The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

DOOLEY'S THE YEAST BEST POWDER TRY IT, SOLD BY GROCERS.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a small portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

GENUINE NORWAY OATS, CHESTER COUNTY MAMMOTH CORN, and ALSIKE CLOVER. Sample packages sent free to all Farmers: also a copy of the AMERICAN STOCK JOURNAL, by inclosing stamp to N. P. BOYER & CO., Parkesburg, Chester Co., Pa.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

LEA & PERRINS'

WORCESTERSHIRE

SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY GOOD Sauce, and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

STAR SPANGLED BANNER

"IT STILL WAVES." Rich, Rare and Racy as ever. 8 large pages, Ledger size, 40 columns of charming Tales, Sketches, Wit, Humor, Fun, Quacks, Humbugs and Swindlers exposed. 200 Swindlers "ventilated" in 1870. It is a paper for LIVE people. It "waves" for all. Established 1863. It is NOT a NEW paper. It belongs to no sect or party. It is reliable, fearless, and truthful—a paper for ALL. There is nothing like it. EVERY subscriber will receive mounted on roller and prepaid, the NEW and superb engraving, "PIONEERS OF AMERICA," one-and-a-half feet by two feet in size, and costing $1000 to engrave. NOW IS THE TIME. We guarantee satisfaction or money refunded. Only 75 cents secures this paper a whole year, and $3 engraving free gratis and prepaid. Specimens for stamp. Address, "Star Spangled Banner," Hinsdale, N. H.

EARTH CLOSET,

Or Commode. WOODRUFF'S IMPROVED PATENT, from $6 50 to $11 00. Absolutely without odor. Indispensable to every family.

A. DRAPER & CO., Sole Agents for U. S.
No. 40 Cortlandt St., New York.

UPHAM'S DEPILATORY POWDER removes superfluous hair in five minutes, without injury to the skin. Sent by mail for $1 25.

UPHAM'S ASTHMA CURE

Relieves most violent paroxysms in five minutes, and effects a speedy cure. Price $2 by mail.

THE JAPANESE HAIR STAIN

Colors the whiskers and hair a beautiful BLACK or BROWN. It consists of only one preparation. 75 cents by mail. Address S. C. UPHAM, No. 721 Jayne Street, Philadelphia, Pa. Circulars sent free. Sold by all Druggists.

A BOOK WORTH ITS WEIGHT IN GOLD.—MADAM LEMAAR'S EVERY WOMAN HER OWN PHYSICIAN. PRICE $1.00, BY MAIL 1.15. BEAUTIFULLY ILLUSTRATED. ADDRESS PEOPLE'S PUB. HOUSE 128 BROADWAY, N. Y.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH thirty years, and was cured in six weeks by a simple remedy. The receipt will be sent, postage free, to all afflicted. Address Rev. T. J. MEAD, Drawer 176, Syracuse, New York.

$4 TO $12 PER DAY.—Extra inducements in cash and premiums to canvassers for "Our Magazine," the best One Dollar Monthly in America. Specimens, 10 cents; or three for 25 cents.
W. R. MATTISON, Publisher, Newton, New Jersey.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

STARTLING DISCLOSURES.—Valuable information for both sexes, especially those contemplating marriage. Address S. R. SHAW, 737 Broadway, New York.

FREE Try samples of our great $1 Weekly. The GAZETTE, Hallowell, Maine.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for MARCH, 1871.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 90 cents.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Nearly Ready.)

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

THE UNITED STATES INTERNAL REVENUE AND TARIFF LAW (passed July 13, 1870), together with the Act imposing Taxes on Distilled Spirits and Tobacco, and for other purposes (approved July 20, 1868), and such other Acts or Parts of Acts relating to Internal Revenue as are now in effect; with Tables of Taxes, a copious Analytical Index, and full Sectional Notes. Compiled by HORACE E. DRESSER. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents; Cloth, $1 00.

ON THE TRAIL OF THE WAR. By ALEXANDER INNES SHAND, Occasional Correspondent of "The London Times." With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 35 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

"VENTRILOQUISTS' GUIDE," a new, complete and sure guide by which any one may become a perfect Ventriloquist. It is the best and largest work on the subject ever published. Written by a retired Ventriloquist of forty years experience. Ventriloquism is not a "natural gift," but an ART easily learned by any one with proper instructions. This unique and wonderful book tells how to make and use the Magic Whistle. How to perfectly imitate every animal; the voices of birds; to imitate bees, flies, &c., &c. It gives instructions for ALL the wonderful Ventriloquial performances of Herrmann, Heller, Blitz, and Harrington; also of the "Hooking Bird," and other imitations as given by various Minstrels. It is the only ORIGINAL book of the kind ever published in America, and while a complete treatise, it is written in plain English, easily understood by any boy, forming a course in Ventriloquism. A neat and neat volume. Sent by mail, post free. Address, HUNTER & CO., Publishers, Hinsdale, N. H.

VENTRILOQUISM

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Devoted to Fashion, Pleasure and Instruction.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & CO., Portland, Maine.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

A GOOD CHARACTER.—We know a fellow who is so excessively hospitable that he will even entertain doubts, and has frequently harbored malice. As for his friends, he is always ready to "take them in."

NOTES AND QUERIES.

1. Who invented plum-pudding? And what did he do with it after he invented it?
2. Who were the Gracchi? And did their mother know when they happened to be out?
3. Why, except for profit, do so-called Christian butchers raise the price of Christmas beef?
4. Do you know the question whereof this is the answer: Because one is a mistletoe, and the other is a missal too?
5. History relates that next morning he repented of that last cigar he smoked. Of whom is this related, and where is the record writ?
6. An ounce of ozone is as heavy as a feather-weight of oxygen. Describe the process of determining this interesting fact.
7. Was it Junius or Julius Cæsar who said that England's best bulwarks were her wooden heads?
8. Can a bill at sight be legally made payable at a Blind Asylum?
9. In what year were the Greek Calends established? How many were there, and what was their relation to the Three Calendars in the "Arabian Nights?"
10. Why does a cook, when she wants to broil a chop, make up such a fire as is enough to broil an elephant?
11. State, from history, your reasons for believing that Alfred the Great was in reality a dwarf?

"FANCY WORK"—Imaginative poetry.

Why should you never carry a portable inkstand?—Because you will find it an ink-convenience.

UP IN THE WORLD—Walking on stilts.

A DEAD RECKONING—Bad debts.

EFFECT OF THE FIFTEENTH AMENDMENT.

INDIGNANT MOTHER. "Cum in out of dat Mud right straight' Fust ting you'll know you'll be took for Irish Chil'en!"

NATURAL SELECTION.—Here's an interesting bit for Dr. Darwin. A country journal states that in its vicinity fashionable young men have taken to wearing ear-rings! And why not? We have no doubt these young persons felt that nature had not endowed them with such an extent of ear to no purpose.

A CHEAP FISH DINNER—Go on the ice, and you can have a good skate for nothing.

What man is most looked up to?—The man in the moon.

"WATER-PIPES."

PATERFAMILIAS'S SONG OF THE FROST.

AIR—"Cherry Ripe."

"Water-pipes, water-pipes, pipes," I cry!
"Been and busted!" low and high.
If I ask the house-maid, "Where?"
She will answer, "Here and there—
Here and there and every where."

Whence they come, and where they go,
Is just the thing I want to know;
But I don't, and that is why
"Plumber! Plumber!" is the cry.
Plumber! Plumber! left and right;
Plumber! Plumber! day and night.

Why are you and I such fools
As submit to builders' rules?
You and I, my friend, and all—
High and low, and great and small
One thing Builder understands—
How to play in Plumber's hands;
And for one thing Builder cares—
To leave openings for "repairs:"
So loose tiles and slates defends,
Drains that finish in "dead ends,"
Tanks and boilers safe to leak,
Chimneys warranted to reek;
Doors and windows placed with craft,
Still to catch you in a draught;
Green wood panels in the doors,
Warping new deal in the floors;
Pipes that run just where they shouldn't,
And burst each frost. Oh, if they wouldn't!

PEDESTRIANISM EXTRAORDINARY—Several plays are now having a long "run."

AN ECLIPSE OF THE SON—Cut off without a penny.

"COMPANY DRILL"—Instructing the servants before your party.

"NATIONAL DEFENSES"—The sea and—its sickness.

QUESTIONABLE HOSPITALITY—Entertaining an idea.

CARD-PARTIES—Newly married couples.

BALLS OF THE SEASON—Snow-balls.

SACCHARINE MATTER—Love.

SEASONABLE, VERY.—What is the difference between eau-de-vie and cold weather?—One tips the nose, and the other nips the toes?

ROMANCE!

YOUNG LADY. "Oh, what a dear little Fellow! But what Medal is that upon his Neck?"
DOG-DEALER. "Badge of Honor, Miss! Saved Four Men from bein' Drownded!"

"STILL URGED HE ON HIS WILD CAREER."

"For Goodness sake, Alexander, don't go on so Dreadful Impetuous, or you'll Pull me off my Legs!"

KNOTTY QUESTIONS FOR NATURALISTS.

Is a sole's female companion a feme sole, or only a loose fish?

Is not a parrot's native tongue a Polly-glot?

Is a bête noir eatable, like whitebait?

Are book-worms the same as leaf-insects?

Does the tapir consume its own oil, and is it liable to spontaneous combustion?

Do the cows in Holland understand low Dutch?

Does it "settle" a duck's bill to cut it off? If so, can you give the receipt?

Are horses in a stable liable to stamp duty?

What becomes of all the crows which the cocks give every day?

Is cream-laid paper producible by cows, or is it produced, like eggs, out of fowl pickings?

Could a grasshopper play at cricket if it had the mind to do so?

Is the beard of an oyster liable to turn gray?

THE FORCE OF HABIT.—Our coachman, when he waits at table, always commits the same fault—he whips away the plates too soon.

A TROUBLESOME ANTAGONIST.—The most difficult task of the whole war must have been silencing Fort Noisy.

HOT AND COLD.—"Quite correct, my dear; the natives of Africa do not require clothes to keep them warm, because they are Hottentots, don't you see? Coolies are a different sort of people altogether. So are the people of Chili."

DEDICATED TO ALL YOUNG HOUSEKEEPERS.

COOK. "Which I'm come to give Warnin', Mum!"

WIDOW'S MITE.—A widow, being cautioned by her minister about flirting, said that she knew it was wrong for unmarried ladies to flirt, but the Bible was her authority. It said "widow's mite." She was flirting awfully at last accounts, her pastor acknowledging that "widow's mite."

When is soup likely to run out of the sauce-pan?—When there is a leek in it.

Why is a whale like a water-lily?—Because it comes to the surface to blow.

Why does walking on the cliffs make you feel sleepy?—Because you see so many yawning chasms.

The girl of the period is accused of being too practical. And yet a glance at her chignon proves how fond she is of building castles in the hair!

An author, ridiculing the idea of ghosts, asks how a dead man can get into a locked room?—Probably with a skeleton-key.

What is the difference between a patriot and a politician?—The politician bleeds his country, and the patriot bleeds for his country.

FAR APART.—A critic said of a lecturer that his words were as far apart as the stations on the Pacific Railway.

HAY AND OATS.—All efforts to make hay by gaslight have failed, but it is discovered that wild oats can be sown under its cheerful rays.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 10.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Silk Ball Dress with Tulle Trimming.

THIS dress, with low-necked basque-waist, is made of pink silk, and trimmed with puffs and ruffles of white tulle. The ruffles are bound two-fifths of an inch wide with pink satin, and between the puffs are set bows and bands of pink satin ribbon. Cut the waist from the pattern of the Low-necked Basque-Waist, Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 8, Supplement, Figs. 78–81; but at the middle of the back cut a slit extending from the bottom of the basque to the end of the waist. Trim the bottom of the waist and the edges of the slit with a puffing of tulle four-fifths of an inch wide, the under edge of which is trimmed with a ruffle an inch and a fifth wide, and the upper edge with a ruffle four-fifths of an inch wide. The bertha is trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with puffings of tulle and silk, and the sleeves are made in the same manner. At the back the train is slit eight inches at the bottom, and the under corners are rounded. Trim the bottom of the skirt with a ruffle five inches wide, above this sew on a puffing an inch and a quarter wide, and above this a ruffle an inch and a quarter wide, which must face the waist. This trimming is continued up the middle of the back of the skirt, but becomes narrower toward the top. Besides this sew on a puffing between the two wide ruffles up the back of the skirt. Trim the front of the skirt with puffings and ruffles, as shown by the illustration. Between the puffings of the front set bands and bows of pink satin ribbon. At the back of the skirt are similar bows. Roses in the hair.

Satin and Gauze Ball Dress.

THIS dress consists of a skirt, over-skirt, and basque-waist. The trained skirt is made of light blue satin, and the tunic of blue silk gauze. The over-skirt is trimmed with a side-pleated ruffle of the material five inches and a half wide, and a similar ruffle an inch and a quarter wide, which must face the neck. The seam made by sewing on these ruffles is covered with a fold of blue satin. The basque is made of gauze, and trimmed in the same manner as the over-skirt, but the wide ruffle is sloped off toward the front corners. In making the skirt and over-skirt, slope the front and side breadths, and cut the back breadths straight. The over-skirt is draped at the sides, and four yards wide at the bottom; it is twenty-one inches and a half long in front, and forty-one inches at the back. For the basque cut from Fig. 22, Supplement, two pieces, and from Fig. 23 one piece. Join these parts according to the corresponding figures, and trim as shown by the illustration. Gather the upper edge of the back of the basque from the middle to : on each side until it is five inches and three-quarters wide there, then gather the fronts slightly from 43 to ∗, and sew the basque between a blue satin belt. Drape the basque at the sides, bringing × on ●. The waist is closed in front by means of satin buttons, and the neck is trimmed with a satin fold and gauze ruffle; a similar ruffle trims the bottom of the short puffed sleeves. Cord the bottom of the waist. Arrange the hair in curls, as shown by the illustration.

CHASING A MOTH.

BY ALICE CARY.

PAINT you my Margery? Paint my maid Margery!
The task being done, were done vainly;
Through love-mists I saw her, and how should I draw her
For eyes that see only too plainly!
I must! Then your fancy must help: do you see
A little low house and a sycamore-tree?

And sloping away through the shimmer of heat
'Twixt the house and the sea, as if never to stop,
The pale yellow waves of a field of ripe wheat,
With lilies and pinks swimming over the top?
The scene is before you. The house, you divine,
Is Margery's mother's; the wheat-field is mine.

Fair baby Margery! dear baby Margery!
How oft I went out of my way just to see
The good mother sitting, with sewing or knitting,
And rocking her cradle beneath the white tree!
And when she could toddle and reach to my hand,
I led her about with me over the land.

The mother was widowed, and poor as could be;
And when the child's birthday afforded excuse,
I turned what had else been an alms, as you see,
Into gifts; and the care that blent beauty with use
Stretched them over bare want for a year, like a screen,
And so little Margery grew to fourteen.

Poor little Margery! proud little Margery!
"My thanks, Sir," she said, "should be double;
With pleasures to cover your charities over
Were surely a twice-taken trouble!"
"'Tis I, not my poor, homely gift you disdain,"
I replied; so we parted in coldness and pain.

I lived after that as a stranger to her;
And next year, the wheat being come to its best,
I heard, at my reaping, a flutter and stir,
As if I had frightened a bird from her nest;

SILK BALL DRESS WITH TULLE TRIMMING.

SATIN AND GAUZE BALL DRESS. [For pattern see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 22 and 23.]

Digitized by Google

Looked up and saw, flying along my gold swath,
The little maid Margery chasing a moth!

Quick-witted Margery! light-footed Margery!
Skimming from hillock to hollow;
Her locks, long and brown, lifting up, letting down,
Like the darkly bright wings of the swallow:
My hand lost its cunning, my sheaf fell apart,
And I from that moment but saw with my heart!

Her coarse frock was flaxen white mingled with fawn;
Its like you may see, if you list,
Whenever the bright-colored shuttle of dawn
Is thrown through the silvery mist;
Her shoes were stubbed out, and her bare little toes,
As they stood in the gap, were as red as a rose.

Willful maid Margery! wayward maid Margery!
Like buds in a moment disparted,
The little pink streaks widened out in her cheeks,
So proud was her pride, so high-hearted:
The princess of rustics, tall, slender, and sweet—
A starry-eyed cardinal set in the wheat.

The wind murmured tender consent in the leaves,
The twilight its shelter outspread;
"Will you bide, dearest Margy, among my ripe sheaves?
I have something to tell you," I said.
She brushed the brown tresses away from her eyes,
And looked down upon me in royal surprise.

One moment, high-hearted and proud as we parted,
She stood; I as witless to move her
As though she were grand lady-queen of the land,
And I her poor page, not her lover!
"I wait, Sir!" "Nay, Margy, I'll keep to my swath."
Then, laughing out lightly, she sped for her moth.

By what little chances of pleasure or pain
Our life-wheels are shoved in some track
So narrow and deep that our efforts are vain,
Tug we never so hard, to turn back!
And just for the wing of a moth, or for sake
Of a moment's brief pride, hearts are suffered to break.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 11, 1871.

☞ Our next Number will contain a Cut Paper Pattern of a Water-proof Cloak, with many other useful and ornamental articles and beautiful engravings.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 158 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Street, House, and Evening Dresses for Young and Old Ladies; Boys' and Girls' Suits; Talmas, Trained Under-Skirts, Paniers; Over-Shoes and Slippers; New Styles for arranging the Hair; Cigar-Holders, Bottle Mats, Tidies, Worsted-work Patterns, Netted Guipure Embroidery, etc., etc.

SOME SOCIAL CUSTOMS.

THERE are some social customs said to be in force at our national capital, which are singular, to say the least, and which we should imagine could hardly obtain any where else on earth. Not to speak of the young lady reported to be a belle there, and to come down to breakfast at the hotel in her own dark hair, and to go out in the evening in a more becoming and gold-colored wig; nor of the young gentleman whose previous wives have an inconvenient habit of turning up just as he celebrates fresh nuptials, but whom society seems to receive as if nothing had happened—not to speak of these or of kindred trifling circumstances, we must declare ourselves to be more particularly amused and amazed at the system of visiting, which correspondents tell us pertains to the capital as much as its climate, and for which its tremendous avenues might seem to have been particularly designed.

This system of visiting consists chiefly in the necessity of calling upon the ladies at the head of the households of those in authority in the place, or else of remaining out of "society," and in the obligation which these ladies feel of returning every one of the calls, not only by cards, but in person, and of inviting every caller to one or more of the grand evening receptions of the winter. The domestic lives which these ladies of high station lead must remain matters of conjecture; for when one has an imperative reception to attend every evening, and, without exaggeration, a thousand calls to make once or twice in a season, there is nothing to do but to live a martyr in one's carriage from noon till night. Indeed, their lives are not objects of envy. At nine in the morning people on business beginning to occupy their husbands' attention; at ten, if they are Congressmen, the husbands going to their committees; at twelve Congress meeting, and at five adjourning; while if, after that, some important political dinner, at which the affairs of the nation are to be settled, does not take them to itself till nearly midnight, then constituents, schemers, and lobbyists doing so. But the expectation of all this must most probably have been learned before entering upon the life; and it is the "calling," that seemed such an airy plaything when they first took it in hand, that presently they find weighing them down beneath the weight of the social world, and which is, indeed, the sheerest waste of time that ever was invented; for, of course, the visit is brief, the faces are unknown, the conversation is void, and the only satisfactory result of the whole thing is the checking off of the name in the visiting-book as done with.

Of course such a state of things must create unusual incidents, especially among the foreigners of the various embassies; and many a circumstance consequent on this mania for calling is said to ring on the laughter of the capital. When, last winter, at an evening party, a foreign lady found herself engaged in a fisticuff affair with another person, she was informed that it was in consequence of her familiarity with the canaille; in spite of which assurance and belief, other strangers, wishing perhaps to conform to the custom of their place of residence, followed her example, and threw open their houses on specified days. An enthusiastic reporter had already kindled the public imagination concerning the beauty of one of these ladies; and those who did not see her leaving her opera-box, and wrapping her ermine-trimmed velvets around her, her yellow hair bare, her proud and rosy face smiling gently over the audience, behind which she passed, her large figure, her noble stature making her seem were determined to see her at her own house, where every week they have flocked, unable to say much to her in English, unable to say any thing at all in French—destroying a vase, or a statuette, or an album, or a photograph, as it might be, but always staring with all their eyes; and one day finishing up their enormities with a procession of deaf-mutes from an asylum, which filed in and gazed at the show, and filed out again, well pleased with the results of the indecorum.

> "A daughter of the gods, divinely tall,
> And most divinely fair,"

But perhaps the greatest nuisance of the whole calling business, and one unquestionably peculiar to the place, is that of a certain sort of reporter. He enters a lady's house on her appointed afternoon, deliberately empties the card-basket in the hall, and takes a list of the names, and sits down in a corner and scribbles off his whole story without the least ado. Or, if the sex be other, she stands behind the throne, note-book in hand, and jots down the minutiæ of the scene, and tells all the universe that cares to know the condition of the guests' lace, let us say—whether it is real, or the purling is sewed on—the last act of the individual being an account of the supposed female correspondents of the place, in which things were told about one lady that she has thought best to deny under her own signature; half a dozen totally false statements were made about another; a robust family of boys was erroneously given to a third; and such liberality of assertion was lavished upon the rest as seriously to alarm both them and their publishers. On the whole, then, in view of such facts and their inferences, we think that, in spite of all the allurements and splendors of the days and nights there, until the calling and the reporting of the social life of the capital are either abolished or reformed, we prefer our more quiet residence as it is.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Parlor Magic.

MY DEAR HELEN,—In any long journey the question of amusement becomes very important. The travelers ask themselves with interest how they are to entertain themselves, and the most universal resource is story-telling. There were the travelers, as we may call them, in Boccaccio's garden at Fiesole who wished to push far beyond any remembrance of the pestilence and death to which they were exposed in Florence, and they beguiled the threatening hours with the gay tales which are oftener mentioned than read. And there were the Pilgrims journeying to Canterbury, who set forth from the Tabard Inn at Southwark, and who upon their way told the stories which Chaucer has repeated, and which often show that the echoes of those garden tales of Boccaccio had floated over the sea to England. Then, more recently, there was the party met at the Wayside Inn, the homely resort of lucky travelers, whose tales Longfellow has commemorated in memorable music. It is evident that story-telling is the kindly magic with which travelers throw a glamour upon their journey, which steals away the sense of weary hours. And in our longer travel, dear Helen, what magic have we for consolation?

On the evening of St. Valentine's Day I went to a children's party at my niece's. It was, in truth, a child's party—not an assembly of young people dressed with a criminal extravagance, each one of whom seems to say, with the absurd costliness of her dress, "See what a very foolish woman my mother is, who knows no better than to array me as if I were a ridiculous old woman devoted to dress, instead of a little girl!" No; it was not one of those melancholy assemblies, at which Mrs. Jones tries to extinguish Mrs. Smith by the richness of her child's toilette, and where Mrs. Jenkins is consumed with chagrin if she sees Mrs. Thompson's daughter more superbly dressed than her own. It was a children's party, where the young people were all neatly and prettily dressed; for I don't mean, Helen, that they should be clad in crash, nor in dull gingham gowns. I would have them brightly and freshly dressed—no one so poorly as to be conscious of disparity, no one so expensively as to feel a mean superiority. They were romping and rollicking when I went in. They were spinning the platter and driving stage-coach; they were feeding the chickens, and there was a main of fighting cocks amidst tumultuous laughter; they were kneeling to the wittiest, and bowing to the prettiest, and kissing the one they loved best; they were hunting the slipper, and chasing the fox; and the toddlers were opening the gates as high as the sky to let King George and his troops pass by.

It was the gayest scene—a second Christmas-eve; and when the rompers were a little tired, Uncle Hokey, who is the idol of all children, the very Lord of Misrule, exclaimed, "And now for some parlor magic." The little folks all sat down on the chairs, on the sofas, and upon the floor; and Uncle Hokey, with a very solemn face, went behind a table, and sent for tumblers and spoons and other things which he did not mention aloud; and then, with a great deal of hocus-pocus and presto! change! and mysterious mumblings and mutterings, he proceeded to do the most wonderful things. He showed a shilling—which I suppose Uncle Hokey had saved in an old stocking for this very purpose, for I don't know any one else who has shilling pieces—and he slipped it up his sleeve, then bade every body look up and see it fall through the ceiling; and clink! it came from somewhere, rattling into a basin upon the table. Then he put something into a box, and shutting the box he blew upon it, and opening it the thing was gone! Or he laid a marble upon the table, then placed his hat over it, spoke some mysterious words, lifted the hat, but nothing was there! Then he asked young Master Callipee to step forward, and put his hand in his pocket, and pull out what he found there, and show it to the ladies and gentlemen. Upon which Master Callipee obeyed; and lo! there was the missing marble.

Perhaps, my dear Helen, you have seen performances like these of parlor magic; and perhaps as you looked at them you thought, as I did, that it was a very pretty way of amusing our young fellow-travelers. It was their Boccaccio garden of delight, their "Canterbury Tales," their "Tales of the Wayside Inn." It was a very pretty entertainment for our dear little people, you thought; but I wonder if it occurred to you that there was another kind of parlor magic which was no less delightful to us older people. Indeed, I am inclined to believe that parlor magic is the surest spell of enjoyment that we travelers can throw over our great journey. It is not exactly by slipping shillings up our sleeves, and then watching to see them drop through the ceiling, nor by taking unexpected marbles from our pockets, nor by those extraordinary hat transformations that we are likely to be beguiled. But there is a magic of the parlor which makes the long journey a long delight—a magic which can not be bought, which can not, indeed, always be learned, and which comes most bounteously and beautifully by nature. Yet I think all of us travelers have a share of it for our outfit, and it is for us to determine whether to make much of it or little.

Thus, if I should go to the Giraffes—where, of course, I am never invited—I am sure that I should find all the luxury that money can buy. I should see a tesselated marble pavement in the hall, and a marvelous staircase. I should remark curtains, and ormolu tables, and superb cabinets, and soft, luxurious carpets, and pictures in costly frames. Mrs. Giraffe and her daughters would be dazzlingly arrayed. The mother, indeed, would probably seem to me a corruscation of jewels; and when she should please to say, "Mr. Bachelor, come in and take a cup of tea," it would be with such an air that I should feel the only proper acknowledgment would be to throw myself prostrate upon the floor, and crawl, as the loyal Siamese do before their ineffable sovereign; and when this shining and condescending lady preceded me into the dining-room, devastating grammar and laying waste our native language as she went, I should be wondering why so magnificent a lady did not have the tea brought to her in the drawing-room, instead of going to it in the dining-room.

Upon the table I should see the most costly tea equipage, and we should all sip in the stateliest way the very washiest of tea. Indeed, my dear Helen, every thing would be very splendid and very stiff and utterly unenjoyable, and I know how glad I should be when I could escape; for I should feel as if I had been put upon my good behavior in a cabinet wareroom and a silversmith's and an upholsterer's. It would be a home bought at a shop at so much a yard and so much a pound. It would be a home without any homelikeness; and Mrs. Giraffe and the Misses Giraffe would seem to me to have no more to do with it than with ready-furnished apartments at a fine hotel. As I stood in her magnificent drawing-room I should be very sure that this was a lady who had not the parlor magic which could alone turn it all into a pretty and pleasant home.

Or we might go into a very different house from that of the Giraffes—little Mrs. Alfred Angle's, for instance. They are not fashionable and splendid people. They do not drive a clarence nor have ormolu cabinets. Alfred is a fine young fellow, living upon a comfortable salary, and Mrs. Alfred is a loving spouse, and they do not sigh, as some people do, that they are not Giraffes. But when you are in their house you can not help feeling that something is wanting. There is the usual furniture, and it is of the usual pattern, and that is all. If there is a table, it is not a pretty table. If you ask for a glass of water, it is poured out of an ugly pitcher into a clumsy glass. The carpet is of an unhandsome pattern, and it is out of keeping with the curtains. The curtains cost a great deal of money, but they have a very common look. You are asked to stop to tea, and it is served in a graceless tea-pot covered with a mean figure, and the forms of the sugar-bowl and cream-pitcher are painful to contemplate. I have heard of tea served at the Angles' in an ugly brown-ware pot, with a large, plain, white china sugar-bowl, and a gold and yellow pitcher for hot water, and a plated cream-pitcher. There is nothing cozy or comfortable in the aspect of the rooms; but Mr. and Mrs. Alfred are very hearty and pleasant people, and they are not niggardly, and cheerfully pay for what they want. Still little Mrs. Angle has not the parlor magic which would instinctively fill her rooms with graceful and lovely forms.

Now my little friend Clover Harebell, who lives very near the Angles, is the deftest of parlor magicians. Her skill is as exquisite as Uncle Hokey's, but shows itself in a very different way. Clover and her husband have not more money to spend than Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Angle, but it is astonishing how much more this necromancer gets out of it. It really seems as if her gold must be more golden than that of any one else: and it is certainly wonderful, if there are only one hundred cents in her dollar. I see a great many of my young friends who wish to be economical, and who, indeed, must be; and they pass the whole day in buying little objects of various kinds to furnish their houses, and it is deplorable to see the result; to behold the ugliness and clumsiness and tastelessness and tawdriness in which they patiently and with the best purpose invest their money. But Clover has the magical touch that selects the very prettiest and quaintest and most tasteful of objects. The dress she buys costs no more than that of a dozen of her friends, and not a quarter as much as yours would, I suppose, my dear Helen; but no dress could be so exactly and exquisitely fit for her. She makes a bonnet, and trims it so that nobody looks so lovely and comme il faut; but it costs very little. The shades of her ribbons are always exquisite; her collars and trimmings are always choice; my young friends of the better sex whisper to me privately that there is no waste, no dross, as it were, in her wardrobe or in the appointments of her house. She is not extravagant. Indeed, Harebell himself has but a moderate salary; but her delicate magic makes every thing tell.

If you are fortunate enough to take tea with her, you see in that pretty room, where there is no extravagance, but infinite taste, which is not like a goldsmith's or cabinet-maker's shop any more than the most airy filigree of Genoa is like the coarsest gold ore—in that pleasant room you see the quaintest tea-service, as dainty as if Benvenuto had wrought it for a princess, yet not half so costly as that imposing array of the Giraffes. There are harmony and taste and grace every where, which are the sure sign of that parlor magic which transforms the simplest and plainest home into a kind of fairy bower. Of course, my dear Helen, love is the chief element in the happy household; but love loves a tasteful and beautiful expression. Because Harry loves you, and you are sure of it, and because you do not fear that any change of fortune or adverse fate would chill that love, is it desirable for you to be careless, or even dowdy?

I am but an observer of these nuptial bowers into which my young fellow-travelers withdraw, my dear Helen, but I am not so old that I do not recall in my own experience the feeling from which the happiness of those nests springs; and I am sure that the rose-bud which Romeo carries to his Juliet adds a charm to their love; and so I know that the parlor magic which touches all the objects and details of their household with grace and beauty deepens the happiness of their lives. Uncle Hokey was the parlor magician of sixpences and hats and marbles. The most common, the most trivial thing became wonderful under that glamour. The children sat and smiled, eagerly attentive and delighted. But that finer magic, which deals with the trivialities of another kind, and makes them charming, is one of the happiest gifts that I could wish any of my fellow-travelers; and therefore, my dear Helen, I wish it, with all my heart, for you.

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING GOODS.

AMONG suit materials shown for spring is a wiry cotton and wool mixture called English mohair. It is in all the gray, brown, and écru shades, with old-fashioned lilac, spring green, clear, light blue, and bright rose-color. The goods is a solid color, with an embossed stripe of white near each selvedge, and in some cases a sort of crimped fringe, showing white, is made by cutting off the selvedge. These are to be made up after the fashion of the shawl suits that had a brief reign last year, and will furnish their own trimming. Some of the gray and brown patterns have gold-colored borders, while others have the gay Roman stripe. They sell for 60 cents a yard.

Digitized by Google

Next there are the grisaille serges, wool with silk face, in all the grisaille shades that can be formed by alternate bias twills of white and black. These clean-looking grays are especially adapted for spring. Besides these, all the stylish brown shades—cigar, chocolate, and nut brown—are shown in similar diagonal goods. Three-fourths of a yard wide, the price is $1 a yard.

Japanese silk of wiry linen and silk is shown in a variety of styles. The lowest priced are solid grounds, in the usual gray and brown shades, for 75 cents a yard. Dyed colors in écru and green are $1. Another style, imitating the real silks worn in summer, has white ground with double stripe of high color. These are suitable for home dresses and children's suits, are twenty inches wide, and $1 25 a yard. Pin-head checks of every color with white are $1. Larger shepherd's check, in black and white blocks, the broken plaids, and mixed gray or brown Chines, are $1 10. The cool and serviceable pongees of last year are brought out again without any change in appearance. They cost from $1 to $1 50 a yard.

Pattern dresses for the house are shown in empress cloth of light quality and color suitable for spring. Two shades of color are in each suit. For instance, all of the dress skirt visible is covered with three scant flounces of chocolate brown, while the long over dress is of darker nut brown. Sometimes a flounce in gay cashmere color and design is placed between the flounces on the skirt, and a cashmere border trims the polonaise. The dress pattern is $12. Morning robes of real cashmere are solid grounds with a flounce in India cashmere designs, and trimming for the neck and sleeves. Others have a loose jacket, and half-flowing sleeves with bright border. Prices range from $14 to $16.

One of the handsomest fabrics noted for suits is ottoman velours, in many light and stylish colors, for warmer weather. This velours, though not of heavy quality, has thick ottoman cords or reps crossing it, and is as glossy and well finished as Irish poplin. It is not reversible. The stylish shades are granite, écru, pale ashes of rose, chocolate, golden and cigar brown, and the green-tinged gray called absinthe: $1 50 a yard is the price, and three-quarters of a yard the width. French poplins are shown in all the shades just mentioned for $1 50. Pym's best Irish poplin is $2 25.

PASSEMENTERIE.

In the way of trimming there are new designs in passementerie, combining elaborate patterns of gimp with fringe. The gimp is wrought to form a scalloped edge below, and narrow crimped fringe, scarcely wider than Tom Thumb fringe, is attached to the scallops. Guipure edging also forms a part of new silk passementeries. Gothic patterns of passementerie, with long, slender, pointed figures at intervals, are stylish; the tapering point is placed between the box-pleats of ruffles. Cotton gimps with square cords will be offered again for trimming wash goods. Thick, rich-looking designs will be wrought in braid on many of the handsomest garments for spring.

CHINA CRAPE PALETOTS.

The first wraps imported for spring are models of elegance; but as they are made of China crape, we do not expect them to be durable. The material is black China crape, like the old-fashioned Canton crape of shawls, and the lining is thinnest silk, either lavender, salmon, or pale blue. The paletot falls in with the line of the figure, being sloped in the single seam that passes down the centre of the back. A funnel-shaped fold in the Watteau fashion begins at the neck behind, and widens below, where the garment is curved open to the waist. The sleeves are plain Orientals, wide and flowing. The neck is finished with a standing frill of black lace, and the trimming is very rich braiding of black soutache in a rose-vine pattern, with the edge finished by two kinds of fringe, a crimped fringe being laid over straight sewing silk fringe. The braiding is three inches wide, and the fringe four inches. These crape paletots will be cooler than those of gros grain for summer wear, and can be made of the Canton crape shawls that are now out of style. These shawls dye black and ashes-of-roses shades very well.

BLACK GRENADINE SUITS.

Correspondents at the South, and others who prepare their wardrobes in advance of the season, are already asking for hints to guide them in making summer dresses, especially the black grenadine suit that forms so valuable a part of a summer outfit. The polonaise and single skirt will be the model for such suits, and we remark in passing that the neck and sleeve linings of thin dresses should not be cut out. That fashion has become obsolete here, and looks vulgar, especially on the street. A black grenadine costume seen at a most refined French house is now being copied for Southern customers. The skirt, of walking-dress length, is of black silk, an ordinary gros grain without a covering of grenadine, but trimmed above the knee with grenadine flounces. Around the bottom are two side-pleated ruffles, straight, and each four inches wide when hemmed. Above and overlapping these is a wide bias gathered flounce, over which is draped a loose chain of puffs, and the final heading is two erect pleatings, each an inch wide. The polonaise of grenadine is long enough to reach to this trimming. It is tight-fitting, being lined with strong black silk, and shaped by darts and side bodies. The unlined skirt of the polonaise is in one piece with the waist, but has added fullness behind. It hangs plainly in the back, but is caught up high on the sides. A side pleating four inches wide, with an inch-wide pleated heading, is the trimming. The sleeves are duchesse-shaped coat-sleeves, with an opening up the outer seam to the elbow. A pleating surrounds the wrist and extends up the opening, while inside is a ruffled fall of black lace. The neck has also a pleating and lace. Long looped bows made of thick gros grain doubled, and two inches wide when sewed together, are placed on the hips and on the back of the waist.

LACES AND COLLARS.

A late importation of lace contains the lovely point duchesse lace, both black and white. Lovers of novelty think no lace makes a garment so distinguished-looking as this. It is similar to the old-fashioned Honiton, is less expensive than fine Valenciennes, and promises to be a feature in the trimmings of the summer. White duchesse will trim the finest white muslins, while the black will appear on confections and costumes of black silk and grenadine. A lovely piece of black duchesse, two inches wide, is marked $5 50 a yard; another, three inches wide, is $7. Wider white duchesse, for flounces of silk dresses, has borders of fern leaves beautifully shaded, heart's-ease, and clusters of forget-me-nots tied by true-love knots all wrought in the lace—a heavy pattern on very wide irregular meshes. These laces are four or five inches wide, worth from $9 to $25 a yard. Flounces of exquisite Valenciennes are among the varieties. One specimen, eight inches wide, is $35 a yard. Some fine point laces have just been brought from abroad. A curiosity among these is the point de Brabante, with thread lace meshes and Valenciennes figure. The only piece to be found in this country is four inches wide, and $17 a yard. A pair of flounces of round point, a wide flounce with narrow upper heading, are of marvelous beauty. Each petal of the flowers is a tangible thing, wrought separately, and may be taken in the fingers and lifted apart from the others. The set is $400. A trousseau of point has but four pieces, and is marked $2200. There is the shawl—a large point, with heavily wrought convolvuli on very fine meshes—which will be used as the bridal veil, a flounce, lace for garniture, and a handkerchief. A single specimen of the rare old point de Venise, finest of all laces, is shown for $55 a yard. Lace handkerchiefs remain square in shape.

Of lace mantles the large point will continue the favorite shape. Llama laces are greatly worn even by ladies who can afford better. A llama point for $100 is exceedingly pretty, and might deceive ladies who think themselves connoisseurs in laces. The thread lace points that are worn by the average number of promenaders range from $125 to $250 in price. There are new designs this year with tiniest vines wrought in intricate geometrical patterns. The newest linen collar is called the Lorne, after the fiancé of the Princess Louise. It is like the English collar worn by gentlemen—a high, straight band, with the smallest bit of the points at the throat turned over. A shoulder piece of muslin is sewed to it, to keep it in place. Price 20 cents. The square cuffs to match are also turned over in a point. It is said that Byron collars of fine linen, exquisitely needle-worked, will be worn again. These cost from $5 to $8.

VARIETIES.

On bright, sunny days fur boas are cast aside, and, instead, a long width of plain or dotted net, or else a square of guipure, is worn around the neck, and tied in front. This is, of course, not used for warmth; but it affords some protection from the wind, and is exceedingly becoming.

With the return of Lent—the penitential season—black is more universally worn than ever, many ladies refusing even to wear a color at the throat or on the bonnet. Black cashmere suits are in requisition for church and morning toilettes, black silk and velvet costumes for afternoon and evening. As spring advances, the heavy velvet trimmings, now so universal, will give way to silk bands and flounces. Cashmere over dresses—black, brown, prune, and dark green—are now trimmed with narrow ruffles of silk like the skirt over which they are worn. A few colored cashmeres are trimmed with black guipure, but this lace should be used only on black cashmeres. Many over dresses and upper skirts have buttons or bows down the front, and it is predicted that this fashion will prevail. A pale gray cashmere over dress is being prepared for spring. It has passementerie and fringe trimming. A pretty collar, cuffs, and very tiny pockets are shaped out of the passementerie. These may be imitated in braiding by sewing the braid together over paper on which the design is traced. This gray casaque can be worn either over a gray silk skirt or else one of black silk.

For information received thanks are due Madame DIEDEN; and Messrs. SCHMAUDER; A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and JOHNSON, BURNS, & Co.

PERSONAL.

MRS. ANNIE L. GAMFIELD, recently appointed Deputy Collector of Internal Revenue, in Ohio, is the first of her sex who has been appointed to any office in the internal revenue service of this country. She is understood to be one of the most competent of the Buckeye functionaries.

—The pleasantest part of preparing these "Personals" is to make note of the benefactions of liberal men—like this: SAMUEL E. SAWYER, of Gloucester, Massachusetts, has just given ten thousand dollars to the Lyceum Library of that town. None but top-sawyers do that sort of thing.

—General KILPATRICK, who was a classmate of General UPTON, the present Commandant of Cadets at West Point, whose conduct during the recent troubles at West Point has been admirable, says that he was notable while a cadet for his manliness, and moral as well as physical courage; and tells this incident of him: "A cadet named GIBBS, from South Carolina, had made some disparaging remarks concerning UPTON, which, coming to his ears, he resolved to resent. One noon, as we were drawn up preparatory to marching to the mess-room, UPTON stepped out from his position on the right of the battalion, walked deliberately down the line to the extreme left, where GIBBS was standing, and asked him if he had used the language attributed to him. Upon receiving an affirmative reply he brought his hand down on the face of the villifier with a ringing slap; whereupon instantly a score of high-toned Southerners pounced upon the daring UPTON, and it was with the utmost difficulty that he was rescued from their clutches by those who were willing to see fair play."

—President ANGELL, of the University of Vermont, has finally winged his way to the presidency of the Michigan University, borne on a pinion of $4500 a year, and will alight in a house expressly provided for him by the University.

—Secretary ROBESON, bachelor as he is, and given to hospitality, is said to be one of the most industrious government officials in Washington. He is Secretary of the Navy, and is rapidly familiarizing himself with the details of his Department, its requirements, and what it ought to do.

—The Rev. ROBERT COLLYER, of Chicago, recently preached a sermon on "What it Costs to Get Married." Of course we can't name the price in Chicago; but here, in New York, the figures range from about $1 50 to $100—the latter only in extreme cases of opulence, at Grace Church or Dr. ADAMS'S. Instances have been known among persons in "indignant circumstances," offering as low as 62½ cents, but that sum is estimated to be rather thin for a nuptial gift to the parson.

—How LONGFELLOW came to write "Evangeline" is thus pleasantly described in one of the "Whispers" of Mr. JAMES T. FIELDS: "HAWTHORNE dined one day with LONGFELLOW, and brought with him a friend from Salem. After dinner the friend said: 'I have been trying to persuade HAWTHORNE to write a story, based upon a legend of Acadie, and still current there—the legend of a girl who, in the dispersion of the Acadians, was separated from her lover, and passed her life in waiting and seeking for him, and only found him dying in a hospital when both were old.' LONGFELLOW wondered that this legend did not strike the fancy of HAWTHORNE, and said to him: 'If you have really made up your mind not to use it for a story, will you give it to me for a poem?' To this HAWTHORNE assented, and moreover promised not to treat the subject in prose till LONGFELLOW had seen what he could do with it in verse. And so we have 'Evangeline' in beautiful hexameters—a poem that will hold its place in literature while true affection lasts. HAWTHORNE rejoiced in this great success of LONGFELLOW, and loved to count up the editions, both foreign and American, of this now world-renowned poem."

—General JAMES H. WILSON, one of the best cavalry officers during the late war, has resigned from the army to take the vice-presidency of the St. Louis and Southeastern Railroad, making his residence in this city.

—A London lawyer named JENKINS, son of a Montreal clergyman, is the author of that celebrated work, "Ginx's Baby."

—The spirit of EMANUEL SWEDENBORG is doubtless pleased with the report that two of the ablest men of the South, ALEXANDER H. STEPHENS and HERSCHEL V. JOHNSON, have adopted his religious platform. Mrs. JOHNSON, one of the most brilliant women of the South, has been long a believer in the doctrines of E. S.

—The Boston Commonwealth is authority for saying that the highest price paid for an article in the Atlantic Monthly, even to such favorite contributors as LOWELL, EMERSON, or HOLMES, is $250.

—GARIBALDI'S only daughter, TERESITA, is just deceased in Italy. She was twin-sister of RICCIOTTI, his youngest son, and the General's favorite child, and an amiable and kind-hearted woman.

—A Washington letter-writer thinks that General FREMONT'S greatest exploit as a "pathfinder" was when he found Miss JESSIE BENTON, and induced her to "change her local habitation and her name." She is one of the most accomplished and fascinating women at Washington.

—GEORGE WASHINGTON'S folio family Bible has recently come into the possession of PORTER & COATES, of Philadelphia. It is in three volumes; was printed at Bath, in 1785; is in good preservation, and is valued at $3000.

—Mr. R. B. ELLIOTT, the colored member of Congress from South Carolina, who has just taken his seat, is said to be well educated, and the best public speaker of his race in the South. He has held several offices in South Carolina.

—Those astute Chicago men didn't catch Mr. BRET HARTE, after all, with the $5000 per annum bait. He comes to the East'ard, where all the bright people are coming; in fact, he panted to come, "as the Harte panteth for the water brooks."

—Thirty thousand $'s per annum, and one hundred and fifty thousand cash down, is the figure that Parliament has unanimously donated to the Princess LOUISE on her wedding young Mr. LORNE.

—The proposition to raise a fund for the benefit of the daughters of the late Chief Justice TANEY promises to be a great success. New Orleans has promised $3500 at least. Not to make it a success would be a reproach to the American bar.

—Mr. CHARLES FRANCIS ADAMS, the elder, is a man of small stature, being not over five feet in height, and weighing about one hundred pounds. His head, which is not large, is bald, with a fringe of white hair, and he has the expression of sixty years on his countenance. He reminds one of his distinguished father, JOHN QUINCY ADAMS. His figure and appearance resemble, in some respects, those of Admiral FARRAGUT, though he is very much slighter; and as he stood in the middle of the great stage of the Academy of Music he recalled, in a curious way, the picture of Punch as he appears on the title-page of the Punch periodical. He conveys, withal, the historical idea of the statesman and diplomatist, the man of culture, refinement, and breeding—the man of scholarship, talent, experience, and affairs. At a recent public assemblage in Boston he was dressed in black, with a white neck-tie, and his coat was the old-fashioned style of English dress-coat. His voice, though any thing but loud, is clear, and his enunciation was so very distinct that every word was heard by the entire audience, which filled the immense and splendid building.

—Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, who takes the place of Sir JOHN ROSE as one of the British High Commissioners, is fifty-three years of age, represents a very old family, and has talent. He was educated at Oxford, where he was first-class in classics, and third-class in mathematics; has held a number of offices—in fact, has been in office most of the time since he entered public life sixteen years ago. The reason why he takes the place of Sir JOHN ROSE is that Sir JOHN is a partner in business here with Mr. L. P. MORTON, banker; besides which, he married an American wife, and, on the whole, thinks he is a little too much American. But Sir JOHN ROSE is the man who originated the idea of the High Commission, and who now has the satisfaction of seeing it carried out.

—The Countess of Durham has just deceased in England at the age of thirty-six. She had been married sixteen years, and was the mother of thirteen children. Her father, the Duke of Abercorn, was in a double sense the creation of Mr. DISRAELI, for he gave him his dukedom, and put him in "Lothair" as the Duke of Brentham, the elegant noble who, putting the last touch to his consummate toilette, thanks Heaven every morning that his family is not unworthy of him. The daughters, "after seventeen years of a delicious home, were presented, and immediately married, and all to personages of the highest distinction." This has been really true of the Abercorn girls. Lord Lichfield (Lord Elcho's brother-in-law) carried off the eldest; the next was the Countess of Durham; the third, Countess of Dalkeith, her husband being heir to the dukedom of Buccleuch; the fourth, Lord Mount Edgecumbe; the fifth, the Marquis of Blandford (heir to the Duke of Marlborough); and the sixth, the Marquis of Lansdowne, who in social and territorial rank is quite as great as a duke. There is still a seventh daughter, who may, perhaps, link the crowd of family coronets with royalty itself.

—Little incident at Davenport, Iowa: When Mrs. STANTON lectured, recently, in that city, she was introduced to the audience by Mr. LOUNSBURY, President of Griswold College. Mrs. S. remarked that she had not had the pleasure of meeting Mr. LOUNSBURY since they contended for a Greek prize long ago, at the Johnstown Academy. The President gallantly responded that on that occasion he was beaten by Miss ELIZABETH CADY, and that he had always regarded his defeat as a high honor; for Miss CADY was the best Greek and Latin scholar in the academy.

—ALEXANDRE DUMAS'S daughter, a pious girl, writes to M. VEUILLOT, of the Univers, that the old gentleman, her father, died a Catholic, after receiving the last sacraments.

—Mr. A. T. STEWART proposes to dispatch at once to France a vessel with 5000 barrels of flour for the suffering poor. Mr. S. did a similar thing a few years ago, by sending a ship-load of provisions to Ireland.

—The Duchess De Frias, who died recently in Madrid, was a daughter of BALFE, the composer. Many years ago she was married to Sir JOHN FIENNES CRAMPTON, formerly British minister at Washington, but obtained a divorce from him in 1863.

—Among the Americans who remained in Paris during the siege were Dr. HUMPHREYS and Dr. MARY C. PUTNAM, of this city, who are in the French service as surgeons. The latter is a daughter of Mr. GEORGE P. PUTNAM, the publisher.

—Governor MERRILL, of Iowa, recently visited the State penitentiary, and commenced a little speech to the inmates with the cheery remark that "he was glad to see so many there!" But he managed to retreat gracefully.

—Governor HOFFMAN has received during the past year more than 1000 applications for pardon. Of this number he granted eighty-five, commuted thirty-four, and reprieved one.

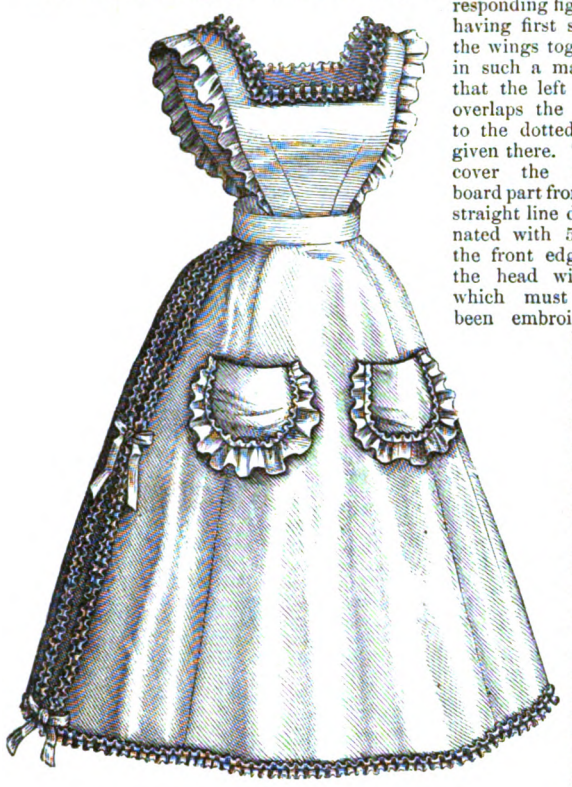
—"Uncle DANIEL," as Mr. DANIEL DREW is pleasantly spoken to and of in Wall Street, is not much given to stunning attire. Going to Albany once on the steamer that bears his name, he was accosted by a passenger, who took him for one of the crew, with, "Do you belong to this boat?" "No," said Mr. D., quietly, "the boat belongs to me."

—It is seldom we can chronicle a "Personal" like the following, taken from a recent number of the Lexington (Kentucky) Daily Press: "On Sunday last, as the venerable Chief Justice ROBERTSON, stricken by the hand of death, lay, almost insensible to the world, which he seemed fast leaving forever, while the gigantic brain, which for so many years has throbbed grandly to the inspiration of his genius, barely fluttered with the consciousness of life, he expressed a desire to hear Miss CARY sing the ballad of 'Old Folks at Home,' as if the strains of his favorite melody would have power to call back his soul from the portals of the grave, which he was so fast nearing. The wish was at once communicated to Miss CARY, who willingly consented to do any thing in her power to rouse the ebbing current of life in one who, as a statesman or jurist, has known but few rivals during the course of a long and eventful life. On reaching the residence of Judge ROBERTSON Miss CARY was at once ushered into the chamber where so much of intellect and learning was fast flickering out into the darkness of the unknown hereafter; and, without accompaniment of any kind, raised her rich contralto voice in the touching words, 'Way down upon the Swanee River;' but, before she had sang three lines, broke down in the intensity of her emotion. Calming herself, she again essayed the ballad, and, while the venerable and stricken man lay drinking her glorious melody, poured out her whole soul in the simple utterances which gave so much pleasure to one whose giant intellect had in days a-gone fascinated the most talented of the land. When she had ceased Judge ROBERTSON could scarcely express his gratification by signs, yet signified a desire that Miss CARY should sing for him, 'Home, Sweet Home.' Twice did the gifted artist attempt to comply with the request, but her emotion was too great, and, choked with feeling, she was compelled to leave the room. The whole incident was one of the most touching and affecting episodes that ever marked the death-bed of departing greatness."

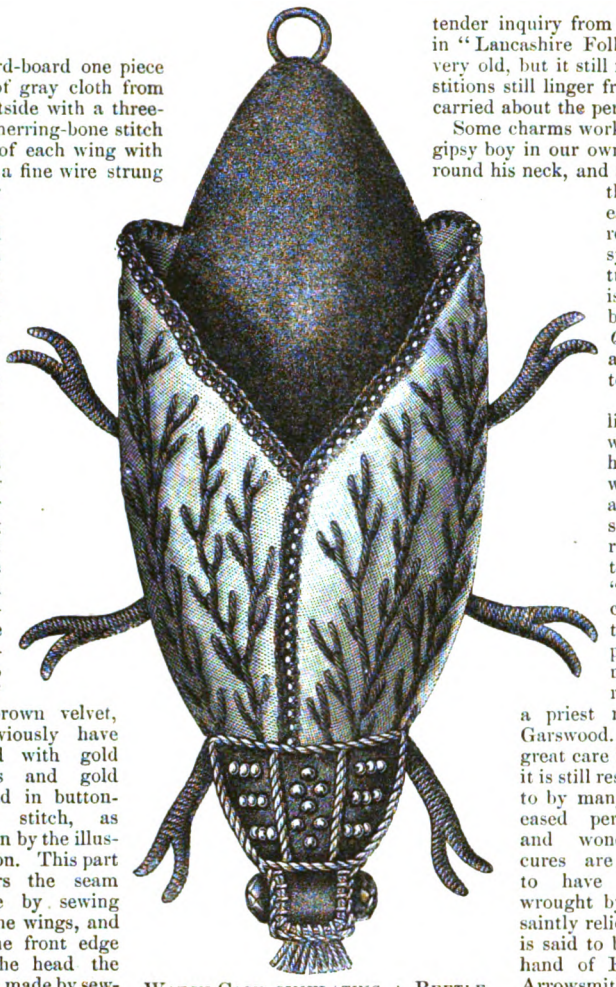
Digitized by Google

Watch-Case simulating a Beetle.

To make this watch-case cut for the body of the beetle of card-board one piece from Fig. 28 of the Supplement, and for the wings two pieces of gray cloth from Fig. 29 of the Supplement. Cover each of these pieces on the outside with a three-fold layer of light gray crape, embroidered with blue silk twist in herring-bone stitch as shown by the illustration, and work the scalloped outer edge of each wing with blue silk twist in button-hole stitch, sewing in at the same time a fine wire strung with steel beads, with a button-hole stitch after each bead. Cover the card-board part at the end marked "head" with brown velvet, reaching to the first straight line; at the front edge of the head the velvet projects four-fifths of an inch, and is turned over on the under side of the card-board, and fastened down there. The double material is felled together at the side edges, and two cut jet beads are fastened there for the eyes. From the other end to the straight line marked with 51 cover the card-board on the upper side first with cotton batting and then with blue velvet; at the outer edges the blue velvet is turned over on the under side two-fifths of an inch wide, and fastened down there with mucilage. Join the part thus prepared with the wings according to the corresponding figures, having first sewed the wings together in such a manner that the left wing overlaps the right to the dotted line given there. Then cover the card-board part from the straight line designated with 51 to the front edge of the head with brown velvet, which must previously have been embroidered with gold beads and gold thread in button-hole stitch, as shown by the illustration. This part covers the seam made by sewing on the wings, and at the front edge of the head the seam made by sewing on a bunch of short gold threads. After fastening the velvet part sew on fine gold cord, as shown by the illustration. For each of the six feet take two pieces of black bonnet wire each an inch and three-fifths long, wind three-fifths of an inch of one end of each wire with black silk, and then wind both wires together as shown by the illustration. Bend the wires as shown by the illustration, and join them with the lengthwise edges of a piece of card-board, which must be cut from Fig. 28, Supplement, but without a head, and three-fifths of an inch smaller all around. Sew this piece to the under side of the watch-case, letting the feet come between the card-board parts. On the under side of the watch-case paste a covering of gray enameled cloth, and with the upper end join a brass ring covered with blue silk, whereby to hang it up.



KITCHEN APRON TRIMMED WITH RUCHES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 56-58.



WATCH-CASE SIMULATING A BEETLE.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 28 and 29.

EMPRESS CLOTH DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 2 TO 4 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 24-27.

Fan with Satin Stitch Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS fan consists of an ivory frame covered with white silk on both sides as shown by the illustration. The covering of one side is ornamented with satin stitch and point Russe embroidery, which is worked with shaded red and shaded green silk twist. Fig. 2 gives a full-sized section of the embroidery. The upper edge of the fan is trimmed with lace four-fifths of an inch wide. The fan is finished with a white silk cord and tassel. The frame of an old fan may be covered in this way, and turned to advantage.

Crape, Lace, and Gros Grain Bertha.

See illustration on page 149.

THIS bertha is made of box-pleated crape, and trimmed with a ruffle of the same cut in points and arranged in double box-pleats. Trim the outer edge of the ruffle with lace three-fifths of an inch wide, and above this set on blue gros grain ribbon two-fifths of an inch wide. Cut the foundation of the bertha of wash lace from Fig. 60 of No. XVI. of the Supplement, letting the under edge reach only to the dotted line given there. Cover this foundation, in the manner shown by the illustration, with box-pleated crape, lace, and ribbon. For the ruffle take a double piece of crape four inches and a half wide, and of the requisite length. Cut the under edge of this strip in points, as shown by Fig. 61, Supplement, and trim it according to the illustration. Slope the upper edge in such a manner that the part coming on the shoulders is only two inches and a half wide. Arrange the upper edge in double box-pleats, bringing × on ○; the dotted lines on Fig. 61 indicate the folds of the pleats. Sew the ruffle thus prepared to the under side of the bertha. At the right side of the bertha place a bow made of blue gros grain ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide and flowers.

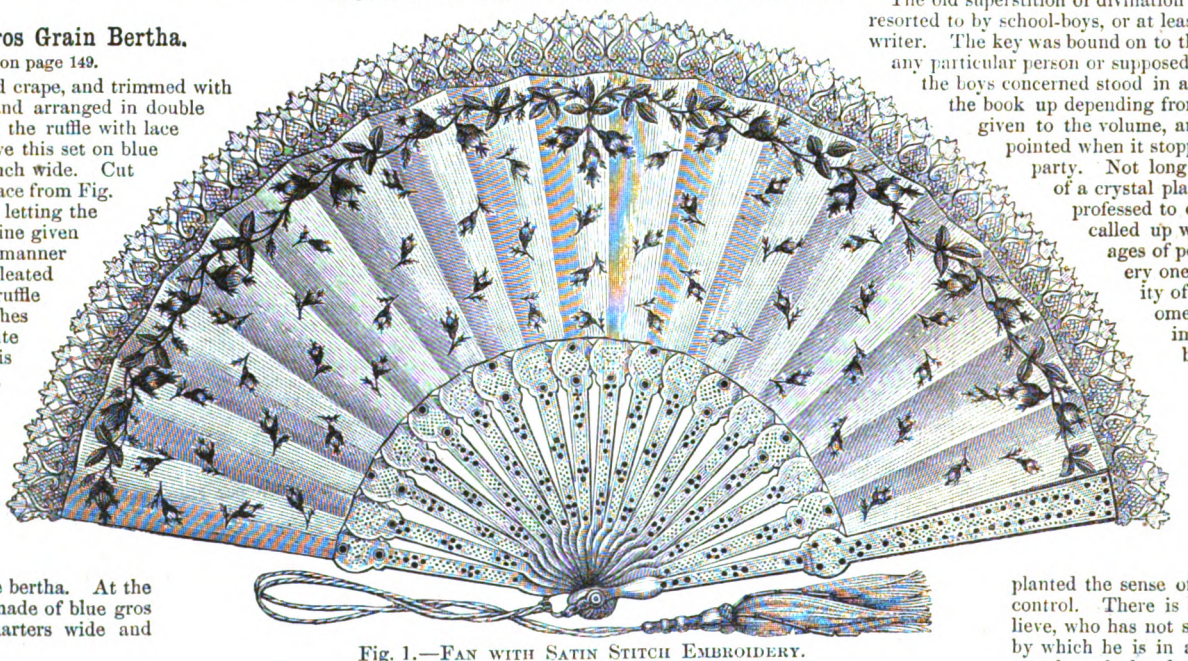


Fig. 1.—FAN WITH SATIN STITCH EMBROIDERY.

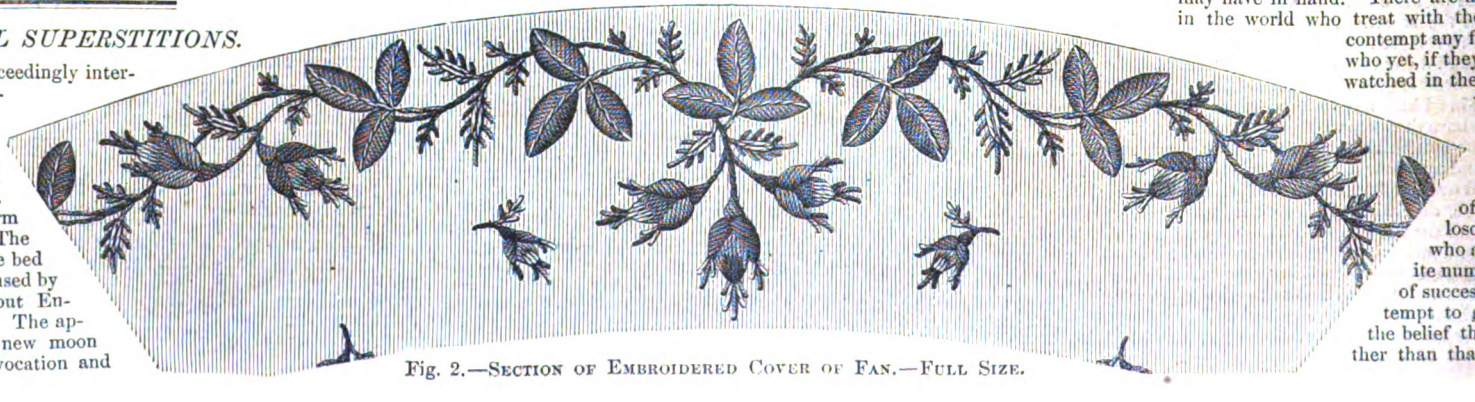

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF EMBROIDERED COVER OF FAN.—FULL SIZE.

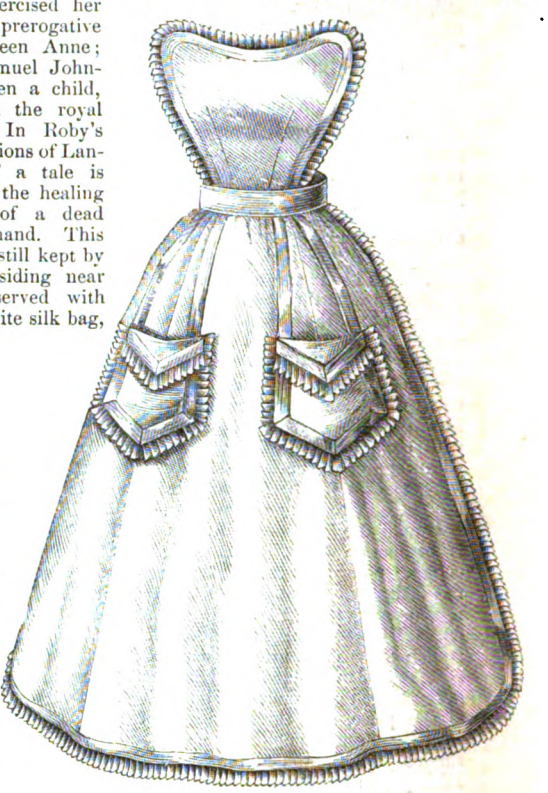
SMALL SUPERSTITIONS.

WHAT an exceedingly interesting chapter could be written upon charms and spells! Very many of these are in doggerel verse. The lady-bird charm is well known. The charm to bless the bed is also commonly used by children throughout England to this day. The appearance of the new moon calls forth the invocation and tender inquiry from young maids respecting their lovers. There is a charm quoted in "Lancashire Folk-Lore" against epilepsy, which is new to us. This is evidently very old, but it still maintains its ground in Devonshire, where a vast number of superstitions still linger from the old time. The charm is written upon parchment, and is carried about the person of the afflicted one.

Some charms work through their influence upon the minds of the patients. A poor gipsy boy in our own service told us he was cured of fits by his mother hanging toads round his neck, and allowing them to remain there until they died. It is just possible that in some slight affections, which do not depend upon brain disease, the impression made upon the minds of patients by such a recipe may be serviceable. It is quite certain, however, that epilepsy will not be cured by any such method. Some charms actually transfer the blemish from one person to another, provided the latter is unfortunate enough to pick up the agent by which the charm has been worked. Take the following, for instance, from Notes and Queries: "For warts, rub them with a cinder; and this, tied up in a paper and dropped where four roads meet, will transfer the warts to whoever opens the parcel."

The regal power of "touching" for the king's-evil was firmly believed in during the reigns of the early kings. The last monarch who exercised her healing prerogative was Queen Anne; and Samuel Johnson, when a child, received the royal touch. In Roby's "Traditions of Lancashire" a tale is told of the healing power of a dead man's hand. This relic is still kept by a priest now residing near Garswood. Preserved with great care in a white silk bag, it is still resorted to by many diseased persons; and wonderful cures are said to have been wrought by this saintly relic. It is said to be the hand of Father Arrowsmith, a priest alleged to have been put to death at Lancaster for his religion in the time of William the Third. The story goes that when about to suffer he desired his spiritual attendant to cut off his right hand, which should then have the power to work miraculous cures in those who had faith to believe in its efficacy. Not many years ago a female, sick of the small-pox, had this dead hand lying in bed with her every night for six weeks, in order to effect her recovery, which afterward took place.



KITCHEN APRON WITH PLEATED TRIMMING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 54 and 55.

We made a journey some years ago to Saint Winifred's Well, in North Wales, to see the beautiful Tudor building in which the miraculous spring is inclosed. The healing power of this spring is believed in most implicitly by all the many pilgrims who resort to it; and they are numerous, it is clear, by the numbers of crutches, handbarrows, eye-patches, and other easements of the lame, halt, and blind who have resorted to its healing waters, and left these relics behind, secured in the open stone-work of its beautiful roof. However we may laugh at the credulity of the poor people who have left their testimony behind them in this manner, nevertheless it is a singular proof that faith is still lively in the land, notwithstanding our utilitarian tendencies.

The old superstition of divination by the Bible and the key is often resorted to by school-boys, or at least it was in the school-days of the writer. The key was bound on to the cover of the Bible; and when any particular person or supposed culprit had to be discovered, all the boys concerned stood in a circle round the one who held the book up depending from a string; a vigorous twirl was given to the volume, and the person to whom the key pointed when it stopped was supposed to be the guilty party. Not long since Dr. Ashburne, by the aid of a crystal placed at the nape of people's necks, professed to divine their thoughts; and even called up within its translucent sphere images of persons that were asked for. Every one pretends to laugh at the absurdity of putting faith in the numberless omens, charms, etc., that have been implanted in us in the nursery; but many, nevertheless, pay the practical homage of attending to them in secret. Some, for instance, walk out into the road rather than pass under a ladder. With others, a black dog following them is a sign of coming good luck. These little weaknesses, although outwardly disclaimed, show how deep in our nature must be planted the sense of a fate over which we have no control. There is scarcely a living person, we believe, who has not some whim or other, some token, by which he is in a measure guided in matters he may have in hand. There are a great many people in the world who treat with the greatest outward contempt any form of superstition, who yet, if they could be narrowly watched in their inmost thoughts, would give evidence of being actuated by the most trivial matters even in the great concerns of life. Great philosophers may be found who accept certain favorite numbers as good omens of success. They do not attempt to give any reason for the belief that is in them, further than that, as certain events have turned out favorably in conjunction with those numbers, it is likely they will do so again. The only explanation of the matter is that underlying our religious faith a vast amount of paganism is still remaining; and the explanation is strengthened by the known fact that the less cultivated and enlightened countryman is a greater believer in the grosser superstitions than the citizen who, by the time he reaches manhood, has had a great many of the powerful impressions instilled into him in the nursery dispelled. The "charms" of the town-bred young lady take the form of very pretty jewelry, but the agriculturist reads Culpepper's "Herbal" in greater numbers than all the other works upon the same subject put together, and Napoleon's

Digitized by Google

PUFFED TULLE AND LACE BERTHA.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 59.

"Book of Fate" is in the hands of every servant-girl. To use the language of a writer in a review, when speaking of the superstitions of Cornwall: "Stripping off the romantic and the amusing, it is, in truth, a rather humiliating topic to dwell on. Superstition lives on with little abatement of vitality in the human heart: in the lower classes it wears its old fashions, with very slow alteration; in the higher, it changes them with the rapidity of modes in fashionable circles."

ON DOMESTIC SCAPE-GOATS.

IT is related of a gouty subject that, being advised by his physicians to abstain from salted meats of all kinds, he asked what he might have to quarrel with in the extremity of his pain, as he considered swearing at the dried tongues and Bologna-sausages some mitigation of his torments.

It would be well for domestic happiness were the lords of the creation, in a general way, content to vent their spleen, or visit their sins of omission or commission, upon inanimate objects. Unfortunately they prefer a sentient scape-goat, whom they can bind with the scarlet cords of their wrath, and drive out into the wilderness of their disfavor. Do men—if they would confess the truth—value women in proportion to their willingness to load themselves with the burdens of others? Is this the reason why a man, choosing a partner for life, takes to himself a meek and gentle helpmate rather than one of the strong-minded of her sex?

"The woman gave it me, and I did eat." The excuse is as old as the hills. It is of no use to fall foul of the apple, and some one or something must be to blame; not the man—oh, certainly not! How could he uphold his prerogative of superior wisdom if he were to confess to such little weaknesses as a longing after forbidden fruit? It was the woman; she gave it him, and he did eat, in the innocence of his heart.

It is man's usual logic. Wherever the Adam has an Eve it is the readiest method of settling the question. Even when the annoyance from which a man is suffering, or the blame he has incurred, can not by any possible twist be traced to the wife, she is still the best available scape-goat. It is so easy to find something she has done or said amiss, and seeing her wear the scarlet cord is an immense satisfaction; it keeps up a due sense of inferiority on her part, and maintains discipline, as Mr. Bagnet would say.

Meekness and long-suffering are essential qualifications in a scape-goat. A woman who refuses to be "put upon," who is in the habit of treating her spouse to a "bit of her mind" upon all occasions, is of no use at all in that capacity, and many domestic quarrels arise from the wife's resolutely declining to enact the part. She is troubled with some foolish ideas of justice, and rises up in self-defense. She ought to know better; she ought to know that justice has nothing whatever to do with the question. As well might the sheep complain of injustice in being shorn, or any other animal that conduces to the benefit of lordly man.

A sergeant seventy years of age took unto himself a wife, and being asked by one of his superior officers what made him think of marrying at his time of life, replied, "Why, an' please your Honor, they tease and put me out of humor abroad, and so I go home and beat my wife." The sergeant, it seems, had the good fortune to meet with a satisfactory scape-goat, who took the beating quietly, without insisting upon woman's rights.

Sometimes one out of a number of children is chosen for the part. Not the Pickle of the family; the Pickle has sins enough of his own to answer for; but some meek-eyed maiden totally destitute of the organ of combativeness. Teased by brothers, snubbed by teachers, her small shoulders have to bear the burden of faults in which she has no part; she has to endure irascibility arising from annoyances caused by no word or deed of her own. Has Jack been refused a holiday? Jane's life is not made particularly pleasant on that afternoon, we may be sure. Has her lady mother treated the music-master with offensive hauteur? Miss Jane is reprehended for her false notes with a harshness that wrings silent tears from her eyes.

We imagine one reason why men more than women find the necessity for a scape-goat is because they have not so ready a resource in tears. When things go wrong with a woman she "falls a-weeping," and washes away the bitterness of her vexation in salt tears. Her temperament is more April-like; the showers descend quickly, they are soon over, and the air is clear again. Man has more of July's stormy mood. The atmosphere is overcharged, the thunder growls and grumbles, and the lightning flashes and sometimes scorches, before the sky is once more serene. Woe be to the one who is in the way when the bolt falls!

Scape-goats are mostly of the feminine gender, but occasionally the case is reversed. Mr. Bumble is tyrannized over by his termagant wife, and boxes the ears of the boy at the gate as a vent for his wounded feelings.

In partnerships a scape-goat is found convenient. Mr. Spenlow would not for the world do an unkind or ungenerous deed, but he can not act without the consent of Mr. Jorkins. Of course Mr. Jorkins does not consent; he is the scape-goat for Mr. Spenlow's meanness or severity, as the case may be.

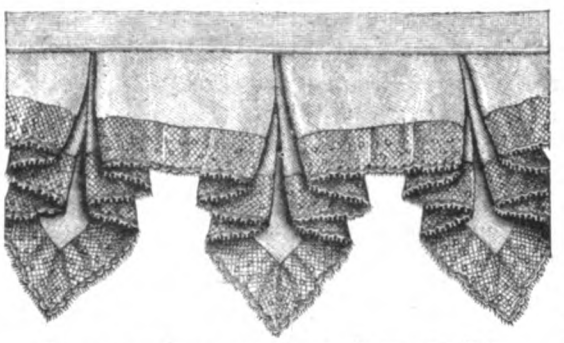
"Papa" is also useful in this capacity at times, consciously or unconsciously. If a young lady finds she has gone rather too far in a flirtation, it is convenient to fall back upon "papa." A short time ago a gentleman paid his addresses, in all sober seriousness, to a girl with whom he had fallen in love for her beaux yeux—not those of her cassette. In the course of courtship he presented her with several handsome articles of bijouterie, which she accepted without scruple. The ardent lover, thus encouraged, followed the fair lady to the sea-side, whither she had gone on a visit. He returned, believing himself happy in the possession of his mistress's affections. She had referred him to "papa," and to "papa" he accordingly betook himself. To his utter amazement and discomfiture, consent was absolutely refused. There was no appeal; the young lady was too good a daughter to marry without her father's approval. It transpired afterward that she had written to her father to beg that, when Mr. A—— presented himself, consent might be withheld. The presents were not returned.

Descending to the lower regions of the house, a familiar scape-goat is the cat. "Please, ma'am, it was the cat," is a statement frequently heard by the mistress of a household. When we consider the amount of breakage, depredation, and destruction of all kinds charged upon this unfortunate domestic quadruped, we wonder that its presence should be tolerated in a well-regulated establishment. We are inclined to think that any amount of annoyance from rats and mice, and "such small deer," had better be submitted to than the losses from the larder, the fracture of china and glass, and all the other evils caused (according to the servants) by that unlucky animal, the cat.

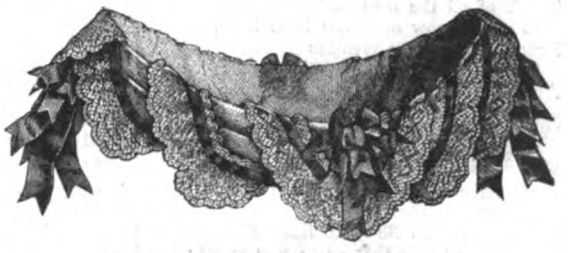
Children ought never to be made scape-goats. The habit of inflicting vicarious punishment upon them is dangerous. They have a keen sense of injustice; they do not reason upon the cause, but they feel the effects, and inwardly, if not audibly, resent the harsh word or impatient tone they are conscious of not having deserved. It is a sad thing to see children creep away, or look up hushed, with frightened faces, when papa comes in, because papa is so often cross.

If man, in defense of his self-love, must, porcupine-like, bristle up against any acknowledgment of failure or weakness, let him dart his quills, at any rate, where their prick will be less keenly felt. If blame must fall unduly, let the little ones go free, and let the burden of the sin be cast upon one to whom the passage through the wilderness is less appalling. And let not the wife find the toils of the family aggravated instead of lightened by him who too often makes her the scape-goat on which to shift the burden of his own blunders.

CRAPE, LACE, AND GROS GRAIN BERTHA.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 61.



SECTION OF FRILL FOR CRAPE, LACE, AND GROS GRAIN BERTHA (WRONG SIDE).—REDUCED.



TULLE AND GROS GRAIN BERTHA.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 60.

SUIT FOR ELDERLY LADY.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 30-36.

UNDER-WAIST FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 42-45.

SUIT FOR ELDERLY LADY.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 30-36.

Digitized by Google

A FANCY.

I SUPPOSE if all the children
Who have lived through ages long
Were collected and inspected
They would make a wondrous throng.
Oh, the babble of the Babel!
Oh, the flutter of the fuss!
To begin with Cain and Abel,
And to finish up with us.

Think of all the men and women
Who are now and who have been,
Every nation since creation
That this world of ours has seen:
And of all of them, not any
But was once a baby small;
While of children, oh, how many
Never have grown up at all!

Some have never laughed or spoken,
Never used their rosy feet;
Some have even flown to heaven
Ere they knew that earth was sweet·
And indeed I wonder whether,
If we reckon ev'ry birth,
And bring such a flock together,
There is room for them on earth?

Who will wash their smiling faces?
Who their saucy ears will box?
Who will dress them, and caress them?
Who will darn their little socks?
Where are arms enough to hold them?
Hands to pat each shining head?
Who will praise them? who will scold them?
Who will pack them off to bed?

Little happy Christian children,
Little savage children too,
In all stages of all ages
That our planet ever knew—
Little princes and princesses,
Little beggars wan and faint;
Some in very handsome dresses,
Naked some, bedaubed with paint.

Only think of the confusion
Such a motley crowd would make;
And the clatter of their chatter,
And the things that they would break.
Oh, the babble of the Babel!
Oh, the flutter of the fuss!
To begin with Cain and Abel,
And to finish off with us.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER IV.

IT is a mistake to take for granted, as in books and life we perpetually do, that people must always remain the same. On the contrary, most people are constantly changing—growing, let us hope, but still changing—in character, feelings, opinions. If we took this into account we should often be less harsh to judge; less piteously misjudged ourselves. For instance, we resolve always to love our friend and hate our enemy; but our friend may prove false, and our enemy kind and good. What are we then to do? To go on loving and hating as before? I fear we can not. We must accept things as they stand, and act accordingly. Or—and this is a common case—we may ourselves once have had certain faults, which we afterward had sense to see and correct; yet those who knew us in our faulty days will never believe this, and go on condemning us forever—which is a little hard. And again, we may have started honestly on a certain course, and declared openly certain opinions or intentions, which we afterward see cause to modify, or even to renounce entirely. Time and circumstance have so altered us that we are obliged to give our old selves the lie direct, or else to be untrue to our present selves. In short, we must just retract, in act or word, boldly or weakly, nobly or ignobly, as our natures allow. And though we have been perfectly sincere throughout, the chances are that no one will believe us; we shall be stamped as hypocrites, renegades, or deep designing schemers to the end of our days. This, too, is hard; and it takes a strong heart and a clear conscience to bear it.

When Hannah Thelluson consented to come to her brother-in-law's house, and he thankfully opened to her his dreary doors, they were two most sorrowful people, who yet meant to make the best of their sorrow, and of one another, so as to be a mutual comfort, if possible. At least this was her intent; he probably had no intent at all beyond the mere relief of the moment. Men—and young men—seldom look ahead as women do.

Now two people living under the same roof, and greatly dependent upon one another, seldom remain long in a state of indifference; they take either to loving or hating; and these two, being both of them good people, though so very different in character, were not likely to do the latter. Besides, they stood in that relation which of all others most attracts regard—of reciprocally doing good and being done good to. They shared one another's burdens, and gave one another help. Consequently the burdens lightened, and the help increased, every day that they resided together.

Their life was very equable, quiet, and, at first, rather dull. Of course the widower did not visit, or receive visitors. Occasional family dinners at the Moat House, and a few morning calls, received and paid, were all that Hannah saw of Easterham society. She had the large, handsome house entirely to herself often from morning to night; for gradually Mr. Rivers went back to his parish duties, which he once used most creditably to fulfill. Consequently, instead of hanging about the house all day, he was frequently absent till dinner-time. This was a great source of satisfaction to Miss Thelluson; at first—let the honest truth be told—because she was heartily glad to get rid of him; by-and-by from sincere pleasure at the good it did him.

"Work always comforts a man," she said to herself, when she saw him come in, fresh from battling with rain and wind, or eager to secure her help and sympathy in some case of distress in the parish, his handsome face looking ten years younger, and his listless manner gaining energy and decision.

"You were right, Aunt Hannah," he would often say, with an earnest thoughtfulness that was yet not exactly sadness. "To preach to sufferers one needs to have suffered one's self. I shall be a better parson now than I used to be, I hope: on week-days, certainly, and perhaps even on Sundays, if you will continue to look over my sermons."

Which, people began to say, were much better than they used to be, and Hannah herself thought so too. She always read them, and, after a while, criticised them, pretty sharply and fearlessly, every Saturday night. On other nights she got her brother-in-law into the habit of reading aloud; first, because it was much the easiest way of passing the evening—and after being out all day, he absolutely refused to go out again, lessening even his visits to the Moat House whenever he could—secondly, because soon she came to like it very much. It was like falling into a dream of peace to sit sewing at Rosie's little clothes (for Aunt Hannah did all she could for her darling with her own hands), silent—she always loved silence—yet listening to Mr. Rivers's pleasant voice, and thinking over, quietly to herself, what he was reading. In this way, during the first three months, they got through a quantity of books, both of prose and poetry, and had grown familiar enough now and then to lay the books down, and take to arguments—quarreling fiercely at times—until either became accustomed to the other's way of thinking, and avoided warlike topics, or fought so honorably and well that the battles ended in mutual respect, and very often in a fit of mutual laughter.

It may be a dreadful thing to confess, but they did laugh sometimes. Ay, even with the moonlight sleeping, or the white snow falling, on Rosa's grave a mile off—Rosa, who was with the angels, smiling in the eternal smile of God. These others, left behind to do their mortal work, were not always miserable. Rosie began the change, by growing every day more charming, more interesting, more curious, in her funny little ways, every one of which aunt retailed to papa when he came home, as if there had never been such a wonderful baby in any house before.

A baby in the house. Does any body know fully what that is till he—no, say she—has tried it?

Hannah did not. Fond as she was of children, and well accustomed to them, they were all other people's children. This one was her own. On her alone depended the little human soul and human body for every thing in life—every thing that could make it grow up to itself and the world a blessing or a curse. A solemn way of viewing things, perhaps; but Hannah was a solemn-minded woman. She erred, any how, on the right side. This was the "duty" half of her new existence; the other half was joy—wholly joy.

A child in the house. Say, rather, an angel; for I think Heaven leaves a touch of the angel in all little children, to reward those about them for their inevitable cares. Rosie was, to other people besides her aunt, a very remarkable child—wonderfully sweet, and yet brave even as a baby. She never cried for pain or fretfulness, though she sometimes did for passion; and for sorrow—a strange, contrite, grown-up kind of sorrow—whenever she did any thing the least wrong, which was very seldom. She was usually a perfect sunbeam of brightness, wholesomeness, and content. Her delicacy and fragility, which were only that of a flower reared up in darkness, and recovering its healthy colors as soon as ever it is brought into the sun, soon became among the things that had been. Not a child in all Easterham seemed more likely to thrive than Rosie Rivers; and every body, even at the Moat House, now acknowledged this, to Miss Thelluson's great glory and delight. Grace's also—unto whom much credit was owing.

Hannah had taken her rather rashly perhaps—wise people sometimes do, upon instinct, rather rash things. She thought so herself when one day, accidentally asking Grace some apparently trivial question, the girl burst into tears, confessed that she was a married woman, and her husband had run away from her. "But I was married, indeed I was, and his sisters know it!" Which the sisters, who were in fact sisters-in-law, resolutely confirmed; but no more facts could be gained. Nor did Hannah like to inquire, having a feeling that poor women's miseries were as sacred as rich ones'. It was an unwelcome discovery—a nurse with a living and, probably, scape-grace husband might prove very inconvenient; still she had grown fond of the girl, who was passionately devoted to Rosie.

"For Rosie's sake I must keep her, if possible; and for her own sake, poor thing. I can not bear to send her away. What must I do?"

Rosie's father, to whom she thus appealed—for, despite what he had said, she persistently consulted him in every thing—answered decisively, "Let her stay." So Grace staid. But Miss Thelluson insisted that she should no longer pass under false colors, but be called Mrs. Dixon; and finding she had no wedding-ring—her husband, she declared, had torn it from her finger the day he left her—Hannah took the trouble to buy her a new one, and insisted upon her wearing it, saying, "She hated all deceits of every kind." Upon which Grace looked up to her with such grateful, innocent eyes, that, Quixotic as her conduct might appear to some people—it did at the Moat House, where the girls laughed at her immoderately—she felt sure the story was true, and that she should never repent having thus acted.

This was the only incident of the winter; and as week after week passed by, and nothing ill came of it, no runaway husband ever appeared, and poor Grace brightened into the tenderest nurse, the most faithful servant, hardly thinking she could do enough for her mistress and the child, Hannah ceased to think of it, or of any thing unpleasant, so busy and contented was she.

More than content—that she had always been—actually happy. True, she had thought her May-time wholly past; but now, as spring began to waken, as she and Rosie began to gather primroses in the garden and daisies in the lanes, it seemed to her as if her youth had come back again. Youth, fresh and full, added to all the experience, the satisfied enjoyment, of middle age. They were like two babies together, she and Rosie, all through this Rosie's first earthly spring. They crawled together on the sunny grass-plot; they played bo-peep round the oak-tree; they investigated with the deepest interest every new green leaf and flower and insect; for she tried to make her child like the Child in the Story without an End—a companion and friend to all living things. And Rosie, by the time she was eighteen months old, with her sweetness, intelligence, and the mysterious way the baby-soul opened out to the wonders and beauty of this our world, had taught her aunt Hannah quite as much as Aunt Hannah had taught her, and become even a greater blessing than the blessings she received.

"It is all the child's doing," Hannah said, laughing and blushing, one day, when Mr. Rivers came suddenly in, and found her dancing through the hall with Rosie in her arms, and singing too at the top of her voice. "She is the sunbeam of the house. Every servant in it spoils her, and serves her like a little queen. As for me, auntie makes a goose of herself every hour in the day. Doesn't she, Rosie? At her time of life, too!"

"What is your time of life? for I really don't know," said Mr. Rivers, smiling. "Sometimes you look quite young, and then, again, I fancy you must be fully as old as I am."

"Older. Thirty-one."

"Well, I am thirty; so when you die of old age I shall begin to quake. But tell her not to die, Rosie." And a sad look came across his face, as it still often did. Hannah knew what it meant. "Bid her live and take care of us both. What in the wide world should we two do without Aunt Hannah?"

And Rosie, with that chance instinct of babyhood, often so touching, patted with her tiny soft hand her aunt's cheek, saying, wooingly, "Nice Tannie, pitty Tannie"—which had been her first attempt at "Aunt Hannah."

"Tannie"—the name clung to her already, as baby pet-names always do—pressed the little breast to hers in a passion of delight and content, knowing that there was not a creature in the world—no woman, certainly—to come between her and her child. Her child! Twenty mothers, she sometimes thought,

> "Could not with all their quantity of love > Make up the sum" of that she felt for her motherless darling.

The father stood and watched them both. As Rosie grew older and more winning he began to take more notice of his little girl, at least when Aunt Hannah was present to mount guard over her, and keep her good and quiet.

"You look quite a picture, you two! Hannah" (he sometimes called her "Hannah" without the "Aunt"), "you must be excessively fond of that child?"

She laughed—a low, soft, happy laugh. Her feeling for little Rosie was a thing she could not talk about. Besides, its sacredness had a double root, as it were; and one root was in the dead mother's grave.

"The little thing seems very fond of you too, as well she may be," continued Mr. Rivers. "I trust she may yet repay you for all your love. I hope—I earnestly hope—that you and she may never be parted."

A natural thought, accidentally expressed. Hannah said to herself over and over again that it must have been purely accidental, and meant nothing; yet it shot through her like a bolt of ice. Was there a chance, the dimmest, remotest chance, that she and the child might be parted? Did he, now that the twelvemonth of mourning had expired, contemplate marrying again—as Lady Dunsmore had foretold he would? Indeed, in a letter lately (for she still wrote sometimes, and would by no means lose sight of her former governess) the countess had put the direct question, at which Miss Thelluson had only smiled.

Now she did not smile. She felt actually uneasy. She ran rapidly over, in her mind, all the young ladies he had seen or mentioned lately—very few; and he seemed to have no interest in any. Still there might be some one whom she had never heard of: and if so, if he married again, would he require her—of course he would!—to quit the House on the Hill, and leave behind his little daughter?

"I could not! No! I will not," thought she. And after the one cold shiver came a hot thrill of something more like fierceness than her quiet nature had known for long. "To expect me to give up my child. It would be cruel, barbarous!" And then came a sudden frantic idea of snatching up Rosie in her arms, and running away with her, any how, any where, so as to hide her from her father. "I shall do it—I know I shall—if he drives me to it. He had better not try!"

And hot tears dropped on the little white night-gown which Aunt Hannah was vainly endeavoring to tie. It was Sunday night; and she always sent Grace to church, and put the child to bed herself, of Sundays. Bitter, miserable tears they were, too, but only on account of the child. Nothing more. Afterward, when she recalled them and what had produced them, this first uneasy fear which had shot across the calm heaven of her life—a heavenly life it had grown to be since she had the child—Hannah felt certain that she could have looked the child's angel, or its mother, in the face, and declared positively they were nothing more.

But the notion of having to part from Rosie, under the only circumstances in which that parting was natural and probable, having once entered her mind, lurked there uneasily, troubling often the happy hours she spent with her darling; for the aunt, wholly engrossed with her charge, had her with her more than most mothers, with whom their children's father holds rightly the first place. Nevertheless Miss Thelluson did her duty most satisfactorily by her brother-in-law; whenever papa wanted auntie, little Rosie was remorselessly sent away, even though auntie's heart followed her longingly all the while. But she had already learned her lesson—she never allowed the child to be a trouble to the father.

"Not one man in a thousand cares to be troubled about any thing, you may depend upon that," she said one day, gayly, to the second Miss Rivers, who was now about to be married.

"Who taught you that?—my brother? Well, you must have had plenty of experience of him, faults and all; almost as much as his wife had," said the sister, sarcastically; which made Hannah rather sorry that she had unwittingly betrayed the results of her year's experience at the House on the Hill.

Yes; she knew her brother-in-law pretty well by this time—all his weaknesses, all his virtues; better, he told her, and she believed it, than his own sisters knew him. He was so unlike them in character, tastes, and feelings that she had now ceased to wonder why he chose none of them to live with him and Rosie, but preferred rather his wife's sister, who might a little resemble his wife, as Hannah sometimes vaguely wished she did.

More especially when the approaching marriage forced him out of his retirement, and he had to officiate in the festivities as eldest brother, instead of poor Austin, whom nobody ever saw or spoke of. Bernard had to act as head of the house, Sir Austin being very frail now; and he accepted his place and went through his duties with a cheerfulness that Hannah was surprised yet glad to see. If only he could have had beside him the bright, beautiful wife who was gone, instead of a grave sister like herself! Still she did her best; went out with him when he asked her, and at other times staid quietly at home—half amused, half troubled, to find how she, who in the first months of winter almost longed for solitude, now began to find it just a little dull. She was not so glad of her own company as she used to be, and found the evenings, after Rosie's bedtime, rather long. Only the evenings: of mornings, when Rosie was with her, she felt no want of any kind.

Following the wedding—to which Miss Thelluson was of course asked and, somewhat unwillingly, went, seeing Mr. Rivers wished it—came many bridal parties, to which she was invited, too. Thence ensued a small difficulty—ridiculous in itself, and yet involving much—which, when her brother-in-law urged her to accompany him every where, she was at last obliged to confess.

"I can't go," she said, laughing—it was much better to make it a jesting than a serious matter. "The real truth is, I've got no clothes."

And then came out another truth, which Mr. Rivers, with his easy fortunes and masculine indifference to money, had never suspected, and was most horrified at—that, her salary as governess ceasing, Aunt Hannah had absolutely nothing to live upon. Though dwelling in the midst of luxury, and spending unlimited sums upon housekeeping weekly, the utmost she had had to spend upon herself, since she came to the House on the Hill, was an innocent fifteen-pound note laid by from last year, the remains of which went in the wedding gown of quiet gray silk which had replaced her well-worn black one.

"Dreadful!" cried Mr. Rivers. "While you have been doing every thing for me, I have left you like a pauper."

"Not exactly," and she laughed again at his vehement contrition. "Indeed, I had as much money as I wanted, for my wants are small. Remember, I have been for so many years a poor governess."

"You shall never be poor again, nor a governess, neither. I can not tell you how much I owe you—how deeply I respect you. What can I say? Rather, what can I do?" He thought a little, and then said, "The only plan is, you must let me do for you exactly what I would have done for my own sister. Listen, while I explain."

He then proposed to pay her a quarterly allowance, or annuity, large enough to make her quite independent personally. Or, if she preferred it, to make over the principal in a deed of gift, from which she could draw the same sum as interest at her pleasure.

"And, you understand, this is quite between ourselves. My fortune is my own, independent of my family. No one but us two need ever be the wiser. Only say the word, and the matter shall be settled at once."

Tears sprang to Hannah's eyes.

"You are a good, kind brother to me," she said. "Nor would it matter so very much, as, if I did take the money, I should just make a will and leave it back to Rosie. But I can not take it. I never yet was indebted to any man alive."

"It would not be indebtedness—only justice," argued he. "You are a practical woman: let me put it in a practical light. I am not giving; only paying, as I should have to pay some other lady. Why should I be more just and liberal to a stranger than to you? This on my side. On yours—what can you do? You are fed and housed, but you must be clothed. You are not a lily of the field. Though"—looking at her as she stood beside him, tall and slender and pale—"I sometimes think there is a good deal of the lily about you, Aunt Hannah. You are so single-minded and pure-hearted; and, like the lilies, you preach me a silent sermon many a time."

Digitized by Google

"Not always silent," said she, yet was pleased at the compliment. He had never made her a pretty speech before. Then, too, his urging her to remain with him, on the only possible terms on which she could remain—those he proposed—proved that he was not contemplating marriage, at least not immediately.

All he said was thoroughly kind, generous, and wise. Besides, her sound common-sense told her that clothes did not grow upon bushes; and that if she were to continue as mistress of the House on the Hill, it was essential that Rosie's aunt and Mr. Rivers's sister-in-law should not go dressed, as he indignantly put it, "like a pauper." She considered a little, and then, putting her pride in her pocket, she accepted the position of matters as inevitable.

"Very well, Mr. Rivers. Give me the same salary that I received from Earl Dunsmore, and I will take it from you as I did from him. It will cover all my personal needs, and even allow me, as heretofore, to put by a little for my old age."

"Your old age? Where should that be spent but here, in my house?"

"Your house may not always be—" She stopped; she had not the heart to put into plain words the plain fact that he might marry again—few men were more likely to do so. But he seemed to understand it.

"Oh, Hannah!" he said, and turned away. She was so vexed at herself that she dropped the conversation at once.

Next day Miss Thelluson found on her toilette-table, in a blank envelope, a check for a hundred pounds.

At first she felt a strong inclination to throw the money into the fire; then a kind of sensation of gratitude.

"If I had not liked him I couldn't have touched a half-penny; but I do like him. So I must take it, and try to please him as much as I can."

For that reason, and to do him credit when she went out with him, poor Hannah expended more money and thought over her clothes than she had done for years, appearing in toilettes so good and tasteful, though simple still, that the Moat House girls wondered what in the world had come over her to make her look so young.

THE FASHIONABLE SEASON.

THE fashionable season has reached its end at length. And if you inquire to what end has the fashionable season been at all, a chorus of physicians from one side of the town to the other will answer you with disgust and contempt by no means diminishing the bills they expect to render. Among other things, hysteria. What! you may very well cry, can it be that these innocent daylight receptions, these stately dinners, these magnificent midnights, have any connection with that most silly and absurd, most unmanageable and trying and trivial and terrible of all diseases, the hysterics? Ah, certainly, you are answered; what is hysteria but a separation between the worn-out nerves and the judgment, or the volition? and what else can be expected in the summing up of these innocent receptions, where ladies encounter in the afternoons, to give one all-comprehending glance, as swift as the conjuror Houdin's, at each other's costumes, and be torn with envy or puffed with conceit in a moment, and to say two pleasant words, or unpleasant, as that may be, and to take three sips of punch from the tiniest punch-glass in the world, and to do the same at twenty houses afterward?—of these stately dinners, where, precedence being settled, one's partner admires as much as he chooses of one's white shoulders, of one's graceful carving, of one's trifling with ragout and paté, terrapin and venison, truffle and mushroom, jelly and ice?—of one's skill with aroma and bouquet, and the handling of the half dozen glasses at one's plate?—of these magnificent midnights, rich in every delight of pleasured vanity—the thin slipper, the bare breast, the brain loaded with false tresses, the pores stopped with the delicate dust of white and pink ball, the heated dance, the indigestible banquet, the scanty sleep ensuing before the morning beam pries open the eyelids yet heavy with undreamed dreams? What else can be expected of a life every moment of which is so unreal and unnatural that one becomes ready for the phantasmagoria of the disease as it were by mere affinity? What else? Fevers, to be sure; probably consumptions, after a little; possibly insanities. What is the punch made of, for one thing, into which the young princesses of society dip so eagerly? Of "sugar and spice and all things nice?" That may be; but also of brandy and Champagne and tea in a bowl hollowed out of a cake of ice, or else of Bourbon and Santa Cruz and brandy and Champagne and tea—a simple mixture, poisonous to none but delicate stomachs, and almost as harmless as certain superbly translucent jellies that suddenly twist the tongue, yet tingling with their flavor, into stuttering confusion. What emotions are stimulated by the whirling dances, the rich dainties, the breath of exotics, the wild waltz music, the emulation of toilettes, the common contact, the unseasonable hours, the twice-breathed air? Only those out of which, you see, hysteria might flower, like a weed out of a heap of compost.

We saw Florimonde going the round of her half-dozen parties the other night. What a resplendent creature she was when she set out—the hazel-eyed and brown-haired beauty, with the faintest tinge of sunset hues on her oval cheeks! Her dress was of that peculiar tarnished shade of pink—like yellow sunshine suffusing a pale rose—which made the white shoulders rising from it whiter and more polished yet; the panier and scarf were of yellowest point lace; and a necklace of filigree and of large pale topazes, each carved in cameo, illuminated the whole. Maudita went out with Florimonde, too, that night, as she had gone every night for nearly two months before; skirt over skirt of fluffy net flowed round the stately Maudita, and let their misty clouds blow about the trailing ornaments of long green grasses and blue corn flowers that she wore, while puffs and falls half veiled the stomacher of Mexican turquoise and diamond sparks, whose device imitated a spray of the same flowers; and in among the masses of her glittering, waving auburn hair rested a slender diadem of the turquoise again, that whose nameless tint, half blue, half green, makes it an inestimable treasure among the Navajoes, as it was once among the Aztecs, who called it the chalchihuitl; each cluster of Maudita's turquoises set in a frost-work of tiniest diamonds—a splendid toilette indeed, as fresh and radiant as the morning dew upon the meadows. When they set out on the love-path, that is. When they came home from it, and from all the fatigues and fervors of the German, quite another thing. The gauzy dress was so fringed and trodden on and torn that it seemed to hold together, like many an ill-assorted marriage, rather by the cohesion of habit than otherwise; the hair—Madge Wildfire's was of more respectable appearance; the powder had fallen on arms and shoulders; and to our critical eyes, if to no others, the sunset hues remained on only one of Florimonde's cheeks. And those enticing shadows round Maudita's eyes when she went out—for the best of eyes are dulled by too much wear and tear—does antimony "run?" Or, had some pugilistic dancer given her a "black eye?" Not that the damsels came home in such trim on every night of the season; far from it. This was the accumulation of six parties in one night, the last of the Germans, when the fun grew fast and furious, the figures and the favors more and more fantastic; when daylight was breaking ere the Champagne breakfast was partaken; and when the drunken coachman, out all night, had kept them shivering in the porch an endless while, and had banged them about the carriage afterward.

But they had had a glorious time, their eyes were dancing like marsh-lights, their laughter was ringing like a peal of bells, the jests and bon-mots and flattery they had heard were running off their lips like rain; they had made goodness knows what conquests; they had made goodness knows how many engagements for the morrow; and oh, they were so tired! We ran into their room to see them next day; it was afternoon, and they were still in bed. There was nothing remarkable in that, they said; some girls were obliged to stay in bed two days out of every week through sheer fatigue; and some got so excited that they couldn't sleep at all, except by means of morphia, and that made them sick a couple of days, any way; but as for themselves they had never given out yet, and never meant to do so. While she was speaking, Florimonde's voice faltered, and the sentence was finished under the breath. Her voice had given out. At the moment the muscles round that handsome mouth of hers began to twitch ridiculously; she yawned, and threw up her arms as a baby stretches itself, and stiffened in that position, with her teeth set, and her eyes rolled out of sight, and lay there like a corpse. Florimonde had given out. As we sprang to investigate this surprising condition of things there came a sudden gurgle and a groan from Maudita, who had risen in her own little bed at our motion. We turned to see her clutching her throat, as if her hands were the claws of a wild-cat; she was laughing and howling and crying all at once; her face was of a dark purple tint; her body—that lithe and supple waltzing body of hers—was bending itself rigidly into the shape of a bow, resting by the head and the heels on the bed—the dignified Maudita—and the foam was standing half an inch high on her mouth. Maudita had given out too. And if there had been a dozen other girls in the room whose nerves had been tortured into the same excitement as theirs, they would one and all have given out at the same time, and have gone down like a row of bricks in the contagion of the same hysteric.

Of course the doctor came presently, and separated the patients, and gave them pills and powders and bromides without end; and there were watchers to keep the delicate creatures, whom it took three or four people to hold in their fits, from injuring themselves; and at last sleep came with the all-persuading chloral, and with the awaking from that powerful chloral-given sleep came an imbecile sort of state, whose scattered wits were full of small cunning and spites, that told secrets, and told lies, and could not pronounce names, and lips were blistered, and eyes were swollen and purblind; and Florimonde and Maudita must keep Lent in spite of themselves.

But how long do you suppose they will keep it, and in what way? As the good formalist fasts on Friday with dishes of oysters escalloped deliciously in the shell, with toasted crabs, and bass baked in port-wine? Will Florimonde forego her low necks, or Maudita her blonde powder? Will there be any less excitement or display or rivalry in their private theatricals and concerts for charity? Will the flirtations be any less extraordinary at the high teas? The mind will be, perhaps, a little flighty; the health will not be so firm; there will be a good deal of morbid sorrow over imaginary misdeeds, and none at all over real ones; there will be compensatory church-going, with delightful little monogram-covered prayer-books; but will the flesh be mortified by any real rough sackcloth and ashes? It is hardly to be hoped. Neither Lent, nor religion, nor judgment, nor any thing but poverty and absolute impotence will put a period to the wild pursuit of pleasure that a fashionable season begins. Ill for the next generation, the mothers of which are wrecks before its birth! Well for Florimonde and Maudita, with all the dew and freshness of their youth destroyed, if at length, thoroughly ennuyée, they do not put a piquancy and flavor of sin into their pleasure, as the old West Indian toper dashes his insipid brandy with Cayenne!

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IN 1851 the East River was frozen over opposite Wall Street Ferry, forming, for the time, a solid ice-bridge from New York to Brooklyn. Again in 1865 the river was frozen over, so that several individuals immortalized themselves by crossing on its treacherous surface. But the ice-bridge of February, 1871, appears to have been more securely made, and better patronized, than either of the others. About noon one day, when the river was filled with immense cakes of ice, the tide slackened, and the huge masses were wedged tightly against each other and the shores on either side, forming from Fulton up to Catherine ferry a complete bridge. Several vessels and boats were ice-bound as if in an arctic sea. Gradually one person after another was tempted by the firm appearance of the ice to venture upon it, until thousands had passed over. The scene, however, assumed a somewhat tragic type when the ice began to move with about three hundred persons upon it. Many were in great danger, but by means of boats and steam-tugs all were at length rescued and conveyed safely to shore.

A unique portrait of Washington has been recently exhibited in this city. It is from a drawing on stone by Rembrandt Peale. This stone was destroyed by fire after only a few proof impressions had been struck off. For many years past there have been but two copies known to be extant, and one of these was lost in the fire that destroyed Barnum's Museum. In many respects the portraits of Peale are preferred to those of his competitor, Stuart.

Some adventurous individuals have been paying a visit to the scientific party at the summit of Mount Washington. Their experiences have been novel. Under the fierce blasts of Boreas, the building occupied shakes and trembles and creaks in a manner which would drive sleep far away from the nervous. During these gales it is impossible for a person to stand a moment exposed to them. Moreover, a perfect shower of ice flies in fragments across the summit. Even within the house, where all is really comfortable, the flying missiles sound as if a genuine bombardment were going on.

At Rome there is not much prospect of a prosperous season. The inundation of the Tiber has left so much mud and slime as to threaten an epidemic. Travelers who had planned to visit Rome at this time will linger at other places until the sunshine has dried up that quarter of the town where foreigners usually lodge. Many poor people have greatly suffered from the flood, and a subscription has been circulated for their benefit.

The War Department has concluded to yield to the pressing demands made upon the Signal Office by ship-owners and commercial men generally for the daily publication of a reliable synopsis of existing weather throughout the country, and the probable change during the succeeding twenty-four hours. This synopsis will be based upon the three daily reports now received, and will be prepared by competent authority. Arrangements are now making to give them a wide and speedy circulation.

National colors are quite a study in themselves, as, abroad, each country displays its own in conspicuous places, and they are also worn by soldiers as a necessary and useful distinction. The Prussian colors are black and white. The colors of the old German empire were red and gold, and now the heralds are devising for the new empire under William a combination of black, silver, red, and gold.

A very strong feeling exists in England, among Churchmen, against the marriage of Princess Louise taking place during Lent. The day is now fixed—March 21—but many protests are made in the hope the royal family may not offend the feelings of many loyal subjects by celebrating the marriage at that time. It is stated that in many London churches, should the ceremony take place in Lent, there will be a special penitential service at the same hour.

Presence of mind in emergencies is worth every thing. During a late disastrous fire in Brooklyn a heroic servant-girl, undaunted by the flames which were pressing in on all sides, seized two little children in her arms, and forcing two others before her, succeeded in conveying all to a place of safety. The girl then rushed back into the burning building to rescue an old man, whom she found vainly seeking a way of exit. She had brought him to a ladder in the fourth story, when he fell, exhausted. She called loudly for help, but none coming, she was forced by the blinding flames to fly and leave him to his fate. But the children were saved by her from a horrible death.

Some years ago a London journal gave the following description of M. Dumas, which now gains a fresh interest: "If you should ever go to Paris, and chance in some of the streets to meet a great boy, about five feet four inches in height, having a physiognomy resembling that of a negro, with frizzled hair, broad nose, and an olive complexion—his costume also being distinguished by some peculiarity, such as light yellow under-waistcoat, or a ribbon of an infinite variety of color depending from his button-hole—speaking loudly and gesticulating fiercely, as if he was quarreling instead of conversing with a friend, you may go boldly up to him and say, without fear of being deceived, 'Good-day, M. Dumas.' Be assured it is the man himself, for there are not two such physiognomies to be found in Paris. He will receive you very civilly, converse with you, and in a few moments you will feel, as it were, almost instinctively, that you are confronted with the greatest, or, at all events, the most prolific, writer of modern times."

Empresses and queens occasionally relieve their minds from the cares of state and the weariness of court by indulging in some domestic employment. The late Empress of the French, the Empress of Russia, and the Queens of Bavaria and Greece beguile their hours with a sewing-machine of great elegance and simplicity, and which is now generally adopted by the English government for industrial schools.

A warning to husbands comes from East Brooklyn. A while ago a moderately wealthy man, of good standing and reputation, married a young wife. But the husband was extremely eccentric in some particulars, and no servants were allowed in his establishment. At length the wife, who had no taste for domestic occupations, became so disgusted with the ceaseless round of scrubbing and working, preparing meals and clearing them away, that she concluded she would explore the unknown, and have a change, at any rate. In her letter of farewell she stated that she had no fault to find with her husband, but she was determined to seek a spot where there were no dishes to wash. The pistol with which she attempted to shoot herself through the heart was evidently a new weapon in her hands, for the result was a slight wound in the left side, causing considerable physical pain, but by no means dangerous. The nearly bereaved husband has engaged a competent housekeeper, and sufficient help to keep the domestic machinery in motion. If the pistol had been aimed more accurately, the man would doubtless have soon married a second wife, and she would have reaped the benefit of the first one's experiment—a suggestion which discontented wives should remember in any similar experiments.

Not many "little men" are as brave as one who hails from Bridgeport, Connecticut. A short time ago the lad had three fingers cut off by some machinery in a brass shop. Did he cry? Not he. Looking upon his bleeding hand, the brave little fellow exclaimed, "I'll bet mother will cry when she sees that!"

Is the Mont Cenis Tunnel to be of practical utility? is the question now raised. The Alps have been pierced, and there will be no difficulty in laying the track and furnishing the cars. But what is to be done with the smoke of the locomotives? That would surely suffocate passengers. Probably some pneumatic principles will be applied to remedy this evil when all other things are ready for a trip.

The following little poem will, we fancy, meet the feelings of some fathers, as well as mothers, whose honors are yet fresh and new:

THE NEW ARRIVAL.

There came to port last Sunday night
The queerest little craft,
Without an inch of rigging on—
I looked, and looked, and laughed:
It was so singular that she Should cross the Unknown water,
And moor herself right in my room—
My daughter, oh, my daughter!

Yet by these presents witness all,
She's welcome fifty times,
And comes consigned to Hope and Love,
And common metre rhymes.
She has no manifest but this;
No rag floats o'er the water;
She's too new for the British Lloyd's—
My daughter, oh, my daughter!

Ring out wild bells—and tame ones too—
Ring out the lover's moon,
Ring out the little worsted socks,
Ring in the bib and spoon;
Ring out the muse, ring in the nurse,
Ring in the milk and water;
Away with paper, pens, and ink—
My daughter! oh, my daughter!

Briefer, yet in a like happy and satisfied vein, is another bit, which will suit other cases:

Give us joy—
It's a boy.

Do you ask when?
Just half past ten

On Saturday night.
Mother all right;

Likewise the boy—
Give us joy.

This recipe for making mush, or hasty pudding, has been the rounds of the newspapers: "Take three quarts of water in a pot, boil and salt to taste. When boiled take out two quarts in a suitable vessel for the table. Then stir in one quart of sifted Indian meal, and pour back the batter or mixture so made into the pot with the remaining one quart of water, and boil the whole fifteen minutes." Doubtless this will be very good mush; but there is no need of taking such an exact rule. Boil water according to the quantity of mush you desire. Salt it, of course. While boiling, stir in dry Indian meal, thoroughly and carefully, until thickened sufficiently. It won't hurt it to boil until your breakfast is ready. Corn-meal always requires much more cooking than flour.

An English medical journal warns its readers against the use of a certain kind of green-colored gloves, which stain the hands, and cause an eruption to appear on the skin after a while. Analysis shows that the dye used in coloring the gloves contains arsenic.

Honesty is not yet one of the "lost arts." Not long ago the keeper of a toll-gate at Oxford, Connecticut, received a letter containing twenty cents from a man who said that thirty years ago he got through the gate on fraudulent pretenses. "Better late than never." He remitted the original debt with interest. Happy Connecticut, to raise and rear such honest folk!

Digitized by Google

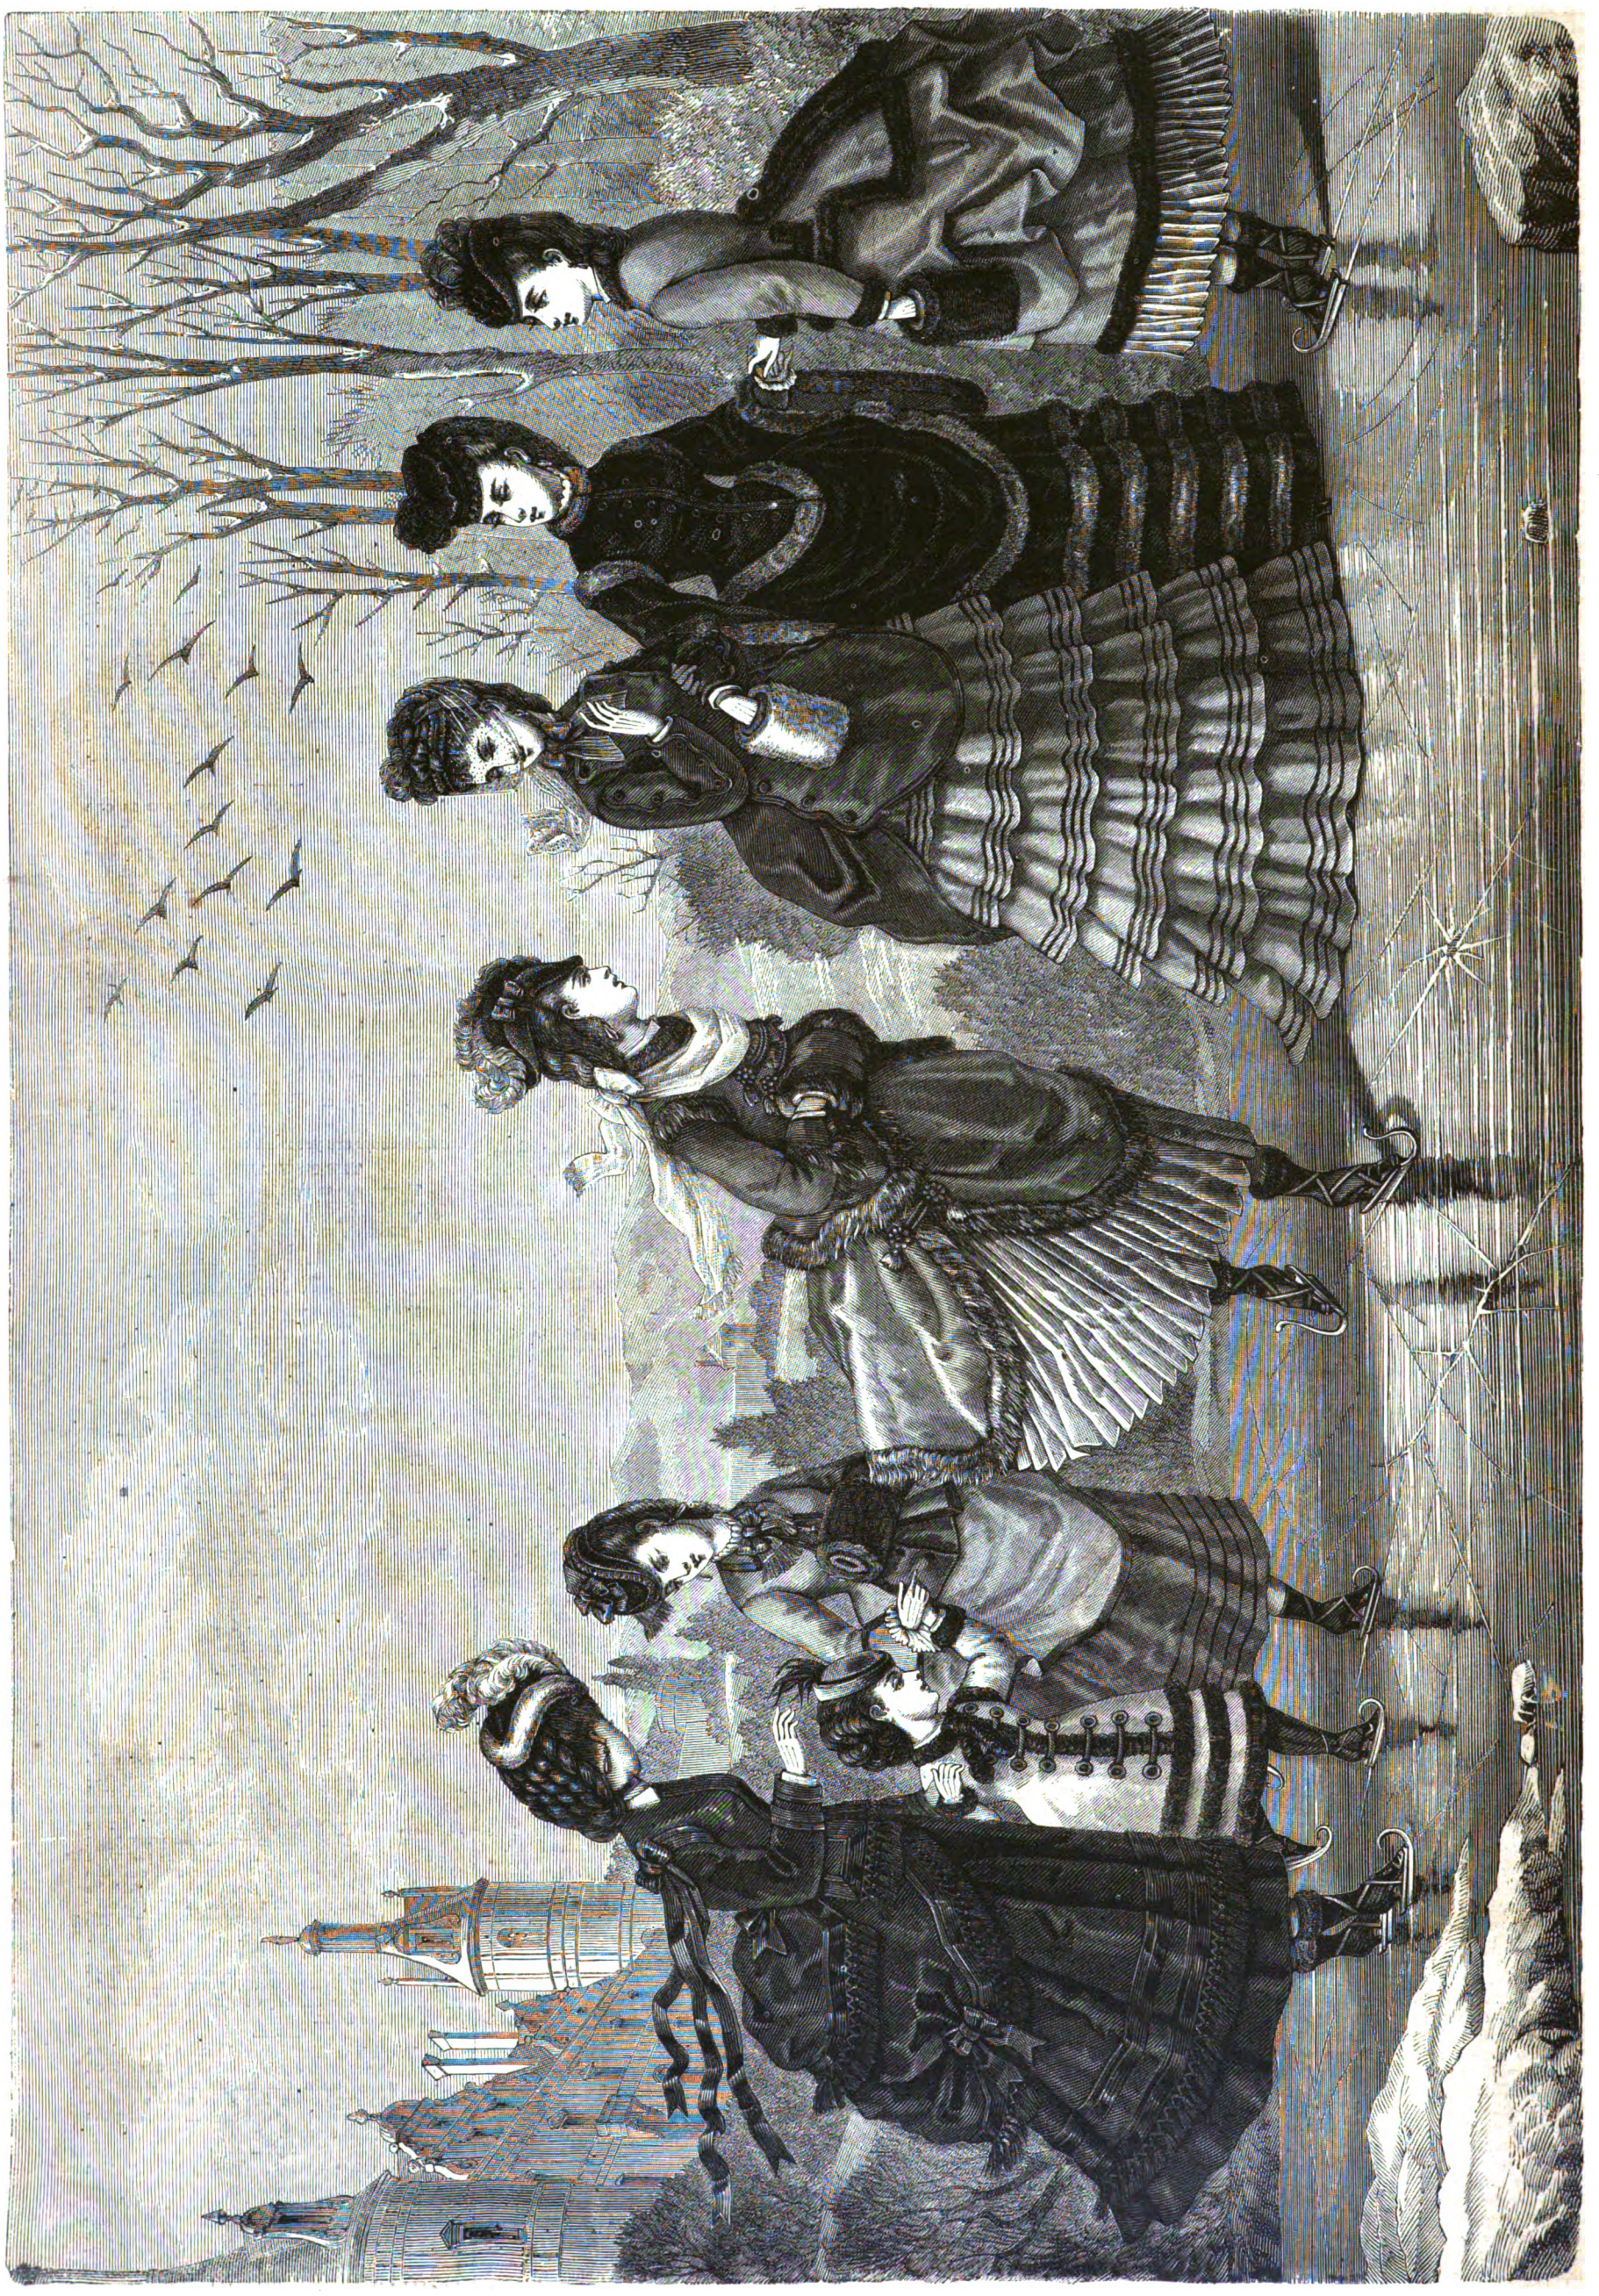

Fig. 1.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 14 TO 16 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 3.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-5.

Fig. 4.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 6-10.

Fig. 5.—LADY'S STREET SUIT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 11-16.

Fig. 6.—LADY'S STREET SUIT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 17-21.

Fig. 7.—SKATING SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 13 TO 15 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Digitized by Google

Aigrettes for Hats, etc., Figs. 1–6.

THESE aigrettes are made partly of wire and beads, and partly of feathers and satin. They are used for finishing bows, or for covering the seams made by sewing feathers on hats and bonnets, and are especially commendable for the simplicity of the materials, and the ease with which they are made.

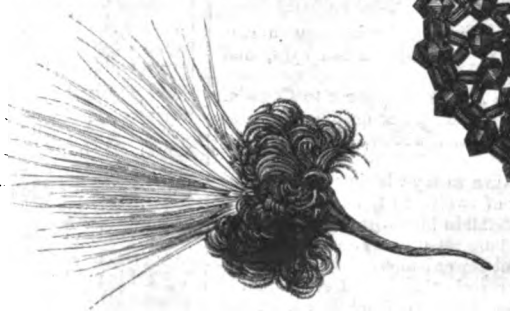

Fig. 4.—AIGRETTE FOR HATS, ETC.—REDUCED SIZE.

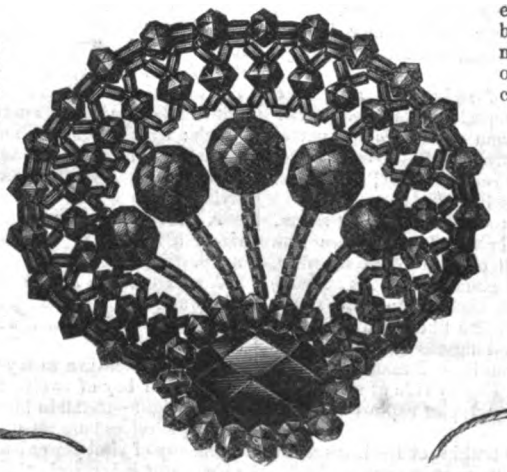

Fig. 1.—AIGRETTE FOR HATS, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

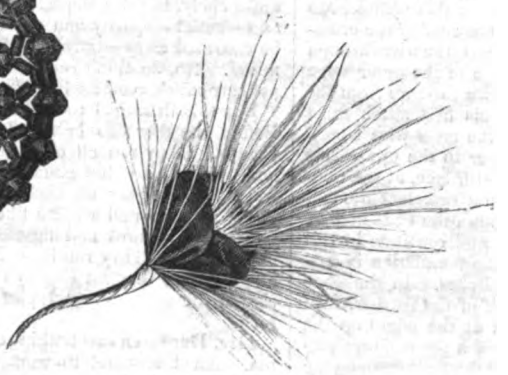

Fig. 5.—AIGRETTE FOR HATS, ETC.—REDUCED SIZE.

Fig. 1.—To make this aigrette take for the five bead bars in the middle five pieces of wire each two inches and a half long, string a black enameled bead on each wire, slip it to the middle, double the wire, and on the double wire string, first, a large round bead, and then several bugles. As is plainly shown by the illustration, the large round beads of the two outside bars must be somewhat smaller than those of the three middle bars. Sew the still free ends of the wires on one lengthwise edge of an oval foundation made of a double piece of stiff lace. Cover the seam made by doing this with a small oval cut jet medallion, and surround this with small round cut beads strung on wire. In connection with the middle part work the border; for the outside of the border take two pieces of wire of the requisite length, string bugles and round cut beads on these, as shown by the illustration, and in connection with them work the scallop as follows: Fasten the ends of the outer bead wire underneath the jet medallion, lay on a new wire there, * string three small enameled bugles on this wire, then a round cut bead, then a bugle, then pass the wire through the first round bead of the outer wire, take up a bugle, and pass the wire through the round bead previously taken up. Repeat from *. In working the scallops which come on the free end of the five bead wires, instead of taking up the three bugles, pass the wire through the bugle at the end of the bead bar (see illustration). After completing the border, fasten the wire under the jet medallion.

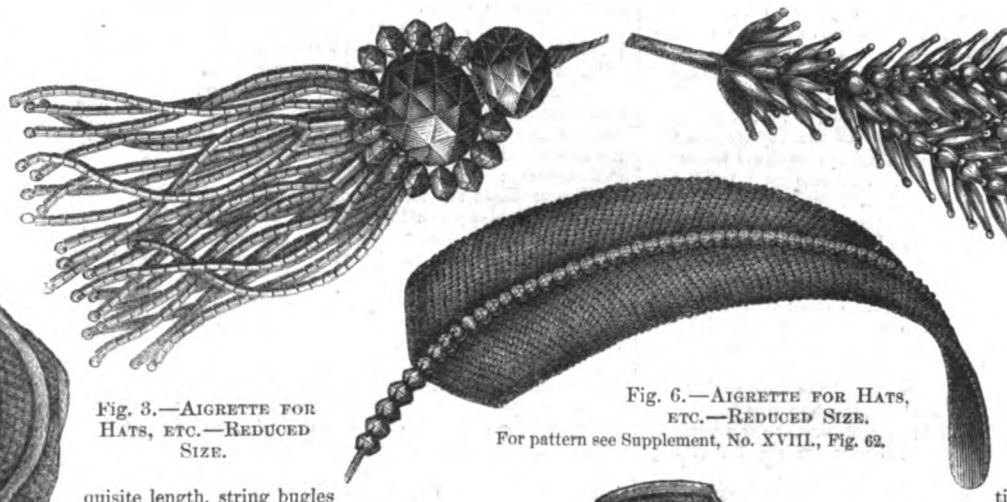

Fig. 3.—AIGRETTE FOR HATS, ETC.—REDUCED SIZE.

Fig. 6.—AIGRETTE FOR HATS, ETC.—REDUCED SIZE.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVIII., Fig. 62.

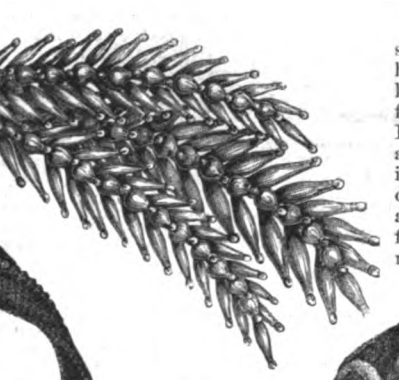

Fig. 2.—AIGRETTE FOR HATS, ETC. REDUCED SIZE.

Fig. 2.—For this aigrette, simulating heads of wheat, which the illustration shows reduced to one-third of the original size, take three rather coarse pieces of wire, one of which is five inches and three-fifths long, and the other two five inches and a fifth and four inches and four-fifths respectively; each of these wires forms the middle vein of a head. Besides this take for each blade as many pieces of fine wire, each four inches long, as the head counts bugles and large round beads. Take up a small bead on each of these wires, pass it to the middle of the wire, bend the latter double, take up a bugle, and fasten the grain thus formed to the coarser wire by means of fine wire, as shown by the illustration. Besides this fasten a round bead between each two grains; this bead, like those of the grains, is secured on a double wire by means of a small bead. Bind the three heads of wheat, the stems of which must previously have been wound with silk, together with silk, in doing which fasten two tufts of wheat to the stem of the aigrette (see illustration).

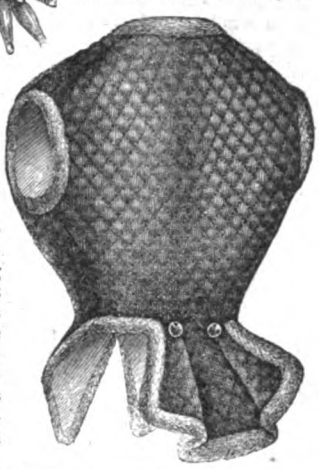
Fig. 3.—For this aigrette prepare, first, five bead tassels. Each of these tassels consists of five to six very fine wires, each twelve inches long. Take up a small bead on each wire, slip it to the middle of the wire, and bend the latter double. Then take up black bugles on the wires, leaving three inches of the ends free. Pass the free ends of five or six such wires through a bugle four-fifths of an inch long, below this bugle twist the wire ends of two tassels together. In the same manner join the three remaining tassels together. Then pass the ends of the five tassels through a large round cut jet bead, and above this cover the tassels with a small oval jet medallion, which must be surrounded with round beads strung on wire. The still free ends of the wire form the stem, and are closely wound with black silk.

Fig. 4.—This aigrette consists of a bunch of white heron's feathers three inches and a quarter long, around which smaller bunches of curled black ostrich feathers are arranged in a circle. The wire ends of the feather bunches form the stem, which must be wound with black tissue paper (see illustration).

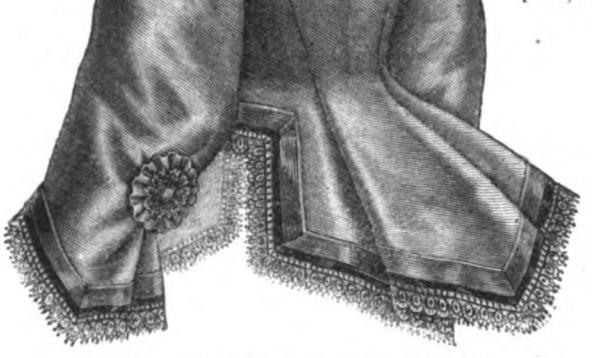
Fig. 5.—This aigrette consists of a bunch of white heron's feathers four inches long, which is surrounded by four small black satin leaves. For each of these leaves take a piece of black satin two inches and two-fifths square, double it so as to form a triangle, and insert a piece of fine wire between the double material along the fold, letting the wire project two inches beyond the satin on each side. Lay each part in thick pleats along the straight edges, so as to give it the shape of a leaf; twist the ends of the wire together, and arrange the leaves around the bunch of feathers in the manner shown by the illustration. Finally, edge the leaves with small bunches of heron's feathers, and wind the wire ends, which form the stem, with tissue paper.

Fig. 6.—This aigrette simulates a feather. To make it, cut of stiff lace from Fig. 62 of the Supplement one piece, allowing four-fifths of an inch

QUILTED SLEEVELESS JACKET WITH FUR TRIMMING.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 46 and 47.



QUILTED SLEEVELESS JACKET WITH FUR TRIMMING.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 46 and 47



TIGHT-FITTING GROS GRAIN BASQUE.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 37-41.

CLOTH SACQUE.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 48–58.

TIGHT-FITTING GROS GRAIN BASQUE.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 37-41.

Digitized by Google

extra material all around. On this foundation work the design in bead satin stitch embroidery as follows: First draw the contour of the feather on the foundation, fasten a fine wire to the middle of the broad cross-wise edge, and take up a number of small black beads on this sufficient to cover the foundation along one-half of the cross-wise edge before mentioned, pass the wire through a hole of the lengthwise edge of the outer edge of the feather, putting the wire through from the upper to the under side (this first stitch must cover half the contour of the cross-wise edge), pass the wire from the under to the upper side through the first hole of the stiff lace, at the middle vein of the leaf, take up a sufficient number of beads, pass the wire through the next hole of the side of the outer edge, and continue in this manner until one-half of the foundation is covered with diagonal bead stitches. In the same manner cover the other half of the feather, turn down the surplus material at the edges on the under side, and fasten it; sew a piece of fine bonnet wire to the under side of the feather along the middle, and on the outer edge fasten a wire on which round beads are strung. The ends of the wire must project an inch and a fifth beyond the end of the feather. The beads must be largest at these ends of the wire, and gradually grow smaller toward the point of the feather.

LOVE IN WINTER.

BETWEEN the berried holly-bush
The Blackbird whistled to the Thrush:
"Which way did bright-eyed Bella go?
Look, Speckle-breast, across the snow—
Are those her dainty tracks I see,
That wind toward the shrubbery?"

The Throstle pecked the berries still.
"No need for looking, Yellow-bill;
Young Frank was there an hour ago,
Half frozen, waiting in the snow;
His callow beard was white with rime—
Tchuk—'tis a merry pairing time!"

"What would you?" twittered in the Wren;
"These are the reckless ways of men.
I watched them bill and coo as though
They thought the sign of Spring was snow;
If men but timed their loves as we,
'Twould save this inconsistency."

"Nay, gossip," chirped the Robin, "nay;
I like their unreflective way.
Besides, I heard enough to show
Their love is proof against the snow:
Why wait, he said, why wait for May,
When love can warm a winter's day?"

DESIRÉE.

BY JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

NEARLY twenty years ago an English lady and her little boy were crossing the Atlantic in one of the Cunard steamers. The lady was going to Canada, where her brother lived. She was a widow; she had lost her husband a very few years after their marriage. Her name was Helen Dunraven, and she had a sweet, gentle, somewhat melancholy face, as I think a woman named Helen ought to have. Her little boy was a bright-haired, blue-eyed creature. His fair hair clustered about his forehead, and fell upon his shoulders. This was about the time when knickerbockers first became the garb of small boys in Europe; and little Eustace Dunraven wore black velvet knickerbockers, and looked like a tiny prince.

It was summer weather. The sea was really for once "like glass." One could hardly be sick, even if he tried. Mrs. Dunraven was sitting on deck one day with her boy, when she heard the patter of little feet, and a child came scampering up to her knee, and caught her hand. The new-comer was a little maid some eight years old, with a pretty head covered with jet-black hair, and a pair of deep black eyes, lustrous and lambent. The little girl's complexion was of almost tropical darkness. She was a lovely little creature, indeed, who might have stood as an infantile impersonation of Night, while the sunny-haired boy near her would have passed for a living symbol of Day.

"And what is your name, my little dear?" asked Mrs. Dunraven, who did not remember to have seen the child before.

"My name is Desirée," little Night replied, promptly and clearly; and then went on, "I saw you on the deck, and I ran to you because I love you!"

"Do you, my sweet little creature? I am sure I shall love you," said Helen, kissing the child tenderly.

"Oh yes, I love you; and I love your little boy."

The little boy was holding off rather sheepishly, after the manner of his race. In very early life the girls make all the advances, if any are made. This little girl stood fearlessly before the boy, and gazed at him with tender, innocent frankness, while he was somewhat shy, and looked at her timidly out of his great blue eyes. At his mother's bidding he went near the child, and gave her his hand; but she put her arms round his neck and kissed him.

"Do you know us, Desirée?" Mrs. Dunraven asked.

"Oh yes, quite well; I saw you once before—the day you came on board; and now I knew you again, and I ran up because I am so fond of you. I was below for two days. Mamma thought she would be sick. But I hope she won't be sick; don't you?"

"Yes, my dear, I do indeed. Is she on deck?"

"Oh no; but she sent me up. She said I might go and play; and, please, may I play with your little boy? We have been in Paris. Was he ever in Paris? There are such nice dolls in Paris! I suppose he doesn't care for dolls? Boys don't, I suppose."

There was a tone of resignation, almost of melancholy, in this; the reluctant recognition of an essential disparity and uncongeniality not to be charmed away—only perhaps to be compromised. No, he didn't care for dolls; didn't just yet care much even for little girls.

But this little girl took him fairly by storm. Before the day was half over they were firm friends. They ran all over the deck together, and tried to play that game (what is it called?) which people play on board ship with round pieces of wood and a thing like a crutch, and a number of squares and figures chalked on the deck planks. They ran into all manner of holes and corners; they sat side by side at meals, and shared the oranges and apples captured at dessert.

Mrs. Dunraven saw nothing of Desirée's mamma. An elderly mulatto woman came and looked after the child now and then; but the mother did not appear, and seemed quite content that Desirée should be left entirely to Mrs. Dunraven's care. Practically this was so. The little girl clung to Helen and her boy all through the voyage as if she belonged to them; and, indeed, people often wondered at the English lady's two children—the one so fair, the other so dark.

Only on the last day of the voyage did the lady whom Desirée called her mamma make an appearance on deck. She was an invalid, apparently; she walked with difficulty. She was wrapped in shawls, though the weather was warm. Her face was indeed somewhat like that of Desirée, but it was sallow and yellow. It was prematurely wasted and old. It was lighted by the cold fire of two stern and dark eyes that burned with a penetrating, painful keenness. The mulatto woman, on whom she leaned, brought this lady up to Mrs. Dunraven.

"I am deeply grateful," the lady said, "for your attention and kindness to this little girl, Desirée. I am an invalid, and she is a restless, self-willed child. No nurse or servant of any kind can get any control over her."

"Indeed? I should never have thought so," Mrs. Dunraven replied. "She seems to me a very docile and loving little creature. It was such a pleasure to me to have your little daughter with us during the voyage!"

"Thank you. I am much obliged. Desirée is not my daughter; she is the child of my brother. He is dead. Desirée is an orphan."

Mrs. Dunraven sighed, and looked at her little boy.

"She calls me mamma," the other lady continued; "but she has neither father nor mother. I take care of her so far as I can; I am her guardian. Desirée will be well cared for, and she will make many friends if she lives, for she will be an heiress."

There was something cold and disagreeable in her tone—a certain grating cynicism, implied in the manner more than in the words. Mrs. Dunraven felt inclined to shrink from her.

"She looks a fine, healthy little girl," she said, in order to say something.

"Healthy! Oh no!" the other replied, coldly; "far from healthy! I should say she had the seeds of consumption in her. Her father and mother both died very young."

The little boy and girl were playing on the deck at some distance while the elders were thus talking. Mrs. Dunraven looked with wonder and greatly increasing dislike at the woman who thus so coldly cast the horoscope of this loving and lovely little child, and sought to find for her the house of death.

Poor Desirée came in for misfortune that day. She and little Eustace were missing for a long time. Two hours and more passed away without their making an appearance. At last they came running up together, hand in hand, and with an air of immense triumph and excitement, to where the elder ladies were sitting.

"Look here, mamma!" the boy exclaimed, half out of breath. "See what we have been doing! Desirée is to be my wife, you know, when we grow big: and so, that we may be sure to know each other again, I have done my name—the letters of it—on her arm, and hers on mine. Tom, the steward's boy, got us the gunpowder, and it didn't hurt a bit—at least, not much, you know. I liked it, and Desirée stood it like a brick! See! there it is—'E. D.' on her arm, for Eustace Dunraven, because she belongs to me; and 'D.' on my arm, for Desirée—only 'D.,' because Desirée doesn't quite remember her other name, and I don't know it. But 'D.' will do well enough; won't it, mamma?"

And the boy pulled up first Desirée's sleeve, and then his own, and showed the work of his hand in triumph. He actually had tattooed the identifying mark in his rude little letters on their arms. He had seen and been immensely delighted with the tattooing performances of some of the sailors, and he thought the finest thing in the world was to employ the process as a love-mark for Desirée and himself.

Desirée's "mamma" positively flamed with fierce, sudden and unintelligible anger. She loaded the poor little girl with harsh and bitter words, and struck her two or three sharp blows on the face. Little Eustace's eyes burned with anger, and his fat, round fists clenched. Desirée never cried, or even winced. The punishment over, her guardian rose from the seat without a word to Mrs. Dunraven, and, despite her invalid condition, hurried down stairs.

The parting of little Desirée from Eustace was a dismal piece of business. The poor children clasped each other and cried. Mrs. Dunraven found her own eyes wet as she looked at them. She made an effort to obtain the address of the little girl's so-called "mamma;" and when the "mamma" herself appeared on deck for the last time, the steamer being actually in the dock, Mrs. Dunraven went over to her, made an effort to be warm and friendly, expressed a hope that they should meet again, and tendered her card. The other lady was cold and constrained. She said, "We are going South; we seldom come North: the climate does not suit me or my husband and children—or Desirée." But she gave a card which bore the name of "Mrs. Angelo Ryland, New Orleans."

A hurry ashore, a rush for luggage, a carriage, a final flash of Desirée's sad eyes, and the parting was over.

Mrs. Dunraven and her boy went to Canada. She was to keep house for her brother, who was a widower, as she was a widow, and had young children.

I will not venture to say whether it is possible for a little boy of twelve to fall in love with a girl of eight—to fall in love with her so that the feeling survives long separation, and abides with a tenacity of vital power which seems unconquerable. But it is certain that little Desirée had so deeply impressed Eustace Dunraven that the memory of her was always with him. For a year or two he kept incessantly harassing his mother with petitions and prayers to be taken to Desirée. Then, as he began to have a clearer intelligence, and to understand that thousands of miles can separate loving hearts, he implored and petitioned no more; but he thought of Desirée all the same. Mrs. Dunraven listened to his occasional talk of Desirée with a keen pain and sadness; for she had learned something which she would not tell as yet to her son. It was this: one day she happened to see an old copy of a New Orleans paper at the house of a friend, and turning listlessly over its pages, she was shocked and grieved to see in the list of deaths the name of Desirée Constant, aged nine years and three months, at the house of her uncle, Angelo Ryland, Esq.

So she was dead, then, and the cold, sharp-faced aunt was right, after all! She was dead, the bright-eyed, beautiful little creature, in whom life seemed so exuberant and so affluent! Never had Mrs. Dunraven seen a creature who appeared to have been gifted with such lavish life-power; and now she was dead! Those lustrous black eyes were closed forever; never would the brilliant, noble-hearted woman be seen on earth whom Mrs. Dunraven had mentally looked on when she contemplated the future of little Desirée. Dear, lost little creature! Earth, lie light upon her graceful, winsome form!

Mrs. Dunraven resolved that she would not yet tell her boy of the death of his quondam little play-fellow. When the distinctness of his memory of her should have worn itself away, then she would tell him; not till then.

Two years after their arrival in Canada Mrs. Dunraven and Eustace paid a visit to some friends in New York. One day, as Mrs. Dunraven was coming out of a book-store in Broadway, Eustace clutched her dress, and cried, "Oh, mamma, look, look—Desirée!" Then he ran two or three paces on, and cried out, "Desirée!"

Mrs. Dunraven looked in the direction which the boy's gestures and movements indicated, and she saw a carriage driving on, and there was a child's face seen for a moment at the window, which did certainly seem to her to resemble that of poor, lost Desirée. At least it was the face of a dark-eyed child, with clustering dark hair; and the child did seem to be looking eagerly back. But that fact was easily to be explained. The child, who probably bore some little resemblance to Desirée, was doubtless attracted by Eustace's sudden cries and gestures. The whole incident was piteous and pathetic. Mrs. Dunraven's heart was keenly touched by the mournful expression in the face of her boy, as, disappointed, he came back to her.

"Well, dear," she said, "you were mistaken?"

"Mistaken! Oh no, mamma; it was Desirée. I wonder she did not stop the carriage! Perhaps now I shall never see her again. Why did she not stop the carriage?"

"But, Eustace, my child, it could not have been Desirée."

"Mamma, don't you think I should know Desirée? Besides, she saw me and knew me."

Mrs. Dunraven shook her head sadly. She saw no use in pursuing the discussion any farther. Poor Eustace was quite perplexed and miserable all that day. Indeed, the holiday in New York was spoiled for him. There was something wonderful in the hold which the recollection of the dark-eyed child had on the boy. You might have thought he was a full-grown lover yearning for a lost mistress. At last his mother thought it right to tell him what she knew. The certainty of the worst seemed to her less likely to be wasting and injurious than the pressure and excitement of a barren hope. So she gently but firmly broke the news to him that Desirée was dead. He flushed all red with horror at first, and his lips and hands trembled; but then he broke out with the words:

"Mamma, it isn't true. It was a mistake of the paper, or it was somebody else of the same name. But it was not Desirée! I saw her that day in Broadway, and she saw me. Desirée is alive, and I'll find her yet!".

Mrs. Dunraven wrote a letter to Mrs. Angelo Ryland, New Orleans, reminding her of their slight acquaintance on the voyage from Europe, and of the affection Eustace had formed for Desirée; and asked if it was true that the dear little creature was dead. After the lapse of some weeks she received the following answer:

"MY DEAR MADAME,—I well remember our too short and slight acquaintanceship, which might have ripened into something closer but for my invalid condition. I shall never forget your kindness to the beloved child who is now an angel in heaven. It is too true that Desirée Constant has been long since removed to that better land where those whom her loss has bereaved may yet hope to find her. To me, who loved her as dearly as if she were my own daughter, there can be no earthly consolation for the decree which carried her off, but to which, however, as in Christian duty bound, I endeavor unrepiningly to bow. I remain, dear madame, with warm regards, yours ever,

"CLOTILDA RYLAND."

Mrs. Dunraven thought there was something singularly repelling about the tone of this letter. "She never loved the dear little child; she was glad of her death, because probably she got some money by it," was her exclamation; but then the good woman checked herself, and said: "I have no right to judge her thus. After all, it would be cruel to suppose that a woman did not love a child, or mourn for its death, merely because she was sometimes harsh to it in its lifetime."

She told her son of the letter, and even read it to him. He burst into a passion of tears, but even amidst the tears he exclaimed: "Oh, mamma, I don't care; I don't believe it. I saw Desirée in Broadway that day, and she is not dead!"

Nine or ten years went over, and Eustace Dunraven was a rising young physician, settled in New York, his mother living with him. He had been attached to the army, had served through the war, had been in New Orleans, and had stood by the grave which a marble monument described as the last resting-place of Desirée Constant, aged nine years and three months. He had looked at the grave with tenderness and sadness, remembering the fervor of his childish love. Of course the dark-eyed child had faded for him long since into a mere memory, a cloud-shape, a dream; something which it impressed him sweetly and sadly to think of, like the recollection of exquisite music, or of some melancholy moonlight scene. But he had never loved any girl since. He thought with curious wonder over his boyish conviction that he had seen Desirée alive long after the date on the tomb-stone; and though he now assumed that he was mistaken, it was strange how clearly on his mind remained the impression of his having seen her. In New Orleans he had made inquiries about the Ryland family. Fate had dealt heavily with them. Clotilda Ryland, the aunt of poor little Desirée, had died at an early period of the war, her death having been hastened by the news that her son, whom she passionately loved, had been killed in a battle by a Federal bullet. Angelo Ryland, her husband, who was represented as having been wholly under her influence during her lifetime, was living in Paris with his daughter, now his only child. They had lost nearly all their property (most of it inherited on the death of little Desirée) during the war, and were living in a poor and narrow way. The mulatto woman whom Eustace remembered as Desirée's nurse had been devoted to Mrs. Ryland, refused to accept her freedom during the war, and died soon after her mistress's death. The family was, if such an expression may be used, effaced from New Orleans.

And now Eustace Dunraven is settled in New York. One day he is sent for to attend an English lady who, with her family, has just arrived from Europe, and is at the Clarendon Hotel. He finds that the lady is very weak and nervous, from the effects of the voyage partly, but that there is nothing serious the matter. The lady's husband is an Englishman of wealth. They had been in America several years before; they have come again, to see how it looks after the war. He hears the lady ask one of her servants "where Miss Dennis is," and he hears that Miss Dennis has gone out with Miss Emily, and has not yet come back. Dr. Dunraven takes his leave, to visit the lady again next day; and on leaving her apartments, and hurrying through the hall, he almost rushes against a young lady and a little girl, who are coming in. He takes off his hat—begins to make an apology, when he suddenly breaks off, flushes, stammers, and at last exclaims, "Do let me ask your name! Tell me—are you not Desirée Constant?"

For there before him stands a woman—not a child; but that woman has the face, the eyes, the hair of the child Desirée! The resemblance is wonderful, bewildering, overpowering. It is Desirée!

And the young lady turns pale, and says, in a tremulous tone:

"Sir, my name is Elizabeth Dennis; but the name Desirée startles me in a manner I can not explain. I do believe I must once have been called Desirée, and that I must have known you then."

"How did you get the name of Elizabeth Dennis?"

"I don't know; I hardly remember my parents. I can not understand why the name of Desirée seems so familiar to me. It can not, I now know, have been my name."

"Why—do please forgive my strange questions, and believe that I have a reasonable purpose in them—why can not your name have been Desirée Constant?"

"Because," she said, somewhat hesitatingly—"because, among other reasons, the initials of my name are marked on my arm; and I can faintly remember my little brother—I suppose it must have been he—marking them one day on board a ship, and somebody—I suppose my mother—was there, and was angry."

Eustace Dunraven broke into an exclamation that was almost like a cry. "Desirée," he exclaimed, "it was I who made that mark upon your arm! The initials were mine—not yours. My conviction—my faith was right. Desirée Constant was not dead! She lives, and you are she!"

It was Desirée Constant. The change from childhood to manhood, the hardships and bronzing of the war, the heavy mustache and beard, had so utterly transfigured Eustace Dunraven that she could not possibly recognize him; but gradually a memory of him as the boy on board the steamer came clearly back to her mind, and with it other recollections that helped to make the mystery of her life intelligible at last. It was never wholly cleared up; but, piece by piece, much of it came out, then and afterward; and a crime was revealed. Mrs. Ryland and her mulatto servant had arranged it. Desirée once was attacked by fever, and Mrs. Ryland announced her death. A slave child, nearly white, died just then: her corpse was buried in a coffin which bore the name of Desirée Constant; and Desirée was sent to the far West, when she had scarcely yet recovered from her fever, and kept there for a while by some people who received an annual sum for her, and were given to understand that she was an illegitimate child. The letters marked on her arm suggested to Mrs. Ryland a new baptism for the girl, and she smiled to herself to think how admirably the supposed means of identification could be made to serve the purpose of deception and fraud. She gave to Desirée Constant the name of Elizabeth Dennis; and the child, waking from the delirium of her fever to hear herself addressed only by this name, soon yielded to it in bewilderment, and at last forgot that she had ever been called by any other. Once, when for some purpose her keepers, as they may be termed, brought her to New York, and she saw the boy Eustace, some flash of memory leaped up within her; but she did not hear the name he called, and he soon was lost to sight.

Digitized by Google

It was not long after this that the English family with whom she was now living saw the child, were charmed with her, and were anxious to rescue her from the rough, uncongenial, and mercenary hands in which she was placed. They paid off her keepers, got possession of the child, educated and brought her up, and had her now as a teacher and companion of their children.

This was the story so far as it ever became known. It was not clear that Angelo Ryland, the broken old man now pining in Paris, ever was a party to it. No steps were taken to crush that broken reed by any legal prosecution.

Eustace Dunraven became a close friend of the English family, and of course of Desirée. The memory of his childish affection soon changed into the reality of a manly love. And the girl loved him; and they were finally married, and are happy. Desirée found a mother and a husband at once in Mrs. Dunraven and Eustace: and the future, let us hope, will repay her for the past.

THE FISHERMAN'S DARLING.

See illustration on page 157.

THIS pretty picture represents a scene on the north coast of England. The fisherman's darling, a little barefooted child, is wading out to the old fisherman, who bends over the side of the boat to welcome her. The coast is lined with the village population, some come to welcome the returning craft, and others straining their eyes over the dim horizon, in hopes to see the boats of their husbands and fathers making their way to the harbor. But the bronzed and bearded fisherman sees none of their familiar faces; his eyes and thoughts are bent on the little child that comes through the waters to greet his return home. The little domestic scene appeals to the hearts of all, and possesses a sentiment often lacking in pretentious pictures, which are admired, but never felt.

LENT—ANCIENT AND MODERN.

MODERN Lent. We all know what that means. A six weeks' lull in the gay life of our cities, a substitution of small parties for large, daily service in churches, elaboration of ritual, spare diet for the Catholic part of our households; to gentle and devout souls here and there a time for retrospect, self-questioning, thoughtful charities, prayer. A season deprecated by the young and giddy—welcomed by graver folk; but, at best, accepted only in limited sense, and shorn of much of the pomp and ceremonial which marked an earlier period.

It is curious to look back and note how much the slow-creeping centuries have stolen from the great Fast. We talk of "Shrove-Tuesday," we observe Palm-Sunday and Maundy-Thursday with a special collect and an hour in church; but few of us comprehend that these are but the survivors of a long train of designated days once solemnly celebrated—now disused and laid aside. The very names of the few that remain have lost significance to modern ears; yet in their history is bound up a whole literature of quaint tradition and ceremonial dating back to the early dawn of Christianity, and the cradle of the English race.

The Christmas season, in that old time we speak of, was supposed to last until Fastern-eve, which is the same thing as Pancake or Shrove Tuesday. The four days preceding were given up to revelry of all sorts. On Monday—known as "Collop-Monday"—all who could afford it fortified themselves by an immense meal of beef collops as preparation for the ensuing fast. The scholars at Eton composed on this day rhymes in praise of Bacchus, and affixed them to the college doors. Another curious and very ancient custom was that of the lasses dancing in the church-yard after even-song. Sir Thomas Overbury alludes to this practice indulgently, and "thinks not the bones of the dead any thing bruised or the worse for it."

Shrove-Tuesday derives its name from the Saxon word "shrive," it being a day set apart by the Catholic Church for general confession of sins. Many quaint observances cluster about this day, such as the "pancake-bell," which was rung in the church steeples; the custom of burying the "Holly boy" and the "Ivy girl"—two effigies—by the youth of the village, the boys at one end of the street, and the girls at the other; "shroving," or sending children from house to house to sing carols, and beg for bits of pancake; and "throwing at cocks" (i. e., pelting them with clubs, supposed in some strange and occult way to be a revenge for Peter's denial of his Master). A "learned foreiguer" of the seventeenth century writes, "The English eat a certain cake on Shrove-Tuesday, after which they immediately run wild, and kill their poor cocks!"

Shrove-Tuesday was also a prophetic day. If the wind blew in the night, it betokened "death among them that are learned, and much fish shall die in the following summer." The Shepherds' Almanac for 1676 remarks, "Some say thunder on Shrove-Tuesday foretelleth wind, store of fruit, and plenty."

Ash-Wednesday derives its name from the ancient custom of signing the cross on the foreheads of the people on that day with ashes made of the consecrated palms of the year before, the priest repeating at the same time the admonitory formula, "Memento, homo, quod pulvis es, et in pulverum reverteris." (Remember, man, thou art dust, and shalt return to dust.)

It is a proverb in Norfolk that wherever the wind blows on Ash-Wednesday it will blow the whole of Lent.

"Tid, Mid, Misera, Carling, Palm, Paste-Egg Day,"

are the names given by the vulgar in the north of England to the Sundays in Lent, the first three being probably corruptions of some part of the old Latin psalms for the day. The opening Sunday of Lent is called by the Burgundian peasants "Fire-brand Sunday," from a custom they have of going in procession, with torches of lighted straw, "to drive away," as they say, "the bad air from the earth."

Mid-Lent, or "Mothering-Sunday," was formerly held in high repute. It was a joyful occasion, like the "Mi-Carême" of to-day in Catholic countries, and was observed somewhat after the fashion of our New England Thanksgiving—all children, far and near, going home to visit their parents, and carrying with them gifts, and "simnel" or mothering cakes, flavored with saffron, iced, gilded, or otherwise ornamented. It was a day for family reunions, for the knitting together of the partially sundered filial tie; and if, as pessimists assert, the fifth commandment is in danger of falling into decadence in the nineteenth century, and among ourselves, it were well if this sweet old festival could be revived, and taken back to its honorable place among Lenten customs.

The fifth Sunday in Lent, known of yore as "Care" or "Carle" Sunday, took its name from "carlings," or green pease fried in butter, which were the universal meal on this day. In the twelfth century doles of pease and beans were given away to the poor on Carling-Sunday. Brand, in his "Popular Antiquities," suggests a curious derivation for this from the ancient pagan custom of making doles of beans at funerals. And in fact the day was known in the ancient Roman Church as "Passion-Sunday," and was observed with solemn services, analogous to those of Good-Friday, as a funeral service for our Lord.

In Seville there is a usage for this day evidently the remains of an old custom. Children of all ranks parade the street, fantastically dressed, and making a din with drums and rattles, accompanied by cries of "Saw down the old woman." At midnight older people repeat the performance, and end by sawing in two the figure of an old woman representing Lent. This division is emblematic of Mid-Lent.

It is still customary in parts of England for the boys to "go a-palming" the week before Palm-Sunday. The "palms" are twigs of newly budded willow—almost the only thing that is green at that early season. And they are sold in London streets, and supposed by many to be specimens of real palm.

The day before Good-Friday, once known as "Shere-Thursday," because people on that day "shered theyr heds and clypped theyr berdes, and so made them honest against Easter," now bears the name of "Maundy," a corruption of the Latin word "mandatum," interpreted by some as applying to the "command" given to the disciples to wash one another's feet. Accordingly, this day has been selected from time immemorial for what, in Italy, is called the "Lavanda," or washing of the feet of the poor by royal or noble hands. James II. was the last king of England who performed this office in person, but the custom was observed by deputy until a much later day, and is still of annual occurrence in some countries of Europe.

Good-Friday was then, as now, the gravest and most generally observed fast of the Christian world. In the north of England an herb pudding made of the "passion-dock" is still considered an indispensable dish on this day. In many counties a small loaf of bread is annually baked and laid aside, to be used throughout the year as medicine, grated into water, and swallowed; it is thought a miraculous specific for various disorders. Hot cross-buns, the specialty for Good-Friday, are annually made and sold in great quantities for the use of Catholics and Episcopalians, both in Europe and our own country:

"Whose virtue is, if you'll believe what's said, They'll not grow mouldy like the common bread."

As late as the sixteenth century brazen rings were "hallowed," or blessed, by the kings of England on this day, and distributed as preservatives against cramp.

"Easter-even" was celebrated with much solemnity and many rites, such as extinguishing all fires in churches, and kindling them anew from flint, blessing the Easter wax, consecrating fresh water for fonts, lighting the "paschal taper," and "watching the sepulchre"—a curious custom, reference to which is found in many of the old church-wardens' accounts; as, "For the Tombe of brycke, xiid.; imprimis, for waking of the sepulchre, viiid."

Lastly—crowning, though not belonging to, the mournful season—comes glorious Easter-day, at the dawning of which, according to old tradition, the sun is supposed to dance. In the middle counties of Ireland peasants still rise at four in the morning in hopes of witnessing this phenomenon. Churches were decked with flowers on this day from time immemorial; and not churches only—houses also received similar garnish, the fires being put out, all foul and unclean things laid aside, and the floor strewed with "grene ryysshes all aboute." Every person, it was thought, must produce some new article of dress in honor of the festival, else good fortune would not be his that year:

"At Easter let your clothes be new,
Or else be sure you will it rue."

There was great feasting upon tansy puddings and "pudding-pies," likewise "clean-footed beasts, even as eggs and green herbes." The old custom of eating bacon on this day, to mark abhorrence of Judaism, is still kept up in some parts of England. Another practice, long obsolete, was "clipping the church," all the children of the parish clasping hands, and making a chain round the sacred edifice. (Fancy the pretty rogues, with honest English roses in their cheeks!)

"Pasch," "paschal," or "paste" eggs were made in every house, and exchanged between friends as an Easter greeting. Various methods of ornamenting them were in use. Sometimes patterns were traced on the shell with tallow, after which the egg was boiled in lye, the pattern appearing in white lines on the colored ground. Another device was to color the egg, and scrape the pattern artistically with a penknife. Sometimes the egg was covered with leaf-gold. "Cracking" these eggs was a favorite sport among boys. They were held in the hand, and struck violently together, the survivor being accorded a sort of champion's belt, and challenging all the other eggs in the village.

In Russia these eggs are given and taken with the beautiful salutation and countersign, "Christ is arisen;" "Yes, He is risen." The people then embrace, and drink a great deal of brandy.

Such was ancient Lent—differing widely from the modern, but still with so much of the same usage as to make applicable to either Herrick's lines in "The Noble Numbers," with a fragment of which we close:

"It is a fast to dole
Thy sheaf of wheat
And meat
Unto the hungry soul.

"It is to fast from strife,
From old debate
And hate—
To circumcise thy life.

"To show a heart grief-rent—
To starve thy sin,
Not bin.
And that's to keep thy Lent."

FAMILY BREAKFASTS AND DINNERS.

BREAKFAST.

Chocolate, Stewed Rabbit, Broiled Potatoes, Rice Bread, Stale Bread Griddle Cakes.

CHOCOLATE.—Heat half a pint of milk and half a pint of water until nearly boiling. Scrape into this while on the fire an ounce of chocolate, stirring quickly till dissolved. Boil two minutes.

STEWED RABBIT (Southern style).—Skin the rabbit, and separate every joint, rubbing each piece with butter, pepper, salt, powdered cloves, and lemon. Parboil the heart and liver, and chop fine. Put the meat and chopped liver and heart in a stew-pan, and cover with cold water. Cover closely, and stew gently till the meat is tender; take it out in a dish, thicken the gravy with flour and butter rolled together, add a table-spoonful of mushroom catsup, pepper, salt, lemon juice, and two table-spoonfuls of rich cream. Boil up once, pour over the meat, and serve.

BROILED POTATOES.—Parboil large potatoes, peel and cut them in thick slices. Broil the slices on a gridiron over a clear fire until brown on both sides. Serve on a hot dish, with pepper, salt, and butter.

RICE BREAD.—Boil one pound of whole rice in milk enough to dissolve all the grains, adding it boiling as it is absorbed. Have four pounds of sifted flour in a pan, and into this pour the rice and milk, adding salt and a wine-glassful (large) of brewer's yeast. Knead, and set to rise till night. Form in loaves, and bake.

STALE BREAD GRIDDLE CAKES.—Grate the crumb of a stale loaf of bread, and sift out all the lumps. Stir in milk till a thick batter is formed. Beat eggs, allowing two to every pint of milk, till smooth, and add to the batter; add a little salt. Beat all well together, and bake on a well-buttered griddle.

DINNER.

Ox-tail Soup, Stewed Eels, Saddle of Mutton, Sweet-breads and Cauliflower, Green Corn (boiled), Potato Salad, Currant Jelly, Pickled Lemons, Apricot Jam Tarts.

OX-TAIL SOUP.—Scald and scrape the tail. Divide it at each joint, and stew it with plenty of water. Peel and cut in slices two large potatoes, two large onions, two large turnips, and two carrots. Chop a bunch of pot-herbs fine. When the meat is tender, skim the soup, add the vegetables, and boil till they are done. Stir in a table-spoonful of burned sugar, and strain the soup. Season the soup with pepper, salt, Cayenne, and lemon juice, and break in half a pound of vermicelli. Boil till this is tender, and serve.

STEWED EELS (Canada recipe).—Wash and skin two pounds of eels, cut them in pieces three inches long, pepper and salt them, and put them in a stew-pan. Pour in one pint of good soup-stock, adding one large onion, shredded, three cloves, a tea-spoonful of grated lemon peel, and a wine-glassful of port-wine. Stew gently half an hour, and pour into a hot dish. Strain the gravy, and add a wine-glassful of cream thickened with flour, and boil up once. Pour over the eels, and serve.

SADDLE OF MUTTON.—Remove from a saddle of mutton all uneatable portions, and loosen the skin. Roast for one hour before a clear fire, turning it often. Remove the skin, sprinkle on flour and salt, and roast again half an hour, basting often. Thicken the gravy in the dripping-pan, and pour it over the mutton when done. Serve on a very hot dish.

SWEET-BREADS AND CAULIFLOWER.—Boil two large sweet-breads and one head of cauliflower in separate vessels until they are tender. Cut the cauliflower in two, and place on a flat dish, with a sweet-bread on each half, and stand five minutes in the oven. Put in a sauce-pan a pint of rich sweet milk, an ounce of butter, a tea-spoonful of sifted flour, and a tea-spoonful of salt. Boil up to a rich sauce, and pour over the cauliflower and sweet-bread.

GREEN CORN (boiled).—Green corn is too often spoiled by being left too long in the water. Very young corn will cook in ten minutes, and any that is not tender in twenty minutes is too hard to be eaten at all. Husk the corn, remove the silk, and cut out all imperfect places. Put the ears in an iron pot, cover with boiling water, cover the pot closely, and boil fifteen minutes. Corn is very delicious if boiled in the inside husk, removing it before serving. It can be loosened to remove the silk, and drawn up again.

CURRANT JELLY.—Strip the fruit from the stalks; bruise the fruit; and if the currants are black, add a little water; put them in a preserving kettle; stir them about, till they have yielded their juice, over a moderate fire; turn them into a very fine hair sieve, and drain the jelly from the pulp. To every pint of the jelly allow one pound of refined sugar; boil for fifteen minutes. Keep in glasses covered with brandied paper and bladder.

POTATO SALAD.—Boil one egg hard; when cold, take out the yolk, and rub it to a pulp with a wooden spoon; add a raw yolk, a tea-spoonful of flour, one of vinegar, one of sweet-oil, a little salt and pepper, a salt-spoonful of mixed mustard, and a table-spoonful of sweet butter. Beat this mixture well together. Slice some cold boiled potatoes in thin slices, and over these pour the mixture. Serve cold.

PICKLED LEMONS.—To six large lemons allow two quarts of boiling water, one quart of vinegar, half an ounce of cloves, half an ounce of white pepper, one ounce of grated ginger, half an ounce of stripped mace, one ounce of mustard seed, half an ounce of grated horse-radish, and a few cloves of garlic. Put the lemons into a brine strong enough to bear an egg; let them remain six days, stirring the brine every day. On the sixth day take the lemons out, throw them into two quarts of boiling water, and boil them fifteen minutes. Let them dry and get perfectly cold on a fine hair sieve. Boil all the other ingredients in the vinegar; put the lemons in stone jars, pour in the boiling vinegar, cover closely, and stand away to cool. When cold, make the covers air-tight, and keep for six months, when they will be fit for use.

APRICOT JAM TARTS.—Pare ripe apricots, break them in halves, and remove the stones. To every pound of fruit allow a pound of finely powdered sugar. Strew the sugar over the fruit, and stand for twelve hours. Break the stones; blanch the kernels, and put them with the fruit and sugar in a preserving kettle. Simmer gently, removing the apricots as they are done, and skimming the sirup. Mash fruit, kernels, and sirup together, and put in jars to cool. Line tart-pans with puff-paste, fill with the jam, crossing the top with strips of paste. Bake in a quick oven. Serve cold, and sprinkled with sugar.

INFINITELY LITTLE PEOPLE.

IT does appear singular that in this book-multiplying age there should be a large number of men and women, not devoid of education and some intelligence, who have a positive dislike to reading, and would be driven to the most vapid resources for killing time rather than open a book. I have met with some striking exceptions to the rule that only unreflecting and ignorant persons dislike reading. And by books I do not mean those dry books for instruction and improvement in history, science, etc., such as, according to delightful Elia, "no gentleman's library should be without."

No; I mean "books which are books"—thrilling novels and romances which hold you enchanted to the last page. Conceive, only conceive, the terrible undevelopment, the dreary dullness, of that soul which will prefer a mournful, melancholy morning call to the rapture of lying on a sofa at home, and reading Wilkie Collins's "Man and Wife" or "Woman in White," Hawthorne's "Blythedale Romance," or any of the volumes of Scott, Bulwer, cum multis aliis!

Yet hear it, credite posteri. Such people exist. Tempt them in every possible way. Leave the most enticing volume upon the table. They will avoid it as if it were a snare or pitfall. Offer to lend it to them—force it upon them; they will take it home, and return it after a certain time, with thanks. Do you imagine they have read it? Never will they allude to the contents unless you cross-question them severely. Then they will say it was "very interesting," or "very nice," and immediately change the conversation. Do not press them beyond this; do not ask for any analysis or critical opinion of the book they say they have read.

There are, too, those delicious coteries, who live in the midst of the nineteenth century with ideas of matters and things in general worthy of the Dark Ages—people who regard all intellectual superiority as something wicked, which should be punishable by law. Let the naturalist beware, however, how he attempts to dispel the mental darkness which these people love. Let any one endeavor to raise the bold, disjointed chat into something deserving the name of conversation. The alarm will be spread. "He thinks for himself; he wishes to make us think. He is a bad man." Immediately these moral hedgehogs roll themselves up, and present an impenetrable wall of bristles to the attack of ideas.

We are in the habit of calling "good sort of persons" those who merit the very opposite title; whose lives are little, selfish, dirty, and mean; who pursue no great aims, entertain no elevated views, despise any sentiment and idea above their own circumscribed intelligence, and at every lofty, generous, enthusiastic impulse, decline every thing involving a self-sacrifice; whose philanthropy, virtue, and religion are but vain, empty words.

These bad sort of people—these infinitely little folk—thoroughly illustrate the truth of Diderot's pithy saying, "that the ingredients of human happiness are a good digestion, a bad heart, and no conscience."

Digitized by Google

ALICE CARY.

ON Sunday, February 12, anticipating the earthly daybreak, Alice Cary awoke in the morning of immortality out of a sleep that had come after a long, long pain. Her passage into the everlasting light was followed by a line of loving hearts that were loth to give her up even to the Angel of Glory. Her readers were her friends, her friends were her lovers. The readers of the Bazar, all the world over, will mourn with us the loss of a "sweet singer," who will sing no more for us; for she has gone, with harp and crown, to rule and sing among the immortals.

Alice Cary had the blood of chivalry and of religion in her veins. Among her ancestors was that Sir Robert Cary who, in the reign of Henry V., met and vanquished the Aragonese chevalier who challenged to combat any Englishman of gentle blood. The arms of the distinguished combatant became those of the Cary family, and a copy is hanging now in Alice's library. Then there was a Walter Cary, who left France on the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, because he was a Huguenot, and settled in England. His son, Walter, came to New England, and near Plymouth Rock opened the first grammar-school in America. From him our Alice descended.

She was born on a farm near Cincinnati, Ohio, April 26, 1820. Her sensitive organism made her peculiarly susceptible to the influences of nature, and her admirable judgment taught her what to do with the wealth she gathered from garden and field and forest. At the age of eighteen she began to write for the papers, principally for the National Era; and these contributions won for her the friendship of the poet Whittier, which she held through all her life. Her sister Phœbe, five years younger, began also to write. There were five other sisters, all greatly gifted women.

But the mother went away in a consumption, the sisters married, and have all departed this life except Phœbe, who is the last of that extraordinary sisterhood. Upon the second marriage of their father, and the removal from home of the other sisters, Alice and Phœbe determined to come to New York. This was in 1850. It was a bold but not a rash undertaking. They had youth and health and friends, and some money to sustain them until they could make a settlement. It was not long before many persons of literary taste and high culture became their friends, and the parties that met at their tea-table have embraced many of the most noted American and European authors and artists.

In busy New York, where congregate so many men and women distinguished in every department of art and literature, there are still very few centres for society of this kind. There are rallying-places in plenty for persons of fashion and leisure; but people of ideas and culture—who really constitute the best society—are diffused through the mass, and gather together but rarely and at few points. To those the sisters' hospitable house was a godsend. It soon became famed as the centre of a choice coterie which might have rivaled the French salons of the eighteenth century; and the loss which the literary society of New York sustained when its doors were closed can only be realized by those who remember the charm of these delightful reunions of the most gifted of the great metropolis.

In 1850 a joint volume of poems written by Alice and Phœbe appeared in Philadelphia. The next year appeared the first series of the "Clovernook Papers," which have been so greatly admired on both sides of the Atlantic. In 1853 the second series was equally successful. In 1854 appeared "The Clovernook Children." Her intellect and heart grew through all the succeeding years; and her industrious hand produced stories and poems which will always be regarded as valuable contributions to American literature. Her novels are, "Hagar: a Story of To-day" (1852), "Married, not Mated" (1856), and "The Bishop's Son" (1867). Her "Pictures of Country Life" (1859) was received with great favor. "Ballads, Lyrics, and Hymns" (Hurd & Houghton, 1866), "The Lover's Diary" (Ticknor & Fields, 1867), and "Snow Berries," a juvenile, are the latest of her productions. Besides these, her still uncollected contributions in prose and verse to the Bazar, Harper's Monthly, the Atlantic, the Independent, the Ledger, and other journals show her great industry and manifold resources. Perhaps there are none of her American sisters in song who will not consent to consider Alice Cary the chief of their beautiful choir. Edgar Allan Poe regarded the following one of the very finest poems produced in America:

Of all the beautiful pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
Is one of a dim old forest,
That seemeth best of all:
Not for its gnarled oaks olden,
Dark with the mistletoe;
Not for the violets golden
That sprinkle the vale below;
Not for the milk-white lilies
That lean from the fragrant hedge,
Coquetting all day with the sunbeams,
And stealing their golden edge;
Not for the vines on the upland,
Where the bright red berries rest;
Nor the pinks, nor the pale, sweet cowslip,
It seemeth to me the best.

I once had a little brother,
With eyes that were dark and deep:
In the lap of that olden forest
He lieth in peace asleep.
Light as the down of the thistle,
Free as the winds that blow,
We roved there the beautiful summers—
The summers of long ago;
But his feet on the hills grew weary,
And one of the autumn eves
I made for my little brother
A bed of the yellow leaves.

Sweetly his pale arms folded
My neck in a meek embrace,
As the light of immortal beauty
Silently covered his face;
And when the arrows of sunset
Lodged in the tree-tops bright
He fell, in his saint-like beauty,
Asleep by the gates of light.
Therefore, of all the pictures
That hang on Memory's wall,
The one of the dim old forest
Seemeth best of all.

Miss Cary's fondness for flowers was very great. She had what is better than all botanical knowledge—a poetic knowledge of the sweetest usages and significances of all the flowers that grew. She does not generalize when writing of them. She sets each in its particular place, and gives it a fresh grace by the appropriate surroundings of ideas. A young Southern lady, who from childhood has been a loving student of Alice Cary's poetry, remarked to us at the funeral that she believed she could find each flower of our Middle States, and many of those of the South, mentioned with appreciation in some part of Alice Cary's poems.

She never knew

"That which is woman's greatest good—
The blessedness of motherhood;"

but she never lost her fondness for children. Little girls felt much at home with her. She caught the individuality of each child into her own nature, and reproduced it in her communications with the child. Her "Snow Berries" will always be a great favorite with the little people.

She had created for herself many friends whom she never saw, and many who had never seen her until they beheld her lying in her last sleep in the house of prayer. Among these was one gentleman well known in scientific circles—a man supposed to have little of poetic juice in the dry composition of his nature. He surprised a friend who sat near him by his exhibition of feeling while the address was delivered; and at the close, in explanation of his great emotion, he said: "I have read every line that woman ever published. I have never spoken to her; but I tell you she was the largest-hearted woman that ever lived!"

She never outgrew her sensitiveness. To the last she was as quick to perceive whether what she had written was pleasing to her friends, and gave pleasure to the public, as when she first began authorship. It was not morbidness, but the sensibility of genius, that was touched by failure or success.

She had been long an invalid, sometimes a great sufferer, and yet she had kept to her work very steadily. In Packard's Monthly for February, 1870, an article by Dr. Deems, describing the home of the two sisters, says: "The two windows to the left in the second-story let light into the work-shop of Alice Cary. In that delightful room the patient, toiling, suffering invalid has wrought with her pen for years, heroically holding down the pain that has tugged at her nerves, and never allowing it to creep into her charming poems and stories, which are open, sunny, breezy as the country, and full of the odors of wild flowers and of new-mown hay. Books for children, books for lovers, books for grave and thoughtful people, have grown up in that room. How she does it is amazing. For years a sufferer, she has produced so much that is so good that she is 'as a wonder unto many' of her robust fellow-laborers of both sexes."

ALICE CARY.—[PHOTOGRAPHED BY ROCKWOOD AND CO., FROM A PICTURE BY FRANCIS B. CARPENTER.]

The readers of the Bazar will remember the exquisite poem by Alice Cary, "The Flight of the Birds," published last fall, just when our feathered songsters were taking their flight to a warmer clime.

Therefore I pray, and can but pray,
Lord keep, and bring them back when May
Shall come, with shining train,
Thick broidered with leaves of wheat,
And butterflies, and field-pinks sweet,
And yellow bees, and rain.

Yea, bring them back across the seas
In clouds of golden witnesses—
The grand, the grave, the gay;
And, if Thy holy will it be,
Keep me alive, once more to see
The glad and glorious day.

The touching prayer was not granted; and when the birds return they will no longer find her who knew their language so well, and who, like the swan, warbled her sweetest songs when dying. She is the first lady contributor to the Bazar who has died, and its half million of readers will be numbered among her mourners.

In private life Alice Cary was a most attractive woman. She was so pure, so truthful, so elevated! She had no petty jealousies, no stinging wit, no unwomanly ambitions. Women of the most diverse culture and habits of thought recognized her as a true sister. When men love a woman it may be of nature; but when women love her it is of grace—the grace the loved one has created. Her sufferings during the last eighteen months have sometimes been terrible; but no one who has read the stories and the poems she has produced during that season of darkness could imagine that they had come from a bed of sickness and torture. They have in them no suggestion of a sick head or a sick heart.

On Tuesday, February 7, she wrote her last poem, the last line of which is "The rainbow comes but with the cloud." Even after that she attempted in her bed to make a cap for an aged woman who greatly loved her, and whose sobs in the Church of the Strangers, when her death was announced, moved the whole audience to tears. But her fingers failed, and the needle stands in the unfinished cap; for her own crown was ready, and she could not stay away from her coronation. She fell in a deep sleep, out of which she once exclaimed, "I want to go away." She passed away as she had always desired—waking into the better land out of a slumber in this. "For so he giveth his beloved sleep."

The 14th of February was a day of storm and of immense snowfall. Through it all hundreds went to the Church of the Strangers, where the services at her obsequies were conducted by her friend and pastor, Reverend Dr. Deems. Early in Dr. Deems's ministry in New York she took a deep interest in the success of the church that was to be unsectarian, and free for all strangers. It was the last in which she was able to hear the Gospel, but her interest in it deepened to her dying day. Often in her sickness she expressed the wish that she could contrive some way to obtain a church for the congregation, which was then worshiping in the chapel of the University. When she learned that Commodore Vanderbilt had given the Mercer Street Church to Dr. Deems for his Christian work she was overjoyed into speechlessness, and could not have been more grateful if some great personal favor had been conferred on her. Her anxiety to be present at the opening exercises was intense. But she could not. She went into the church at last, to lie in quiet and beauty among flowers and music and friends, while her pastor tearfully and heartily interpreted the love and grief of a large assembly, in which were many poor, some servants, many who loved her in her books, and almost every man and woman in New York who is distinguished in literature. And while he talked great men bowed their heads and wept. She was carried to Greenwood, a score of devoted friends following her through the storm, and seeing her precious dust laid beside that of her sister Elmina. Immediately the heavens covered her resting-place with drapery as white as her soul, and as soft and noiseless as her charity.

We conclude this sketch with one of her poems, which she called "Dying Hymn," and which Dr. Deems recited in his address. To appreciate the marvelous appropriateness which makes these verses seem like a prophecy it is necessary to know that she exceedingly enjoyed singing and walking. As she declined in health she grew freshly fond of the hymns of her childhood, and frequently asked her friends to sing such hymns as, "Jesus, lover of my soul," "Show pity, Lord, O Lord, forgive," "A charge to keep I have;" and she loved to have them sung to old tunes. When in health, in walking the streets, she would frequently say, "I do not envy those who ride, so long as I can walk on my feet." This made her lameness seem so much harder. This whole hymn describes what we know was her physical and mental, and what we trust was her spiritual condition in dying. Her frequent quotation from Holy Scripture, when in intense pain, was, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust in Him."

Earth, with its dark and dreadful ills,
Recedes and fades away:
Lift up your heads, ye heavenly hills;
Ye gates of death, give way!

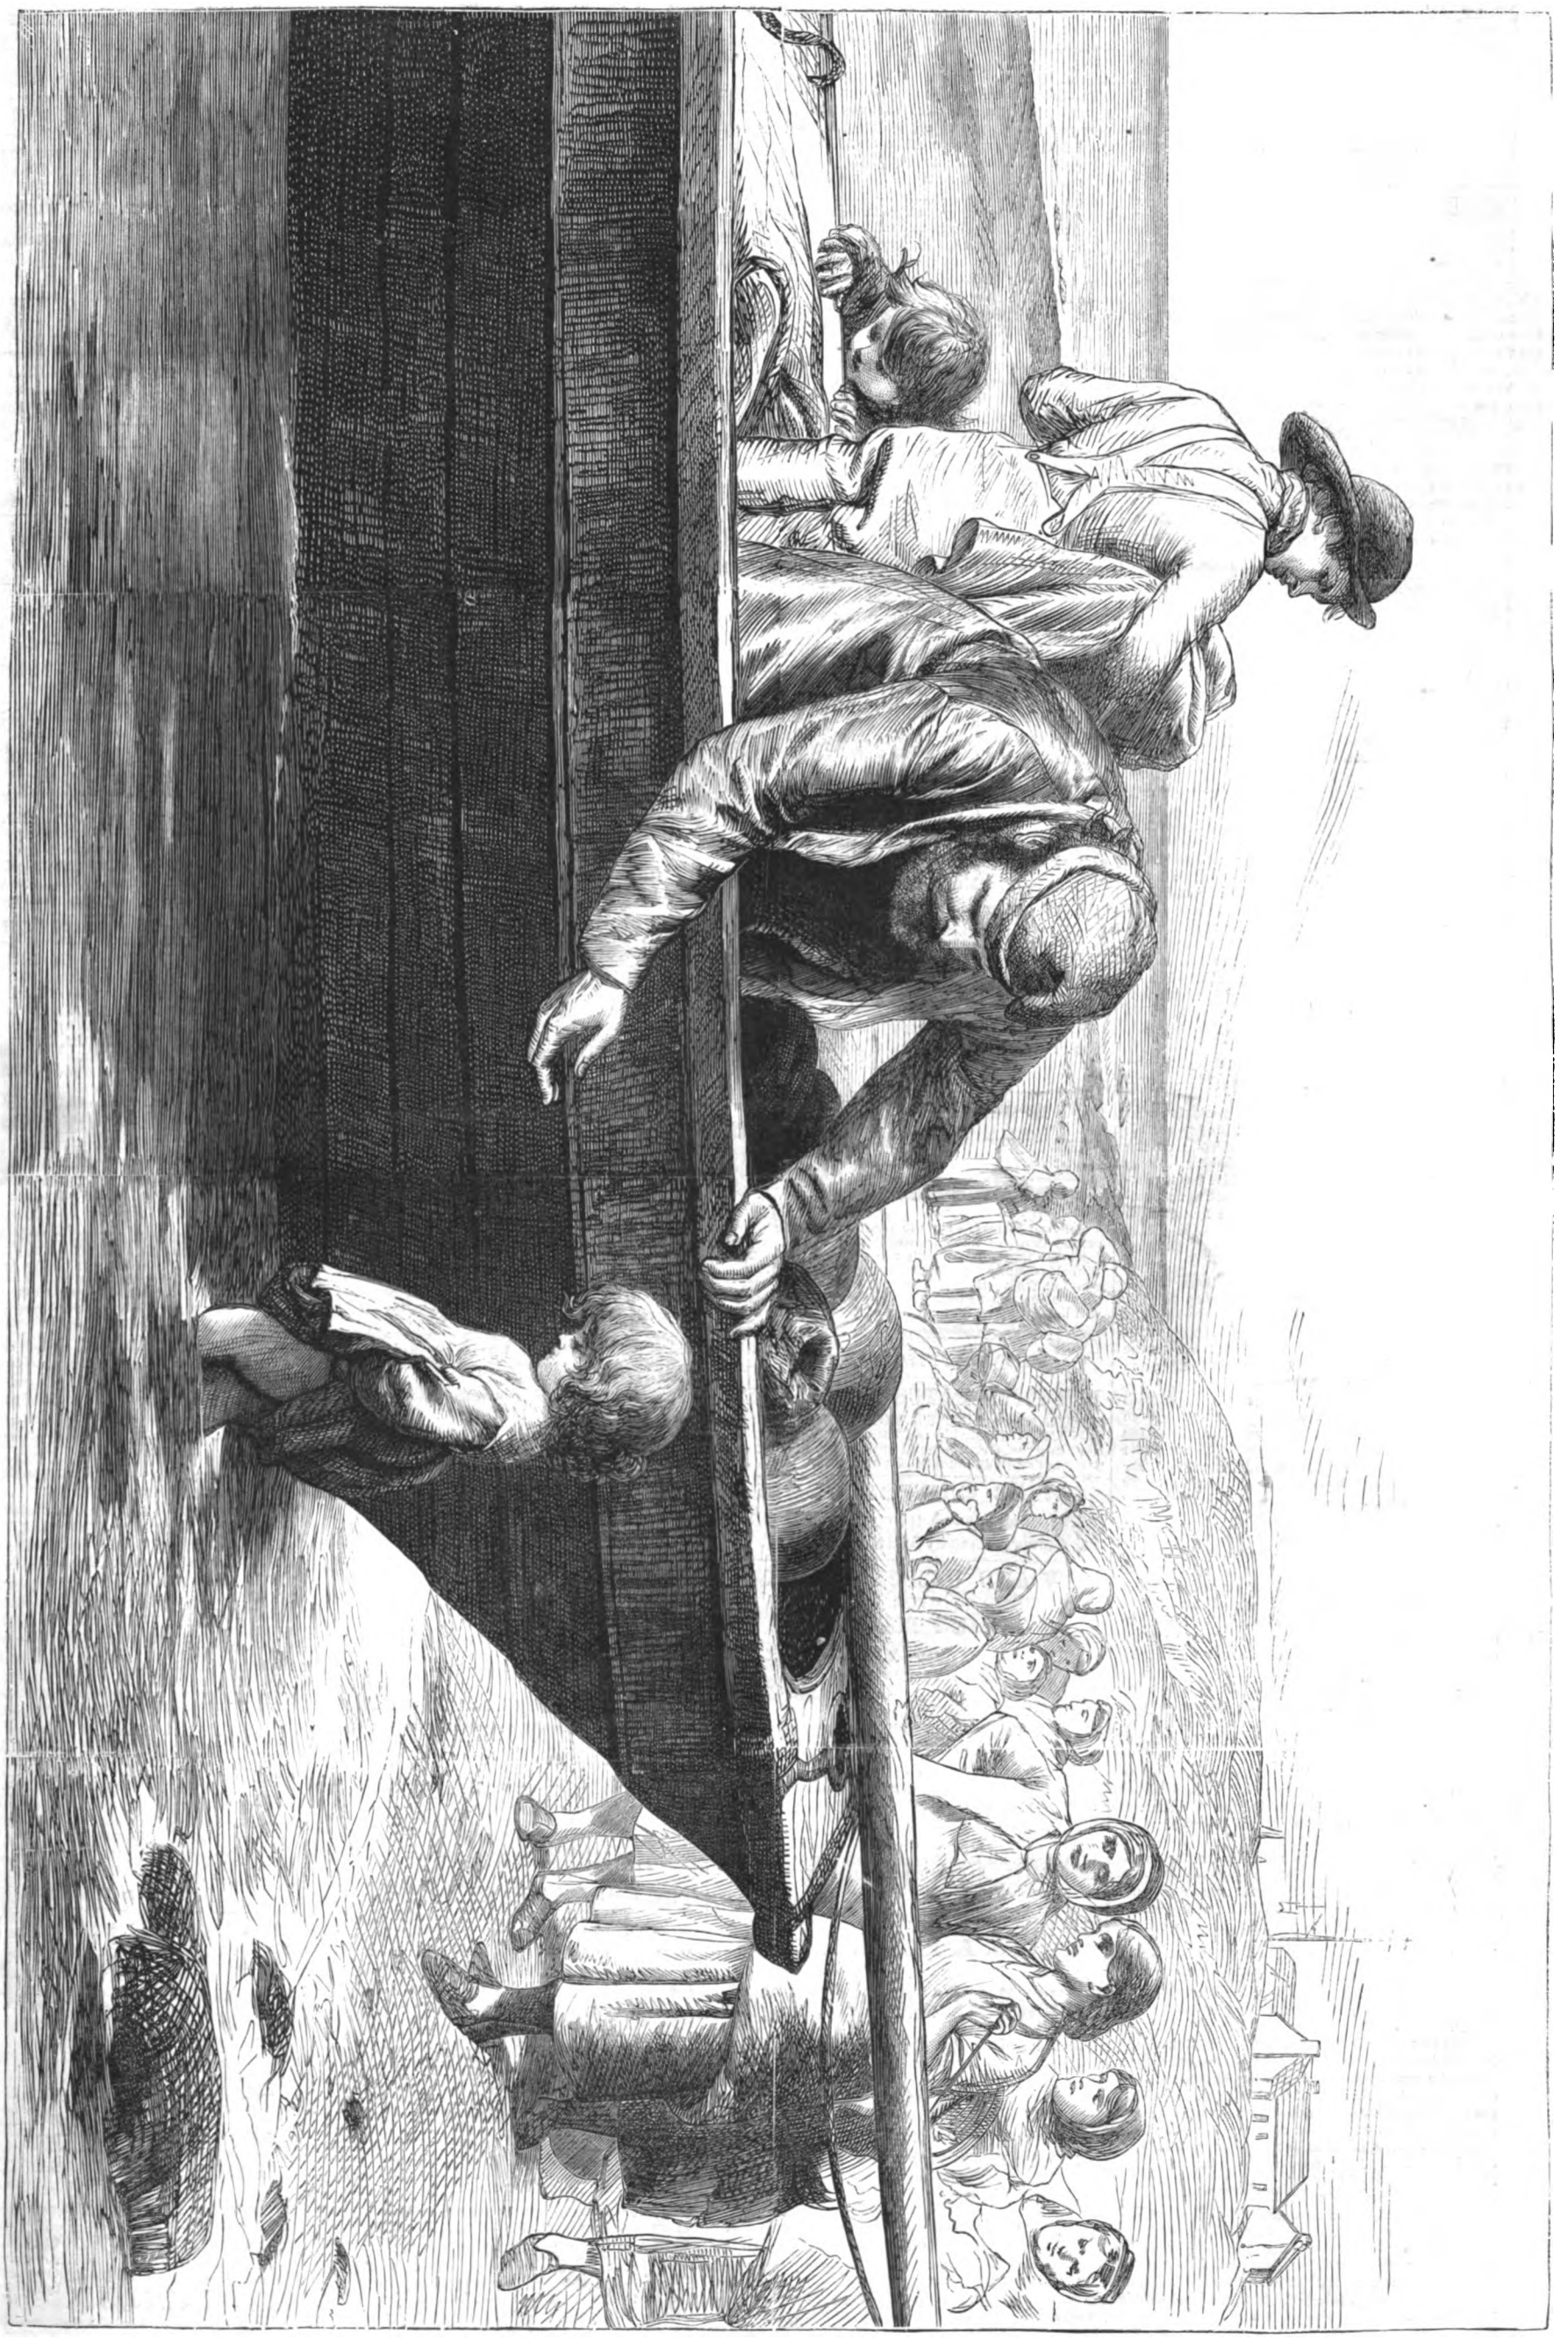
My soul is full of whispered song;
My blindness is my sight;
The shadows that I feared so long
Are all alive with light.

The while my pulses faintly beat,
My faith doth so abound,
I feel grow firm beneath my feet
The green, immortal ground.

That faith to me a courage gives,
Low as the grave to go:
I know that my Redeemer lives—
That I shall live I know.

The palace walls I almost see
Where dwells my Lord and King.
O grave! where is thy victory?
O death! where is thy sting?

Digitized by Google



THE FISHERMAN'S DARLING.—[SEE PAGE 155.]

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SCHERZEX.—We do not know any thing about your pseudonym; nor have we time or inclination to investigate the authorship of the long list of quotations you send us. You had better consult the dictionary of poetical quotations, which we have not space to publish in our columns.

MRS. ELLA R.—It is of no use to send your bust measure in the mail following your order for patterns, as by the time it reaches us the order is usually filled, and the pattern on the way to you. When the bust measure is not given in the order, we send the average size, thirty-four or thirty-six inches. We do not exchange patterns under these circumstances, or ever, unless the mistake is our own; nor do we replace patterns lost in the mails. Both the polonaise and the vest casaques will probably be worn during the coming season. There is no use in sending any measure except that of the bust, which is taken, as we have frequently explained, by passing a measure all the way round the body just under the arms, across the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust.

MARION.—A fool can ask more questions in five minutes than a wise man can answer in a month. You are at liberty to make the application. We spare no time or pains to answer questions of real importance that fall within our province; but we reserve the right to be silent when we please, and our space is too valuable to devote it to irrelevant questions, or those that would not interest the public at large as well as the individual questioners.

MRS. M. A. E.—Send a post-office order, payable to Harper & Brothers, which is much safer than sending money by mail.

KITTY.—There is no harm, certainly, in giving your photograph to a gentleman friend who really desires it; but good taste would dictate the restriction of such gifts to a very narrow circle. It does not, however, commit you to any marked preference of the individual thus favored.

MARIE.—Thanks for your appreciative letter. Cheering words are always pleasant.

CLARA.—Your question has once been answered in the Bazar.

ANITA.—We can recommend no special cosmetics. Read the "Bazar Book of Decorum" and the "Ugly Girl" articles.

ALICE T. L.—The design printed on the paper used for decalcomanie is first coated with a cement prepared for the purpose. As soon as the design becomes sticky, that is, in five or ten minutes, place it against the article to be decorated and press it firmly down till it adheres. Moisten the back of the paper with a damp sponge or cloth, leave it for a minute or two, then wet the back of the paper thoroughly, and carefully peel it off with a pair of scissors or the hand, leaving the colored design adhering to the article to be decorated. Wash the picture carefully with water and a fine camel's-hair pencil, and dry it with a moist piece of fine linen. Leave the work to dry and harden for a day or two, then finish with a coat of varnish. This is an easy and pleasant species of home amusement.

ROSE.—See the answer to "Anita."

SCHOOL-GIRL.—We have already catalogued the Seven Wonders of the World, as you would have seen had you read the Bazar regularly.

ORPHAN.—Send your pigment to a geologist, who will analyze it, and tell you whether it is of value.

POSILIPPO STEMLKIN.—We do not think that the work you mention has ever been translated.

MRS. N. R. R.—Long polonaises of white Swiss muslin, or of bishop's lawn, will be worn again in the summer. The dress beneath may be either low or high necked, though the latter is preferred. Lace points of fine llama or thread will be worn also. Guipure lace and passementerie (gimp) will be the most stylish trimming for black grenadine. At present we can not suggest any improvement in the trimming of your white and black poplin. Open the seams of your black velvet sacque to the waist, and trim up the openings. A long polonaise and short ruffled skirt is the best design for a black silk for spring. Ruffles and fringe, or lace, on the skirt.

ZELIA.—Use flat bias folds of silk, as you do not wish to trim your suit with crape. Put from five to seven overlapping folds around the lower skirt, three on the upper skirt, and two on the basque. The cut paper pattern of the Vest-Casaque Suit, illustrated in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III., will be suitable for your black silk for light mourning. You will need eighteen or twenty yards.

L. W. R.—The false chatelaine braids that ladies with thin hair fasten on top of their heads, and loop under below, are as constantly sold at the hair-dressers' as high chignons were a couple of years ago. They will cost from $15 upward if made of real hair. There are several varieties of braids with topsies plaited in beneath the hair. These topsies and the jute switches are sometimes braided in beneath the natural hair by ladies who have long thin hair.

J. H. G.—The Elizabethan ruffs of fluted muslin are entirely out of fashion. Plain lace collars, or else edged with Valenciennes, are worn on most occasions. Lace is arranged by the modiste in the neck of handsome dresses.

CLAUDINE.—Long trained skirts are never worn to church in the city. The Pompadour roll is a roll of stuffed silk, or a topsy, with the hair combed straight up from the forehead over it. Three dollars a yard is the lowest price for any gros grain that could be called "heavy." You could not wear a white tarlatan in the street.

DOWN EAST.—The initials "I.H.S." on a cross stand for Jesu Hominum Salvator—"Jesus the Saviour of men."—Grenadine made over black silk is worn by young widows in the deepest mourning.

JESSIE L.—Colored veils are not worn for dress. When worn at all, blue is the best color. A yard of dotted net, hemmed all around, or edged with lace, is gathered on a string, and worn in front of the bonnet or hat.

SEMIRAMIS.—Semiramis was the wife of Nimrod, the King of Assyria, and, according to tradition, the daughter of the goddess Derceto. On her husband's death she became absolute ruler of the kingdom. She built the city of Babylon, in which work she employed two millions of men, waged war successfully against surrounding nations, and was the most powerful sovereign of the age. After reigning forty-two years she abdicated in favor of her son Ninyas, and disappeared forever from the eyes of men. Tradition affirmed that she was changed into a dove, and for this reason the dove was held as a sacred bird among the Assyrians. It is fair to say that some of the modern iconoclasts dispute the very existence of Semiramis, like that of Romulus and Remus, and ascribe her and her achievements to the reign of fable.—Stout figures look best in plain waists.

X. Y. Z.—"Death and Sisyphus," by E. L. Bulwer, was published in Harper's Magazine for May, 1866. The Number can be ordered separately from this office.

BESSIE C.—The over-skirt, of which a cut paper pattern is given with the Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is being made up in spring suits. The sleeve of that suit is also very popular, and will continue so. Passementerie (gimp) is more used for black silk than braiding. If the latter is preferred, you should put it at once on the garment. Very good summer silks are selling for $1 a yard in black and gray; but gayer colors cost $1 50.

MRS. E. N.—We have already given patterns of every garment an infant wears, bibs, dresses, skirts, etc. Both long and short clothes have been illustrated. You will find these in your files of back volumes, or can order the papers from this office.

YOUNG DRESS-MAKER.—Make your pink silk a demi-train. Cut the edge of the skirt in deep points, and bind with your yard of pink satin. Beneath the points place a white Swiss pleated flounce eight or ten inches wide. Then make a Swiss muslin over-skirt by pattern with the Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., trimming with two narrow pleated ruffles. A low-necked basque of Swiss muslin, made by a pattern in Supplement of Bazar No. 8, Vol. IV., will be very pretty. It should have no lining, but be worn over a pink silk waist, and trimmed with pleatings and lace. If you dislike muslin over-dresses, use rose-colored crape, and edge with a pleating.

L. S. L.—A clear gray or an ashes-of-roses poplin, with two skirts and a paletot, will be a pretty spring suit for a girl of sixteen. Warm scarlet, crimson, rose, buff, clear green, and dark French blue are becoming colors for brunettes.

JENNIE.—You can order a breakfast sacque braided all over at any of the furnishing houses or modistes', but will find them expensive, certainly not less than $25. Don't get a shawl suit for traveling. Remodel your black brilliantine by hints given in the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV. A pretty straw gipsy bonnet, trimmed with black gros grain ribbon two inches wide and blue flowers, will answer for April. Why not get one of the cheap black and white striped silks for a plain spring suit, and make with polonaise and single skirt trimmed with black and white fringe and passementerie, or else get a light poplin suit of very light brown trimmed with a darker shade?

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

MISS "C.," of Troy, N. Y., in three years and eleven months, earned with a Wheeler & Wilson Sewing Machine $2308 92, in stitching 638,652 collars, equal to 216 miles and 1528 feet of seam, making 117,102,800 stitches, an average of 100,000 per day and 12,500 per hour.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

DRUNKENNESS permanently cured. For evidence, send stamp to Dr. C. C. BEERS, 12 East 12th St., N. Y. —[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

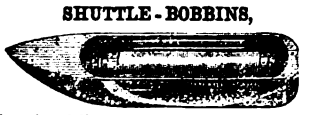
FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION
FOR
SEWING MACHINES.
CHURCH'S PATENT MACHINE-FILLED SHUTTLE-BOBBINS,



Fitted for the following machines: Singer's, Weed F. F., Elias Howe, Florence, Grover & Baker, and Empire. Try it! It is cheaper, gives a perfect tension, does better work, and saves time and trouble of winding. Sample package 2200 yards best six-cord thread, assorted numbers 50 to 100, with set of equipments, with directions for using, sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. In ordering, state style of machine.
Address MERRICK THREAD CO.,
Holyoke, Mass.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

BALL, BLACK, & CO.,

565 & 567 Broadway, N. Y.,

INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR LARGE STOCK OF

Waltham Watches,

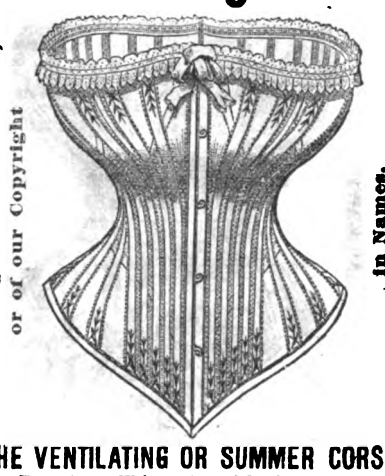
and the Low Prices at which they are selling them.

These Watches greatly excel any others made in this country in Finish, Variety, and in fine Time-keeping Qualities, and are far cheaper than any other American Watch, quality and price fully considered.

GOODS SENT BY EXPRESS C. O. D.

Thomson's New Styles
Glove-Fitting Corset.

All Infringers of our Patents, or of our Copyright



Will be Prosecuted. in Names,

THE VENTILATING OR SUMMER CORSET.

Entirely NEW in Style and Perfect in Shape.

The Curvilinear, rich and elegant in finish.

Also, a lower cost "Glove-Fitting" than ever before offered; which, with our former regular qualities, make the assortment complete.

These justly celebrated PATENT GLOVE-FITTING CORSETS are constantly gaining favor in the United States as well as in foreign countries.

Always ask for Thomson's GENUINE GLOVE-FITTING, every Corset being Stamped.

THOMSON, LANGDON, & CO.,
Sole Patentees, 391 BROADWAY, N. Y.

THE NEW WILSON
Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co.,
CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, Mo.
AGENTS WANTED.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

ON TRIAL.—To give readers a taste of its quality, that first-class pictorial $3 magazine, the PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL, will be sent in clubs of twenty copies or more, half a year, at 75 cents each! clubs of ten, at 80 cents each; clubs of five, at 90 cents each; a single copy, six months, $1. Sample copies FREE. No deviation. This offer good for three months. Address
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

have opened

AN EXTENSIVE ASSORTMENT OF

HOUSEKEEPING GOODS,

of every variety, viz.:

LINENS, SHEETINGS, SHIRTINGS, DAMASKS, DAMASK TABLE-CLOTHS.

NAPKINS, TOWELS, TOWELING.

BLEACHED AND BROWN COTTON SHEETINGS.

SHIRTINGS, FLANNELS, BLANKETS, QUILTS, COUNTERPANES, &c., &c.

FORMING the LARGEST and MOST ATTRACTIVE STOCK, BOTH AS TO QUALITY AND PRICE, TO BE FOUND IN THIS CITY OR ELSEWHERE.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

MOURNING DEPARTMENT.

SPRING STOCK now open, comprising all the most desirable goods for FULL or SECOND MOURNING.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

FAMILY AND HOTEL FURNISHING DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
have now opened their Spring Stock of
4-4 Shirting Linens. Bed and Pillow-Case Linens.
Damask Table-Cloths and Napkins (en suite).
Damasks and Towelings by the yard.
Plain Huck and Fancy Damask Towels, in great variety.
Silk and Linen Lunch Cloths and Napkins.
White Goods, in all the Popular Makes.
Summer and Opera Flannels, Quilts, &c.
The balance of our BLANKET STOCK will be closed out at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
N. B.—Sheets and Pillow-Cases made to order.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH PRINTS,
PERCALES,
SEERSUCKERS AND PIQUES,
POPLINS and SERGES, in PLAIDS and PLAIN COLORS, for SPRING SUITS, with FRINGES and SATIN STRIPES, for the trimmings, to match.
Just received, and now open.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	"	24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

FLOWERING PLANTS by Mail

Sent with safety to any Post-Office. Priced Circular, with instructions for culture, free.
My Illustrated Catalogue of NEW and RARE PLANTS mailed on receipt of 25 cents.

Peter Henderson

67 NASSAU ST., N. Y.

VERBENA SEED.—SEND 25 CENTS FOR a packet of our choice Verbena Seed; saved from a collection of 100 named kinds.
J. T. SMITH & SONS, Brentwood, N. H.

GENUINE NORWAY OATS, CHESTER COUNTY MAMMOTH CORN, and ALSIKE CLOVER. Sample packages sent free to all Farmers; also a copy of the AMERICAN STOCK JOURNAL, by inclosing stamp to N. P. BOYER & CO., Parkesburg, Chester Co., Pa.

Digitized by Google

COMIC SONGS

ARRANGED TO

PIANO MUSIC.

ANY TWENTY MAILED ON RECEIPT OF $1.

Each song has a Piano accompaniment, and is beautifully printed on sheet music paper. Please order by number.

No.		Author.
153.	A Motto for Every Man	Hobson
344.	All Among the Hay	F. Williams
256.	Annette's Granny Dear	Bayly
363.	An Old Man would be Wooing	Candy
75.	Bachelor's Hall	Culver
67.	Barney O'Hea	Lover
77.	Bashful Young Lady	Glover
340.	Beauty and Time	Lover
84.	Bell Goes Ringing for Sairah	Hunt
40.	Belles of Broadway	Raymond
408.	Better Late than Never	Blockley
65.	Boston Belles	Raymond
56.	Bootblack's Song	Waverly
320.	Bother the Fashion	Butler
197.	Bother the Men	Walker
409.	Bowid Sojer Boy	Lover
316.	Broken Down	Sinclair
157.	Bulls and Bears	Pratt
331.	Cackle, Cackle, Cackle	Bagnell
136.	Call Her Back and Kiss Her	Clifton
1.	Captain Jinks	Maclagan
9.	Champagne Charlie	Lee
66.	Chestnut-Street Belles	Raymond
179.	Clown in the Pantomime	Pratt
154.	Cruiskeen Lawn	Benedict
351.	Da, Da	Lloyd
133.	Dancing Darkey	Moesleim
108.	Dancing Fairy	Waverly
228.	Dashing White Sergeant	Bishop
211.	Dutchman's Leetle, Wee Dog	"
198.	Early in the Morning	Mac
322.	Fascinating Swell	Van Hess
70.	Fidgety Wife	Covert
89.	Flying Trapeze	Raymond
63.	Foreign Count	Lloyd
100.	Gay Cavalier	Millard
346.	Give a Man a Chance	Batchelder
159.	Good-by, John	Pratt
100.	Go it While You're Young	Waverly
132.	Hamlet, Prince of Denmark	Raymond
324.	Have Patience till To-morrow	Ease
149.	Have You Seen Her Lately?	Tute
7.	I Really Don't Think I shall Marry	Gabrielle
209.	I Saw Esau	Davies
396.	I Will Stand by my Friend	Bicknell
150.	I'll Ask my Mother	Earnshaw
352.	I'll Tell Nobody	"
96.	I'm Not Myself at All	Lover
192.	I'm O'er Young to Marry	Lee
181.	Irish Hussar	Raymond
404.	It's Not the Miles We Travel	Clifton
361.	Jemima Brown	Candy
177.	Jog Along, Boys	Nash
90.	Ka-boozle-um	Stewart
396.	Kate Kearney	Irish
83.	Kitty Tyrrell	Glover
61.	Lancashire Lass	Raymond
196.	Laugh While You Can	"
234.	Live in My Heart	Lover
230.	Love was Once a Little Boy.
291.	Merriest Girl that's Out	Minasi
176.	Matrimonial Sweets	Freeman
[illegible]	My Daughter Fan	Blewitt
[illegible]	My Son Tom	Bayly
[illegible]	tto for Every Man	Hobson
[illegible]	lie Just Over the Way	Millard
[illegible]	McShane	Blewitt
[illegible]	Joseph	Lloyd
[illegible]	Else to Do	Hatton
[illegible]	n Pretty Blue-eyed Witch	Taylor
[illegible]	d Simon, the Cellarer	Hatton
[illegible]	One Good Turn Deserves Another	Edw. Rankine
[illegible]	Paddle your Own Canoe	Hobson
305.	Pretty Girl Milking her Cow	Irish
282.	Pretty Jemima	Belmont
22.	Riding Down Broadway	Andrews
350.	Rolling Home in the Morning	Egerton
155.	Romeo and Juliet	Raymond
91.	Sally, Sally	Lover
167.	Sports at Fire Island	Raymond
82.	School of Jolly Dogs	Copeland
225.	Tapping at the Garden Gate
328.	The Way to be Happy	Clifton
53.	Those Tassels on the Boots	Raymond
108.	Tommy Dodd	"
165.	Tommy Noodle	Steele
20.	Up in a Balloon	Raymond
48.	Velocipede Johnny	Leander
81.	Willie Went a Wooing	Raymond
296.	Why Don't the Men Propose?	Blewitt
251.	Widow Machree	Lover
276.	Widow Mahoney	Blewitt
28.	Waltzing Down at Long Branch	Andrews
68.	Where there's a Will there's a Way	Saer
401.	Wait for the Turn of the Tide	Clifton

The above can be obtained through any News Agency, or by inclosing the price (five cents each) to

BENJ. W. HITCHCOCK, Publisher,
24 Beekman Street, N. Y.

THE NEW EMPIRE
SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to

EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

SPECIAL NOTICE.

12 Best Mixed Gladiolus for	$1 00
10 Best Double Tuberoses for	1 00
5 Best Lilies, including the Golden Banded	1 00
20 Papers Flower Seeds, choice annuals	1 00
15 Papers Vegetable Seeds	1 00
150 Seeds Trophy Tomato	25
Or the six collections	5 00

By mail (postpaid) upon receipt of price.

Illustrated and descriptive Catalogues sent free to all applicants. Address C. L. ALLEN & CO.,
74 Fulton St., Brooklyn, N. Y.

FRESH GARDEN AND FLOWER, FRUIT, HERB, TREE AND SHRUB, AND EVERGREEN SEEDS, postpaid by Mail. 25 different packets of either class for $1 00. The six classes, $5 00. Catalogues gratis. Agents wanted. Seeds on commission. B. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to

HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

A WONDERFUL NOVELTY.—The Combination Pocket Mirror, Writing Tablet, and Pin Case. A perfect little bijou. An absolute necessity for the porte-monnaie, pocket, or work-box of every lady and gentleman. Needed by all. In elegant gilt case, neat, pretty, and useful. Try one. Sent prepaid, carefully packed, for only 25 cts.; 5 for $1; 12 for $2, by addressing the sole proprietors, HUNTER & CO., Hinsdale, N. H.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

ELEGANT DESIGNS
IN WALNUT AND ASH,

With Mottled-Oak Ornaments, - - - - - - - - $2
Same, with Nottingham Lace Curtains included, $3

The annexed cut represents the WASHSTAND CORNICE, with Nottingham Lace Curtains suspended over the Washstand by a simple attachment which secures it to the wall, and is as readily adjusted as a picture-frame.

Nothing is so unpleasant to a tidy housekeeper as to see the walls behind the Washstand bespattered with water and soiled with dust. To obviate the difficulty, strips of paper, muslin, or lace are pinned upon the wall; but these cover one defect by displaying another.

This WASHSTAND CORNICE not only serves as a complete protection to the wall, but makes the Washstand

A Beautiful Article of Furniture.

Attached to the Cornice are two arms, swinging on a pivot, to which may be added a LAMBREQUIN of either Muslin, Rep, or Lace; or they can be swung out and used for a Towel-Rack.

Sent to any part of the country on receipt of amount. Parties out of town ordering will be particular to give name of Town and State, and full Shipping directions.

All orders addressed to

LORD & TAYLOR, Sole Agents,
Cor. Broadway & 20th St., New York.

VICK'S Floral Guide for 1871

THE FIRST EDITION OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND copies of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide is published and ready to send out—100 pages, and an Engraving of almost every desirable Flower and Vegetable. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, illustrated with Three Hundred fine Wood Engravings and Two beautiful

COLORED PLATES.

The most beautiful and the most instructive Floral Guide published. A German Edition published, in all other respects similar to the English.

Sent free to all my customers of 1870, as rapidly as possible, without application. Sent to all others who order them for Ten Cents, which is not half the cost. Address

JAMES VICK, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

IT HAS NO RIVAL.

The standard excellence of DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER has been satisfactorily demonstrated to be owing to its STRICT CHEMICAL PURITY, no articles being used in its composition but those especially adapted to the purpose, and such as are free from any injurious substances.

Two teaspoonfuls of DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER is all that is necessary in a quart of flour, while ordinary Baking Powders require from one-third to one-half more. Hence, DOOLEY'S is the most ECONOMICAL, RELIABLE, and the BEST. Manufactured by DOOLEY & BROTHER, 69 New St., New York. For sale by grocers generally.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a small portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

SEEDS FOR 1871.

☞ Our Illustrated Catalogue of FLOWER and VEGETABLE SEEDS will be mailed to any address on receipt of stamp.

Address J. T. SMITH & SONS,
Brentwood, N. H.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE Price reduced Monthly Payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

FREE Try samples of our great $1 Weekly. The GAZETTE, Hallowell, Maine.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c., &c. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 90 cents.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Nearly Ready.)

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbotts' Illustrated Histories.)

COMFORT'S GERMAN READER: to succeed the German Course. By GEORGE F. COMFORT, A.M., Professor of Modern Languages and Æsthetics in Alleghany College, Meadville, Pa., and Author of "A German Course." 12mo, Half Leather, $2 00.

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

ROBERTSON'S LIFE, LETTERS, &c. Life, Letters, Lectures on Corinthians, and Addresses of Frederick W. Robertson, M.A., Incumbent of Trinity Chapel, Brighton, 1847–1853. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 840 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

ROBERTSON'S SERMONS. Sermons preached at Brighton by the late Rev. Frederick W. Robertson, the Incumbent of Trinity Chapel. New Edition. With Portrait on Steel. Complete in One Volume. 838 pages, large 12mo, Cloth, $1 50; Half Calf, $3 25.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

EARL'S DENE. A Novel. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

IN DUTY BOUND. By the Author of "Mark Warren," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

STARTLING DISCLOSURES. — Valuable information for both sexes, especially those contemplating marriage. Address S. R. SHAW,
737 Broadway, New York.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH thirty years, and was cured in six weeks by a simple remedy. The receipt will be sent, postage free, to all afflicted. Address
REV. T. J. MEAD, Drawer 176, Syracuse, New York.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

The best publication of its class in America, and so far ahead of all other weekly journals as not to permit of any comparison between it and any of their number. Its columns contain the finest collections of reading-matter that are printed. * * * Its illustrations are numerous and beautiful, being furnished by the chief artists of the country.—Boston Traveler.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1847 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

BED is a bundle of paradoxes: we go to it with reluctance, yet we quit it with regret; and we make up our minds every night to leave it early, but we make up our bodies every morning to keep it late.

The greatest nutmeg ever known met with a grater.

An exchange says that the reason school-boys delight to dig and explore caves is because of the recesses there.

A poet says: "Oh, she was fair, but sorrow came and left its traces there!" What became of the rest of the harness he does not state.

A Quaker's admonition to a man who was pouring forth a volley of ill language to him was: "Have a care, friend; thou mayst run thy face against my fist."

BAD TO BORROW—Trouble.

A traveler was relating that he saw, in the course of his travels in Japan, a church a thousand feet long. A friend checked him as he was going on, and the traveler added, "And two feet broad." Every body laughed at this absurdity, when the story-teller flew into a passion, and exclaimed: "It's my friend's fault; if it hadn't been for him I'd have made the church square."

THE CHIGNON.

ITS RISE.

ITS FALL.

ITS FIRST APPEARANCE IN PUBLIC.

ITS LAST APPEARANCE.

ITS FATE.

ITS END.

NOTES OF A NATURALIST.

The gad-fly is a rover, never staying long in one place.

The favorite amusement of the arctic bear is swarming up the north pole.

Of all the mammalia the ounce weighs the least.

When I ask a boy in the street to run after a cab for me, I call him my fly-catcher.

The rarest kind of shell-fish is, undoubtedly, the Siberian crab.

The notes of the sand-piper are especially appreciated in Scotland.

The opossum is a quadruped of great ability, able to do almost any thing you ask him, as, indeed, his name signifies; for, translated out of Latin into English, it means neither more nor less than "Oh, I can!"

"Now, my boy," said the committee-man, "if I had a mince-pie, and should give two-twelfths of it to John, two-twelfths to Isaac, two-twelfths to Harry, and should take half the pie myself, what would there be left? Speak up loud, so that all can hear."

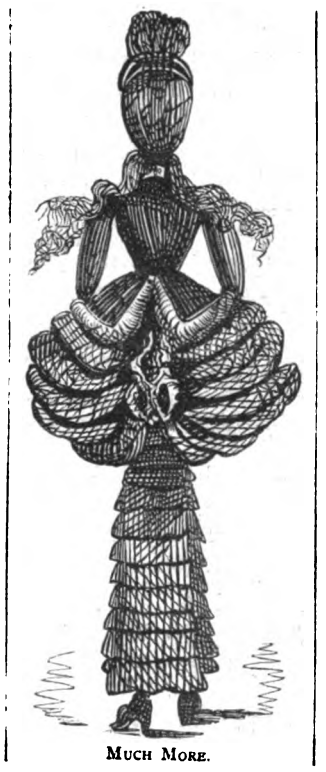
"The plate!" shouted a boy.

COMPLICATED.—A writer speaks of a hut so miserable that it didn't know which way to fall, and so kept standing. This is like a man who had such a complication of diseases that he didn't know which to die of, and so lived on.

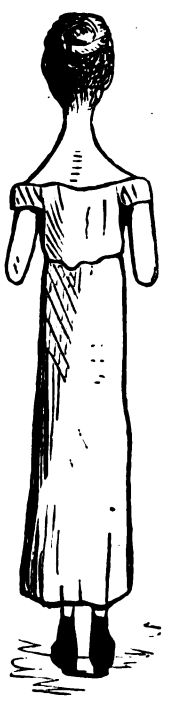
THE RISE AND FALL OF THE PANIER.

A LITTLE.

A LITTLE MORE.



MUCH MORE.



NONE AT ALL.

A NEW CATECHISM.

Whom did Adam marry, and when did he marry her?—One Eve.

What was her bridal dress?—Barely nothing.

Not even a ribbon?—No; she had no need of one, she was a rib-bone herself.

When Adam and Eve were in the gardening business what time did they commence picking apples?—In the fall.

Why did not Cain make good sugar?—Because he wasn't Abel.

Spirit as well as sugar comes from cane; what evil resulted from this Cain's spirit?—Abel got slewed.

What reason have we to suppose that Cain also got slewed?—He went immediately to the land of Nod.

Who was the wisest man?—Knower.

What did he know?—He knew enough to go in out of the rain.

A WATCH-WORD—Tick.

Why is an elephant unlike a tree?—Because a tree leaves in the spring, and the elephant leaves when the menagerie does.

THE GREAT AMERICAN BIRD—The "bird in the hand."

A boy who undertook to ride a horse-radish is now practicing on a saddle of mutton.

It is remarkable that the first apple in paradise should have turned out the first pair!

"Man and Wife" appear to be a very restless couple, taking a peep in all the principal theatres in the country, and being found in several places at the same time.

HOSPITALITY.—An Irish soldier who had been abroad being asked if he met with much hospitality where he had been: "Oh yes," replied he, "too much; I was in the hospital almost all the time I was there!"

A young man charged with being lazy was asked if he took it from his father. "I think not," was the reply; "father's got all the laziness he ever had."

Why is a lawyer like an uneasy sleeper?—Because he first lies on one side, then turns over and lies on the o[illegible]

How does a lawyer split [illegible] ence between meum and [illegible]? By making it suum.

When is a lawyer [illegible] ngest?—When he is fee-blest.

Why are hens not immortal?—Because they have their necks [illegible] this.

It is a noticeable fact that people who change their minds often never get a good one.

INTELLIGENT PET. "Ma dear, what do they play the organ so loud for when church is over? Is it to wake us up?"

A Quaker, rigidly adhering to his sect, invariably calls a yew-tree a "thou"-tree.

An exchange has the following characteristic prayer from the heart of a little boy. He had evidently had a little unpleasantness with Aunt Effie: "Please, God, bless papa and mamma, and—and—and if you're a mind to, you may bless Aunt Effie; but I don't much care."

PATERFAMILIAS. "Hollo, Tommy, you're up Early! When do you Rise when you're at School?"

TOMMY. "Oh, any Time we Like; but we mustn't be Later than Half Past Six."

A GOOD SHOT.

DUFFERTON. "Well, I could have sworn I hit the 'bull' that time."

OFFICER IN CHARGE (having a look through his glass). "No; but very near. You've killed the cow in the field to the left!"

STRANGE FEEDING.—The horse is a curious feeder. He eats best when he hasn't a bit in his mouth.

Some young rascals were annoying an old gentleman by snow-balling his house. He rushed out, and caught a youngster who was standing one side and looking on; and, thinking him to be one of the offenders, began to administer a flogging. But, to his surprise, the harder he whipped, the harder the boy laughed, until he stopped and sought an explanation.

"Well," said the boy, "I'm laughing because you are awfully sold: I ain't the boy!"

When the audiences fall off at the theatres they are not generally at all injured.

"Luncheon is an awkward meal," says Mrs. Jenkinson. "I want to know what dishes I can extemporize when a lot of visitors come in suddenly about one o'clock, and stay to lunch?"

[It quite depends upon what you have in the house. Parsley, onions, jam, cheese, bread, something cold from yesterday, salt, mustard, pepper, and anchovy-sauce. If you can't extemporize luncheon out of such materials as these, then neither you nor your friends can be hungry.]

ALDERMAN G——. "What is that, Hemily? Read that again, dear."

EMILY. "By a wonderful provision of nature, the camel is enabled to take a great supply of food, having been provided for that purpose with three stomachs."

ALDERMAN G——. "Wonderful provision of nature! I should think it was! Three stomachs; and for a camel—and we have only one!"

"A shoemaker" writes us that he is not only willing to give woman her rights, but her "rights and lefts." That is his last joke. Witty man!

TO YOUNG HOUSEKEEPERS.—Never weigh fish in their own scales; you are sure to lose by it.

A GENTLE HINT.—Emily Carisbroke, who has already "officiated" at the weddings of three of her friends, and is still disengaged, says it is all very well for the gentlemen to propose the bridemaids, but that she wishes they would go a step farther, and propose to them.

LADY OF THE HOUSE. "Really, Cook, you must be more careful with the Early Dinner. The Mutton Yesterday was hardly Warmed through, and the Children could not Eat it."

COOK. "Then hadn't the Children better Dine after us, Mum? If I cook the Jint any more for them, there won't be a bit of Goodness in it when it comes to be hotted up for the Kitchen." [Exit Cook, with a flounce, and the "Missus" very properly left to her own reflections.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 11.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK.

THIS graceful wrapping will be found very useful at all seasons. It may be made of water-proof cloth, as a protection against rain, or of linen, plaid, or other material, to be used as a duster for traveling. It cousists of a very loose sacque, reaching nearly to the bottom of the dress, and furnished with a hood and a deep cape, which extends across the back, and is sewed into the shoulder seam so as to form a graceful, flowing, pointed sleeve. This cape may be thrown up over the bonnet to protect it more fully than the hood can do. The garment is ample enough to envelop the the wearer from head to foot, and is less cumbersome and voluminous than the ordinary circular. A large shawl-pin confines it at the throat. The original is trimmed with three rows of Hercules braid, as shown by the illustration. As a water-proof cloak is designed for use, and not for ornament, the trimming should always be as simple as possible. Trimmings of the material are heavy, and should be avoided. Of course, when the garment is used for a duster, the trimmings should be varied to suit the material. The cloak is put on and off with ease, and the large circular arm-holes are less likely to tear down than the straight slits in circulars. Indeed, in this style the advantages of the circular and sacque are combined, and the effect of the cape is gained, while its superfluous flapping fronts are dispensed with.

The bust measure is taken in the usual manner, by passing a tape just under the arms across the largest part of the shoulder-blades and two inches above the fullest part of the bust, entirely around the body. We repeat this explanation because many of our readers send us only the measure of the front, or the back, or the length of the waist, which gives no clew to the size desired. When the measure is not sent, we send the medium size—34 or 36 inches. The estimates for the quantity of material are based on this size; very large persons should provide a little more.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern is in four pieces—front, back, cape, and hood. Place the notches in the shoulder of the cape, the shoulder of the hood, and the shoulder of the front together, and seam as far as the arm-hole, then sew the curved part of the cape to the front part of the arm-hole around under the arm to the side seam, making the notches meet each other, and the figures 4 come together. Sew a narrow tape an inch from the outer edge of the hood, and run an elastic cord in the shirr to fit easy when the edge is turned over. Gather the neck of the hood to fit the neck of the sacque. Close the front with buttons and button-holes, and trim the bottom of the cape and sacque with three rows of Hercules braid. The garment is loose enough to be worn over the dress and other wrapping, and should reach almost or quite to the bottom of the walking skirt, and is cut without a seam in the back of sacque, cape, and hood. Lengthen or shorten it at the bottom according to the height of the wearer, taking care to keep the same shape.

Quantity of material, 54 inches wide, for medium-sized lady, 4½ yards.

Quantity of silk for lining of hood, ½ yard.

Quantity of braid for trimming, 18 yards.

Number of buttons, 15.

LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK.

[Cut Paper Pattern of this entire Suit, to fit any Figure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Bust Measure.]

HANGING BASKETS.

THERE are various ways of making these pretty decorations for the sitting-room or parlor. The most elaborate are made by taking a wooden bowl of any suitable size, say from eight to twelve inches in diameter, and tacking on it suitably crooked branches or roots of trees—preferably the grape-vine—cut into suitable lengths, making the handles of smaller stems entwined together. The vine stems should have all the loose bark peeled off, but some portion of the closer or inner bark should be left on, so as to give some variety of color to the stems. Before putting on the stems the bowl should be stained or painted some shade of brown, and when all is finished it should be varnished over with copal varnish.

A good stain for the bowl can be made by dissolving two or three ounces of asphaltum in spirits of turpentine or kerosene.

The bowl, after being stained, may be covered with the scales of the large pine cones, tacking them on with upholsterer's tacks; the hole for the tack in each scale must be bored with a brad-awl, otherwise they are apt to split. The scales should break joint, being put on in a similar way to shingles on a roof; and after it is finished the whole should be varnished. The cords can be of ratan, picture cord, or wire.

Another way is to take pieces of oak, maple, larch, or other suitable wood with the bark on, in lengths of eight, ten, twelve, or more inches, and about an inch in diameter, boring a gimlet-hole about an inch from the end of each stick, then building them up log-house fashion, and passing a wire with a loop on the upper end through the holes at each corner and bending it up on the bottom stick. A piece of board of suitable size and thickness is then inserted for a bottom in the space between the second and third sticks; the remaining interstices between them can be filled up with moss; or, if that is not desirable, the ends of each stick can be notched out sufficiently to let them touch each other. The best mode of hanging such a basket is by means of small jack-chains (to be bought by the yard at the hardware stores), hooked at one end to the eye or loop on the end of the wires at each corner, the other ends being hooked on to a common central ring.

Digitized by Google

A wire ox-muzzle painted, and lined with moss, and suspended by three wires, makes a good hanging basket. The wire should be cut in pieces of from four to six inches long, and a loop or eye formed on each end of each piece, and then as many of these pieces joined together as may make the desired length. The object in doing this is to prevent the wire kinking, and to make the basket hang evenly.

For a very small basket, a cocoa-nut shell with about one-third of its length cut off and suspended by colored picture cord is very pretty, especially if one can be got with the husk on. It can easily be cut with a good sharp saw. When one with the husk on is used, the stem end is the part to be sawn off and thrown away.

In preparing the baskets for the plants, first place some pieces of charcoal, broken to about the size of filberts or hazel-nuts, in the bottom of the basket, and on it a small piece of coarse sponge, and then fill it up with soil suitable for the plants. The charcoal and the sponge do away with the necessity of boring a hole in the bowl for the purpose of drainage—the one absorbing the extra moisture, and the other acting as a purifier as well as an absorbent.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 18, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Street, House, and Evening Dresses for Young and Old Ladies; Boys' and Girls' Suits; Talmas, Trained Under-Skirts, Paniers; Over-Shoes and Slippers; New Styles for arranging the Hair; Cigar-Holders, Bottle Mats, Tidies, Worsted-work Patterns, Netted Guipure Embroidery, etc., etc.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Lady's Waterproof Cloak, on our first page, are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 175 of this Number.

PICTURES ON THE WALL.

CASUAL allusion was made in the Bazar lately in regard to the value of pictures in making a room attractive; a few suggestions in regard to the selection and hanging of pictures may assist some of our readers in carrying out the idea.

Americans have an instinctive love of pictures. On their visits abroad they are known as the most interested frequenters of the great public galleries and of private studios; and those whose means enable them to indulge luxurious tastes are almost always munificent, if not always intelligent, patrons of art. But one need not be rich nor a traveler to enjoy art, or to make it serviceable in beautifying home life. Taste and tact are sufficient, with the most humble means, to bring this refining element into the household. The arts of wood-engraving and lithography have now reached such perfection that some of the noblest works of ancient and modern art, reproduced with marvelous skill and fidelity, are to be obtained at prices which impose no perceptible burden on the purchaser, while their possession is an unceasing source of enjoyment. Many of the chromo-lithographs, now so common, are exceedingly beautiful, and so cheap that they may be almost said to be given away. A very little money, saved without curtailing one necessary comfort, will purchase several of the smaller of these chromos, or one of the larger size, according to the buyer's taste; and when neatly framed in gilt, or black-walnut with a light beading, they add vastly to the attractiveness of a room. We know that the objection is made to these chromos that they are "so common," owing to their cheapness, that there is no pleasure in owning one. This is a very selfish and unreasonable objection. There is nothing quite so common as the sky: would you refuse to look at a beautiful sunset because thousands besides yourself were admiring it at the same time? Should not this very fact, on the contrary, add to your own enjoyment? By the same rule, we ought to scorn the great European galleries, which are open to thousands every day. We should not be miserly or exclusive in our pleasures. If a chromo-lithograph is in itself beautiful, it should not be less precious to you because it also adorns your neighbor's parlor. It would be more agreeable, of course, to be able to give one of our eminent artists a commission, and tell him to paint a picture regardless of cost; but as very few of us have the means to be thus munificent, we ought not to despise the art which places so much that is beautiful within our reach.

In regard to hanging pictures, many people spend too much on the frame. An elegant frame, tastefully designed, certainly adds greatly to the attractiveness of a picture; but if the choice lies between an inferior picture and a simple frame, it is always the better way to choose the latter. The best frame for a small picture is a simple gilt bead, about an inch wide, with perhaps a button, or other slight ornamentation, at the corners. Black-walnut, also, is handsome, but does not set off a picture to the same advantage, nor make an apartment as cheerful as the first. The gilt frames should therefore have the preference in most cases. Very pretty frames are to be obtained at exceedingly moderate prices, in which an engraving, or lithograph, or chromo, looks just as well as it would in one costing twice the money. We trust none of our readers will follow the example of a rural patron of art whom the writer saw purchase a very handsome frame, at a cost of thirty dollars, to adorn a picture for which the magnificent sum of two dollars was paid! This was a most ridiculous reversal of the proper order of things. We have known persons to buy a frame which struck their fancy, and then select some picture to fit it. The better way—in fact, the only right way—is to choose some picture within your means, which you think you would not very soon get tired of looking at—some beautiful landscape, perhaps, some pleasant representation of life or character, the portrait of some statesman or author, the artistic record of some grand historical event, or whatever may suit your taste—and then consider how it may be most simply framed, yet so as not to appear mean. For very small pictures, especially small engravings, a person with a little leisure, taste, and tact may make his own frames; glass, cut to the right size, paper of a grayish tint (to serve instead of the frame-maker's passe-partout), and strips of darker paper for the outer edges, being all the materials necessary for the purpose. A little practice will enable one to produce very creditable work, at much less expense than if he bought the frames of a dealer.

It should always be kept in mind that no lavish expenditure of money is required to give a home an air of cheerfulness and refinement, just as the most expensive dressing in the world will not transform vulgar people into ladies or gentlemen. Simple means, directed by taste, may give a humble dwelling a charm which is not to be found in many a magnificent "palatial residence."

AN AMERICAN CARNIVAL.

ARE Americans fun-loving enough to nationalize the carnival? The people of Washington have tried to answer this question lately, but their experiment leaves the matter still in doubt. The affair certainly reflected great credit on the managers. There was plenty of fun and nonsense and gayety. There were tournaments, there were horse-races and goat-races, and there was some talk of a pig-race (which, however, did not come off); there was a very fine masquerade procession up and down Pennsylvania Avenue; there was a grand masquerade ball, and there were two or three civic balls and banquets, and other entertainments of similar character. In short, as a spectacular show, the Washington carnival was really a success; but in one essential point the festivities were a failure. There was no carnival feeling among the people who were looking on. No doubt the spectators enjoyed the fun, but few of them looked as if they did. As the writer passed up the broad avenue he was pained to observe the prim sobriety of the crowd. There was an entire absence of the abandon and hilarity to be seen during carnival-week in Rome or Florence, or any European city where this gay festival, celebrated for centuries, has become so interwoven with social life that every body takes part in the festivities, and goes in for a good time. The merry-making is general and unrestrained. High and low, rich and poor, give themselves up to the most extravagant foolery. Business is entirely suspended; and a stranger, unaccustomed to such performances, if suddenly dropped down among them, would imagine that the whole population had gone mad.

As a genuine carnival is possible only under these conditions, we doubt whether it will ever become an American institution. Our people take their pleasures too soberly to "make fools of themselves" in this manner; and as this abandon is entirely foreign to their character it would be unwise, and perhaps useless, to attempt to ingraft it upon them. But there can be no doubt that, as a nation, we are too much inclined to the sober side of life, and that we need an infusion of the gayer spirit. More frequent holidays—secular days of rest from business—would serve to break the monotony of our lives. Until recently we had but one national holiday, the Fourth of July, when the whole people left business, and gave themselves up to merry-making. Thanksgiving-day was only another Sunday, with a jolly ending, after morning service at church. The observance of Christmas is even yet not general in New England, and nowhere in the United States has it been kept with the jollity of the mother-country. In this respect we have made some improvements of late. The designation of WASHINGTON'S birthday as a national holiday was a step in the right direction. We are not inclined to condemn our Washington friends for trying the experiment of an American carnival; on the contrary, though doubtful of its ever becoming a social institution here, we are glad that the attempt was made, and to learn that it will be made again next year. For even should it fail again, the attempt may lead to something which will bring a new and more cheerful element into the American character.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Alms-giving.

MY DEAR LAZARUS,—We had a great collection at Saint Rainbow's the other morning, after a sermon upon alms-giving. It was not a particular occasion, but a general charity—a free plate for the poor; and as the rector was unusually eloquent about the claims of the poor, I could not help wishing that we could give alms to every kind of poverty. That of the purse is bad enough, but I doubt if it be the worst. I meet such abject paupers in fine clothes, so utterly bankrupt in will, so stripped of generosity, so shorn of honor, limping about, as it were, in such tatters of gentleness, such sorry patches of nobility, and covered with such pitiful sores of cant and hypocrisy, that I sometimes wish our excellent rector would preach a sermon for them, and kindle the parish to a fire of zeal in their behalf. How it would awaken Smoothpate and Rocsegg, just as they are composing themselves for their nap with the giving out of the text, if the preacher should say, "I wish to give notice that on Sunday morning next a charity sermon will be preached in behalf of those unhappy fellow-creatures who have been lamentably deprived of all their faith in man. I earnestly solicit for them the charity of the congregation, exhorting you to remember that the poor ye have always with you."

That would be a sound and seasonable appeal; and if it were only suspected that he would mention by name some of the most pitiful instances of this melancholy destitution, I have no doubt that the church would be very full. Meanwhile it is a pleasant thing to be able to give money to relieve want and suffering. But there are two things that we can not help remembering, my dear Lazarus, when we see a full purse emptied into the plate: one is that you can not fill up the ocean by dropping rocks into it; and the other is that when Fullpurse has emptied himself he is very apt to think that his charitable duties are discharged. I observe that when Bullion drops a bill of a handsome figure into the plate he has an expression of countenance which I can not describe as seraphic, but which seems to imply a serene consciousness that his account current with Heaven now shows a very pretty balance in his favor.

I am not likely, as you know, my friend, to undervalue the service of money well spent or wisely given. When a man is starving, what he chiefly wants is a loaf of bread, and not a tract nor a fine sentiment. Tact is as much charity as a visible gift, and in that case it shows itself in the bread. When I go with a certain minister at large into the unspeakable homes, or dens, rather, in which so many of us—for are we not brethren? did not the rector say so, and don't we believe it at bottom?—are huddled in a heap of misery, and when I see him giving a little soup here, a little medicine there, a great deal of bread every where, and with it a cheery look and a kind word, and infinite patience with querulousness and anger and sullenness, and never a whine nor a groan, nor any attempt to touch by a kind of appeal to which the people he is helping would be as insensible as a hippopotamus to a pin's prick, then I say to myself that I see Christian charity, and I recall that the Master did not preach to those whom He healed if they did not care to listen. His goodness was eloquence enough. He opened their eyes, He strengthened their feet, He cast out their devils, and He bade His followers do likewise.

When I was coming out of Saint Rainbow's, after the charity sermon, young Callipash joined me, and asked me if I saw, as he expressed it, "what a souser old Rocsegg dumped into the plate." And when I told him that I had missed that pleasure, he exclaimed: "Wouldn't it be pleasant to have a cornucopia, and pour out various abundance upon all the poor people in town? What a pity that most of us young fellows can't honestly afford to be charitable! How I should like to give alms! But mine are all Barmecide gifts. They wouldn't make any body richer." Then I told him what I tell you, and I really think I preached him a kind of supplementary sermon upon the way home, that upon this journey of ours there is no man so poor that he may not give endless alms; for the poor that we have with us always are of many kinds; and there is another curious fact, that there are alms which we all need, whether we are rich or poor. The best rule of life, the best manner upon our road, dear Lazarus, is to do what we can. Now we can not give what we do not have. But among the things that we can do, for instance, is to keep our tempers; and if we do that, we have at once an infinite supply of resources to deal out in alms.

How often have I known Harry to come home jaded and weary with his day's work; his heart heavy and doubtful, his brow cloudy, and the very peevishness and petulance of his manner revealing the inner strain and sorrow! He has squandered all his good-humor; he has spent all his self-command. He is a miserable pauper in the very feelings and manner with which he should, and indeed would, come home. You know, Lazarus, how hard it is when the starving wanderer is turned away from the cruel door through which streams over him for a moment the warm light and the sweet music of a home. The poet often tells us of him. He sinks upon the cold ground, or plunges into the pitiless flood. How sad it would be if Harry were to meet such a fate! Yet many a Harry does. The poor vagrant comes begging to his own door, his very soul craving kindness and sympathy and gentle pity; but some relentless Lucy, with hard eyes and cold voice, pushes him back again into the darkness, and the wretched mendicant, to whom not even the alms of a soft word is doled, turns away and plunges, not into a flood of cold water, but into a deadlier death than drowning. One little alms would save so many! One little alms of cheering words, of forgiving sympathy, of that patience which seems to me the divinest of all the virtues, would work such a miracle! How often, my dear Lazarus, I seem to see the miracle of feeding the thousands from the few loaves and fishes repeated! It is when the actual gift given is multiplied a thousandfold by the manner in which it is given. It is when the charity is not of the hand only, but of the heart. It is when the feast of herbs, seasoned with love, miraculously surpasses the stalled ox without it.

Now every Harry, every Lucy, can give those saving alms of words and looks and feelings forever. And there is a still sorer poverty than that of Harry, which we can all relieve. Some Lucy suddenly falls into the utmost misfortune. Health, youth, hope, honor itself, are ruined, as when all of a man's fortune and prospects, and even his character, which is the beginning of credit, are all swept away. Lucy is wholly destitute, beggared in every thing, even in self-respect. It is a depthless poverty, which is all the sadder the more splendid it is. Its gilded and glittering exterior makes the terrible want more tragical. A beggar frantically gay—a moral pauper, painted with smiles and pasted with jewels, is the most appalling of human spectacles. A mendicant in lace and pearls, grimacing for the amusement of those who despise her—by Jupiter, Lazarus, when I have seen it, whether on a public stage or in a private room, I have been tempted to cry aloud that beasts are kinder than men, and serpents more tender! This poor, pitiful Lucy, or Aspasia, or Anonyma, she stands at the door of our hearts begging; she looks into our eyes to see if she can find there any of the human regard she used to see in mother-eyes long ago. Or if her smile be hard, and you see no yearning, then all the more a beggar is she—beggared even in the power of showing what lies dumb and doubtful in her heart and soul. For it is there, Lazarus, it is there, as surely as the woman stands before you; and if her smile is brass under which that yearning for love and sympathy is hopelessly bound fast, all the more pitiful is her poverty, all the more pathetic her appeal for alms.

She does not need food, or money, or lodging, or clothes. All these she has, and too profusely. The alms she asks the poorest can give. Those who do not earn in a month what she wastes in a day can give her what she craves. Yet to how many it is harder to give that little alms than it would be to give a year's wages! To how many women it is almost impossible to speak the gentle word, to look the friendly look, to give the sisterly hand, which would enrich that gilded outcast with the blissful consciousness that love and respect and sympathy are yet to be for her! Mistress Margery, in your modest kitchen you give orders that no starving body shall be turned hungry away; from your moderate supplies you have enough for the wretched beggar. Kind lady! here is a starving soul; here is a famishing heart. Here is not a ruined merchant, nor an embarrassed artisan, nor a strong man out of work, but a ruined woman, a conscience impoverished, a life gone wrong. Believe me, the word of cheer, the hopeful smile, the hearty, strenuous effort you give her to go right again, to find the path, and to walk upright in it—the barrier against sneering contempt and crushing pharisaic avoidance, and the eyes askance, and the hearts averted, which your strong, steady sympathy will be—this is an alms which you do not need to be rich to bestow, which will drop into that aching heart more gratefully to God than many a golden eagle that rattled into the plate at Saint Rainbow's after the charity sermon.

For, my dear Lazarus, who of us is not a beggar, who does not openly or silently ask for alms? I know, for my part, how much forbearance, how much generous interpretation, my life and words and acts implore. And one of the richest and most helpful kind of alms is faith in a good motive—putting the best construction, as we say, upon what is said and done. Nothing measures more exactly than this the real richness of a man's nature. The thin, arid people, those whose natures are like the soil in which was no depth of earth, so that every thing withered away, are the clever unbelievers—the men who are too shrewd to believe that religion is more than cant, or politics more than corruption; who are always secretly sure that if a man makes a generous subscription to any object from which there can be no pecuniary return, or if he founds a noble institution of benevolence, or education, or art, it is for his own glory; that he builds a hospital not to relieve suffering, but to perpetuate his own name; and founds a library that it may be a monument of his generosity. And even where a simple and pure motive is obvious, if there be a chance of suggesting a bad one, how eagerly these people seize it! When Jocelynd married Ptolemy Philadelphus last spring, he was so rich that there were plenty of people poor enough to believe that it was his money and not him that she loved.

Digitized by Google

Dear Lazarus, these, too, are paupers. They ask the alms of charitable consideration. Don't shut the door in their faces. There is no old tramp with a greasy certificate, which every body knows to be false, who is a truer beggar than one of these clever unbelievers in human nature. Don't drive him away with scorn, because he is a tramp, a vagabond, a good-for-nothing, although he sits at a club window in the morning smoking, or sneers in the best chair at the opera. Give him an alms of pity, for no beggar needs it more. Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WATER-PROOF CLOAKS.

IN selecting water-proof cloth for a cloak a great difference will be seen between the best qualities of English water-proof and American goods. The finest English water-proof cloths are all wool, and are very durable. These cost from $2 25 to $3 50 a yard, and are found in black, heather-gray, plum color, navy blue, and green. Lower-priced English water-proof is mixed with cotton, and is of about the same value as the best American repellents—viz., $1 50 a yard for goods a yard and a half wide. It is poor economy to buy water-proof sold for less than this amount. Plaid water-proofs are shown in pretty combinations of colors; but these are conspicuous, and intended more for beauty than service. A solid color is far preferable for a substantial cloak, and, above all other colors, black in which white is slightly mingled.

The cut paper pattern of the Glengarry wrap, illustrated on the first page, is the best model that can be devised for a water-proof garment. It can be easily put off or on, because it is as ample as a circular, though less heavy and clumsy. Though sacque-shaped, it is without the sleeves, that are so troublesome to remove when damp; yet the arm is well protected by the cape, that also gives double warmth across the shoulders and back, where it is most needed. A water-proof cloak should be large, and have ample arm-holes, so that it may be easily slipped off and on over the usual cloak or wrap. From $8 to $14 is the price of ready-made cloaks at the furnishing houses. Imported cloaks made of English water-proof are sold by modistes for $25. Some exceptionally fine ones, made of thin, light rubber, covered with black taffeta silk, are $50. These are of London make.

The neatest water-proof cloaks are those with the least trimming. A good model has a hem an inch and a half wide, held down by twilled silk tape, that is first stitched on the hem, then on the cloak, to conceal the raw edge of the hem. Eight rows of stitching in double lines ornament this hem. The cape has a similar well-stitched hem. The seams in the body of the cloak are taken very small, and twilled tape is faced over them. The hood has a silk lining, and is bordered with silk an inch wide, almost covered with parallel lines of stitching. The fullness of the hood is held in five box-pleats, instead of being gathered together. A button is on each pleat. Large flat gutta-percha buttons, with eyes, not shanks, are best for water-proof garments. Several rows of worsted braid, or of the strong Hercules braid, are used for trimming these cloaks; and sometimes a simple binding of tape is preferred. Pleatings and ruffles add too much weight for comfort.

LINEN OVERALLS.

The pattern of the Glengarry cloak will be used for overalls and dusters of gray or brown linen, to be worn over handsome traveling suits, or to protect the dress when driving over dusty roads. A belt may be used with this garment, but we do not advise it. The cloak should be long enough to cover the entire dress. The trimming is bias bands of the linen stitched on, or else white or brown braid. Large pearl buttons.

SPRING SHAWLS AND WRAPS.

Spring shawls, and the pallium scarfs, shaped somewhat like a burnous, are brought out in beautiful English goods, fine and soft, with thick ottoman reps, yet as clinging and pliable as cashmere. The bright Roman colors are seen on many, while others are merely a bright scarlet, or blue, gray, or black, in irregular stripes with white. They are square, reversible, and are prettily fringed. These are for carriage wear, and to be worn carelessly around the shoulders in scarf fashion when the spring suit is not heavy enough: $14 is the price for the best.

STRAW BONNETS.

The first importations of millinery are straw bonnets. From the unusually large quantity prepared, it is anticipated that straws will be greatly worn. Fine English dunstables, smooth Milan braids, English pearl braid with pointed edges, and the coarse-looking but stylish rough-and-ready straws constitute the variety. Few Neapolitan and other hair bonnets are shown. White straw will probably be most worn. Light Milans are colored in the pale leather-color, tan, and other brown shades, and in every tint of gray, to match the spring costumes. Narrow gros grain ribbon of two shades of one color will be used for trimming. Later in the season chip gipsies will be worn.

The gipsy, cottage, and empire shapes, with crown, short-eared head piece, and tiny curtain, are the new styles. The brim of the gipsy is fashioned in a variety of ways. A pretty style has the brim rolled up all around, and slightly pointed over the ears; another has a border of twisted braid around it; still another is plain and straight in the front, with a deep fluted back; while a fourth is scalloped around the edge. The Lorne gipsy is a graceful shape, between a bonnet and round hat. It has a low crown; the brim is deep in front, but slight and round behind, and is pulled down at the sides to the ears. This will trim up prettily. The Princess Louise has a higher, square crown, with the brim rolled all around. The rose-bud gipsy is a coquettish little affair, jaunty and becoming for a fair, young face. The front brim turns down around the forehead, while the back curves up above the chatelaine. The daisy, the hawthorn, and other floral titles are given to these fanciful hats. For traveling bonnets there are large gipsies in the empire shape, long and close at the ears, with broad, straight back, made of rough-and-ready straws of every shade of brown. The cottage shape, a medium bonnet for old ladies, frames the face closely, and almost meets under the chin.

ROUND HATS.

Many round hats partake so largely of the gipsy shape that they can scarcely be called hats, while others retain some features of last season's styles, such as half-high sloping crowns and rolled brims. The turban reappears, with round crown, and broad, straight brim rolled closely against the crown. The prettiest of these are in fine Milan braid of a dark brown color. For school-girls is a hat called the Galatea, an ample sailor shape of rough-and-ready straw, or of smooth Milan. It is trimmed precisely like the sailor hat worn by gentlemen, with wide ribbon binding on the brim, and a band around the crown, a bow and ends behind, or a half rosette at the side.

Black glazed hats in the sailor shape are made over cork frames, like the regular yachting hat, that is so light and cool for midsummer wear. A band of black ribbon, with the name of a favorite ship in gilt letters in front, is the trimming.

Shade hats for country wear are in great variety. One of the prettiest, called the gipsy queen, has the broad brim indented sharply above the ears, and is to be held on by a ribbon passed over the crown and tied under the chin. The St. Leon is a graceful garden hat. The crown is half high and square; the brim is two inches wide, and slightly fluted.

Infants' hats of fine Milan and the soft but frail split straw are turbans, with concave brims, for boys, and fancifully indented gipsies for girls.

BERLIN SUITS.

As a proof of the increasing favor with which Berlin styles are regarded by New York merchants, we may mention the fact that a leading wholesale house, hitherto extensively engaged in the manufacture of hoop skirts, has relinquished this business, and turned its attention to the importation of large numbers of ready-made ladies' suits, opera cloaks, wrappings, etc., from Gerson, the manufacturer of the garments illustrated in the Berlin Bazar and the Mode Illustrée of Paris, and reproduced by us. All of these pretty styles we recognized as those which we had given or are giving in the Bazar, thus affording another proof of the promptness with which our readers receive the earliest fashions. The suits are of materials of all kinds, from cheap wash poplin to heavy gros grain, and are elaborately trimmed with neatly made puffings, flounces, ruches, fringe, and embroidery, at a cost of from $20 to $150. An under-skirt, over-skirt, sash, and sacque or casaque, and sometimes material for the waist, constitute the suit. It will be a happy day, indeed, when ladies can purchase ready-made clothing as easily and cheaply as gentlemen do, and thus be spared the time and anxiety involved in consultations with dress-makers.

VARIETIES.

New lace sacques of llama and thread are quite short, in the simple sailor shape, without slashes. The sleeves are coat-shaped, or else flowing, and open high on the inside of the arm. Some very pretty ones have vandyked edges. Prices range from $25 to $70.

A pretty fabric for spring costumes is a light quality of wool serge so finely twilled that it resembles cashmere in effect. It has a satin stripe near each selvedge; and knotted fringe that can be used for trimming the suit. It is shown in tan-color, with a darker brown stripe and fringe, mauve, with violet trimmings, and several shades of gray, brown, and of clear bright blue. Three-fourths of a yard wide, it is 80 cents a yard.

White, buff, and gray piqués are being used at the furnishing houses for children's dresses. For boys too young to wear pantaloons there are kilt skirts of piqué, to be buttoned on shirt waists of white linen or muslin. The kilt pleats, from the belt to the edge of the skirt, are laid deeply all around except in front, where it is left plain for a space two finger-lengths broad. Perpendicular rows of braid extend from the belt halfway down the front. The edge of the skirt is simply hemmed. The belt has two rows of braid. Kilt skirts are not sewed up, but are merely lapped under in front, and held by two rosettes on the right side of the skirt. This makes them easy to iron. Braiding done by machinery in elaborate patterns, with medallions of embroidery inserted, will be fashionable for trimming children's piqué dresses. A little dress for girls has a Gabrielle front, while the back is cut off at the waist, and a full skirt like a polonaise is added. A round talma is worn in the street with this, and gives the effect of a walking dress.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. BALLARD, HALLEY, & Co.; JOHNSON, BURNS, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.

PERSONAL.

SHOULD France fail in ultimately adopting a republican form of government, and become a constitutional monarchy, the probabilities are that the Comte de Paris, eldest son of the late Duke of Orleans, will be chosen king. He is now nearly thirty-three years of age. In the autumn of 1861 he and his brother, the Duc de Chartres, became attached to General M'CLELLAN'S staff as aids-de-camp, and served until the close of the Virginia campaign of 1862, when they returned to Europe. The modesty of their deportment, simple tastes, and temperate habits made them favorites with the soldiers, who gave them the pet names of "Captain Perry" and "Captain Chatters." The Comte de Paris, in May, 1864, married his first cousin, Princess MARIE, eldest daughter of the Duke of Montpensier and the Infanta MARIA LOUISA, sister of the ex-Queen ISABELLA II. of Spain. By her he has a daughter, AMELIE, born in 1865.

—Old King WILLIAM'S habits during the war have been of the old ISRAEL PUTNAM and FRANCIS MARION style of simplicity. He rises at seven; never sleeps but in his own campaign bed, which is carried to all reviews and military manœuvres which he attends. If there is a bed already in the room where he stays, it is taken out and the campaign bed substituted. The latter consists of an iron frame; is only a foot high, and has little furniture. He opens all letters himself. Even when ill they must be opened in his presence. On a first perusal he makes marginal comments, which the officials who have to deal with them understand. Every thing goes on according to a regular method, and the King has really only one habit—that of working.

—Count VON MOLTKE is one of the best of modern linguists, there being scarcely a language or dialect of Europe he has not mastered. He is also a singularly reticent man, more so, perhaps, than BISMARCK. A witty saying has been attributed to Lord PALMERSTON, that VON MOLTKE could talk six languages, but knew how to hold his tongue in ten.

—The King of Bavaria, ascending from the puerilities of a puny potentate, is said to contemplate becoming editor of a musical journal. The monarch has had music on the brain from his youth up.

—The Russian Grand Duke is getting ready for a trip to the United States in May or June, in his own war vessel, accompanied by a squadron of ships. It will be the first time that a member of the royal family has visited a republic. No doubt about an enthusiastic reception for him. Russia has always been our frank and outspoken friend, and our people bear that little circumstance in mind.

—Miss CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG is said to have accumulated a fortune of $200,000—a very snug, comfortable capital for a young woman of her years; but Miss CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG expects to accumulate half a million at least before she retires from the foot-lights; after which some person—some nice person—may induce her to "change her local habitation and her name."

—Mr. JEFFERSON DAVIS is now a resident of Memphis, Tennessee, where his time and services are devoted to his duties as President of the South Carolina Insurance Company. He receives a salary of five thousand dollars a year. His name is regarded as of positive money value to the company. On public affairs he is very reticent—can not, in fact, be drawn out even by his intimate friends. He never appears in public except at church, or to say a few words to the Sunday-school scholars. General PILLOW, another gentleman prominent among the Confederate leaders, is also a resident of Memphis, where, in partnership with ex-Governor ISHAM G. HARRIS, he practices law. He is a man of small stature, light build, and very agreeable in conversation. Before the war he was wealthy; now, not.

—DINAH MARIA MULOCK (CRAIK) is said to have written more than a thousand poems she has never printed, simply because, on reperusal, they failed to satisfy herself.

—When Mrs. MOODY, of Plainville, Indiana, celebrated her eightieth birthday, on the 9th ult., she asked some of the old folks to take tea with her. One of the "young men," aged eighty-four, was found in a well cleaning it out, when the billet-doux was lowered down to him, asking him to assist at the soirée. He went over in the evening and saw Mistress MOODY.

—It was NATHAN HALL, of Durham, Connecticut, who, in 1833, thanked God that he lived "in a hilly country, where it was impossible to build railroads." To-day the cars of a railroad run through the door-yard of his place, between his house and the barn, and within four feet of his side door.

—"Josh Billings" comes of a wealthy family—the SHAWS, of Lanesborough, Massachusetts—and it is estimated that his estate would "sugar off," as they say in Vermont, at about $200,000. "Joshua" is now about fifty years old, tall, round-shouldered, and an oddity, always carrying about on his features an expression indescribably comical.

—Mr. LECKEY, author of the "History of European Morals" and other works, is to marry the Baroness VON DEDEM, lady-in-waiting to the Queen of Holland.

—Senator MORTON, of Indiana, when addressing the Senate, is obliged to remain in a sitting posture, owing to partial paralysis of his lower limbs. He manages, however, so to wheel his body about as to address, at will, any part of the chamber. His manner is earnest and impressive. In stating a case clearly and pointedly he is said to have no superior in Congress; and, instead of being diffuse, as is the too general style of public speakers, he gives a distinct argument in almost every sentence. Probably no man of his party is more generally respected or more influential than Senator MORTON.

—The Bishop of London has admitted Miss C. HART to the office of a deaconess in the Church of England, and has appointed her visitor in the district parish of St. Gabriel, Pimlico. The ceremony took place at Fulham Palace.

—ADELINA PATTI, SOTHERN, and TOOLE, the eminent comedian, propose to make the Federal Union the theatre for public performances next season.

—A late Number of the Bazar contained a sketch of the personal appearance of Professor HUXLEY. We now have something about his history. He is only forty-six; was a poor boy with an inclination for the medical profession; studied at Edinburgh; appointed assistant surgeon in the navy; cruised four years in the South Pacific; returned to England in 1850; in 1854 became attached to the School of Mines; and from that time dates his fame. He is one of the most industrious workers of the age, applying himself to the study of every problem with a persistence and an energy which are generally rewarded with success as far as he himself is concerned. This latter trait is one of the most marked of his character—his skepticism of other people's conclusions until he has solved them for himself. He is a most assiduous worker, and an equally free thinker. He is at present Professor of Comparative Anatomy and Physiology in the Royal College of Surgeons, and Professor of Natural History in the School of Mining.

—Mr. PETER COOPER recently signalized his right to call himself an octogenarian, by making another gift of one hundred thousand dollars to Cooper Institute, the income of which is to be spent in the maintenance and extension of a free circulating library. By the terms of the trust he also authorizes the trustees to draw upon his estate at his death, or upon him, should they deem it advisable, before his death, for the additional sum of fifty thousand dollars.

—Mrs. President MADISON, certes one of the most brilliant women who have graced Washington society, used to expend a thousand dollars per annum on turbans. She wore one to her latest day, long after wearing turbans had ceased to be the fashion. These turbans were made of the finest material, and trimmed to match her various dresses. Her old servant speaks of one of her dresses of purple velvet with a long train trimmed with wide gold-lace, with which she wore a turban also ornamented with gold-lace, and a pair of gold shoes. With a white satin dress she wore a turban spangled with silver, and silver shoes.

—Among the recent guests of President GRANT was Mr. A. J. DREXEL and wife, of Philadelphia, who passed several days at the White House. Mr. DREXEL is one of those bankers who add brain to bullion, and who, being a good linguist, and a gentleman of refinement, as well as of proverbial modesty and courtesy, imparts honor to the calling of which he is so deservedly eminent a member.

—Canon MELVILL, better known in this country as the Rev. HENRY MELVILL, a volume of whose brilliant sermons was published in this country in 1838, edited by Bishop M'ILVAINE, has recently deceased at the age of seventy-three. He was the most brilliant rhetorician in London from, say, 1846 to 1856, at which latter date he was made Canon of St. Paul's Cathedral. He was in his day what the Rev. Mr. LIDDON now is in England.

—Mr. DISRAELI, who seems to be freeing himself somewhat from the trammels of party organization, perceiving that he is not again likely to become Prime Minister, is reported to have said that he intends to write three more novels, and then retire from the field of authorship. They will be more or less of a political character.

—The Prince of Wales has again incurred the general odium of Britons, and the particular disgust of the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals Society, for killing, in mere sport, and just to see what he could do, 1243 hares, 348 rabbits, 2074 pheasants, 116 partridges, and 52 other birds—3833 head in all—in four days; this, too, on the property of a man who had not given his consent to their raiding over his premises. There were eight other sprigs of nobility who assisted in the slaughter.

—Indiana's great charity man is CHAUNCEY ROSE, who, within a few years, has given away for benevolent purposes $300,000. It may be true that an Indiana Rose by any other name would have done that figure of benevolence, though it would be permissible to take the Chauncey's the other way.

—As an indication of the popularity of the Rev. Dr. POTTER, the new rector of Grace Church in this city, it is mentioned that for the first time in its history every one of its two hundred pews is rented. Dr. POTTER has won not only the solid respect and regard of his own parishioners, but of Episcopalians generally, for the unflagging industry with which he devotes himself to the duties of his position, his zealous attention to the wants of the needy, and his prompt and cheerful aid in works of benevolence.

—General SHERIDAN has been fêted in the extensivest possible style in Florence by the bluff King of Italy, who gave him a grand dinner, to which eighty guests were invited. All present were in full uniform, and behind each guest stood a servant gorgeously draped. The table service of the occasion was that sculptured by BENVENUTO CELLINI. It was altogether in gold and silver—no china being upon the table. The flowers, lights, and other decorations were in accordance with the service. Bands of music were placed so as to enliven, without drowning, the conversation. General SHERIDAN, as the honored guest, was placed at the King's right hand, and his Majesty seemed greatly to enjoy his presence. In the conversation held in the morning, when the General was presented, he mentioned to the King that on one of his hunting expeditions he had killed two grizzly bears, one of which weighed a thousand pounds. The King fairly leaped in his chair; all his hunter blood was on fire in a moment. The General, with characteristic modesty, instantly added, "Oh, that was nothing, for on the Pacific Railroad we might shoot a bear from the window of the cars"—a remark which did not weaken VICTOR EMANUEL'S interest in the land which produced such men—and such bears.

Digitized by Google

Trimmings for Ball Gloves, Figs. 1 -4.

BALL gloves are worn very long this winter, generally with three buttons, and with or without trimming. Frequently trimming is used in order to lengthen short gloves—for instance, gloves with two buttons. The favorite trimming for gloves is blonde lace, illusion ruches, puffs, etc. Figs. 1–4 show several styles of trimming, which may be made with little difficulty and expense.

Fig. 1.—For this trimming take a strip of Swiss muslin three-fifths of an inch wide and corresponding in length to the upper edge of the glove, which must be edged on each side with a side-pleated strip of white blonde an inch and three-fifths wide. On the outer edge of each of these strips sew two fluted ruches of blonde, in such a manner that one ruche covers the seam made by sewing on the other. Then take a strip of blonde two inches wide and edged on both sides with lace three-fifths of an inch wide, arrange it in side pleats along the middle, and sew it on the Swiss muslin strip, covering the seam made by doing this with lace insertion three-fifths of an inch wide.

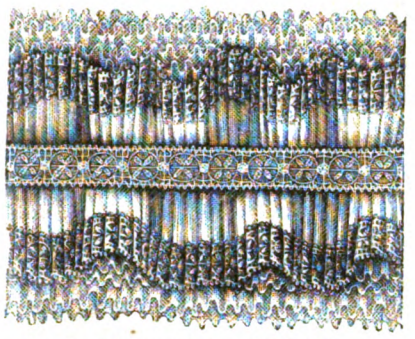

Fig. 1.—TRIMMING FOR BALL GLOVES. REDUCED SIZE.

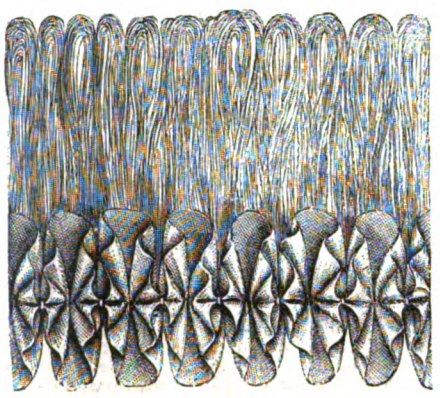

Fig. 3.—TRIMMING FOR BALL GLOVES. REDUCED SIZE.

Fig. 2.—This trimming consists of a double piece of tarlatan three inches and three-fifths wide, one lengthwise edge of which is arranged in side pleats. On the pleated edge sew, first, gathered lace two inches wide, and then two rows of pinked white satin leaves, the under edges of which must meet; each leaf is an inch and a fifth long and four-fifths of an inch wide, and is pointed at the upper edge, and laid in a pleat at the under straight edge. Cover the seam made by sewing on the satin leaves with a satin piping as shown by the illustration.

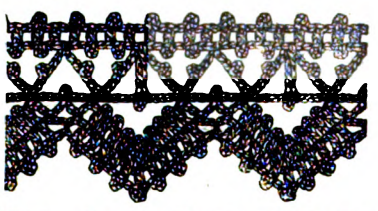

Fig. 1.—CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE.

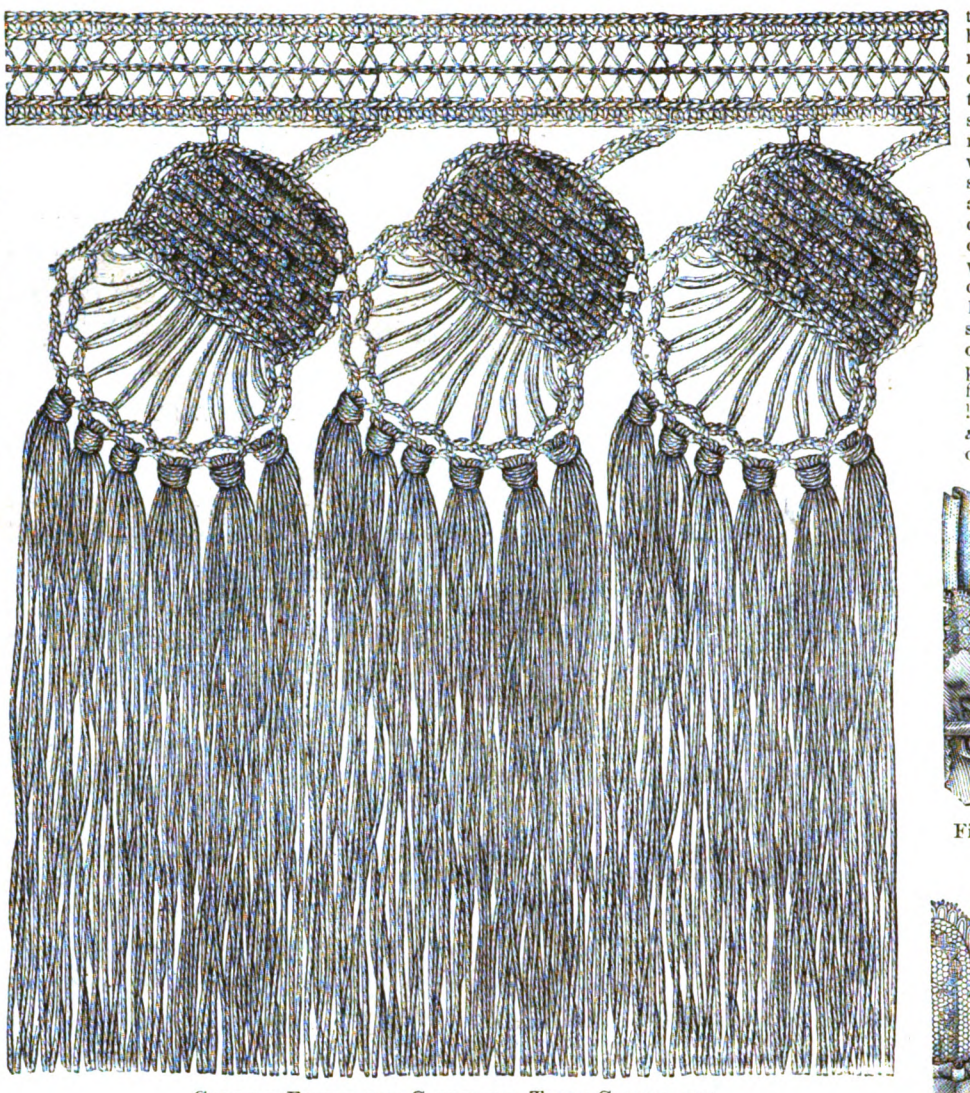
Fig. 3.—For this trimming take a strip of white tarlatan five inches and a half wide and of the requisite length, draw out all the lengthwise threads from a part of the middle nearly five inches wide, double the piece lengthwise, and arrange the double material in thick side pleats at one lengthwise edge. On this pleated edge sew a strip of tarlatan two inches wide arranged in rose pleats.

Fig. 4.—This trimming consists of a double piece of blonde two inches wide, corresponding in length to the upper edge of the glove. On this strip arrange two puffs made of blonde taken double; one lengthwise edge of each puff must form a heading a fifth of an inch wide. Under one lengthwise edge of the blonde strip sew gathered lace two inches wide.

Crochet Fringe for Coverlets, Table-Covers, etc.

THIS fringe is worked with medium-sized white twisted cotton, first working the flower-like figures as follows: Begin each figure at the upper edge with a foundation of 13 st. (stitches), and, always going backward and forward, work on this twelve rounds of sc. (single crochet) in ribbed crochet, that is, always insert the needle under the back vein of the two upper veins of each st. At the end of each of the first four rounds w. (widen) 1 st., after that work without changing the number of st. Besides this, work in each 2d following round, at intervals of 4 st., 1 p. (picot) consisting of 3 ch. (chain stitch). No notice is taken of these p. in the rounds which are worked without p., and which must alternate in the course of the work. After completing the 12th round turn the work, pass over the first st. of the preceding round, and work 1 sc. on each of the following 15 st. After completing each of these st. (exclusive of the first two and the last two) draw out the loop on the needle as a picot; the first p. is about two-fifths of an inch long, and each of the following 5 p. must be slightly lengthened, as shown by the illustration; shorten the last 5 p. in the same proportion (see illustration). After completing this round work 3 ch., turn the work, and work 1 sl. (slip stitch) on each of the p., after each sl. 5 ch., but after the last sl. only 3 ch.; then fasten to the first st. of the preceding round, and going back, work alternately 5 ch., and 1 sl. on the middle st. of each of the ch. scallops previously worked. On the nearest side edge of the flower-like figure work always alternately 3 ch., 1 sc., then going forward, work 1 sc. on each of the first 7 foundation st.; after completing the 7 sc. work for the stem 10 ch., pass over the last of these, and work 9 sc. on the following 9 ch.; finally, 1 sc. on the 7th of the 7 sc. previously referred to. Now work on the other side edge alternately 3 ch., 1 sc., cut off the thread and fasten it. On the scallops of the under edge of the figure tie six strands of fringe of the length shown by the illustration. Having worked the requisite number of leaflets in this manner, connect them as follows:



CROCHET FRINGE FOR COVERLETS, TABLE-COVERS, ETC.

Fig. 1.—KNITTED AND CROCHET OVER-SHOE.

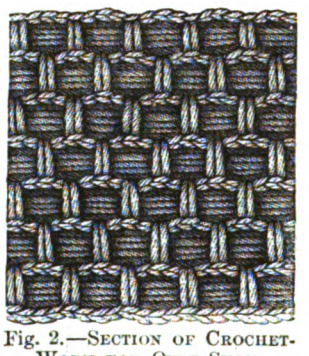


Fig. 2.—SECTION OF CROCHET-WORK FOR OVER-SHOE. FULL SIZE.

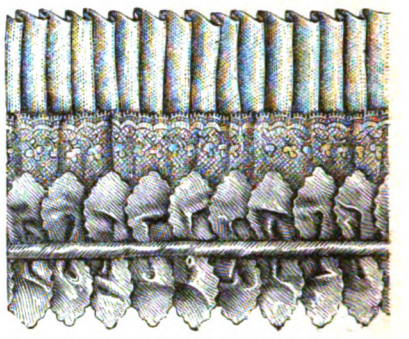

Fig. 2.—TRIMMING FOR BALL GLOVES. REDUCED SIZE.

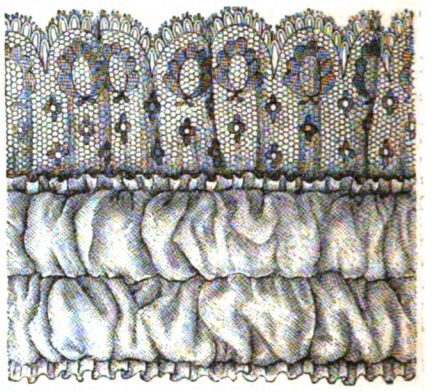

Fig. 4.—TRIMMING FOR BALL GLOVES. REDUCED SIZE.

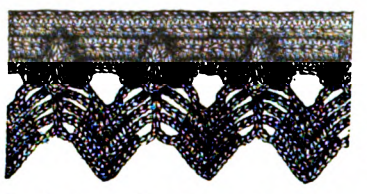

Fig. 2.—CROCHET EDGING FOR LINGERIE.

1st round.—2 sc. on the first 2 sc. at the end of a stem of the figure, * 10 ch., 2 dc. (double crochet) separated by 1 ch. on the side edge of the figure (see illustration), 10 ch., 2 sc. on the first 2 sc. of the stem of a new figure, and repeat from *. 2d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, but after completing each following sc. draw out the loop on the needle, so as to form a picot half an inch long. 3d round.—Alternately 1 sl. on each p., 1 ch. 4th round.—1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round. Now cross the two threads of each p. of the second round, and always crochet one thread of one p. together with one thread of the following p. by means of 1 sl.; after each sl. 1 ch. (see illustration). This fringe is very rich and unique, and may be used for coverlets, pillow-slips, table-covers, and similar articles.

VIGNETTES FOR MARKING HANDKERCHIEFS.—[The Letters A–H with similar Vignettes will be found in Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 9.]

Digitized by Google

Knitted and Crochet Over-Shoe, Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 164.

THIS over-shoe is crocheted with red and black worsted, and furnished with a short knitted leg. Work the shoe with red zephyr worsted over an insertion of a 16-fold thread of black split zephyr, beginning at the front edge, as follows: On a foundation of 24 st. (stitches) work alternately 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 sc. (single crochet) on every 4th following st., working over the insertion at the same time; widen at the middle of the round by working 2 sc. separated by 3 ch. on the 1st foundation st.; at the end of the round 1 ch.; turn the work, and again work over the insertion alternately 1 sc., 3 ch. Work these sc. on the middle ch. of every 3 ch. of the preceding round. In this work 23 rounds more, widening in each round as in the 1st round. Now work on the nine ch. scallops of the right side of the upper part 34 rounds in the previous design, always going backward and forward. Then work the ch. scallops of the 35th round together with the ch. scallops of the left side of the upper part by working 1 sc. on every two opposite ch. scallops, and at the same time over the insertion; after each sc. 3 ch. On the under edge of the thus far completed shoe work one round of sc. with red worsted, and on the upper edge one round of sc. with black worsted; to every st. of this round fasten a sixfold strand of black split zephyr two inches long, so as to form a fringe two inches long. For the leg, work with red worsted and steel knitting-needles a foundation of 100 st.; always going forward, work on this 48 rounds of alternately 2 k. (knit plain), 2 p. (purl), then cast off as follows: on the first 2 k. crochet 1 dc. (double crochet), catching both st. together, 2 ch., 1 dc. on the next 2 p., 2 ch., and continue in this manner. Now work with black worsted 2 sc. on each 2 ch. of the preceding round, then a round of stc. (short treble crochet). 3d round.—* 3 dc. on the first 3 st. of the preceding round; these 3 dc. are not worked off separately, but as one stitch; 5 ch., pass over 3 st. of the preceding round, and repeat from *, always going forward. 4th round.—On each ch. scallop 2 sc., 6 dc., 2 sc. On the st. of the 2d crochet round of the upper edge knot worsted fringe as above described. Through the stc. of the following round pass a black elastic band, and sew the leg to the inside of the shoe as shown by the illustration. Knit the sole plain with a sixteenfold thread of black split zephyr, always going backward and forward, and working it in the shape indicated by the sole of some shoe of the proper size. Finally, overhand the shoe and sole together on the inside. If it is wished to make the shoe larger, work a few additional rounds for the top of the shoe and the heel, and lay on a few stitches more for the leg.

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Fig. 2.—NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Crochet Edging for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 164.

Fig. 1.—For this edging work with medium-sized twisted crochet cotton a foundation as follows: Always alternately 3 ch. (chain stitch), 1 p. (picot) consisting of 3 ch. and 1 sl. (slip stitch) on the first of these. When the foundation is of the length desired, hold it so that the p. are turned downward, and on it work the 1st round.—1 dc. (double crochet) on the first foundation st. (the sl. of the picots count as foundation stitches), * 1 ch., 1 dc. on the 2d following foundation st., 1 ch., 1 dc. on the 2d following foundation st., 1 p. as before, 1 dc. on the 2d following foundation st., 1 p., 1 dc. on the 2d following foundation st., and repeat from *. 2d round.—1 sc. (single crochet) on the first ch. of the preceding round, * 2 ch., 1 p. turned downward (for this p. work 3 ch., slip the loop from the needle, pass the needle through the first of the 3 ch., take up the loop previously dropped and work off both loops on the needle together, throwing the thread over once), 7 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 2 ch., 1 sc. on the ch. after the 4th following dc., and repeat from *. 3d round.—1 sl. on the middle ch. of the first 7 ch. of the preceding round, 4 ch., 1 stc. (short treble crochet) on the first sc. of the preceding round, in doing which surround at the same time the ch. of the first round on which this sc. was worked; 1 p. turned upward, 1 sl. on the stc. previously worked, 4 ch., 1 sl. on the middle of the following 7 ch. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 1 p. turned downward, 3 ch., and repeat from *. 4th round.—1 sc. on the first sl. of the preceding round, 1 ch., 7 p. turned downward, with these pass over 4 ch., 1 p., and 4 ch. of the preceding round, 1 ch., 1 sc. on the following sc. of the preceding round, 5 ch., 1 sl. on the next p. turned downward, 5 ch., and repeat from . 5th round.— 1 dc. on the first ch. of the preceding round, after this and all the following dc. 1 ch., 1 dc. on the sl. of each of the following 3 p., 3 dc. on the sl. of the fourth p., 1 dc. on the sl. of each of the remaining 3 p., 1 dc. on the next ch. After this dc. 1 ch., then 1 sl. on the middle of the next 5 ch., 3 ch., 1 sl. on the middle of the next 5 ch., and repeat from *. The 6th round consists of dc., p., and ch., and is worked as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 2.—For this edging work, first, on a foundation of the requisite length, five rounds of sc. in ribbed crochet, always going backward and forward; in the first round, however, work 3 sc. on every 11th following foundation st.; this widening must be repeated in each of the four following rounds, always in these rounds working the 3 sc. on the middle st. of the 3 sc. of the preceding round. In this way points are formed. Work the following rounds also going backward and forward, but lay on the thread anew at every round. 6th round.—* 3 sc. on the 9th, 8th, and 7th st. before the 1 st. forming the point of the next point (counting backward from this stitch), 1 ch., 3 sc. on the 7th, 8th, and 9th st. after the 1 st. forming the point, 7 ch., and repeat from . 7th round.— 1 sc. on the middle ch. of the 7 ch. of the preceding round, 5 ch., 7 sc. on the middle 5 ch. of the next 7 ch. of the preceding round (working 3 sc. on the middle st. of these 5 ch.), 5 ch., pass over 4 st. with the first ch. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 3 sc. on the first single sc. of the preceding round, 3 ch., 9 sc. on the following 7 sc. of the preceding round, 3 ch., and repeat from *. Work the two following rounds in a similar manner, as shown by the illustration.

Vignettes for marking Handkerchiefs.

See illustration on page 164.

We give herewith the remainder of the alphabet with vignettes for marking handkerchiefs which was begun in Harper's Bazar, Vol. IV., No. 9. It is worked in the same manner with embroidery cotton in French embroidery.

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET RIBBON WITH LACE ARRANGED AS BRETELLES.

Fig. 2.—BLACK VELVET RIBBON WITH LACE ARRANGED AS A HEART-SHAPED NECK.

Fig. 3.—VELVET RIBBON AND FRINGE ARRANGED AS A SQUARE NECK.

Fig. 4.—VELVET RIBBON AND LACE ARRANGED AS A SQUARE NECK.

Waist Trimmings of Velvet Ribbon and Lace.

A BLACK velvet ribbon an inch and three-quarters wide, trimmed with black lace or silk fringe of the same width, may be arranged in a number of ways as a trimming for waists, so as to simulate a square or heart-shaped neck, or bretelles, etc. Figs. 1–4 show the ribbon arranged in four different styles. The peculiar advantage of this kind of trimming is that it may be worn with different dresses, as it is not sewed on the waist, but merely fastened with small pins.

Fig. 1.—BLACK VELVET RIBBON WITH LACE ARRANGED AS BRETELLES. For this ribbon two pieces of black velvet ribbon each two inches wide and twenty-nine inches and a half long, lined with silk, are required. Trim one (outer) side of the ribbon with gathered lace two inches wide, and the other with gathered lace four-fifths of an inch wide; arrange the ends in pleats, and sew them to the under side of a black velvet belt as shown by the illustration. At the front of the belt set a bow of black velvet ribbon.

Fig. 2.—BLACK VELVET RIBBON WITH LACE ARRANGED AS A HEART-SHAPED NECK. This ribbon is forty inches long, an inch and three-quarters wide, and is lined with silk; one side is trimmed with gathered black lace two inches wide. Lay the ribbon in two pleats to form the rounded part of the neck. Arrange the ends of the ribbon in a pleat, sew them together, and cover the seam made by doing this with a velvet bow.

Fig. 3.—BLACK VELVET RIBBON WITH FRINGE AND LACE ARRANGED AS A SQUARE NECK. This trimming con-

DESIGN FOR TIDY IN DIAGONAL NETTING.—SIXTH PART.

Digitized by Google

sists of a piece of black velvet ribbon forty-five inches long and an inch and a quarter wide, which is trimmed with black silk fringe at the outer edge, and narrow gathered lace at the inner edge. In order to give the back a rounded shape form two small flat pleats there, and at the corners in front lay the ribbon in two deep pleats.

Fig. 4.—BLACK VELVET RIBBON WITH LACE ARRANGED AS A SQUARE NECK. For this trimming take a piece of black velvet ribbon sixty-one inches long and an inch and three-quarters wide. Line it with silk, and arrange the ribbon in a deep pleat at the proper point to form the corners. Trim the inner edge with narrow and the outer edge with wide gathered lace.

Netted Guipure Squares for Lingerie, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustration on page 165.

THESE squares may be used for trimming lingerie, or a number of them may be joined to form a cover. They may be used as covers for toilette cushions, or for trimming handkerchiefs. To make the squares work a foundation of the size shown by the illustration in plain netting with white linen thread, and work it with linen floss in point de reprise, point de toile, and point d'esprit. Work the triangular figures with close button-hole stitches.

Design for a Tidy in Diagonal Netting.

See illustration on page 165.

To make this tidy, one-sixth of which is shown by the illustration, work first for the foundation a square piece of the requisite size in diagonal netting. Work the netting over a large or small mesh, according to the size of the tidy required, using white knitting cotton or linen thread. The white portions are worked with linen floss in point de reprise, and the more dead-looking portions with linen thread in point de toile. Work the scalloped outer edge in button-hole stitch, and cut away the surplus material.

THEN AND NOW.

See illustration on page 172.

I LOVED her first, I loved her first in glowing days of June,
When all the blossoms were in blow, and all the birds in tune:
The red blush sat upon the rose, the blue was in the sky,
The passion-flower held no tear within her queenly eye.

She sat—my love!—beneath the ash, she waited for me there;
A light was in her soft brown eyes, gold motes lurked in her hair.
Fair daughter of a line of peers, proud heiress of the Hall,
What merit had I, that on me thy maiden choice should fall?

She listened on the terrace walk a well-known step to hear;
And little thought she all the while her truant swain was near.
I stood behind a knotted trunk her tender gaze to see
Fixed dreamily upon the sky, and knew she thought of me.

Ah, Valentine, sweet Valentine, though happy was that day
In sunny June when first I spoke, and thou didst not say Nay,
Yet happier now I to my heart clasp her who gilds my life,
And call her by a dearer name—my own true loving wife!

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER IV.—(Continued.)

WE are always changing within and without, modified more or less, as was said in the beginning of this chapter, by continually changing circumstances. Had any one a year ago shown Hannah her picture, as she often appeared now, in pretty evening dress—she had lovely round arms still, and it was Rosie's delight to catch them bare, and fondle and hug them to her little bosom as "dollies"—Hannah would have said such a woman was not herself at all. Yet it was; and hers, too, was the heart, wonderfully gay and light sometimes, which she carried about through the day, and lay down to sleep with at night, marveling what she had done that Heaven should make her life thus content and glad.

The change was so gradual that she accepted it almost without recognition. Ay, even when there came an event which six months ago she would have trembled at—the first dinner-party at the House on the Hill, given in honor of the bride.

"I must give it, I suppose," said Mr. Rivers. "You will not mind? I hope it will not trouble you very much?"

"Oh no."

"Be it so, then." He walked off, and then came back, saying, a little awkwardly, "Of course, you understand that you keep your usual place as mistress here."

"Certainly, if you wish it."

So she sat at the head of his table, and did all the honors as lady of the house. At which some other ladies, country people from a distance (for it was a state dinner-party), looked—just a little surprised. One especially, a malign-looking old dowager, with two or three unmarried daughters, whispered:

"His sister-in-law, did you tell me? I thought she was quite a middle-aged person. Better, perhaps, if she had been. And they live here together—quite alone, you say? Dear me!"

The words were inaudible to Miss Thelluson, but she caught the look, and during the evening several other looks of the same inquisitorial kind. They made her feel—she hardly knew why—rather uncomfortable. Otherwise she would have enjoyed the evening considerably. No woman is indifferent to the pleasure of being mistress of an elegant, well-ordered house, where her servants like her and obey her—she doing her duty and they theirs, so that all things go smoothly and well, as they did now. Also she liked to please Mr. Rivers, who was much easier to please than formerly. His old sweet temper, that poor Rosa used so fondly to dilate on, had returned; and oh! what a rare blessing is a sweet temper in a house, especially in the head of it. Then, by this time, his sister-in-law understood his ways, had grown used to his very weaknesses, and found they were not so bad, after all. He was far from being her ideal, certainly; but who are they that ever find their ideal? And Hannah sighed, remembering her own—the loveliest and most lovable nature she had ever met, or so it had appeared to her in her girlhood's long-ended dream. But God had taken Arthur home; and thinking of him now, it was more as an angel than as a mortal man.

Looking round on the men she saw now—and they had been a good many lately—she found no one equal to Bernard Rivers. As he took his place again in society, a young widower who had passed from under the blackest shadow of his loss, though it had left in him an abiding gravity, he would have been counted in all circles an attractive person. Handsome, yet not obnoxiously so; clever—though perhaps more in an appreciative than an original fashion; pleasant in conversation, yet never putting himself obtrusively forward, he was a man that most men liked, and all women were sure to admire amazingly. Hannah saw—she could not help seeing—how daughters brightened as he came near, and mothers were extraordinarily tender to him; and, in fact, had he perceived this—which he did not seem to do, being very free from self-consciousness—Bernard Rivers would have run a very good chance of being thoroughly "spoiled."

He was not yet spoiled, however; it was charming to watch him, and see how innocently he took all this social flattery, which Hannah noticed with considerable amusement, and a sort of affectionate pleasure at thinking that, however agreeable he was abroad, he was still more so at home, in those quiet evenings, now sadly diminished. She wondered sometimes how long they would last, how soon her brother-in-law would weary of her companionship, and seek nearer and fonder ties. Well, that must be left to fate; it was useless speculating. So she did her best now; and when several times during dinner he glanced across the table to her and smiled, and also came more than once through the drawing-rooms to look for her, and say a kindly word or two, Hannah was a satisfied and happy woman.

Only—during the pause of a long piece of concerted music by the three remaining Misses Rivers—fancying she heard Rosie cry, she crept away up stairs, and finding her sitting up in her crib, sobbing from a bad dream, Aunt Hannah caught her child to her bosom more passionately than usual. And when the little thing clung for refuge to her, and was soothed to sleep again under showers of kisses, Hannah thought, rejoicingly, that there was one creature in the world to whom she was absolutely necessary, and all in all.

His guests being at length gone, the host stood on his hearth-rug meditative, even grave.

"Well, Hannah!" he said at last.

She looked up.

"So our dinner-party is safe over. It went off beautifully, I must say!"

"Yes, I think it did."

"And I am so much obliged to you for all the trouble you must have taken. I do like to have things nice and in order—every man does. Especially as Lady Rivers was there. They think so much of these matters at the Moat House."

Hannah, half pleased, half vexed, she scarce knew why, answered nothing.

"Yes, it was very pleasant, and the people were pleasant too. But yet I think I like our quiet evenings best."

"So do I," Hannah was going to say, and then hesitated, with a curious kind of shyness, for she had been thinking the very same. Wondering also how long this gay life they now led was to go on, and whether it would end in that climax for which she was always preparing herself—Bernard Rivers taking a second wife, and saying to his sister-in-law, "Thank you; I want you no more. Good-by!" A perfectly right, natural, and desirable thing, too, her reason told her. And yet—and yet— Well! she would, at least, not meet difficulties half-way, but would enjoy her halcyon days while they lasted.

So she sat down with him on the chair he placed for her, one on either side the fire, and proceeded to talk over the dinner and the guests, with other small, familiar topics, which people naturally fall into discussing when they are perfectly at home with each other, and have one common interest running through their lives. All their associations now had the easy freedom of the fraternal relation, mingled with a certain vague sentiment, such as people feel who are not really brother and sister; but, having spent all their prior lives apart, require to get over a sort of pleasant strangeness, which has all the charm of traveling in a new country.

In the midst of it, when they were laughing together over some wonderful infantine jest of little Rosie's, there came a knock at the door, and a face looked stealthily in.

Hannah sprang up in terror. "Oh, Grace! What is it? Any thing wrong with baby?"

"No, miss, nothing. How wrong of me to frighten you so," cried the young woman, contritely, as Miss Thelluson dropped back in her chair, so pale that Mr. Rivers hastily brought her a glass of wine, and spoke sharply to the nurse.

Grace looked at him with a scared face. "It's true, Sir; I hardly know what I'm saying or doing. But never mind! The little one is all right; it's only my own trouble. And I've kept it to myself all day long because I wouldn't trouble her when she was busy over her dinner-party. But oh! miss, will you speak to me now, for my heart's breaking?"

"You should not have minded my being busy, poor girl!" said Hannah, kindly. "What is it?" And then, with a sudden instinctive fear of what it was, she added, "But perhaps you would like to go with me into my own room?"

"No, please, I want to speak to the master too. He's a parson, and must know all about it; and it was him that he went to first!"

"My good woman, if you'll only say what 'it' and 'he' refer to; tell me a plain story, and I'll give you the best advice I can, whatever your trouble may be." And Mr. Rivers sat down, looking a little bored—like most men, he had a great dislike to "scenes"—but still kindly enough. "Tell me, is it any thing about your husband?"

Hannah had not given him credit for remembering that fact, or for the patience with which he sat down to listen.

"My husband!" cried poor Grace, catching at the word, and bursting out sobbing. "Yes, you're right, Sir, he is my husband, and I shall always believe he is, though he says he isn't, and that I have no claim upon him, no more than any wicked woman in the street. But I was married, Mr. Rivers!" and the poor girl stood wringing her hands, while her tears fell in floods. "He took me to London and married me there (I've got my certificate in my pocket), and when we came back every body knew it. And a year after, my little baby was born, my poor little baby that I never told you of, miss, for fear you should send me away!"

"Is it living?" said Hannah, gravely, having listened, as Mr. Rivers did also, to this torrent of grief-stricken words.

"Yes; he is living, pretty lamb! though many a time I have wished he wasn't, after what his father said when he went away. But that might not be true, no more true than what he sent me word yesterday; and I've been nigh out of my mind ever since!"

"What was it? Do keep to the point. I can not make out the matter if you talk so much," said Mr. Rivers.

Hannah sat silent, waiting for what was coming next. An uneasy feeling, not exactly a fear, but not unlike it, came over her, as she recalled the long-ago discussion at the Moat House about the Dixon family.

Grace gathered herself up, and looked her master in the face. She was a sweet-looking little woman, usually reticent and quiet enough, but now she seemed desperate with her wrong.

"Dixon says, Sir—that's my husband; he's James Dixon, of your parish—that I'm not his wife in law, and he can get rid of me whenever he pleases, only he won't do it if I'll come back and live with him, because he likes me, he says, and all the poor children are crying out for me. But that if I won't come back, he shall go and marry another woman, Mary Bridges, of Easterham, that lived as cook with Lady Rivers. He'll put up the banns here next Sunday, he says."

"He can not. It would be bigamy."

"Bigamy! That's taking a second wife while your first wife's living, isn't it, Sir? And I'm living, though I wasn't his first wife; but I suppose that doesn't matter. Oh, why did I ever take him! But it was all for them poor children's sakes; and he was such a good husband to my sister that I thought for sure he'd be a good husband to me!"

Mr. Rivers started. "Stop a minute. Your story is very confused; but I think I take it in now. Is James Dixon the Dixon who once came to me, asking me to marry him to his deceased wife's sister? And were you that person?"

He spoke in a formal, uncomfortable voice; his cheek reddened a little, and he looked carefully away from the corner where Hannah was sitting. She did not move—how could she?—but she felt hot and red, and wished herself any where except where she was, and was obliged to remain.

Grace spoke on, full of eager anxiety: "Yes, Sir, he did come to you, I know, and you told him, he said, that I was not the proper person for him to marry. But he thought I was, and so did I, and so did all the neighbors. You see, Sir"—and in her desperation the poor young woman came close up to her master—"I was very fond of my poor sister, and she of me, and when she was dying, she begged me to come and take care of her children. Jim was very glad of it too. And so I went to live with him; it was the most natural thing possible, and—it wasn't wrong, miss, was it?"

Hannah felt she must answer the appeal. She did so with a half-inaudible but distinct "No."

"Nobody said it was wrong. Nobody blamed me. And the children got so fond of me, and I made Jim so comfortable, that at last he said he couldn't do without me, and we had better get married at once. Was that wrong, Sir?"

"Yes; it was against the law," said Mr. Rivers, in the same cold tone, looking into the fire, and pushing backward and forward the ring he wore on his little finger—poor Rosa's wedding ring, taken from her dead hand.

"But people do it, Sir. I know two or three in our village as have done it, and nobody ever said a word against them. And, as it was, people did begin to say a deal against me." Grace hung her head a minute, and then lifted it up again in fierce innocence. "But it was all lies, Sir. I declare before God it was. I was an honest girl always. I told Jim I wouldn't look at him unless he married me. So he did at last. Look here, Sir."

Mr. Rivers took nervously the marriage certificate, read it over, gave it back again, and still remained silent.

"It's all right, Sir? I know it is! He did marry me!"

"Yes—but—"

"And it wasn't true what he said when, after a while, he took to drinking, and we squabbled a bit—that he could get rid of me whenever he liked, and marry somebody else? It wasn't true, Sir? Oh, please say it wasn't true, if only for the sake of my poor baby!"

And Grace stood waiting for the answer that to her was life or death.

All this while Miss Thelluson had sat silent, scarcely lifting her eyes from the carpet, except once or twice to poor Grace's face, with keen compassion. Not that the question seemed to concern her much, or that she attempted to decide the wrong or right of it; only the whole case seemed so very pitiful. And she had grown fond of Grace, who was a very good girl, and in feeling and education rather superior to her class.

As for Mr. Rivers, the look in his eyes, which he carefully kept from meeting any other's eyes, was not compassion at all; but perplexity, uneasiness, even irritation—the annoyance of a man who finds himself in a difficult position, which he wishes sincerely he were well out of.

To Grace's frantic question he gave no reply at all. She noticed this, and the form of her entreaty changed.

"You don't think I did wrong to marry him, Sir? You are a parson, and ought to know. Was it wicked, do you think? My sister—that's Mrs. John Dixon, a very good, religious woman, and a Methody, too—told me no; that the Bible said a man was not to marry his wife's sister in her lifetime, which meant that he might do it after her death."

"Apparently you have studied the subject very closely; closer, I doubt not, than I have," replied Mr. Rivers, in that hard voice of his. Hannah thought it at the time almost cruel. "Therefore there is the less need for me to give you any opinion, which I am very reluctant to do."

A blank look came into poor Grace's beseeching eyes. "But, Sir, my sister—"

"Mrs. Dixon is a Dissenter, many of whom, I believe, think as she does on this matter; but we Church people can only hold to the prayer-book and the law. Both forbid such marriages as yours. You being brother and sister—"

"But we weren't, Sir; not even cousins. Indeed, I never set eyes on Jim till just before Jane died."

"You being brother and sister," irritably repeated Mr. Rivers, "or the law making you such—"

"But how could it make us when we were not born so?" pleaded poor Grace, with a passionate simplicity.

"You being brother and sister," Mr. Rivers said, for the third time, and now with actual sternness, "you could not possibly be married. Or if you were married, as you say, it was wholly against the law. James Dixon has taken advantage of this, as I have heard of other men doing; but I did not believe it of him."

Grace turned whiter and whiter. "Then what he says is really true? I am not his wife?"

"I can't help you; I wish I could," said Mr. Rivers, at last looking down upon the piteous face. "I am afraid it is only too true."

"And my baby, my baby! I don't care for myself much! but my baby!"

"If you ask me to tell you the truth, I must tell it. I refused to marry James Dixon because I knew it would be no marriage at all, and could only be effected by deceiving the clergyman, as I suppose was done. Therefore you are not his wife, and your baby is, of course, an illegitimate child."

Grace gave a shrill scream that might have been heard through the house. Lest it should be heard, or from some other instinct which she did not reason upon, Miss Thelluson jumped up, and shut and bolted the door. When she turned back the poor girl lay on the floor in a dead faint.

Hannah took her up in her arms.

"Please help me!" she said to Mr. Rivers, not looking at him. "I think the servants are all gone to bed. I hope they are; it will be much better. Once get her up stairs and I can look after her myself."

"Can you? Will it not harm you?"

"Oh no!" and Hannah looked pitifully on the stony face that lay on her lap. "It has been very hard for her. Poor thing! poor thing!"

Mr. Rivers said nothing, but silently obeyed his sister-in-law's orders, and between them they carried Grace up to Miss Thelluson's room. Almost immediately afterward she heard him close the door of his own, and saw no more of him, or any one except her charge, till morning.

MRS. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS'S BALL, 1824.

See illustration on page 168.

THE year 1824 began auspiciously for the pleasure-seekers at the capital. The customary "levée" held by the President on that day was unusually successful. James Monroe, then President, was the last of our chief magistrates whose claims to this preferment were founded on Revolutionary services. In 1824 he entered upon the eighth year of his administration, "and he looked," says one of the journals of the day, noticing the New-Year's reception, "like a patriarch in the midst of his children."

These "children," being understood to mean those who offered him their respects on the opening of the year, were a brilliant progeny. There were the Vice-President, Daniel D. Tompkins, and the members of the cabinet, with the exception of the Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Crawford, who was temporarily ill. These were John Quincy Adams, Secretary of State; Calhoun, Secretary of War; Southard, Secretary of the Navy; and William Wirt, Attorney-General. Henry Clay was Speaker of the House of Representatives, Daniel Webster was a member of that House, and Andrew Jackson, the hero and lion of the season, albeit his military renown was founded on deeds nearly ten years old, was in the Senate, as was also Thomas H. Benton,

Digitized by Google

The foreign ministers called at the White House, and though their names are not suggestive to modern ears of personal distinction, yet they are still remembered by those who knew them as very agreeable gentlemen. England, France, and Spain were represented at that precise epoch merely by chargés d'affaires. Russia had a minister plenipotentiary, etc., Baron De Tuyll. These wore their varied and splendid uniforms, adding brilliancy to the scene, which was still further increased by a more numerous assemblage of fair visitors than for some winters past; "and these," a Jenkins of the day adds, "give an air of attraction to our streets, and a peculiar fascination to our ball-rooms." Of these fair ones more anon. A week later they gave a fascination to a certain ball-room not yet forgotten. To give attraction to the streets the weather gave them ample opportunity. So uncommonly mild was the season that the Intelligencer speaks of a peach-tree in full bloom in the city on the 22d of January.

In 1824 the Greek revolution was universally discussed. It had then been in progress three years; and so great was the sympathy among Americans that in the journals of that date are constantly seen notices of different modes of raising subscriptions to aid the sufferers. There were balls given in various places; one in Baltimore in January of this year; another in New York, on the 8th of the same month, was given in the theatre, and was attended by nearly two thousand persons. New York milliners advertised to supply the fashionables with suitable costumes, and one imported a branch of the "Sacred Grecian Olive," as a model to be used in making Grecian wreaths, etc., for the ladies' heads.

About this time the first resolution was offered in Congress relative to placing a government vessel at the disposal of the Marquis De Lafayette, should he decide to revisit the United States, as he did do in the latter months of 1824. The succession to the Presidency was also much discussed, though it, with other kindred political topics, was tabooed in good society. Politics were voted eminently vulgar, and the four possible candidates (who were later actually nominated) for the highest office in the gift of the people—Adams, Crawford, Jackson, and Clay—met on the best of terms. In fact, one of these lionized the other by giving a ball in his honor, which was the great social event not only of that season, but whose glories talent and tradition have combined to preserve. This ball, given by Mr. and Mrs. Adams on the 8th of January, commemorated General Jackson's victory at New Orleans. It created a sensation in advance. The National Journal, a Washington newspaper, on the 7th of January ridicules another journal which had announced that "so many tickets had been issued" (to the ball) "that the house will not hold the guests, and canvas tents are to be added to the rear." Furthermore the ball was celebrated, or, as some say, heralded, by the following verses from the pen of Mr. John Agg, a literary light of the period:

MRS. ADAMS'S BALL.

(From the Washington Republican, January 8, 1824.)

Wend you with the world to-night?
Brown and fair, and wise and witty,
Eyes that float in seas of light,
Laughing mouths, and dimples pretty,
Belles and matrons, maids and madams,
All are gone to Mrs. Adams'.
There the mist of the future, the gloom of the past,
All melt into light at the warm glance of pleasure;
And the only regret is, lest, melting too fast,
Mammas should move off in the midst of a measure.

Wend you with the world to-night?
Sixty gray, and giddy twenty,
Flirts that court, and prudes that slight,
Stale coquettes, and spinsters plenty.
Mrs. Sullivan is there,
With all the charms that nature lent her;
Gay M'Kim, with city air;
And winning Gales, and Vandeventer;
Forsyth, with her group of graces;
Both the Crowninshields, in blue;
The Pierces with their heavenly faces,
And eyes like suns that dazzle through;
Belles and matrons, maids and madams,
All are gone to Mrs. Adams'.

Wend you with the world to-night?
East and West, and South and North,
Form a constellation bright,
And pour a blended brilliance forth.
See the tide of fashion flowing.
'Tis the noon of beauty's reign;
Webster, Hamiltons, are going,
Eastern Lloyd and Southern Hayne;
Western Thomas, gayly smiling,
Borland, nature's protégé,
Young De Wolfe, all hearts beguiling,
Morgan, Benton, Brown, and Lee,
Belles and matrons, maids and madams,
All are gone to Mrs. Adams'.

Wend you with the world to-night?
Where blue eyes are brightly glancing,
While to measures of delight
Fairy feet are deftly dancing;
Where the young Euphrosyne
Reigns the sovereign of the scene,
Chasing gloom, and courting glee,
With the merry tambourine.
Many a form of fairy birth,
Many a Hebe yet unwon;
Wirt, a gem of purest worth,
Lively, laughing Pleasonton.
Vails and Taylor will be there,
Gay Monroe, so debonnair,
Hellen, pleasure's harbinger,
Ramsay, Cottringers, and Kerr;
Belles and matrons, maids and madams,
All are gone to Mrs. Adams'.

Wend you with the world to-night?
Juno in her court presides,
Mirth and melody invite,
Fashion points, and pleasure guides!
Haste, away then, seize the hour,
Shun the thorn and pluck the flower,
Youth, in all its spring-time blooming,
Age, the guise of youth assuming,
Wit through all its circle gleaming,
Glittering wealth and beauty beaming;
Belles and matrons, maids and madams,
All are gone to Mrs. Adams'. ORLANDO.

Imagine such a poem appearing on the morning preceding a ball of the present day; how eagerly it would be read, how some of the "ins" would wish themselves out, how many of the "outs" would wish themselves in! Merely changing the names of those present, the verses would apply equally well to any grand assembly in Washington at present, for a true picture of the cosmopolitan nature of society at the capital is given. Besides those mentioned, the distinguished men who attended the President's levée a week before were all, or nearly all, present with their families. The diplomatic corps was in force, on account of the entertainment being given by the Secretary of State. In fact, every body who was any body was there—nearly a thousand persons in all, it is said; and this, be it known, was when shoddy was not—society was unmixed, and every one knew who was who, and was free to act accordingly.

The crowd alone interfered with the perfect enjoyment of the evening. To look at the houses still standing on F Street opposite the Ebbitt House is sufficient to understand how much the guests must have been inconvenienced by each other. These dwellings, still known as the Adams houses, were then used as one house, though they had, as now, two entrances. They remain substantially the same as at that time. On the occasion of the great ball the dancing took place on the first-floor, and the supper-table was spread in the third-story. When the supper-room was thrown open, about half past nine o'clock, the crowd rushed irresistibly, says a newspaper of the succeeding day, toward it. The supper was a sumptuous cold collation, "consisting of natural and candied fruits, pies [!], sweetmeats, tongues, game, etc., prepared in French style, and arranged with most exquisite taste."

In those days parties usually began by seven o'clock, and to reach one at eight was to be late indeed. They were over at midnight; but this one, being exceptional in every respect, was prolonged into the small hours. Mrs. Adams was a lady who understood the duties of a hostess to perfection, and is reputed always to have succeeded in making her entertainments thoroughly delightful. Without being a beauty, she was a very attractive woman, and dressed in excellent taste. At this fête she wore what was called a suit of steel. The dress was composed of steel llama; her ornaments for head, throat, and arms were all of cut steel, producing a dazzling effect. General Jackson was her devoted attendant during the evening, and caused much comment by such assiduous attentions. His more than ordinarily courteous demeanor was remarked, being, indeed, what Washingtonians of our own time significantly style "smiling for the Presidency." He had been specially lionized on that evening. The citizens had illuminated the town-house of the First Ward in his honor, and in memory of the battle of New Orleans; large bonfires had blazed in the streets, to the eclat of which was added the vociferous "cheering of the sovereign people;" and many persons had called upon him at his lodgings. He also attended a public ball given by the dancing-master Carusi in memory of his great victory, and he passed the remaining hours of pleasure at the side of the popular wife of the Secretary of State. This night sealed his fate, positively asserts a public man of that time, as a candidate for the Presidency. A few days afterward the name of Mr. Calhoun was withdrawn as a nominee by a portion of his party, and that of Jackson substituted; though it was not until Mr. Adams had first enjoyed the occupancy of the White House that this hero, to whom it seemed too much homage could not be offered, succeeded to the coveted office.

But it is not sufficient to let the guests named in the poem pass without further notice. These "maids and matrons" were almost all women of note, and several of them still survive to recall the delights of that evening. Mrs. Sullivan, who heads the list, was the daughter of Governor Winthrop, of Massachusetts, and sister of Robert C. Winthrop. She is remembered as a very brilliant woman, universally admired. When, in later years, her brother was Speaker of the House, she presided in his home, and was one of the most popular women in Washington. She died abroad. "Gay M'Kim" was the wife of Isaac M'Kim, a wealthy merchant, and a member of the House from Baltimore. Mrs. Gales, the wife of Mr. Joseph Gales, of the Intelligencer, is now living at her home near Washington, and is a lady of remarkable culture. She is the cousin of the late General Robert E. Lee. Mrs. Vandeventer, from Baltimore, was a bride that winter. Her husband was Chief Clerk of the War Department. She is now dead. Mrs. Forsyth was the wife of a member of Congress from Georgia; one of the most elegant and polished "society men" Washington has ever known. Prior to this time he was minister to Spain, and under Jackson was Secretary of State.

Of the "group of graces" but one survives, Mrs. Schœff, who resides in Georgetown. The Misses Crowninshield, daughters of Benjamin Crowninshield, of Essex County, Massachusetts, are now living in Boston; one is the wife of Dr. Mifflin, the other married Mr. Munford, a Unitarian clergyman. They were great belles, and so also was their cousin, Miss Silsby, the omission of whose name in the poem causes surprise even now. Probably no young lady ever had a more brilliant career than hers; but when it is asserted that Mr. Agg dashed off the verses in two hours' time it can scarcely be matter of wonder that many names were left out, more especially when the exigencies of rhyme are taken into consideration. Miss Silsby is the widow of Jared Sparks, the historian. Alas! I have been able to learn little of those heavenly-faced Pierces except that the description of them was unquestionably accurate. There were five sisters, who passed the winter in Washington with their parents. They were one and all beauties, and are remembered as such by many persons who have known nothing of their subsequent lives. On their departure Thomas Bullfinch, author of the "Age of Fable," etc., wrote some very pretty lines to them, in which he paid natural tribute to the handsome sisters.

In the third verse of the poem given above some of the distinguished men of the day are named, and in some instances reference is made to their wives or daughters. Hayne was the Senator from South Carolina who had the great controversy with Webster. James Lloyd was a distinguished Senator from Massachusetts. The Hamiltons were from South Carolina. Thomas was one of the first Senators elected from Illinois. Borland and Morgan were members of Congress from New York; the wife of the latter was the adopted mother of Mrs. Dix. Miss De Wolfe, a handsome young heiress, was the daughter of a Senator from Rhode Island. John Lee, a Representative in Congress from Maryland, is now in Washington, and not only is young in appearance, but seems so full of life and vigor, and speaks with such freshness, earnestness, and enthusiasm, that it seems impossible to believe him a contemporary of Webster, Calhoun, and Clay.

Miss Wirt was deservedly called "a gem of purest worth." She was the eldest daughter of William Wirt, and was an accomplished and beautiful woman. She married Judge Randall, of Florida, and died many years ago. Miss Pleasonton, now the widow of John G. Watmough, of Philadelphia, lives in that city. She is the eldest sister of General Pleasonton. The Vails, sisters of Aaron and Eugene Vail, were born and educated in France. Their musical talents are still remembered with pleasure. They died abroad. Taylor is supposed to be a mistake for Tayloe, one of the elder daughters of Colonel John Tayloe, of Mount Airy, Virginia. She married Antony St. John Baker, brother of a chargé d'affaires of the British Legation, and stationed in Washington; she is now dead. As to "gay Monroe" there is a question as to whether the daughter of the President, Mrs. Gouverneur, of New York, is meant, or the daughter of the postmaster of Washington, who afterward married General Ramsay, U.S.A., now living in Washington. Both ladies were present, and both were very attractive, but the latter is said to have been far handsomer than the former. Neither is now living. Miss Hellen was the niece of Mrs. Adams, and married one of her sons. She died very suddenly in September last, while traveling for her health. She was a most estimable woman, and her loss is much felt by her friends. Since her death, for the first time since the removal of the seat of government to Washington, no member of the Adams family is a resident of the city. Two of the four ladies next mentioned reside in this city, in the enjoyment of good health. The sister of General Ramsay named is now the widow of Colonel Turnbull, of the army, and is still strikingly handsome. Miss Kerr is unmarried, and leads a secluded life in Washington. The Misses Cottringer live in Baltimore.

Mr. Agg modestly omitted to mention his own wife, who perhaps surpassed in personal attractions the majority of her contemporaries. Notwithstanding the omission, the memory of her beauty and grace has not perished. Of Mr. Agg this generation knows little, yet he possessed considerable poetic talent; and before leaving his native England some of his productions were attributed to Byron, and were incorporated in early volumes of Byron's works. He was among the first of those who were regularly established as correspondents for journals in other cities from Washington, and was perhaps the very first shorthand reporter resident there.

With such a company as the above, and such a poet-laureate, there is no wonder the mere mention of this ball should cause eyes to grow bright with memories dating back nearly half a century. Women had need to be beautiful in those days, for the style of dress gave little chance to conceal defects. Gowns were worn short enough to show the ankles, and gored so as to be extremely narrow. The waists were very short, beginning almost under the arms. All dresses were made quite low, and a fall of thread or Brussels lace was gathered about the shoulders and hung from the short sleeves. Gloves reached to the elbow, and were of such fine soft kid that they were frequently imported inclosed in the shell of an English walnut. Their colors usually matched the dress with which they were used. Slippers were invariably worn, also matching the dress in hue, and were secured by ribbons crossing on the instep over the silk stockings, then considered indispensable to the toilette of a fashionable lady. The hair was combed high, and formed into a large bow on the top of the head, around which was passed a braid, while an immense Spanish comb of tortoise-shell kept the lofty tower in place. Married ladies frequently wore turbans, and also long plumes of ostrich feathers. Sometimes these last were attached to a square cap. The beaux for these belles dressed more gayly, though perhaps in less costly attire, than gentlemen adopt nowadays. Blue coats and gilt buttons, white or buff waistcoats, white neck-ties, silk stockings, and pumps, were in vogue.

The dance of the period was the Spanish quadrille, bearing a resemblance to but less intricate than our own "German." The waltz had been newly introduced. Jerome Bonaparte, who married Miss Patterson, was the first to introduce this dance into Baltimore, whence no doubt it was brought to Washington.

MRS. GRANT'S RECEPTION.

See illustration on page 169.

WHEN Mrs. Grant receives, it is called a reception. When the President does the same thing, it is called a levée. Mrs. Grant receives Tuesday afternoon, from half past two to five P.M.; the President once in two weeks, from eight to ten. Mrs. Grant's receptions are less promiscuous than those of her husband, and there are more ladies than gentlemen who call. General Michler stands beside Mrs. Grant, and introduces each person, for she is not gifted with a memory for names or faces. Tuesday is also cabinet day; and after the conference is over the President and his ministers descend to the Blue Parlor and pay their respects to the ladies. Mr. President takes his stand at his wife's side and assists in hand-shaking, but not much in entertaining, as he is not noted for vivacity or loquacity. Mrs. Grant is a great admirer of her own sex, and always invites a number of ladies to receive with her. They come first to an elegant lunch; and once last winter they were enjoying themselves so much that the hour for receiving arrived before they had taken their places, and a crowd outside were impatiently waiting for the outer doors of the mansion to be opened. Mrs. Grant felt mortified, for she is very hospitable and considerate of others; and she has been careful that nothing of the kind should occur again. The Blue Parlor, as it is called, is a luxurious drawing-room, with walls of blue, paneled with gilt; all the furniture is blue satin and gilt frames; blue satin curtains, a large, handsome chandelier, and mirrors. In the centre of the room, beneath the chandelier, is a circular divan of blue satin, and rising from the centre a gilt stand, which is filled with flowers. Mrs. Grant wears a dove-colored silk with small bouquets of roses brocaded upon the silk. The dress is not elaborate, and her only ornament of value is a medallion of her husband, set around with diamonds. Mr. Grant, as she calls him, is still her hero, and she always wears this locket. General Sherman is among the guests; also Hancock. Away with heroes, for this is woman's realm; and we must confess that men very gracefully yield to the ladies undisputed position in a picture that is to possess beauty and interest. Mr. and Mrs. Colfax, or, we should say, Vice-President and wife, may be mentioned together—for they are never so happy as when together. Mrs. Colfax, without taking any leading part at the court, does all that is requisite, and has some very handsome costumes. She is rather handsome than otherwise.

Mrs. Fish always gives the grace and charm of her presence at the receptions. She is remarkable for leaving no known duty undone. Mrs. Creswell, the wife of the Postmaster-General, is another of our noted women, and deserves every word of kindness and admiration that is bestowed upon her. The beautiful wife of Senator Ames wears a dress composed of three shades of blue silk. The first skirt is of Mexican blue, with over dress of French blue, open in front; then a basque and shorter skirt of turquoise blue, with a vest of the Mexican blue. The fringe is knotted in a narrow hem on each skirt—French blue fringe on the Mexican, turquoise on the French, and all mingled in the most delightful confusion that a Paris artist can devise for a rich American bride. With this dress she wears a small white satin hat, with two rows of point lace, and a white feather that has no rival for beauty. A white ermine boa and muff complete the attire of the youngest lady in the Senate. Mrs. and Miss Boutwell should have had precedence except for that lovely dress. They are ladies who impress you more by their cultivated minds than by gorgeous array. Mrs. Blaine and her cousin, Miss Dodge (Gail Hamilton), have called. There is a striking likeness between Mrs. Blaine and her husband. Both are fine-looking. Miss Dodge is bright and keen, and not too literary or literal to enjoy the frivolities of Washington. No doubt she gathers many bits of wisdom even amidst such scenes.

The wife of Senator Pomeroy is one of the shining lights. She is very good in all senses of the word, has a handsome home, where she is always entertaining distinguished authors or lecturers. Miss Kate Field and Anna Dickinson have passed a few days with her recently. Mrs. Beecher Hooker has been her guest since the Woman Congress met. Both Senator Pomeroy and his talented wife give their hearty support to the woman cause. Among noted foreigners we would mention Lady Thornton, in a rich black velvet walking suit, trimmed with handsome black lace; she is a tall, stately blonde, who is winning her way in society as she becomes well known. Madame De Catacazy, the wife of the Russian minister, who has a world-wide fame for beauty, as her husband has for intelligence and comicality. Madame Garcia is the wife of the minister of the Argentine Republic. She is a Spanish beauty, and wore the black lace mantilla over her head. The large, lustrous dark eyes flash from beneath the drapery. There are many fair women and brave men who could be mentioned. A stranger making a first call must be surprised to see the harmony among all classes and shades of politics, rival aspirants greeting each other with apparent cordiality. All belong to the Veneering family. Look upon this picture, and then upon that of forty years ago, and one does not see much difference in the importance of the republican court.

ESQUIRES.

IN some parts of the country, though in many places the habit is dying out, every body almost who wears a black coat, and has a name and habitation, expects his friends to write him Esquire. This assumption—which it really in many cases is—seems to have been an old foible. In an old newspaper we find the following: "This metropolis is overrun with a set of idle and mischievous creatures, which we may call town squires. We might soon levy a very numerous army, were we to enlist every vagrant about town who, not having any lawful calling, from thence takes upon himself the title of gentleman, and adds Esquire to his name."

Digitized by Google

BALL GIVEN BY MRS. JOHN QUINCY ADAMS AT WASHINGTON, JANUARY 8, 1824.—[SEE PAGE 166.]

Digitized by Google

MRS. GRANT'S RECEPTION—1871.—[SEE PAGE 167.]

Digitized by Google

AFTER THREE YEARS.

An Old Valentine.

See illustration on page 172.

THEY are meeting after three long, long years,
And eyes are upon them turning:
Her red lip quivers with unshed tears;
His cheek with a flush is burning.

The youth is a man in his full-blown prime;
The school-girl has grown a maiden.
Do they think of the meetings 'neath the lime—
Of its blooms with the honey laden?

Of the twilight hours, when the tender haze
Was shot with a golden glory?
When the glamour of love made short the days,
And they prattled the old, old story?

His face is tanned by a foreign clime;
Her face has become the fashion.
Do they think of the old days 'neath the lime?
Do they think of their early passion?

Who knows? Mysterious human heart!
Their manner may be but seeming:
Perhaps with a smile and a jest they may part;
Perhaps may renew their dreaming.

It hangs in the balance, that love of old.
A word that is tenderly spoken
May rivet anew its fetters of gold;
A frown, and the spell will be broken.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE Swedish government has opened an avenue of public employment to women in telegraph offices. About one-ninth of the employés are women. The conditions of the service, however, are somewhat rigid. The applicant must present a certificate of good character, report her exact age, give a specimen of her handwriting, bring certificates from competent professors indicating proficiency in universal history, political geography, arithmetic, grammar, and enough French, German, and English to enable her to write and translate them into Swedish; she must take an oath to keep all official secrets, and is politely informed that to marry is to lose her place. If she passes the ordeal of examination, she receives for her work a salary of from one hundred to one hundred and forty dollars a year. And it is to be hoped that money goes farther in Sweden than in America, or she would find it difficult to obtain bread and butter enough for herself. If she gives satisfaction, and can pass a first-rate examination in magnetism, electricity, and meteorology, she has a chance of being promoted to a more important office, and receiving three hundred dollars a year. Thus far the women employed in telegraph offices have given general satisfaction to the Swedish bureau.

A Georgia planter has just discovered that he and his boys have been playing marbles for years past with a diamond for a middle-man, which one Dr. Stephenson—who seems to know something of gems—thinks must have been worth half a million of dollars. The only trouble is that the valuable plaything was lost about six months ago; they are hunting for it now. It is asserted that about forty diamonds have been found in Hall County, Georgia, though the most valuable have been destroyed through ignorance or carelessness. These home diamonds are said to be of finer water than any from the South African diamond valley.

One of the principal florists of this city cultivates eighteen acres of ground, nine of which are under glass. From these nine acres an immense quantity of flowers is produced for winter decorations. Still New York florists are often unable to fill their large orders without aid from other cities.

The steamer Tennessee, which carried the "United States Commission of Inquiry" to San Domingo, was detained several days in Samana Bay to take in a fresh supply of coal. The Commissioners and suite were landed at Santa Barbara, and spent the time in a thorough investigation of that town, and the entire Peninsula of Samana. The scenery is described as surpassingly beautiful—mountain, forest, and bay combining to charm the eye. Santa Barbara, like other cities, contains habitations of various kinds, differing according to the wealth and taste of the people. The houses of the poorer classes are very primitive, often being merely a few boards and stakes fastened together; other dwellings are comfortable and commodious cottages. The food of the people is of the simplest description. Meat is little used; oranges, bananas, cocoa-nuts, rice, sweet-potatoes, and the like being the principal articles of consumption. Vegetation is most luxuriant. Immense forests of palm, banana, plaintain, mahogany, and other trees surround Santa Barbara like a wall.

The Chinese have a curious method of preserving grapes, so as to have them at command during the entire year. It consists in cutting a circular piece out of a ripe pumpkin or gourd, making an aperture large enough to admit the hand. The interior is next completely cleaned out, the ripe grapes are placed inside, and the cover replaced and pressed in firmly. The pumpkins are then kept in a cool place, and the grapes will be found to retain their freshness for a very long time.

From San Francisco comes an account of a terrific storm, during one hour of which there was more lightning and thunder than the residents of that city have ever experienced before. Not even an earthquake could have produced such consternation. A fire-wall, twelve feet high and sixty long, was blown from the top of a dwelling upon a house adjoining, and fifteen or twenty person were buried beneath the ruins. Four of them were instantly killed, and others injured. Such a violent storm has seldom occurred in that vicinity.

A correspondent of the London Daily News, who has been with the German army, was one of the first to enter Paris from the outside. He gives a sad picture of the condition of things within—of hunger and sickness, of silent gloom, and numerous funerals—of the ignorance of the Parisians concerning every thing in the outside world. Strange to say, however, there has been during the siege a very general absence of crime. The people have been too miserable to indulge in private vengeance or rioting. Yet the moral effect of the bombardment has been fearful in many respects.

The folio Family Bible of George Washington has recently come into the possession of a Philadelphia publisher. Its authenticity is unquestioned, and it bears his autograph on the title-page of each of its three volumes. It is in good preservation, and is valued at $3000.

From a lengthy article upon dress we select a few hints, which may be useful to every body:

Avoid overdressing, if any doubt exists about the occasion.
A dress of rich material is more genteel than a showy one.
Avoid glaring contrasts in color, material, or value. A real lace shawl will look badly over a calico dress.
Holes in the gloves, soiled collars, ill-fitting or shabby boots, are a sure proof of a slattern.
Never wear any imitation of finery.
Wear little or no jewelry in the streets.
Large ornaments are seldom becoming.
Never wear two bright colors at the same time.
A traveling dress should be strong in fabric and simple in make.
A short dress should just clear the ground. No more, no less.
It is vulgar for gentlemen to dress gaudily, or adorn themselves with jewelry.
The dress of a woman in the morning is the real test of character.
The dress is a reflection of the mind; a delicate and modest mind will be recognized by the delicacy and modesty of the apparel.

Accounts from Paris vary greatly, as, of course, is natural. Visitors do not always see the same side of the picture. One writes of being entreated by a well-dressed man in the street for something to eat. When money was offered to him, he exclaimed: "Money! I don't want that. I want food. See!" He pulled his hand out of his pocket, and showed it filled with five-franc pieces. "What is the use of money when there is nothing to buy?" Another correspondent writes that he has yet to discover the misery and starvation of which he had heard; that people looked as fat and cheerful as ever; that he dined on Crécy soup, ſeine smelts, excellent roast beef, salad, asparagus, preserved peaches, a bottle and a half of wine, and coffee; that the bread was brownish and a little sawdusty, but perfectly eatable, and the beef was certainly not horse; and that he counted three very well fed-looking dogs roaming at large on the Boulevards, and not apparently exciting any unusual emotion in the breasts of the passers-by. But there are two sides to a picture of Paris life—and one must now be a sad one.

Johnny is a little fellow of only four years, but he has his own theological views. One day, having been disobedient, his mother attempted, when she put him to bed at night, to make him sensible of his fault. She told him she feared Satan had been putting bad thoughts into his mind. "Oh no, mamma," said Johnny. "It was not Satan; he's been so many times he's got tired; it was one of his friends!"

"Boffin's Bower" is the quaint name given to a snug resort in Boston—a comfortable place, not unlike a club of modest pretensions—warmed, well-lighted, with plenty of books and newspapers, and extending a hearty welcome to all respectable women. It was founded by Miss Jennie Collins, with the design of gathering into it poor, weary, overworked girls, and striving, by suitable entertainments of music, reading, and lectures, to make them forget their sorrows. Connected with the "Bower" is an Industrial Home where those who are not skilled in housework, but desire to learn, may be efficiently trained. Miss Collins has also been instrumental in the establishment of a dispensary, where all girls who are unable to pay for medical aid may, on her recommendation, receive it free of charge. Such labor as this is worthy work for any woman—assisting the poor and friendless of her own sex to be happier, healthier, and more capable of helping themselves. Quietly and without wealth she began her labor of love, and the work of her hand has prospered.

One of the most remarkable memorizers known is a Jewish girl about fourteen years old, who lives at Brody, in Galicia. Her name is Amalie Ebstein, and it is stated that she not only remembers every thing she has once read, whether in Hebrew, German, French, Russian, or Polish, but can repeat it word for word. Such a memory is both wonderful and fearful. It is to be hoped the child does not read much.

The bronze figures for the large fountain at the Terrace in the Central Park, which were designed by the American sculptress, Miss Stebbins, and cast in the royal foundry in Munich, are ready for shipment at Bremen, and will soon arrive here. Competent critics pronounce these figures true works of art.

ELIZABETH'S NEW-YEAR.

I.

"POOR Elizabeth! she will scarcely have a happy New-Year."

They were sitting by the fire on New-Year's Eve, a group of five or six girls, telling stories to one another in the twilight. I, lying on a sofa at a little distance, believed myself near enough to them to avoid any appearance of intentional solitariness, but too far off to be obliged to listen to their idle talk. But when Barbara Myers whispered to her next neighbor her pitying remark about me, I heard instantly, and acknowledged the unintentional stab with a start and a thrill.

The speaker's glance had gone past me to the farther window, where the fading light of the winter's afternoon was still powerful enough to sketch out the figures of a man and woman standing together in the deep embrasure. But, though her eyes, giving meaning to her words, had wandered whither, as she rightly guessed, my thoughts were fixed, she was quite conscious of my sudden movement; and added, hurriedly, with a vain effort to divert my attention: "I don't care much for that story, Milly; I've heard it before, dozens of times. Tell us the legend of Rosewarne."

I had not been listening hitherto—assuredly I did not listen now. It startled me to find I had betrayed myself to these young companions; to learn that I was wearing my heart upon my sleeve, and that others had already divined the cause of its pain. They knew it just as well as I. Penelope Seton had come; and my true love, who had seemed so true, had nothing more to say to me. It was only yesterday morning that she had arrived, a guest as I was, to spend the New-Year in his father's house; and in the afternoon they had walked in the park together; this morning they had been in the billiard-room for an hour alone; and now they stood talking low in the window, while I ate my heart.

She was his cousin; but what of that? We were no strangers, either, he and I. He had met me often in my own home, though never before in his; we had been friends for long; and until yesterday morning, though I might not have admitted it to any one else—though he had never professed himself such to me in plain words—I had not doubted that Geoffrey Maynard was my true love.

But in two days this grave, stately creature, with the brown hair, and large eyes opening slowly, as though the great white eyelids were too heavy a weight upon their glances, had changed all. He scarcely left her side; and I was alone—so lonely that these girls, these children, as I called them in the sudden age conferred by sorrow, could see how desolate I felt.

I was not hearkening at all to what Milly said as she sat on the hearth-rug, with her half-sleepy, half-attentive audience round her; but my ears had been opened by the remark which I had overheard to listen for any farther observation that might be made concerning me, and some of the legend of Rosewarne flowed into them, as it were, against my will.

"In the days of Elizabeth," said the narrator, "the owner of Rosewarne was a man of great ambition, deeply immersed in the politics of the times. Naturally anxious to learn the result, for his personal fortunes, of certain intrigues in which he was engaged, he sought out a very wise man, learned in the stars."

Then for a time I lost the thread, my senses fixing themselves upon the two distant figures standing so close together, the taller one bending to the other, with an intensity that closed them for a time to all nearer objects of sight or hearing. What relieved the strain I do not know—perhaps it spent itself; but, becoming conscious once more of the voice beside me, I took up the story at the point where the lord of Rosewarne, having found a very wise astrologer, built for him a high tower, with an observatory at the top, a little door communicating with his private apartment, and—a feature apparently of some importance to the tale—a steep and winding staircase from the very top to the very bottom of the tower.

"From the very top to the very bottom," said the girl to her girlish audience, with the due emphasis of one relating a tale of horror.

Just at that moment some little current of air, some unintentional raising of a naturally penetrating voice, brought somehow to my ears, across the long dusky room, the words,

"I do assure you, dearest Pen—"

Barbara heard them too; she looked at me under her eyelids. But for that I should have got up and fled; but with her glance upon me, with her evident knowledge of what I felt, I dared not move. I lay still; and after a time became aware once more—though my wandering attention gave a strange incoherence to what I heard—of the progress of the legend, now drawing to its climax.

"With the proofs of treason in his hand he mounted to the astrologer's chamber, the little chamber at the top of the tower. His face was changed, and dark with rage.....The old man expostulated, denied, appealed to his science, to the stars he had never misinterpreted, to justify him; yet—'Traitor and fool,' his patron cried in answer, 'was there no intimation of thine own fate writ in the heavens?' Then—"

The narrator's voice sank; and I, wearily conscious of the idle tale rather than disposed to listen, heard no more until the words:

"In the gray of the morning they found him dead at the bottom of the stairs. And the lord of Rosewarne said, 'Bury him there, like a dog, where he lies; for a very traitor and false loon was he.'"

"And did they bury him there?" cried one and another of her audience, starting from their listening attitudes at the conclusion of the tale.

"So says the legend; and on stormy nights there are heard sounds of feet in desperate flight and pursuit, rushing from top to bottom of the narrow stairs. Oh, I assure you that is true; for Mary Warner, our nurse, who married the gate-keeper, told me she had heard the sounds herself more than once."

"And what is the later story, Milly?" interposed Barbara; "the story about Mrs. Trevear? Had it not something to do with the legend?"

"Oh, the poor folks say she heard the spectral footsteps as she was coming down the stairs in the dark, and that, in her terror, she slipped and fell."

"And some say it was suicide—that she flung herself down," said a younger sister, with bated breath.

"Was she not happy?" I asked, interested for the first time. "Who was she?"

"She was Mr. Trevear's wife," said Mildred, gravely; "very beautiful and very clever. Some say she neglected her husband for her books; and others that he neglected her, and so drove her to eccentric studies. He was away a good deal, and she took a strange fancy to the astrologer's tower, and to the musty old books in it. She would spend half the night there sometimes. And one morning she was found dead at the bottom of the stairs, with all her lovely fair hair dabbled in blood. Some say the ghosts frightened her; others that she did it on purpose. Most likely the poor thing's foot slipped in the dark. Mr. Trevear shut up the house, and went abroad. He has been abroad these ten years. He is always coming home, but never comes; he can not bear it, I suppose."

There was the rustle of a dress, and Penelope Seton stepped into the fire-light.

"What are you talking about?" she asked, bending forward, with her hands on the shoulders of her two young cousins. The flame flickered over all her face and figure. She was very handsome; not all the ungenerous bitterness of woman's rivalry could blind me to that. Thirty years ago people did not disfigure their heads as they do now. Penelope's soft brown hair was all coiled simply at the back of her head, with the exception of one smooth weighty curl falling behind each ear. She had a pearly complexion—very little color, but of a strange transparency.

There was a melancholy in her expression which I had at first associated with a half-understood story hinted to me before her arrival, that a young man, to whom she was attached, had somehow got himself into great trouble. Now, seeing her willingness to accept consolation from one who should have been another girl's lover, I attributed the thoughtful air solely to the arch of her eyebrows, as Nature had drawn them on her smooth white forehead.

As she spoke some one came to the back of my sofa.

"Tired, Elizabeth?" asked young Maynard, softly, deprecatingly.

Whether it was grief or indignation that kept me silent I do not know; but for a minute I could not speak. Then I rallied myself, and answered, lightly:

"I am 'creaming all over,' as your West-country people say. Your sister has been telling us heart-piercing stories about a poor old astrologer who was thrown down stairs at Rosewarne. Where is Rosewarne?"

"About three miles from here," said Mildred.

"Only three miles! You must take me to see it, some of you."

"You can go to-morrow," said my little namesake, Bessie Maynard. "Geoffrey and Pen are going. I heard them talking about it."

I detected a swift glance of consternation from Miss Seton's eyes, directed over my head to where Geoffrey was standing behind me. How he looked I could not tell. The next instant Penelope turned her head away swiftly.

"Oh," I said, when I could speak, "I won't disturb existing arrangements. We will have an independent expedition, and go some other day, Bessie—you and I."

"I won't go without Geoffrey," was the swift reply. "It is too dismal, and I'm afraid of the ghosts.—Come, now, Geoffrey, you'll take us, will you not?"

"Yes, to be sure," he answered; but he said it hesitatingly, and Penelope darted a reproachful look at him out of her large blue eyes.

I could say no more then, but I determined within myself that I would not go. The dressing-bell rang, and we had to separate. When I came down again the room was empty. The candles were lit, but the shutters were not yet shut, and a cold white moonlight crept over the snow-whitened lawn into the room. I went and sat down in the window, with the heavy red curtains forming a partial screen around me, and looked out, and nursed my sorrow.

Presently a tall figure came into the room. It was Penelope Seton. I knew her at once by her stately carriage and her pale blue dress. I was indisposed for conversation, and of all people least disposed to talk to her. I sat still; and she went presently to the piano, and played a few wild, disconnected chords. Once I saw her put her handkerchief to her eyes, as if she was in tears.

She did not sit at the piano long. Presently she heard a step—a step that I also heard and knew, that I had often listened for with sweet, joyful expectation—and, rising, went to the door hurriedly, meeting Geoffrey Maynard as he entered.

"Geoffrey," she cried, impatiently, "what is to be done now? You are not using me well."

"Not using you well? You will make me hate myself, dear Pen. How have I done wrong?"

"You should not have promised," she answered, weepingly, "to let Miss Leigh go with us to-morrow."

I felt a strong impulse to rise and tell her that she need fear nothing from the importunate company of Miss Leigh; but before I could move he spoke:

"I wish you would let me tell her, Penelope."

"Not for the world!" she cried, with decision.

"It would be safest."

"It might be safe—you say she is trustworthy; she may be or mayn't—I do not know her; but safest it could not possibly be."

"She is uneasy," he said, thoughtfully; "it would spare her pain."

"You are too vain, Cousin Geoffrey," Penelope answered, with impatience.

"It is not vanity, dear Pen," he said, pleadingly; "but I will have no secrets from you, since you have confessed yours. We have been intimate friends for long, and she may have thought—" He broke off abruptly, and seemed to become immersed in pensive reflection.

"It does not matter," said Penelope, when she had watched him a little while. "If she's unhappy, I am sorry for her; but I can't help her. She looks passionate; I should fancy her unforgiving. Geoffrey, I dare not run the risk."

Digitized by Google

"Very well," he acquiesced, meekly.

"Why should she want to see Rosewarne?" Penelope demanded, after a pause, with a sort of tearful indignation. "We may never have such another opportunity of seeing each other again," she added, her voice sinking to a tender, sorrowful whisper.

"The girls always take every one that comes to see it," said young Maynard. "Barbara Myers wants to see it too. They will surely go over there. After all, dearest Pen, I don't see why they shouldn't go to-morrow; we may easily escape them; and, besides—"

Barbara Myers came in, humming the finale of a grand song she had been practicing all the morning; the two Maynard girls followed in a minute with the two Misses Cameron, and then the elders, and the gentlemen, who had been out shooting all day, came dropping in one by one. When the room was full I ventured out of my retreat.

"What a color you have, Elizabeth!" they said to me. "You little dark thing, what has made you flame up so suddenly?"

II.

I suppose Mr. Maynard's arguments overcame Penelope Seton's objections, whatever they may have been; for on the following morning his sister told me that we were all to go, after an early lunch, to Rosewarne. "All we girls, and Geoffrey, of course," she said.

He had been, ever since I came, our Squire of Dames; at first, I had thought, for my sake, but now evidently for Miss Seton's.

When first told of the expedition I declared I should not go. The knowledge that, swayed by Penelope's wishes, Geoffrey did not want me, though unable to fear any thing, whatever she might fear, from my presence, made me long to be left quietly at home. Besides, the idea of Rosewarne, first presented to me when my heart was in bitterness, had somehow associated itself with my pain.

I had dreamed all night of the grim old legend, and fancied myself pursued down endless stairs and through dark corridors by footsteps which were at once those of the spectre haunting the astrologer's tower, and Geoffrey Maynard's, set on by Penelope Seton to do me some wrong. I was no believer in dreams, but the anguish of my hopeless plight had not wholly left me when I woke; I felt the lassitude consequent upon uneasy slumber, and Rosewarne had become inextricably associated with unpleasant images in my mind.

I told Mildred that I would rather stay at home; but as she and all the others pressed me hard, and laughed amazedly when in despair I advanced for a reason the disinclination induced by my dream, I had to yield and go. I need not have alarmed myself lest I should be in Geoffrey's way. From the first moment of starting he kept ahead with Penelope Seton; and calling to us that they would go on and get the keys, soon disappeared from view.

"They have gone the field way to the lodge," said Mildred Maynard. "We won't follow their example. The path will be wet, and Barbara says she hates stiles. We will go soberly round by the road."

By the road it was a good three miles; and though we were all good walkers, the cheerless afternoon was already fading when, having learned at the lodge-gate that Geoffrey and Miss Seton had preceded us with the keys, we came in sight of Rosewarne, a tall and gloomy pile, standing low and among trees. The snow lay on the roofs and window-ledges, on the couchant lions guarding the flight of steps that led to the hall door, and on the leaves of the thick laurel hedges that shut in the neglected parterre. It was the most desolate place I had ever seen. At the northeast corner a square excrescence ran the whole height of the building, culminating in a tower that rose high above the general level of the battlemented roof.

In the hall, which struck damp and chilly, we found young Maynard alone.

"Where's Penelope?" his sisters asked.

"She is roaming about. Come into the dining-room, Miss Leigh; there are some very quaint old pictures, and I have opened the shutters enough for you to see."

But Bessie voted for an instant investigation of the astrologer's tower.

"Let us go before it gets dark, Geoffrey," she pleaded. "Let us call Pen, and go in a body. I can't bear the look of those narrow stairs in the dark."

"But there is nothing to be seen there," replied her brother. "I never thought Miss Leigh or Miss Myers would care to climb that narrow staircase; and, in fact, I haven't got the key."

"Oh, Geoffrey, Geoffrey!" cried Bessie, who was evidently loth to be defrauded of her terror. "Tell him to go and fetch the key, Lizzie, do."

To please her, I said that I should be certainly disappointed if we came away without seeing the tower; but my wishes were not powerful with him, as they had been once.

"I am very sorry," he answered, but without any heartiness of regret; "it is a mile to the lodge and back, and we have a long walk before us. I could not do it in time."

I turned away, leaving him to Bessie's reproaches, and joined Mildred and Barbara with the others in the dining-room. As Geoffrey had said, the pictures were quaint, and I believe valuable; but I scarcely saw them. I took little notice of any thing in all the long dark rooms we traversed; and as the windows in most of them were shuttered, it would not have been easy to see much.

Barbara and I were the only ones who had not been there before, and we were neither of us very enthusiastic in our inspection. I was in a state of mind which made all things stale and unprofitable, and rendered me incapable of any greater attention to externals than was necessary for a forlorn consciousness that Geoffrey was still in attendance upon Miss Seton—at least I could not but suppose so, as they were both absent from our company.

As for Barbara, I think she knew how it was with me—how worn and weary I felt; and declaring that the damp, dark rooms would give her a cold and spoil her singing, proposed we should return. I had not been aware of the cold; but possibly the others felt the chill of which she complained. Mildred went into the hall, and called Geoffrey and Pen loudly; but they had wandered far away in the long suites of rooms, and did not hear.

"We need not wait for them," she said; and then we all went out down the steps, where the traces of our arrival were already becoming obscured by a few falling flakes of snow.

But before we were clear of the laurel hedges I felt a sensation of cold about my neck, and putting up my hand, discovered that I had dropped the fur collar I had been wearing. I remembered now what I had done mechanically at the time—in the dining-room I had felt the weight of the fur oppressive, and had taken it off. There was nothing to be done but to go back.

"Don't wait for me," I said; "only don't walk very fast. I shall overtake you easily."

The dining-room shutters had been reclosed by Geoffrey while we were wandering through the other rooms; and it took me some time, as the dusk was deepening every minute, to grope my way back to the place where I remembered taking off my collar. It was opposite the only picture that had interested me—a modern portrait of the unhappy Mrs. Trevear, whose melancholy fate had so unfortunately confirmed the evil reputation of the astrologer's tower. Such light as there was glimmered in a ghostly manner on the great gilded frame, and served to guide me; but my collar was not there. I must have carried it upon my arm, and dropped it in some one of the other chambers we had gone through.

I was greatly vexed, and hurried through the desolate rooms, catching my breath now and then with a spasm, as some piece of furniture, unnoticed in the dark, dragged at my dress, like an invisible hand grasping me from behind. But nowhere could I find my collar; and convinced of the futility of the attempt, and growing nervous in the gloom, I hastened back to the hall, intending to overtake my companions by the exercise of my utmost speed.

The hall had been tolerably light when I reentered the house through the great open door; now it had become very dark. The door was shut. With a nameless feeling of alarm I hurried toward it. It was not only shut, but bolted and barred also. Geoffrey Maynard and Miss Seton had left while I was hunting vainly in the dark rooms, and I was locked in the empty house alone.

It was provoking, frightening; but I kept a good heart at first. Geoffrey and his companion would soon overtake the others, and finding I was not with them, my situation would become evident at once. A few minutes' reflection, however, reminded me that he and Penelope would probably return by the fields, as they had come; and that those I had left, finding I did not overtake them, would imagine that I had joined company with the two who had first of all staid behind. No one would learn I had been left at Rosewarne till all the others should have arrived at home; and even then there might be considerable delay, as it was New-Year's Day. There was to be a dinner-party and dance that evening; and they would all go to their rooms to dress, and imagine me to have done the same.

Several hours of cold and discomfort were plainly before me; and though I resolved that this should be all—that I would allow no nervous terror to take possession of me—I knew very well it was a resolution I could not keep.

I staid in the hall for a long time, with a strange dislike to moving, to hearing my own footsteps echo through the empty space, and a longing for the return of my companions that would not suffer me to quit the spot where I should be most quickly found. But I could hear nothing outside except the wind sighing in the laurel hedges, and swaying the snow-laden boughs of the trees. Inside the house were all those strange sounds which only become audible in an otherwise complete silence—strange crackings and creakings of ancient timbers, and ear-jarring monotonous shaking of locks.

The knowledge that there were many doors opening into the hall, and one long black corridor running out of it at the farther end, became very trying as the dusk increased. I could not help fancying strange faces looking out from the empty rooms, mopping and mouing at me as I sat, still as the old suits of armor on the walls. After a while the desire for light became intolerable; it drove me to such desperation that, having lost all expectation of my friends' immediate return, in the hope of finding the upper windows of the house unshuttered, I gathered all my courage, and, with a beating heart, began to climb the wide oak-balustered staircase, the long-unused steps of which groaned audibly beneath my faltering steps.

I came upon a long, dim gallery, lighted by one great west window, and full of doors. Whatever light there was, was, of course, then strongest in the west; and I could tell by the dimness of the gallery how far the day was gone. The falling snow darkened the dusk; but I thought it could not be less than five o'clock. Dinner was to be at seven that night. Two more hours before, in all probability, any one could even miss me!

My poor heart! How it beat as I looked at all those doors, and especially at one that stood ajar, and creaked dolefully in the wind! At last I could bear it no longer, and went toward it to shut it, in sheer desperation. Then I saw that the room seemed to be one of a suite, and that opposite this door there was another, also open, and swinging in the draught.

My horror of these open doors had risen to sheer intolerance of them. I felt as if at any time some hideous formless form might grow out of the dusk upon their thresholds, and make faces at me; or, worse still, look at me when I was not looking; or, a more reasonable terror, I had heard that thieves and burglars occasionally concealed themselves in empty houses. It was quite within possibility that Rosewarne, lonely and haunted, should be chosen as such a concealment; and if any one was near me with evil intent I should like to be made acquainted with his approach. I would choose to be warned by the opening of a door rather than feel suddenly a hand upon my shoulder, perhaps a knife at my throat.

I went forward, gathering courage as I best might, to close this farther door first, and perceived that it was the door of a small room, for some reason or other lighter than the gallery, and with one large window, from which it was possible to see the road that led from Rosewarne to the Old Hall. Along that road my succor, if it came at all, must come.

The attraction of that view, to which the early moonlight would soon lend additional distinctness, gave me an immediate preference for this little chamber, of which the smallness was another agreeable feature; the distant dim corners of the larger rooms seemed so many lurking-places, from which a hidden horror might at any time spring forth. The worst of it was that, like the two others of the suite I had already traversed, it had a second door; but innumerable doors seemed to be the great feature of Rosewarne, and this, at any rate, was shut. Carefully closing that by which I had entered, I took my station by the window, fixing my eyes intently upon the piece of road visible between the swaying branches of two tall Scotch firs.

On such a night few people would choose to be abroad, and I must have sat for an hour before I perceived a figure, looking black upon the snow. It was not coming toward Rosewarne—it was going away, in the direction of the Old Hall; nevertheless, the presence of a human creature, almost within sight of my misery, affected me in an indescribable manner. It lingered long on the little piece of road that I could see—for what reason it was, of course, out of my power to guess. At last it moved on, and a great block of masonry, flanking the window, hid it from my sight. I felt unutterable pain as it disappeared; and all my chilled faculties receiving a stimulus from the feeling, it occurred to me that the door I had previously noticed must lead into another room, of which the window might command a farther stretch of the road this figure was pursuing.

The door opened easily, and I found myself confronted by a flight of steep steps, leading upward, as it seemed, to another story. The higher the level the wider the view, and I climbed up.

There was a tolerably light landing-place above, but the window did not look out upon the road. Impatient lest the figure which had so excited my interest should meanwhile be getting hopelessly out of my sight, I tried the only door that I could see. It was very small and old-fashioned, and not easy to open; but I succeeded, and emerged upon what seemed a continuation of the landing-place I had just left.

Above me, as I issued forth, a narrow staircase wound itself into impenetrable darkness; beneath me the long flights descended, till they, too, became dim and indistinct. About twenty steps below me was a tall and narrow window, through the top panes of which the frosty moon looked cold and bright. I was in the astrologer's tower.

III.

There was an eerie look about the place that became its grim associations, and revived, with a vividness I should have believed impossible, the horror of my last night's dream. I turned to retrace my way hastily; but even as I turned, one of those strange draughts which seem to penetrate through the very walls of old and empty houses drove to the door behind me with a clash, and so jarred the rusty lock that my unsteady fingers could not open it again. God knows I can not describe the trouble that came over me then—reasonable disquietude mingling with superstitious terror, at which in open daylight, or with even one companion near me, I should have laughed.

In fact, my position was sufficiently unfortunate; for, remembering that Geoffrey Maynard had refused to get the key of the tower, it became clear to me that no one would suppose I could have got into it, and my friends might actually seek me without being able to find. The thick walls about me gave no hope that my feeble voice would suffice to direct their search, or that any sounds indicative of their presence in the other parts of the building could reach me where I was.

Added to this reasonable alarm were the horrid associations of the place. I could not look at those dim stairs winding away out of my sight without thinking of the false old man hurried down them by the discoverer of his treason to a terrible doom, or of the beautiful woman at whose portrait I had just been looking, found dead at the bottom of that depth beneath, with her bright hair dabbled in blood.

My one comfort was in the moonlight coming through the long, narrow window. It was placed too high, however, for me to see out of it, and the lower panes were obscured by the branches of a large tree, which tapped every now and then upon the glass, as the wind swayed them to and fro, and traced mysterious shadows on the moonlit stairs. These shadows frightened me after a time, and, sitting crouched upon the floor in the corner of the little landing where the window was, I kept my face covered with my hands.

I do not know how long I had remained in that position—long enough to grow sick with remembrance of the bones said to be mouldering at the bottom of the apparently interminable stairs—long enough to make the horrid legend of the haunted tower seem probable and true—when a sudden clamor overhead awoke the echoes of the grim old walls. I heard a sound of voices and a terrible laughter, and then a rush of footsteps coming headlong down the stairs above me.

For half a minute I remained motionless, with that dreadful impotency in all my limbs which sometimes constitutes the chief horror of a nightmare. Then I sprang to my feet, and fled.

With all the anguish of my dream intensified by the vividness of waking sense, I rushed wildly down toward the darkness at the bottom of the stairs; and still behind me the pursuing footsteps followed fast. I thought they gained upon me, and, heedless of the danger of a fall, sprang on from step to step with fearful speed.

I reached the bottom of the stairs at last. It was all darkness. I could see nothing. But though at any moment I might have dashed myself against the stubborn walls, I rushed blindly on, and happily met with no resistance. I had, in fact, entered a long corridor by which the tower communicated with the rest of the house.

If I had any thought distinct from the terror with which I seemed to be going mad, it was a fancy that the spectre—if in reality it was a spectre—by which I was pursued might not pass the grave where the bones it had animated in the flesh were lying. But this wild hope did not last more than a second; for as I rushed along the corridor the steps came echoing behind me. Flight was hopeless, then. I might be pursued all over the house so long as my strength lasted and I met with no impediment in front; but the instinct to flee prevailed over the certainty that flight was vain.

I was still running at the top of my speed, when, passing a moonlighted window as I ran, I saw a closed door just ahead of me, threatening to effectually bar my passage. I dashed myself against it with all my force; but I was just spent, and its strong bolts would have resisted at the best of times such feeble strength as mine. Shaking and faint, I felt myself falling to the floor as the pursuing footsteps came within a yard of me. The crowning horror took away my senses, and I knew no more.

When I came to myself I was in the moonlight by the window. The first thing that I saw was a hand—not my own hand—lying in my lap. It was a large white hand issuing from a man's coat-sleeve. The involuntary start made me aware of encircling arms from which I could not extricate myself; and for the first time I shrieked aloud—horrid shrieks, that followed one another without pause, and as if without any action or volition of my own. They distracted my own ears, and yet I knew they issued from my own lips. My terror had almost driven me mad.

I do not know how long it was before I became conscious of a voice saying "Hush!" bidding me be comforted and still; or how much longer it was before my poor dazed senses recognized that it was Geoffrey Maynard's voice. When I discovered who it was that held me I forgot every thing but the agony I had endured and my present safety. I threw myself upon his breast, and cried, sharply, "Don't leave me, Geoffrey! Geoffrey, Geoffrey, don't let me go!"

"I'm not going away, my darling!" said Penelope's lover. I did not think of him as her lover then. "Now don't frighten yourself; you're quite safe. Just keep still, and rest."

But though he bade me be still, and for some minutes would not even speak to me as I lay breathlessly panting in his arms, I heard him talking to himself: "Poor little darling, I've just frightened her to death! I could cut my own head off! But how was I to know that it was she?"

After a time he gave me some water to drink. How he got it I did not know; though I had an impression, faintly received through my bewildered senses, that some one else came and brought him the glass. The "some one else" was not Penelope. I thought it was a man. The water revived me; and presently I sat up and found myself alone with Geoffrey—looking haggard in the moonlight with his fear for me.

"How on earth did you come to be in the tower?" he said, when he saw that I was better.

Then, not without feeble girlish tears for my recollected agony, I told him the terrible story, which, in some way I knew not, had reached a climax very different from what I had expected, in his arms. It seemed to me as strange that Geoffrey should have been in the tower as my being there appeared to him. He told me the explanation would startle me, but he would not let me hear it then. Penelope should tell me; he was sure she would tell me now. What he had to do was to get me home. Could I walk with the support of his arm?

That reference to Penelope jarred upon me somehow—enough to act as a tonic, but not to depress me utterly. Jealous as I might be, injured as I still might feel, I could not wholly misunderstand the tenderness of his eyes and voice. I stood up, however, and asserted that I could walk very well without his arm.

He smiled pleadingly, and said, "Don't be cross, Lizzie!" with a look half anxious and half mirthful in his handsome eyes. Then he left me for a minute, and went, as I thought, to the bottom of the stairs. I fancied that I heard him speak to some one, but it might be only the bewilderment of my nerves, which were still quivering; and I was glad when he came back, and we went out of Rosewarne, and together down the snowy road to the lodge, where he left the key.

Digitized by Google

"It must seem unkind to you, tired as you are," said Geoffrey presently, as we came out upon the road; "but do you think you have strength enough to walk fast? It is of great importance that we should get home without attracting attention. And you must promise me, Lizzie, not to say any thing of what has happened."

He spoke with great earnestness, and though I wondered at him, I agreed to what he asked. Without him, to have walked fast would have been impossible to me; but his arm invigorated me wonderfully. It wanted still ten minutes to seven when we reached Old Hall.

"I shall have time to scramble into my dress clothes," said Geoffrey, as he looked at his watch. "For you, poor child, if I may judge by your white face, you will go and rest in your own room until the dancing begins. I'll send Pen to you directly."

But, apparently, he could not keep his promise in this respect; for I had slept for an hour, and, after languidly dressing, was resting by my fire for a few minutes before going down, when Miss Seton came to the door.

"I HAVE COME TO ASK YOUR FORGIVENESS, AND TO TELL YOU A TERRIBLE STORY."

"Elizabeth," she said, kneeling by my chair, "I have come to ask your forgiveness, and to tell you a terrible story. Say that you forgive me first."

"What am I to forgive?" I asked, with a revival of my old misery.

She looked so beautiful, with her braided hair, in her white dress, and the gleam of the fire in her sapphire eyes. She seemed sad, but with a queenly sadness. How could I feel any thing but insignificant beside her, as of old?

"You have been feeling hardly toward me," she answered, with a smile. "Don't attempt to deny it. You will be very sorry for me when you have heard all."

And so I was very sorry for her, in spite of some inevitable joy for myself. Geoffrey Maynard was not Penelope's lover. She had a lover whom she loved, and whose circumstances were such as to add the most tragic interest to her love. The substance of her story was this: When very young she had rashly engaged herself to a man whom her maturer judgment did not approve. During a rather long engagement her growing disapproval resulted in absolute indifference toward him, and a deep affection for another. At length, with her parents' concurrence, she broke off her engagement to Mr. Vaughan, whose wild ways rendered him unworthy of her, and became betrothed to her cousin, Walter Wingfield.

By some unfortunate accident the two gentlemen met soon after in company, where her name was mentioned. Smarting under his recent disappointment, Mr. Vaughan had spoken of her in a manner which was offensive to the man she was about to marry. A duel was in those days the inevitable consequence; and her cousin had been so unfortunate as to wound his opponent mortally, as it was feared. His own safety was thus placed in the gravest danger; and, hard pressed for a hiding-place, he had some days back come secretly to Geoffrey Maynard, as the cousin, almost the brother, of his betrothed, entreating his assistance. Geoffrey had thought instantly of the tower of Rosewarne, where, trusting to the fidelity of the lodge-keeper's wife—an old servant of the Maynards, and the only person who ever entered the deserted house—Mr. Wingfield had remained in concealment ever since.

The expedition to Rosewarne had been organized to give the unfortunate lovers an opportunity of meeting; and leaving Penelope to walk home alone (she had loitered on her walk, looking back with anxious eyes toward Walter Wingfield's hiding-place, and her figure it was that I had seen), Geoffrey had afterward remained to concert with the fugitive some safe scheme for his escape beyond seas. Parting from his friend at last, he had seen my shadow as I fled, and alarmed lest some spy should have discovered the secret of his retreat, had eagerly pursued.

"And now," said Penelope, finishing her story with a sigh, "you will not look at me any more with angry eyes, or resent the pain I have caused you. Geoffrey wanted me to tell you—he saw you were uneasy; you mustn't be angry with him, for he loves you very dearly—but I dared not trust you. I did not know you; and it was such a heavy secret, and the life of one so dear to me depends upon its being kept. You are not angry with me, are you?"

"Oh no," I said; "I love you." And so I did, now that I feared her no longer. "But is there no hope that Mr. Vaughan may recover?"

"Just a chance," she answered, sadly. "I pray that he may—for his own sake, poor fellow, and for Walter's too."

And for her sake I made the prayer also mine. Then we went down to the dancing-room; but Penelope danced very little, though she was asked every time. I could see she had no heart for it. For me, I was too tired; I sat on a sofa, and Barbara told me I looked very ill. But in the course of the evening Geoffrey came to me, and said:

"You are as white as lilies; last night you were as red as a rose; and I do not know which way I like you best. But, any way, you are altogether my own, are you not, sweet love?"

And looking up into his brave and tender eyes, I answered, "Yes."

THEN AND NOW.—[SEE POEM ON PAGE 166.]

AFTER THREE YEARS.—[SEE POEM ON PAGE 170.]

Digitized by Google

CHILDREN AT A PANTOMIME.

DR. DIO LEWIS ON EVENING ENTERTAINMENTS.

DR. DIO LEWIS has written, and Harper & Brothers have just published, a book called "Our Girls," which is so full, from the first page to the last, of wholesome and sensible advice that we wish it could be placed in the hands of every reader of the Bazar. From its readable pages we make the following extracts concerning the elaborate suppers so much in vogue now at evening parties:

If people have beautiful homes and wealth, and desire to make their party a recherché affair, are there not professional players, singers, actors, readers, florists, etc.? Something grand could be given for half the expense of an elaborate supper.

I need hardly hint to bright people of a less pretentious class that social singing, dancing, charades, and a hundred beautiful games are all open to them. These are tenfold more enjoyable than the more stately methods of the rich.

The time will soon come when people of really fine culture will not think of giving their guests a late supper; indeed, of the twenty most intellectual and refined homes to which I have been invited in America and Europe not one gave any refreshments at an evening party, with perhaps the exception of wine in France, and lemonade in this country.

If people have no brains, but have good stomachs, then I advise eating on all occasions; in fact, it is the only thing left. Such people may have already eaten three meals, but when they assemble in the evening at a sociable they had better feed again, and feed hearty; what else is there to do? They can't sit and stare at each other by the hour, and it wouldn't be good manners to lie down on the floor and go to sleep. After they finish the more substantial meats and things they can fill up the rest of the evening with nuts, dough-nuts, apples, cider, and other trifling things.

But if people happen to have a love of music, paintings, conversation (the finest of the fine arts), bright games, charades, dramatics, or any other of twenty amusements—if they happen to have a love for any thing above cold pork, then I advise them, when assembled in a social way, to give their brains a chance, and not stuff their stomachs; the former is human, the latter is piggish.

Few changes in our social life have afforded me such genuine satisfaction as the recent changes, among a few of our best people, in the forms and methods of hospitality.

The change from, "Will you have a glass of whisky?" which was addressed to callers fifty years ago, to the question, "Will you have something to eat?" which was addressed to them twenty-five years ago, was, on the whole, a great improvement. The change which has now been inaugurated of addressing your hospitality to something above the stomach is a still greater improvement.

When this has been fairly established housekeepers can entertain company in the evening with real pleasure and profit to all concerned. When an evening sociable means a "big feed," it involves a great sacrifice; there is roasting, baking, and fussing for two or three days, and the expense is such as only a few can well afford. And what is it all for? Why, I can't think of any thing, unless it is to make the company sick. Does any one doubt that eating late in the evening is injurious? And does any one doubt that the preparation and cost of the supper involve a sacrifice to the housekeeper? If these are admitted, I can't imagine any decent apology for the custom.

Digitized by Google

What shall be done? Every important movement must be inaugurated by individual action. Let those who have the idea and the moral courage excuse themselves from all evening refreshments, and the fashion will soon become general.

It is a real pleasure to say that already thousands have determined upon this course, so that now it is quite safe to entertain company without refreshments.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

IDA.—Directions for making a black alpaca suit, and hints of spring styles, are given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. III.

VIOLIN AND BEZIQUE.—Directions and design for a shoe-bag are given in Bazar No. 37, Vol. III.

MRS. H. T. C.—A tapestry design suitable for a foot rest is in Bazar No. 58, Vol. III.

B. W. K.—A crocheted tidy cover for a sofa pillow is given in Bazar No. 14, Vol. III. A postillion basque, duchesse sleeves, and slight train is the model for your house dress. Trim with bias bands of silk.

A READER OF HARPER.—We have no cut paper patterns except those advertised in the Bazar.

MAUD H. R.—Breakfast cap patterns are in Bazar No. 58, Vol. III. An alphabet for linen embroidery is in Bazar Nos. 28 and 42 of Vol. III. The pattern of a gentleman's dressing-gown is in No. 13, Vol. III. For further hints read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV.

ANNA.—A basque and long over-skirt, to be draped over white, or even black dresses, is the best you can do with your blue silk. Trim with ruffles or lace and passementerie. Thin white muslin basques are made without lining, and are close-fitting, but not tight enough to stretch the seams. They are worn with a belt and sash if preferred, but not necessarily, and are more stylish without.

ALETHIA.—Make your pearl-colored silk by the cut paper pattern of the Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV. Use the Vest-Casaque Suit pattern illustrated in No. 48, Vol. III., for your blue poplin. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV., for hints about your black silk polonaise.

LILLIE W.—Your only alternative, as you do not wish to go to any expense, is to put the ruffles near the edge of your skirt, and drape it as an over-skirt above other dresses, or else wear it as a lower skirt, with colored dresses draped above it.

JEANNETTE.—Your difficulty arises from the fact that different people have different significations for turned-down cards. We have often published the custom that prevails here. If the upper left-hand corner of a card is folded over, it signifies that an ordinary call is made; the upper right-hand corner turned down denotes a visit of congratulation; the lower left-hand means a parting call; and the lower right-hand condolence.

T. O.—A pretty tassel fringe, or else guipure lace with passementerie heading, will look well on your gray Japanese silk. You can carry the trimming up as high as you please on the skirt. It is a matter of fancy. Point lace braid comes in pieces twelve yards long, worth $1 50 a piece, or may be bought by the yard.—Bohemian glass tumblers are never used for finger-bowls. You can put them on the dinner-table if you choose. They are generally used for German wines.

LIZZIE B.—If you are married in the evening, wear a white Swiss dress, made with two skirts and a basque, and much trimmed with narrow ruffles. A tulle veil should be three and a half or four yards square. Alpaca and poplin are the other inexpensive wedding dresses. A pearl gray poplin suit for a morning wedding and traveling is customary. Hold your ostrich feathers over the steam of a tea-kettle, and press closely a sharp knife along the quill of the feather to curl it. Any one of our cut paper patterns of suits with close-fitting waists can be sent you by ordering it, with your bust measure, and thus furnish you a good pattern.

SEVERAL SUBSCRIBERS.—Excellent blue-black alpacas are sold for seventy-five cents a yard. Any one of the houses we quote will send you a good article for that price, though they do not all sell the brand you mention. That brand may, however, be obtained, we believe, as low as sixty cents. The other information asked is embodied in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. III.

ELEANOR.—We fear you can not do much to modernize your dress. Suppose you make more ruffles of the over-skirt for the lower, and drape it as an upper skirt over a short black silk skirt. It is a risk, however, to alter it at all just now, as a later style may bring the bee over-skirt into use.

MARIE H.—If you are acquainted with your escort's friends, you should bow to them, of course; but if you are not, you should not bow, no matter if they are the most intimate friends of the gentleman who is with you.—The engravings in Bazar No. 8, Vol. III., will suggest several handsome dresses for evening.

RECENT SUBSCRIBER.—You will find every hint we can give you of spring styles in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. III. A long linen polonaise will be a fashionable garment, and we commend it to you for your suit. A cut paper pattern of this garment is illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. The pattern of the entire suit, polonaise and skirt, is twenty-five cents. You can order it from this office. Duchesse sleeves are coat-sleeves open up the outer seam to the elbow, and trimmed there. Both pleated and gathered ruffles will be worn again. Flat bias bands of linen with a tiny colored fold, or else white under each edge, will trim linen suits. Embroidery and braiding will also be used.

U. R. G.—Plaids will be worn again.—A sofa pillow, if handsomely made, may be placed on the parlor sofa.—Friz your hair slightly, and strap it with ribbon. Put cold cream or camphorated glycerine on your hands at night, and sleep in loose kid or buckskin gloves. A girl of fourteen who wants to quit biting her nails shouldn't ask us to tell her how to stop, but should leave off by her own strength of will. Nothing so effectually ruins a pretty hand as the stubby finger ends produced by biting the nails.—Jet jewelry is much worn.—"Milly Darrell" is concluded. Mrs. Mulock Craik resides in England.—Ladies who have several rings wear some of them on the left forefinger, whether they are engaged or not.

MRS. S. W.—Your sample is a sort of Japanese poplin—of silk and waxed cotton—that will be worth very little to you.

MADGE Q. S.—There is another establishment of the kind you want near the one you mention.—We know nothing of the letter about Orné knitting-balls.

MRS. N. H. D. W.—We do not give addresses in this column, but in answer to many inquiries we published the address of a house, where point lace materials can be found, in Bazar No. 45, Vol. III.

M. F. W.—Any carpet store will furnish you oil-cloth of a marbled pattern.—Your gray sample is the stuff we have so often advised our readers not to buy. Of the sample you send us the silk woof is not an inch deep; after that glazed cotton threads form the woof. Don't spend much time or money on the dress, as it will not wear. Make your striped nansook by directions given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV.—A married lady should always register and introduce herself as "Mrs.," but it is a matter of fancy whether or not she uses her given name or her husband's. In most cases a gentleman should speak of himself as Mr. So-and-so, but should never write the prefix to his own name.

TEXAS.—The wrapper pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., modified in the way described in New York Fashions of the same paper, is the best plan for your white muslin morning dresses. We did not receive the lace sample.

CRETE.—You will find inexpensive fancy costumes described in Bazar No. 8, Vol. III. Uhlans, Zouaves, Vivandières, and Brigands are the rage this winter.

E. RANDOLPH W.—The Worth Basque House Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is a beautiful postillion basque. The cut paper pattern of the entire dress costs but twenty-five cents, and can be ordered from this office. Send your bust measure.—Any English history will give you a more minute description of the costumes of Queen Bess than our space will permit.—We do not think the French novels you mention—the "Wandering Jew" and "Mysteries of Paris"—very suitable reading for a young lady.

ETTA H.—The French scourers will clean your laces by dry pressure, but will not tell the process.—It is not necessary to add a postscript.

MEXICAN LADY.—If your stones are real topaz, they are quite valuable and fashionable.—We think all powder injurious to the skin, as it stops up the pores.—The vest-casaque is worn by short and stout ladies, and found becoming.—We do not furnish samples of the goods described in our columns.

HATTIE A.—Read reply above to "Recent Subscriber."—The over-skirt with the Worth Basque House Dress is predicted as a popular style for the spring.—Consult a dictionary of poetical quotations. We have not space for all the information you desire.

HARRIETTE S.—Your sample is real empress cloth of very light quality. The color is excellent, and needs a darker brown silk for trimming. Use either the Vest-Casaque or the Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Basques and over-skirts are worn together as you see them in our illustrations. House dresses sometimes have merely a basque and single skirt. The shape of over-skirts is still doubtful—that with the Worth Basque House Dress, shown in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is a stylish model at present.

CARRIE E.—A dove gray silk of the shade of your sample should have ruffles of the same, with passementerie (gimp) and fringe for trimming. A gipsy bonnet of the same silk with facings of pale blue, or rose-colored silk and a gray feather, would be handsome.

HARRY H.—Your sisters will find directions for mourning attire in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV.—Gentlemen wear lustreless black cloths and diagonals; black silk neck-ties and scarfs; jet, onyx, or rubber studs and sleeve-buttons. Your hatter will decide the appropriate width of the band of elastic cloth to be placed on your hat. Ladies wear black-bordered handkerchiefs, while gentlemen use those with a broad hem only. Paper and envelopes with black edge, initial, or monogram are used. The stationer will guide you in this. While deep mourning dress looks unsuitable at gay dancing-parties, it need not debar the wearer from seeing a good play, or enjoying any musical entertainment.

SNUFF-BOX.—Passementerie, or else braiding and fringe, or guipure lace, will be suitable garniture for your black cashmere costume, to be worn in second mourning.

HELEN M'G.—We regret that we can not tell you how and where to dispose of your fancy-work.

ETHELYN.—Get a light poplin, if you want a dressy suit—a black alpaca, if you desire a serviceable one. Read New York Fashions and correspondence of Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV., and of the present Number, for further hints. The polonaise and single skirt is the best design for buff linen suits, as the over dress may then be worn with other skirts, especially black ones. Irish linen or bishop's lawn will be the best materials for white suits. Your idea of the spring gipsy is very good. Wear your hair slightly waved, or else roll it back and put on chatelaine braids. Long, thick hair should be plaited in two braids of three tresses each, and looped up to the front of the head in the chatelaine style so often illustrated in our columns.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—The Polonaise-Casaque Suit pattern, of which a picture is given in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., is the best guide for a suit like your sample. Bias ruffles of the same for trimming. A pink Chambery should have two skirts, and a basque made nearly fitting; for trimming, scalloped ruffles bound with white. The white organdy for your little girl should have a straight cluster of tucks on each skirt, a ruffle, and a basque edged with a ruffle.

SADIE B.—Madame De Staël's works are published in English. You can order them through the stationer of the town nearest you.

IGNORAMUS.—Use chloroform to take out kerosene oil spots.

KATIE.—Valérie is pronounced as if spelled Val-a re. Leather bag or sachel is the name you want. Lace points will be more worn than circulars. Make your blue silk by the Vest-Casaque pattern shown in Bazar No. 48, Vol. III. Trim with silk ruffles and fringe. The Worth Basque House Dress in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is a stylish design for a white alpaca. Bind the ruffles with white silk, and use fringe instead of lace. Get black grenadine with inch-wide stripe for a thin black dress. Read New York Fashions of present Number for hints about making.

NELLIE.—Trim your Japanese poplin with two or three bias ruffles on the lower skirt bound with black silk—a single ruffle is on the basque and upper skirt. The Worth Basque Suit in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is a good guide.

E. P. R.—Use bias ruffles on the striped silk, and black velvet ribbon with guipure edging each side of the velvet on the checked silk. We do not like your idea of grenadine flounces on the checked goods.

MAY D. W.—For water-proof cloak see illustration on the first page. A plain skirt and polonaise, trimmed with bias bands of the goods notched at each edge and stitched on, is the best design for a water-proof suit. For velveteen, make a paletot, upper skirt, and lower, trimmed with simple cord covered with silk. Fifteen or sixteen yards are enough probably.

R. R.—Your questions are answered in New York Fashions of Bazar Nos. 9 and 10 of Vol. IV.

JUTE SWITCHES.—Part your hair down the centre behind, and braid over topsies in two braids of three tresses each. Then loop up in the chatelaine fashion. If you have very short hair, buy a chatelaine of real hair. It will cost you from $15 to $20. Don't use jute switches. It is not stylish to wear the hair in plain ringlets. Braid part of it for a chatelaine, and wear the curls down the centre between the braids.

EVA OF CHICAGO.—We are not familiar with the sample of material you send. Alpaca, poplin, and cashmere are the only black goods for suits we can suggest to you after silk. A black grenadine suit will be exceedingly useful to you, stylish, and appropriate. A frock-coat with pearl-colored pantaloons has become a stylish suit for bridegrooms at day weddings, even though the bride is in full dress.

MARY LOUISA.—Your inquiries about wash dresses have been answered recently to other correspondents.

DESPERANDA.—Of your old grisaille silk get enough to make you a postillion basque and long upper skirt without trimming. Then drape the gray skirt over your black silk skirt. This is now more stylish than to wear the gray dress underneath black, and the postillion basque will be worn in the spring on the street without other wraps.—If you send $3 on the 1st of April you can have the Bazar the remainder of the year.

EDNA.—The Worth Basque, illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is what you want for black cloth. Basques do not need sashes. Put two buttons—moulds covered with corded silk—on the back. The New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., will tell you how to fold over the fullness in the back of the gored wrapper pattern when cutting a calico wrapper.

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

DRUNKENNESS permanently cured. For evidence, send stamp to Dr. C. C. BEERS, 12 East 12th St., N. Y.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

A BEAUTIFUL CATALOGUE

OF

The Knox Fruit Farm

AND

Nurseries,

With Price-List for Spring of 1871, being a very valuable treatise on Small Fruit Culture, will be sent to all applicants inclosing 10 cents.

CATALOGUE (No. 2) of FLOWERS sent for 5 cents.

R. CUMMING & CO.,

Successors to J. KNOX,

PITTSBURGH, PA.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.

R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to

EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

"TRY IT AND SEE!"—THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL sent six months "on trial" for $1 00; or, with either of HARPER'S a year, $5 00. (Price $3 a year.) Specimens FREE.

S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

THE CHEAPEST AND MOST BEAUTIFUL ARTICLE yet offered the public for marking linen or paper with elegant initials or full name. Send for circular to COOKE, SMITH, & CO.,
542 & 544 Broadway, N. Y.

TO ALL FAT PEOPLE.—I know a simple and harmless remedy that will reduce you at the rate of 20 pounds per month. Write by express, with postage stamp, to Mrs. WILLIE ST. CROIX, San Francisco, Cal.

HORRIBLE!—I suffered with CATARRH thirty years, and was cured in six weeks by a simple remedy. The receipt will be sent, postage free, to all afflicted. Address
REV. T. J. MEAD, Drawer 176, Syracuse, New York.

BALL, BLACK, & CO.,

565 & 567 Broadway, N. Y.,

INVITE ATTENTION TO THEIR LARGE STOCK

OF

Waltham Watches,

and the Low Prices at which they are selling them.

These Watches greatly excel any others made in this country in Finish, Variety, and in fine Time-keeping Qualities, and are far cheaper than any other American Watch, quality and price fully considered.

GOODS SENT BY EXPRESS C. O. D.

SOMETHING NEW

FROM WALTHAM.

A Boy's Watch

That will Suit Every One.

This Watch, which is of a smaller size than the other Waltham Watches, has just been introduced, and, although called the Boy's Watch on account of its size, is destined to have a wide and universal sale.

It is finely finished, of substantial construction, and contains all the recent improvements. Its low price and neat appearance will commend it to a large class of persons who have been deterred from purchasing Waltham Watches heretofore on account of their large size.

Our Illustrated Price-List describes this and all other Waltham Watches in detail, gives weight and quality of the cases, with prices of each, and explains our plan of sending watches to all parts of the country, without risk to the purchaser.

Send for the Price-List, and state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO.,

865 BROADWAY, N. Y.

Since February 1st we have made considerable reductions in the price of all these Watches. All orders received after this date will be filled at the reduced prices

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y.,
OR CHICAGO, ILL.

SEEDS FOR 1871.

Our Illustrated Catalogue of FLOWER and VEGETABLE SEEDS will be mailed to any address on receipt of stamp.

Address J. T. SMITH & SONS,
Brentwood, N. H.

GENUINE NORWAY OATS, CHESTER COUNTY MAMMOTH CORN, and ALSIKE CLOVER. Sample packages sent free to all Farmers; also a copy of the AMERICAN STOCK JOURNAL, by inclosing stamp to N. P. BOYER & CO., Parkesburg, Chester Co., Pa.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced. Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,

have just published:

OUR GIRLS.

By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D.

12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

A very interesting book by one of our most popular authors, full of useful suggestions and valuable information on hygiene, callisthenics, and physical education.

The book not only deserves to be read, however; it will be read because it is full of interest, concerning itself, as it does, with such matters as girls' boots and shoes; how girls should walk; low neck and short sleeves; outrages upon the body; stockings supporters; why are women so small? idleness among girls; sunshine and health; a word about baths; what you should eat; how to manage a cold; fat and thin girls, etc., etc.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Dr. Lewis is well known as an acute observer, a man of great practical sagacity in sanitary reform, and a lively and brilliant writer upon medical subjects.—N. Y. Observer.

Dr. Dio Lewis has inaugurated a new era in American education.—N. Y. Independent.

There is revolution in his clear-headed enthusiasm.—N. Y. Tribune.

If Americans would listen to George Combe and our countryman Dio Lewis, they would become a wiser, better, and happier people.—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

Digitized by Google

MOURNING DEPARTMENT.

SPRING STOCK now open, comprising all the most desirable goods for FULL or SECOND MOURNING.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

FAMILY AND HOTEL FURNISHING DEPARTMENT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.
have now opened their Spring Stock of
4-4 Shirting Linens, Bed and Pillow-Case Linens.
Damask Table-Cloths and Napkins (en suite).
Damasks and Towellings by the yard.
Plain Huck and Fancy Damask Towels, in great variety.
Silk and Linen Lunch Cloths and Napkins.
White Goods, in all the Popular Makes.
Summer and Opera Flannels, Quilts, &c.

The balance of our BLANKET STOCK will be closed out at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

N. B.—Sheets and Pillow-Cases made to order.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

FRENCH AND ENGLISH PRINTS,
PERCALES,
SEERSUCKERS AND PIQUES,
POPLINS and SERGES, in PLAIDS and PLAIN COLORS, for SPRING SUITS, with
FRINGES and SATIN STRIPES, for the trimmings, to match.
Just received, and now open.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth Street.

THE FLORENCE
SEWING MACHINE CO.

Have removed their NEW YORK office to 39 UNION SQ., BROADWAY.

Agencies wanted where not already established.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.
FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

DOOLEY'S
THE YEAST POWDER BEST
TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a small portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF SUITS IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

LEA & PERRINS'
WORCESTERSHIRE
SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY GOOD Sauce, and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

VICK'S
Floral Guide
for 1871

THE FIRST EDITION OF ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY THOUSAND copies of Vick's Illustrated Catalogue of Seeds and Floral Guide is published and ready to send out—100 pages, and an Engraving of almost every desirable Flower and Vegetable. It is elegantly printed on fine tinted paper, illustrated with Three Hundred fine Wood Engravings and Two beautiful

COLORED PLATES.

The most beautiful and the most instructive Floral Guide published. A German Edition published, in all other respects similar to the English.

Sent free to all my customers of 1870, as rapidly as possible, without application. Sent to all others who order them for Ten Cents, which is not half the cost. Address

JAMES VICK, ROCHESTER, N. Y.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!
For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, Mo.
AGENTS WANTED.

GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to

AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.
THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!
Agents wanted in every Town.
Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

FRESH GARDEN AND FLOWER, FRUIT, HERB, TREE AND SHRUB, AND EVERGREEN SEEDS, postpaid by Mail. 25 different packets of either class for $1 00. The six classes, $5 00. Catalogues gratis. Agents wanted. Seeds on commission. B. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

For 50c FIFTY-TWO German Bristol Cards, with your name neatly printed and sent by mail prepaid. Address SMITH & MILLS, Argus Office, ATLANTA, Illinois.

Valuable New Books,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE ACTS. Notes, Explanatory and Practical, on the Acts of the Apostles. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," "Notes on the Psalms," &c. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 90 cents.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Ready.)

AN INDEX to HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE, Alphabetical, Analytical, Topical. Volumes I. to XL.: from June, 1850, to May, 1870. 8vo, Cloth, $3 00.

ABBOTT'S LOUIS XIV. History of Louis XIV. By JOHN S. C. ABBOTT, Author of "The History of Napoleon Bonaparte," "The French Revolution," &c. With Illustrations. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20. (Uniform with Abbott's Illustrated Histories.)

PUSS-CAT MEW, and other New Fairy Stories for my Children. By E. H. KNATCHBULL-HUGESSEN, M.P. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 25.

DU CHAILLU'S APINGI KINGDOM. My Apingi Kingdom: with Life in the Great Sahara, and Sketches of the Chase of the Ostrich, Hyena, &c. By PAUL DU CHAILLU. With numerous Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

DU CHAILLU'S BOOKS OF ADVENTURE FOR BOYS: THE GORILLA COUNTRY.—WILD LIFE.—LOST IN THE JUNGLE.—MY APINGI KINGDOM. 4 vols., uniformly bound, in box, $7 00.

Fresh Novels,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

EARL'S DENE. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAISY NICHOL. By Lady HARDY. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE WARDEN and BARCHESTER TOWERS. In One Volume. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "Phineas Finn," "He Knew He was Right," &c., &c. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

FROM THISTLES—GRAPES? By Mrs. EILOART, Author of "The Curate's Discipline," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

No more delightful travels are printed in the English language than appear perpetually in Harper's Magazine. They are read with equal interest and satisfaction by boys of every grade from eighteen to eighty. Its scientific papers, while sufficiently profound to demand the attention of the learned, are yet admirably adapted to the popular understanding, and designed as much to diffuse correct information concerning current scientific discovery as it could be if it was the organ of the "Society for the Diffusion of Useful Knowledge." The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There are few intelligent American families in which Harper's Magazine would not be an appreciated and highly welcome guest. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

The most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.
JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

FREE Try samples of our great $1 Weekly. The GAZETTE, Hallowell, Maine.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

WHY is a lady's ringlet like one of Dickens's novels?—Because it is all of a twist.

COLD COMFORT—Eating ice.

The bee gives us honey, and we give the wasp whacks when we catch him.

QUICK RUNNING—Running up a score.

How do we know a rat is too clever an animal?—Because he gnaws a deal too much.

THE LAND OF CANE—A sugar plantation.

A SUCCESSFUL "UNDERTAKER"—Bismarck.

TO THE CARELESS.—Be cautious how you let fall a remark. It may hurt somebody seriously.

Never crack jokes on delicate ground.

LABOR IN VAIN—A far-fetched idea.

A "JOLLY" COMBUSTIBLE—Laughing-gas.

MOVING SCENES OF THE WAR—Its panorama.

A SOFT BLOW—A gentle breeze.

INVISIBLE TRAVELERS—Passing thoughts.

THE HEIGHT OF ADVERSITY—Pledging your word.

A NUMEROUS CLASS.—How would you speak of a man who was an excessive bore? Would you not call him a hyperborean?

A SAD CALAMITY.—The young gentleman who has had a constant "flow of ideas," which he found it impossible to put together, confesses that the intense cold has frozen up his brain, and stopped, for the present, the "current of thought."

A SAD DISCOVERY.

It is a grave accusation to bring against a great writer and a famous poet, but we fear Wordsworth must be charged with favoring the horrible practice of cannibalism; for does he not say that a woman (a woman, mark ye!) is

"A creature not too bright or good
For human nature's daily food?"

ENGAGING FRANKNESS.

APPLICANT. "Quite right, mum; all seems satisfactory; and if you will give me the address of your last servant, I will make the necessary inquiries, as I'm particular about the families I lives in!"

A WONDERFUL PIECE OF MECHANISM.—The watch on the Rhine.

A LITERAL INTERPRETATION.

NURSE (in anticipation of Master George's punishment). "You'll catch it. I wouldn't be in your shoes!"
GEORGE. "Then the sooner I take them off the better!"

A TENDER DELUSION—Marrying for love.

DOCTOR'S STUFF.

FARMER. "What do you think is the matter wi' 'er, Mr. Quackington?"
YOUNG FARRIER (fresh from the Horse "College"). "Well—ahem—a—I think that probably the cartilaginous processes have subtended the ossification of bone, and thereby forced the coronal arch to the magnetic meridian; consequently, as things which are equal to the same thing are equal to the square of the hypothenuse, it follows that the lateral thrust becomes so powerful as to damnify the ellipticity of the projection, producing such a concatenation of the fluid portions of the periosteum, and lesion of the less coagulated pigments of the cognate therapeutics, as elevate the chalybeate constituents of the anterior extremity of the tibia, which must, of course, guide the treatment to be pursued."
FARMER. "Lor!"

FACE-ETIOUS!

RICH MAIDEN LADY. "Well, May, why are you Looking so Hard at Me?"
MAY. "I'm Looking for your other Face."
LADY. "What other Face, Child?"
MAY. "Why, Ma is always saying you have Two Faces!" [Consternation of Mamma.

REMOVAL OF POLITICAL DISABILITIES

THE HISTORY OF A HERO.

Sir Guy lived in the Middle Ages, which was his misfortune, and not his fault. He was fond of killing every body who disagreed with him, which was his fault, and not his misfortune.

Sir Guy loved, and was beloved in return. The fact of loving was pleasant, and the fact of being beloved in return was almost overpowering; nevertheless, he bore up against it like a hero, as he was. The lady of his love was beautiful, accomplished, and amiable, but she could neither read nor write. Very few ladies could read or write in the Middle Ages.

Sir Guy sickened at bachelor life. The buttons were continually coming off his cuirass, and it cost him a pang whenever he gave four shillings and ninepence for a new hauberk. He longed for change.

We have already stated that the Lady Alicia was beautiful. Her features may not have corresponded with our modern ideas of womanly loveliness; but she was admired in the Middle Ages; and we must respect the taste of our ancestors, because we owe them every thing.

At the age of thirty Sir Guy was an approved warrior. He had lost several arms and legs in battle, and had also contracted an incurable squint, through the perpetual expectation of receiving the point of an enemy's arrow in the tip of his nose. This was only one of the many anxieties which attended the feudal wars of that period.

Sir Guy wedded the Lady Alicia, not without having put the castle of her venerable father to fire and sword in order to gain his consent to their union.

Were they happy? Let us hope so. There was no Divorce Court in the Middle Ages. That was an invention of modern times.

Oliver Wendell Holmes calls a kiss a lisping consonant. He should have added, also, that it usually follows a-vowel.

Flowers are very warlike in their disposition, and are ever armed with pistils.

Persons who like stale bread should send to Pompeii for it. They have loaves there which were baked eighteen hundred years ago.

REALITIES OF LIFE—Real estate, real money, and a real good dinner; none of which can be realized without real hard work.

A wealthy bachelor married, off hand, a beautiful young lady whom he caught inspecting cook-stoves at the fair. Since then you can't get within forty rods of the stove department for the crowd of pretty girls.

The chap who took the thread of life to sew the rent of a house has gone and invented a patent point for cross-eyed needles.

Why is love always represented as a child?—Because he never reaches the age of discretion.

Judge Portly says the liveliest time he ever experienced was on issuing the first number of a newspaper in a Western town. The people wanted something stirring. He published the personal history of the leading politicians as furnished by their friends. The judge says that for the first hour they all rushed for the paper: the second hour they went for him.

FREAKS OF NATURE.

WAITER. "Now, then, look sharp! Here's that mutton-chop a biling with rage at bein' kep' waitin', and a beef-steak gone away in a towering passion!"

"NEGOTIATIONS OPENED."

MAMMA. "Look here, George. Here's a nice pudding. Will you be a good boy now, and come and have some?"
GEORGE (who has been put in the corner for misbehavior). "What sort o' puddin' is it, ma?"

EXHAUSTED PATIENCE.

AFFECTIONATE BROTHER. "Well, Mamma, whatever you do with Him, don't throw Him in the Ash-barrel!"

COLONEL MARS. "I'm sorry, Miss Frisk, but the truth is, I shall be obliged to stop, as my Leg is coming off."
The gallant Colonel's war experience forced him to invest in a cork leg; hence the accident.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 12.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Hair Dressing for Young Ladies, Figs. 1–6.

Figs. 1–3.—COIFFURE OF LONG HAIR. To arrange this coiffure part the hair in the middle from the forehead to the neck, and also part the hair from ear to ear. On each side of the middle parting divide the front hair into two parts. Crimp the two portions of the front next the middle parting by putting it up on crimping pins, then arrange it, as shown by the illustration, so that it falls over the forehead. Comb the remainder of the front hair up over the crimped hair, twist the strands together for a length of about an inch, and fasten them with hair-pins for the present, leaving the ends hang loose. Now comb down the right half of the back hair, and arrange it in a three-strand braid together with the ends of the front hair of the right side (see Fig. 3). Comb the left half of the back hair upward, as shown by Fig. 3; tie it with a string, and arrange it in a three-strand braid together with the ends of the front hair of the left side. In arranging this braid, it is to be remembered that it is afterward laid around the head as a bandeau. Now remove the string with which the hair of the left side was tied, and fasten the end of the right braid under the beginning of the left braid, so that the right braid lies in the neck, as shown by Fig. 2. Bring the left braid over the front of the head as shown by Fig. 1, and fasten the end under the beginning of the right braid. Secure the braids in this position with hair-pins. Finish the coiffure with a bow of colored ribbon, as shown by the illustration.

Figs. 4 and 5.—COIFFURE OF SHORT HAIR. To arrange this coiffure, part the hair, as for Fig. 6, from ear to ear, and part the front hair in the middle; arrange it so as to fall over the front of the forehead, and comb it back at the sides. Comb the ends of the front hair down together with the back hair. Cover the parting between the front and back hair with a tortoise-shell band.

Fig. 6.—COIFFURE WITH CRIMPED CHIGNON OF HAIR OF A MEDIUM LENGTH. To arrange this coiffure, divide the hair, first, from ear to ear, and then part the front hair in the middle. Put up the hair on crimping pins, and leave it so for eight or ten hours; or, if there is not time for this, friz it. Now take down the hair (Fig. 5 shows the manner of putting up the hair on pins, and also several crimped strands), comb out the back hair, and tie it tightly together with a string four inches above the ends. Bring the ends on the inside, lay the strings closely about the head, and tie them on the top of the head between the front and back hair; the ends of the hair must come inside of the chignon thus formed. Comb the front hair back, as shown by the illustration, and roll the ends under so as to conceal them. When the hair is thin, both the chignon and the front of the hair may be arranged over rolls. Finally, fasten a tortoise-shell band on the front of the head in such a manner that the front hair falls on the forehead in small puffs, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 4.—MANNER OF ARRANGING SHORT HAIR.—[See Fig.

Fig. 1.—MANNER OF ARRANGING LONG HAIR. FRONT.—[See Figs. 2 and 3.]

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF ARRANGING LONG HAIR. [See Figs. 1 and 3.]

Fig. 5.—MANNER OF CRIMPING HAIR FOR FIGS. 4 AND 6.

Fig. 6.—CRIMPED CHIGNON OF HAIR OF MEDIUM LENGTH.

Fig. 3.—MANNER OF BRAIDING HAIR FOR FIGS. 5 AND 2.

HAIR DRESSING FOR YOUNG LADIES.

Digitized by Google

THE CONFESSION.

THROUGH birchen woods the sun let down
A crowd of golden rays;
On Nature's face there was no frown
That fairest of fair days;
When my love she said, bending her head,
While a blush her cheek did cover,
"Through dark days and fair, through hope and despair,
I shall love you well, oh, my lover!"

The lark sang from his cloud above,
Rapt in an ecstasy;
The bird on the bough twittered of love,
And the winds did seem to sigh.
"Oh, my love," I said, o'er her bended head,
While the blush her cheek did cover,
"In weal or in woe, only love, we know,
Can love's counterpart discover!"

Well, love, like the wind, it comes and goes,
And who shall dare complain
If the lover's heart, like a summer's rose,
Blossom never again?
The lark that sang his clouds among
In no wise did surpass
The heavenly note that died in my throat
To the murmur of "Alas!"

Is it not enough that the open rose
Takes the sun to its heart,
Though every angry gale that blows
Tear its frail leaves apart?
Is it not enough, is it not enough
(Oh, heart, thy sighing smother!),
That I'd rather be wronged, love, by thee
Than righted by another?

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MARCH 25, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Bridal Dresses and Coiffures; Suits for Elderly Ladies; Evening Dresses for Young Ladies; Paletots; Basque-Waists; Shawl Suits; Watteau and Gored Wrappers; Water-proof and Traveling Hoods; Breakfast and Dress Caps; Wall Tidies; Point Lace Collars, etc., etc.

☞ With our next Number will be published a Cut Paper Pattern of the new and elegant Apron-Polonaise Walking Suit. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 191 of this Number.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Pinchbeck.

MY DEAR HELEN,—When I was a very small boy I was one day looking over the treasures in a bureau drawer where my grandmother kept her jewels, and as I saw a little box I exclaimed with delight—for it was, as I thought, the most precious of golden caskets. "Oh, dear grandma!" I said; "I am sure that grandpa must have brought your wedding ring in that beautiful box; and what a good, generous man!" Then I rattled on, describing a hundred other fit uses to which I thought so splendid a box might be devoted. I remember the soft June sunshine of that morning long ago. I can see still the grave matron in a costume that would now seem to us quaint and queer, and the eager boy, with the fair hair, of which you can see no relics upon my venerable pate, Helen; nor any of that bloom of youth which is still visible upon the old-fashioned portrait of a boy that hangs in my chamber. And I remember also that while my grandmother gravely smiled I gayly dreamed. For I fancied the day—"hasten, happy day"—when some queen would come, bewildering, out of Sheba, and smile upon a certain Solomon whose face resembled mine; and the costly gifts that he would offer her in a box as golden, kissing it as he knelt, while her gracious fingers perfumed the casket as she received it. A thousand swift and bright fancies darted through my mind as I gazed at the golden box, associating it with my grandmother's love and youth; and so bright they were that my mind musically murmured, like a spring grove bubbling with happy song.

My good grandmother still smiled gravely, and when my evident enthusiasm was somewhat spent, she said, with a gentle kiss—how pure and tender are those grandmother's kisses, Helen; how gently they chasten and correct, long after the lips are cold!—

"My dear boy, it was your grandfather's pinchbeck snuff-box."

Away went my basket of eggs! It was Alnaschar, was it not, who suffered before me? What an odious sound the word had! How small and mean and contemptible it was! How pinched! Pinchbeck, indeed! and I had been inspired by an abominable alloy! I did not know at the time that it was alloy; but I remember my disgust, and that was a kind of spiritual perception of it. And afterward, in reading English stories, I encountered occasionally a stone in a pinchbeck setting, or a neat little pinchbeck box; but wherever I saw the name I had a feeling of repulsion, as when walking in the woods I saw a snake suddenly. And I have never lost the feeling. If I meet a man or a woman, or see a religion or behavior, set in pinchbeck, I am conscious of the old repulsion and the sad disillusion of that summer morning.

As we proceed upon our journey, does it ever occur to you, my dear Helen, how very much our fellow-travelers are decorated with pinchbeck ornaments? Or have you ever mistaken a mirror for a window, and suddenly seen a little of the pinchbeck splendor upon yourself? The other evening I was at the pleasant musical party at the Flutes'. The company, I was told, was very select. Indeed, as Miss Bugle said to me, there were only the very best people invited. And she was good enough to point out several of them. The Bassoons and Flageolets were there, and the tall Miss Trombone, who, as the Germans would say, seems to draw herself out endlessly. Alderman Drum and old Mrs. Serpent were also there; Mr. Gong, the eloquent advocate, and the pretty little Misses Castanet. I was delighted to find myself in those high latitudes, and readily forgave the chilliness of the air in consideration of the extreme purity of the atmosphere. But while Miss Bugle was busily naming the guests to me she said, vehemently,

"Who would believe, Mr. Bachelor, that Mrs. Double Bass would wear false jewelry! Look at the woman! Glass in pinchbeck settings!"

"Doubly Base would be a more faithful name," said I to the amiable Miss Bugle; and I turned my eyes with horror upon the monster of iniquity toward whom her remark had directed them. But she seemed unconscious of her sin. She was laughing and chattering, and quivering like blanc-mange; and sure enough she was blazing in undeniable glass and gilt wash.

"I wonder," said I to Miss Bugle, with a tone of suppressed horror, and imitating hers as nearly as I could: "Good Heavens! I wonder if her gown is calico!"

"Every thing is possible under such circumstances," responded my friend. "And in such a select circle, too!"

I could not help laughing inwardly at her great disturbance for so trifling a reason, and I ventured to remark that there was always balm in Gilead; that under every severe dispensation of Providence there was a secret consolation, and that every cloud had a silver lining, if we could only see it. And I said to her, "For example, even in this dire extremity into which we have fallen, dear Miss Bugle, I turn for relief from contemplating Mrs. Double Bass's paste diamonds to feast my eyes upon your flowing and superb chevelure! Is there no comfort in knowing that if her gems are glass, your hair is real; that if she deceives in one little brooch or bracelet, you are severely truthful in every hair of your head? I gaze with respectful admiration, dear madame, upon the commanding and ample decorations of your head, because I know that they put to shame the shining lie upon Mrs. Double Bass's bosom." And I bowed to my fair companion as if we had been Sir Charles Grandison and Miss Harriet Byron.

But, my dear Helen, Miss Bugle changed color so violently, and looked at me so peculiarly, and stammered so half indignantly, that I could only bow the more politely, until I distinguished the question, "Do you mean to insult me, Mr. Bachelor?"

I looked at her in amazement. "Insult you, dear madame?"

But she scarce staid for my reply, and said, with asperity, "You know that it isn't my own hair!"

"Good gracious, Miss Bugle, not your hair! whose is it?"

"You know that we all wear false hair."

"Very well, dear madame; and don't you know that Mrs. Double Bass wears false jewelry? Yet you professed the utmost contempt for it. Where do you draw the line? If she wears pinchbeck, so do you; and her offense is less in the degree that a brooch is smaller than a wig. No, no, Miss Bugle; let me, as an old gentleman, advise you to reserve your expressions and your feelings of scorn until you have ceased to be a proper subject of it yourself. Pinchbeck, madame—I say unto you, thou art the woman! Mrs. Double Bass wears a simple little lie upon her bosom, you display an elaborate and towering falsehood upon your head. A pinchbeck brooch is certainly no more laughable than a pinchbeck wig."

Naturally, my dear Helen, Miss Bugle walked proudly away, wrathfully shaking somebody else's hair at me. But I went after her, and laughed heartily, and begged her pardon, and reminded her that old gentlemen would have their whimseys; and added that one of mine was to think false hair as contemptible as false diamonds. Curiously enough, my remarks did not seem to comfort nor to pacify her, and she moved off without making any reply.

But it is still my opinion; and I wish that pinchbeck were confined to brooches and wigs. But I observe that it infects manners and morals as well as dress, and there it is even worse. The further pinchbeck goes, the baser it becomes. I suppose that when I say pinchbeck manners, we both think of the same person; we picture to ourselves the sweet little Mrs. Janus, as every body calls her, who has such smiles, and such archness, and such softness! Your cousin Ruth went to see her the other morning, to beg her interest in a family of whose cruel destitution she knew; and Ruth told her the piteous tale. Little Mrs. Janus was immediately all sympathy. She had never heard any thing so horrible. It was too pitiful, too tragical. What could she do? Any thing that was practicable she was anxious to begin. She hoped that Ruth would not mind calling upon her for any thing. Dear, dear! it was too much, too sad! And the dear little children, too! Tut, tut! there was never such a tragedy! For about five minutes little Mrs. Janus gushed in this profuse way, so that Ruth felt that she ought to remind her that there were other sufferers in the world, and she must not be too lavish in her succor to this poor family. And thereupon little Mrs. Janus overflowed in the same manner upon a dozen other instances which she mentioned to Ruth. Each was the most heart-rending that was ever heard of; and she showered poor Ruth with magnificent superlatives, until she suddenly observed a locket which Ruth always wears around her neck; and then, with fresh ardor, a new storm of adjectives and admiration set in, and Ruth could do nothing but submit to the pitiless pelting.

When there was a kind of lull she instantly tried to bring little Mrs. Janus to terms, but in vain. That lady was sure that the poor sufferers ought to have soup, and wine whey, and oatmeal, and beef-tea, and warm woolen clothes. Indeed, she rapidly mentioned a very long list of indispensable supplies, and she hoped and prayed they would get them; and Ruth was an angel—yes, indeed, an archangel—for going about on such errands of mercy, and among such cruelly hard-hearted people, too! And how glad she should have been for herself if she hadn't used her last supplies of many kinds last week, and if, in fact, she were only able to do something, instead of wishing and longing to; but Ruth had the eloquence of a saint, and she would work miracles; she would even touch Mrs. Midas's heart and open her purse; she knew she would; and she thanked Heaven there were yet left some such devoted and unselfish Christian women. And where did you say you got that locket, dear? It is too lovely!

This was pinchbeck sympathy, pinchbeck feeling. Little Mrs. Janus, who seems to be a sprightly, affectionate woman, is no more what she seems to be, and is taken to be, than Mrs. Double Bass's glass is a diamond. And when I think how I used to see Janus as a lover, watching her before he had found her out—before, indeed, any of us had discovered her—and with what passionate fondness he hung upon every sign of generous, womanly feeling, believing all the gush and the gurgle to be genuine sympathy and tenderness, I smile; for I seem to see myself as a boy dreaming beautiful dreams over the gold casket in my grandmother's drawer. And as I see Mrs. Janus to-day I recall the grave smile of my grandmother, and her quiet words, "My dear boy, it was your grandfather's pinchbeck snuff-box."

Dear Helen, I see a great deal of ardor for art of a certain kind. But it is all pinchbeck—it is not gold, it is zinc and copper. Orson has grown rich, and he has heard that rich men ought to have fine pictures. Let him buy them, then; but why pretend that he cares for art? His fondness for art is sheer alloy; but he would be horribly ashamed if he wore a gilt watch-chain instead of gold. Why not be as much ashamed of a pretended feeling as of a false watch-guard?

Yes, and we may go higher, and step into church; and at Saint Rainbow's I am sometimes confounded lest the piety be as pinchbeck as the Gothic architecture. There is plenty of marble, which is not marble, upon the walls; and there are fine carvings in oak and walnut, which are not oak and walnut; and there is the most pathetic and pleasing music from the choir, which is giggling in the gallery; and there is Mrs. Janus in her pew, weeping at the lovely sermon, and envious of Mrs. Jupiter's shawl, her mind lost in a kind of sentimental fog, which she calls devotion and religion. There are counterfeiters in the temple still, dear Helen.

But the worst of all deceits is to deceive ourselves. Suppose Mrs. Double Bass had really believed her paste to be a diamond, or Miss Bugle her wig to be her own hair! Suppose that Mrs. Janus thought that she was really charitable and really religious! Suppose that the zinc and copper didn't believe itself to be alloy, and that pinchbeck was sure that it was gold! If we repudiate pinchbeck boxes, why should we not disdain pinchbeck morals and manners?

Your friend, AN OLD BACHELOR.

LOVE-LETTERS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

WELL, perhaps they are not technically love-letters, but what should you name such a missive as this?

"MY DEAR SIR [OR MADAM],—Excuse me for again calling your attention to my pet scheme for book-making, and for asking for it your generous consideration; for, not having heard from you, I conclude the circulars previously sent, by some mischance, did not reach you. In reference to the single poem, I have to say, if you can not decide upon a favorite, but find that your preference is divided between several of your productions, I shall be most happy to give you space for as many as you may be disposed to favor me with. As I preface each contribution with something biographical, you will do me much honor by a short sketch of your busy life, with notes of your published and contemplated works, and, if not asking so much that you will be disgusted, your ideas of what is poetry—your original conception of what it is in reality, its office, or mission—would please me wonderfully. Hoping to hear from you very soon, I am truly yours, etc., etc., etc."

Now this style of book-making is an abomination in your eyes, but what can you do? The letters are respectful, not to say complimentary You don't wish to be, or to be thought, a churl. You do not like to give a gruff answer to a smooth request. If you are evasive, noncommittal, mocking, ten to one your answer will be printed bodily. If you take refuge in the uncertainty of the mails, and make no reply, trusting you will be considered not to have received the letter, another one rises from its ashes, and keeps rising, till the probability of your failure to receive vanishes into thin air. You can not sit down and say:

"DEAR SIR,—I did receive your letters, all of them. I am receiving such letters at irregular intervals all the time. We have now reached a point where forbearance ceases to be a virtue, and I beg leave respectfully to inform you that I abhor the whole thing. You may bring me indorsements from every author under heaven, and all the same I hate your scheme. Its least fault is that it is vicarious authorship—a petty plot to get up a book without the trouble of writing it, a lazy make-shift to acquire credit and money by other people's brains. This, I say, is its least fault, because it is a fault that appears on the surface. A very casual examination will show that the body of the book—that which gives it worth—is not yours; that you are answerable only for the original suggestion. A greater sin than this is that you are appealing to and actually and actively cultivating the worst taste of the community—an itch for personalities. You are not selecting, or pretending to select, the best poetry of the country. You are asking only the poem or poems which each author likes best, and an author is a proverbially poor judge of his own productions. Neither do you confine yourself to the best poets. Your book is a drag-net, into which a certain number of fish must be drawn, irrespective of quality. I know this, because you ask poems of me—of me who make no pretense of being a poet, who never wrote a line of verse that was worth reading next day, and who never would be thought of as a poet except in the last extremity.

"Moreover, you are asking me to do a thing which I should be ashamed to be known to have done, and whose doing you will carefully conceal in your book. Will your 'something biographical' of Brown, Jones, and Robinson begin, 'I was born in Senegambia, of savage but saintly parents?' Not the least in the world. At the head of Brown's poem you will stand, decorously, saying, 'John Brown had a little Indian,' and nothing will appear to indicate that it is John Brown himself who is recounting the story of himself and his young barbarians. Egotism may be objectionable, but egotism hiding itself under alterism is—condemnable! When I wish to give my 'busy life' to the world, I will give it on the house-tops in the first person singular.

"And, to speak within bounds, what an altogether audacious and outrageous thing it is that you ask! The profanation of secrecy, the exposure of private life, the indulgence in personal gossip, are the degradation of our literature. This license is the drawback to public life, the horror of every self-respectful writer. You ask me not only to contribute to the general demoralization, but to throw in my own honor. You would seethe a kid in its mother's milk. I loathe the prurient curiosity which pries into the lives of others, regardless of their rights and their feelings; what ossification is it, then, which does not even pay to individuality the tribute of prying, but coolly walks up and asks you to open the lid yourself, and hand out your property to the public! And property in posse as well as in esse. We are not simply to give notes of our published, but of our contemplated works. This greedy census-taker will count not only the children already living, but the children who are yet to be born.

"Besides this, you ask me to stop in the full tide a life which you acknowledge to be busy, and write you an essay which, to be worth any thing, must embody the ripeness of years, the reading of libraries, the wisest and widest thought, the closest effort, and the finest execution; and in return for this I am to have the consciousness of pleasing you wonderfully—you whom I do not know, whom I have never seen, and of the value of whose approval I have no means of forming any opinion whatever.

"Yours, very respectfully."

This, I say, is a letter which you can not write, because it is brusque and violent and ill-natured, and will give your correspondent offense, and yourself an enemy. So, after all, the only thing that remains is to repress your noble rage, smile a smile that is childlike and bland, and with the poison of asps under your tongue say, sweetly: "Kind friend, I pray thee have me excused. In a little while, at most, we shall all be dead, and you will be surprised to see how little the world will care about our poetry or our prose, our busy lives or our original conceptions. But while we are alive, prithee let us alone. Do not intensify our insignificance by thrusting it into men's faces. Do not magnify our smallness by putting us into the platoons of the giants. Grant to our self-love this boon—that it may be possible for the world to ask why we are not set in the ranks of the immortals, but not why we are.

Digitized by Google

"And even when we are dead, hark from our tombs a soft Shakspearean sighing:

"'Sweet friend, for Jesus' rake forbear
To dig the dust inclosed here.
Blest be the man who spares these stones,
And curst be he who moves my bones.'"

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

SPRING BONNETS.

THE pattern bonnets have arrived from Brussels. Straw bonnets, black lace bonnets, and a few dressy affairs of Frou Frou gauze or of crape, make up the importations. Not a tulle or silk bonnet is shown, and but few round hats.

Straws are greatly in the preponderance, and though gotten up in the simplest village-maiden fashion, they will doubtless be considered the most elegant and stylish bonnets of the spring. English Dunstables, Milan braids, and all white straws are among the trimmed bonnets, but yellow Italian braids, the Tuscan and Leghorn, and the brown and black straws, are omitted. The shapes are the modifications of the gipsy and the republique, already described. Much of the high, towering effect is still given to bonnets by abundant face trimmings, yet the back descends low on the soft chatelaine braids, and is often finished by a cape. The front stands up high, not as the coronet or revers of last winter, but the straw is simply bent upward and back about two inches from the edge of the bonnet. The crown is prominent, and often a straw band or curtain is added beneath.

TRIMMINGS.

The simple ribbon and flowers used for trimming these bonnets look like a return to first principles. Thick corded ribbons of gros grain and faille, and the heavy repped ottoman ribbons, are used in the narrow widths known to milliners as Nos. 12, 16, and 20. There is, however, a difference between the French and American way of numbering these ribbons, and it is best to say that they measure from two inches to two and a half in width. A box of these ribbons displays the soft, pale tints that were introduced a year ago. Tea-rose, écru, cuir, and all the Frou Frou buffs are abundantly represented; next in proportion is the Nile green, fresh and spring-like; then pale plum-color; then sky blue, china pink, ardoise, and mauve; but more than all, black ribbon will be used in conjunction with lace and flowers. Occasionally a colored ribbon is used with black, some of the handsomest bonnets having black and green or blue ribbon folded together; a few contrasts, such as French gray and rose, are seen, and very often two shades of a single color are used.

A great deal of black lace will be used to soften down the hard lines of straw bonnets. This is the lace made in Brussels, and familiarly known here as thread lace. Scarfs of Brussels net, both plain and figured, bordered with narrow edging, are pendent from the backs of bonnets, and the ribbon strings seen on all spring bonnets will be abandoned for lace strings in warm weather. There are no jet ornaments, and only a few straw ones, such as pendent balls and acorns; and, as we said before, the trimmings are confined to ribbons, flowers, and lace.

STYLE OF TRIMMING.

It is an easy matter to trim these straw bonnets. Face the standing front, and, indeed, all the inside edge of the bonnet, with bias silk of a becoming color, usually, though not necessarily, matching the trimming ribbon. Above this put black thread edging, an inch wide, turned up outside on the straw. The face trimming, a revival of the old-time cap front, is fastened to bonnet wire placed inside the front, and slightly projecting. It consists of a full ruche of black lace gathered to the wire, or of white tulle with selvedge, or else doubled and pleated, or sometimes a ruche of colored Frou Frou gauze. Flowers, or a bow of ribbon, are placed in the centre of this ruche, or on the left side, and sometimes all the way across. Outside trimmings surround the crown, and hang in streamers behind. Twine the ribbon around the crown, knotting it irregularly with three or four knots, letting the ends hang at the back three-eighths of a yard long, raveling them into fringe two inches deep, and tied in three little tassels. Another way is to take two pieces of ribbon of two shades, or else one black, the other blue, and fold in layers about the crown, with loops at the side and streamers behind. Sometimes a profusion of bows, with short pointed ends, encircle the crown, or a row of loops overlapping, or of loops of ribbon laid in shells of lace. An easy and pretty way is to put a straight band of ribbon around the crown, and cover the ribbon with a puff of black net; a lace frill or a pleating of ribbon is arranged to stand above this. On the left side there is invariably a flower cluster larger than that in front, but in harmony with it. This is placed very high, with drooping ends, and sometimes trailing flowers fall behind. The curtain used when the bonnet has no straw band is about a finger deep, of ribbon or silk, held in box-pleats. The strings appear from beneath the trimming around the crown, are each a yard long, pass behind the ears, and are tied under the chin. All appearance of stiffness and regularity is avoided in the trimming, and there is much room for display of individual taste. Ladies, we fancy, will again return to arranging their own bonnets, as they did before our late intricate fashions were introduced.

A stylish bonnet to wear with any dress, and one that can not fail to be popular for city use, is a white Milan gipsy, with black lace ruche in front, black ottoman ribbon and thread lace around the crown, lace streamers, ribbon strings; and to enliven it a bunch of pink roses or of tea-rose-buds, field pinks, butter-cups or poppies, or a tiny wreath of rose-buds or fern leaves in front.

Ladies who wear their hair in a large Pompadour roll select bonnets that have plain fronts, without high revers, and with very little face trimming. The Pompadour colors are still seen in the blue ribbons and pink roses of many youthful-looking gipsies. Black ribbon, with white chrysanthemums or daisies, is shown for more mature faces. There are fewer brown and gray bonnets than usual, and the fancy for plum-color is in the ascendant. This shade is pretty with white flowers and black lace.

A model bonnet of Milan braid has the high front piece faced with Nile green silk, and below this a black lace ruche, almost concealed by a wreath of glossy green leaves and tiniest rose-buds. A standing frill of Nile green ribbon two inches wide around the crown has a ruche of lace and a wreath at its lower edge. Large shaded rose, with leaves and buds, on the left. The cape is of ribbon, laid double in pleats. Strings of ribbon a yard long.

Another Milan gipsy has plum-colored facings, black lace ruche for face trimming, and lace laid plainly on the edge of the straw. Plum-colored ottoman ribbon is knotted around the crown, streamers of black net edged with lace hang behind; ribbon strings. A cluster of white chrysanthemums is high on the left side.

The most youthful bonnet is a sewed chip gipsy, almost concealed with bows of pink gros grain. The face trimming is entirely of gros grain. A loop of ribbon, with a bow in the centre, is arranged to pass under the chatelaine. Another has milliner's folds of blue China crape and a tea-rose cluster on the outside, while a ruche of blue tulle forms the face trimming. A lovely English straw for a matron has two shades of ottoman ribbon—mauve and violet—around the crown, with a tea-rose in front, and violets outside.

BLACK LACE BONNETS.

There is nothing original in the black lace bonnets just imported. They are made over light net frames, and are most elegant when trimmed with white flowers.

FROU FROU GAUZE BONNETS.

Very dressy bonnets, to be worn late in the season, are made of the Frou Frou gauze brought out last year. This silk gauze is thicker than grenadine, and has its threads woven in tiny checks, or in crape-like crinkles. The material is plain on the frame, with rolls, cords, or milliner's folds near the edge; a richly knotted scarf of gauze, bias and bound, is around the crown; flowers and a pompon on the sides. A ruche of the gauze, bias and doubled, forms the face trimming. Ribbon strings.

COIFFURES.

To make these bonnets fit properly the softest chatelaines must be worn, dispensing with all topsies and other stuffing in the back hair. Crimped braids, hanging loosely in a net, and worn very low, are revived abroad. These are illustrated in the present Number. Bonnets are placed an inch back from the forehead, instead of being drawn far forward, as they have been worn lately.

DRESS GOODS.

The most elegant importations of the spring are China crapes for casaques, over dresses, paletots, and for trimming. They are in all the spring shades — golden brown, chestnut, cuir, soft dove grays, palest écru, rose, blue, and green. The material is too frail for service, but is very handsome for watering-place costumes and evening dresses, and in the probable scarcity of handsome fabrics will be much used. It is three-quarters of a yard wide, and $3 a yard. Quantities of Frou Frou gauze in more open patterns than that used in millinery are also brought out in the stylish colors for early spring.

WHITE SUITS.

The furnishing houses show very pretty suits of white bishop's lawn. They are made with skirt of walking length, a simply constructed over-skirt, with short apron front and longer back, draped high on the sides, and a slightly loose basque, that may be worn with a belt or without. On the lower skirt are three rows of small side pleats, each row a finger deep, slightly separated from each other, and each headed by a ruche of lawn, scantily gathered in the centre. A single row of this trimming trims the upper skirt and basque. Ruche around the high neck; coat-sleeves, with the trimming outlining the duchesse shape; and a belt of lawn, with short sash ends trimmed like the skirt. Such suits, in very sheer but not fine bishop's lawn, are sold for $9. It is scarcely possible to make them at less expense, if a lady's time is at all valuable. Other suits have deep side pleating, headed by puffs and a row of diagonal tucks. If the figure is thin, a yoke of puffs and tucks is introduced in the basque. Nansook and white organdy suits similarly made are trimmed with point duchesse lace, and will be worn over colored silk slips for evening, and over white in the daytime. Embroidered Swiss muslins are also shown. A model of these had a French waist gathered into a belt, to which full rounded basques were added, and trimmed with an embroidered ruffle. The over-skirt had an embroidered pyramid in each breadth, and a needle-worked ruffle. This was to be draped over a white muslin, or else a colored silk skirt.

BUFF LINEN SUITS.

The first linen suits exhibited are of pale écru lawn, fashioned like the white suits just described, and trimmed with straight side pleatings not hemmed below, but edged with a fold of brown lawn stitched on. The bias bands, with brown folds at the edge, are above this. Some of these suits have the pretty over-skirt and jacket of the Half-fitting Jacket Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. III. A cut paper pattern is given of this suit. The over-skirt may be left open, but the newest fancy is to bring it together, and button it all the way down the front.

Suits of batiste—a linen-finished lawn, in gray grounds striped with white or black—are prettily trimmed with three straight flounces a finger deep, edged with tiny fluted ruffles, an inch wide, cut bias.

For information received thanks are due Madame SIBLEY; and Messrs. SCHMAUDER; JOHNSON, BURNS, & Co.; BALLARD, HALLEY, & Co.; A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

LORD TENTERDEN, the secretary of the British part of the Joint High Commission now in session in Washington, is a great-grandson of CHARLES ABBOTT, who was the son of a hair-dresser, and born at Canterbury in 1762. In 1781 he was elected to a scholarship at Oxford, where he was distinguished for attainments and good conduct. At thirty-three he was called to the bar, and soon secured a large practice. At forty he published his work on the law of merchant shipping, which is now a standard authority. At forty-six he refused a judgeship, but accepted at fifty-four. Two years later, at fifty-six, he was made Lord Chief Justice of the King's Bench, and in 1827, during the premiership of Mr. CANNING, was raised to the peerage, but did not long enjoy the title, having died in 1832. Such is the history of the founder of the house, the dignity of which is worthily maintained by the present lord.

—Mr. THURLOW WEED contributes to the Commercial Advertiser a list of New York gentlemen who on the 24th of February, 1831—just forty years ago—were the committee who invited DANIEL WEBSTER to a dinner at the City Hotel. Among the names of the forty-six gentlemen of the committee are many that are now historical: Drs. MOTT and HOSACK, the HONES, HAGGERTYS, LAWRENCES, GOODHUES, OGDENS, BOORMANS, BRONSONS, VARICKS, SEDGWICKS, SLOSSONS, LYDIGS, etc., etc.—a very notable array. Out of the entire list only two of the forty-six survive, viz., HUGH MAXWELL, now eighty-four, and Mr. CHARLES H. RUSSELL.

—In Irvington, Westchester County, WASHINGTON IRVING was known as "Neighbor Arvin" among the yeomen of Sleepy Hollow and the region round about. They knew him not as the man who had made the place immortal.

—Mr. JUSTICE NELSON at first declined a place on the High Commission, and only accepted at the earnest personal request of Mr. FISH. The judge is now seventy-eight, but hale and vigorous, and by his clear head, great experience of and familiarity with international law, will prove an invaluable member of the Commission.

—It was SYDNEY SMITH who once told a friend that between ten and seventy years of age he had eaten and drunk forty-four one-horse wagon loads of meat and drink more than would have preserved him in life and health, and that the value of this overfeeding was something like $35,000.

—Hon. ELLIOTT, the new colored representative in Congress from South Carolina, was three years ago a journeyman printer in Charlestown, Massachusetts. Afterward edited a paper in South Carolina. Is about thirty, and right smart.

—Mr. HOME, who has been all abroad for several years past on the subject of Spiritualism, has finally abjured that ism, and is about to become a candidate for holy orders in the Episcopal Church.

—M. LOUIS BONARD, a peculiar Frenchman, who enjoyed "a private religion of his own, based on justice and humanity," died recently, and left to M. HENRY BERGH, as President of the S. for the P. of C. to A., the sum of $100,000. Already they begin to pester Surrogate HUTCHINGS about it; and probably his heirs will contest the will. M. BERGH says that M. BONARD was a man of most exemplary habits, who lived simply and modestly in a comfortable dwelling in Wooster Street, and who devoted considerable of his time to thinking about cruelty to animals.

—Colonel G. A. HOLT, just elected President of the Senate of Kentucky, is said to be the youngest man who ever held that position; moreover, an able man and a modest man.

—General SICKLES officially presented to the new King of Spain, on the 2d of February, the letter accrediting General S. as minister of the United States to the new monarch. General SICKLES addressed the King in the Spanish language, which he speaks fluently, as he does the French and Italian, besides being a good German scholar. The United States has been fortunate of late in the accomplishments of its representatives abroad, Mr. MOTLEY, Mr. BANCROFT, Mr. MARSH, and General SICKLES being fine linguists. It is understood that General S. stands particularly high in the personal regard of his Majesty.

—MONCURE D. CONWAY, a frequent and acceptable contributor to the HARPER periodicals, and a most industrious littérateur, preaches two sermons every Sunday in London, in chapels three miles apart, and has for auditors many of the most cultivated men in that metropolis.

—Bishop CLARKSON, of Nebraska, says that of the 75,000 Indians in his diocese there are at least 15,000 "good Indians," who attend religious services. Old frontier-men doubt about the "good Indian." They have a theory that the only good Indian is a dead Indian.

—Miss CLARA LOUISE KELLOGG has just enacted what she calls the greatest romance in her life. Enthusiastic males of Wilkesbarre, Pennsylvania, next day after her concert to the Wilkesbarres, accompanied her in special car as far as White Haven. Dinner. Railroad official offered her a ride on the locomotive "Southeastern." Unhesitatingly accepted. C. L. K. assumed the duties of the fireman, and rang bell at all stations and crossings. Carried away with delight. At Penn Haven alighted; resumed seat in special car, and made the remark above stated about "greatest romance," or words to that effect.

—HENRI ROCHEFORT has commenced the publication of a new journal, entitled Le Mot d' Ordre, and explains in his opening address that the Mot d' Ordre is regicide.

—General BOURBAKI is said to be a wondrous swordsman, and often, it is said, performs the feat with which Sir WALTER SCOTT rendered SALADIN famous—laying a silk handkerchief on the blade of his cimeter, and shredding it in two with an almost imperceptible movement of the arm.

—Ex-Queen ISABELLA, finding Paris no longer an agreeable residence for an ex-empress, proposes buying a château near Vienna, and thenceforth to adorn society in Austria.

—They made a spirited little dash at Mr. BRET HARTE in Chicago, to entice him to settle there, in this wise: WIRT DEXTER, Esq., a good lawyer and cultivated gentleman, who stands as high in his profession as BONNER'S "Dexter" does in his, drew up a paper, on which were autographed the names of WIRT DEXTER, E. J. TINKHAM, JOHN YOUNG SCAMMON, ANSON STAGER, GEORGE L. DUNLAP, Mr. ELLIS (bank prex), and other prominent Chicago men, to the number of thirty, pledged for $500 each, for the purpose of aiding in the establishment of a literary monthly, to be under the control of Mr. B. HARTE; and they offered to go more, if necessary, to make it a success. It did not seem good in the eyes of Mr. H., and so on he came to the East'ard.

—Senator TRUMBULL, of Illinois, expressed in the United States Senate, a few days since, the astounding opinion that "Washington was not the source of all wisdom and purity."

—English noblemen of high degree do not always have, while young, quite as much money to spend as would be agreeable to them. Earl de Grey and Ripon, for instance, the president of the English branch of the High Commission, during the lifetime of his father, who died only ten or twelve years ago, was allowed a sum that was regarded as narrow even to penuriousness, and the very simple habits to which for thirty odd years he habituated himself he still retains. In the House of Commons he was a Liberal, with strong sympathies for the working-classes. One of his most intimate friends is Mr. TOM HUGHES. His father was Prime Minister from November, 1830, until July, 1834. Earl Grey is Grand Master of the Masonic fraternity of England, and it is understood that prior to his return he will be invited by the officials of the Grand Lodge in the United States to some sort of entertainment appropriate to that most mysterious and very aged organization.

—ROBERT BROWNING, though born in 1812, looks as though he were seventy, so much has the death of his wife affected him. His wife, whose parents were in affluent circumstances, was three years older than he, and very precocious, having published a volume of poems at the age of seventeen. She did not marry Mr. B. until she was thirty-seven.

—Concerning certain very old people—viz.: HENRY VAN METER, who died at Bangor, Maine, February 12, aged 110, of whom several interesting facts may be found in LOSSING'S "Pictorial Field-Book of the War of 1812."—Mrs. ELISA LEESON died recently in the alms-house at Hartford, Connecticut, aged 111. Her father lived to be 112.—Mrs. SUSAN RUSK, of Alleghany County, Virginia, died recently at the age of 117, leaving a young daughter of 98.—Mrs. PLANK, aged 106, is still living, and in fair health, in her native town of Killingly, Connecticut.—Mrs. ELIZABETH KIEFFER, of No. 65 Oliver Street, in this city, is 108, and a few weeks ago made a complaint in the Special Sessions against a caitiff who stole $20 from her.

—One of the ablest of the writers of editorials for the London Times, Canon MOZELEY, has recently been appointed to the Professorship of Divinity at Oxford.

—Among the fresh artistes who are to compose PAREPA-ROSA'S new opera company, who are coming to warble to us next autumn, is Madame VANZINI, daughter of Signor BLITZ. She is to receive a salary of $2500 a month in gold, and all expenses. It is said that the entire troupe will be composed of new artistes.

—FROUDE, the historian, is preparing a history of Ireland under the old penal anti-Roman-Catholic laws; but what will interest us more is that he is writing three lectures, embracing the more salient points, which he proposes to deliver in the United States.

—The Rev. MORGAN DIX has been photographed for the Boston Gazette by the New York correspondent of that paper, who speaks of him as "every inch a priest. He imposes celibacy upon himself, as in his opinion more consistent with the ministerial character, but he urges the doctrine upon no one else. He is very wealthy, but denies himself all luxury or repose. His tastes in many things, especially in books and paintings, are æsthetic, but in his habits he is ascetic and severe. He lives far down town, in what was a fashionable quarter when St. John's Park was the most elegant and retired of our green inclosures; but the ugly walls of the monster new Hudson River freight dépôt now frown upon his windows. At all hours, early or late, he may be seen, in his long, black, priestly coat, threading the noisome streets of the wretched section over which he presides, bent on errands of consolation or mercy. He is a tireless, a marvelous worker. His thin, wiry frame seems unconscious of fatigue. His own large fortune he scatters profusely, and he seems to have no heed but the advancement of the Church and the doing of good. In the pulpit he is austere; he has no graces of eloquence, but he is singularly lucid, direct, and he is often quite original. His sharp, somewhat harsh voice seems to give directness and force to what he says. His sentences are like cleavers—so sharp and yet forcible they cut through to the marrow of what he would reach. Stern, inflexible, uncompromising, passionately devout, fired with zeal, preferring work to talk, he presents in most of his characteristics a striking contrast with his peers. While to casual observation the springs of ordinary passions appear to be dried up within him, he is yet, when relaxing from work and duty, hearty, genial, and fairly overflowing with cheerfulness."

Digitized by Google

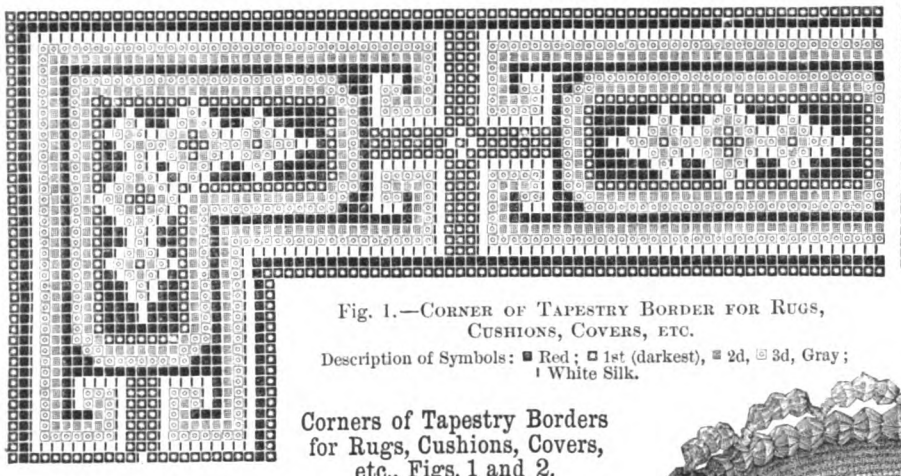

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF TAPESTRY BORDER FOR RUGS, CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC.

Description of Symbols: ■ Red; □ 1st (darkest), ▪ 2d, ▫ 3d, Gray; ı White Silk.

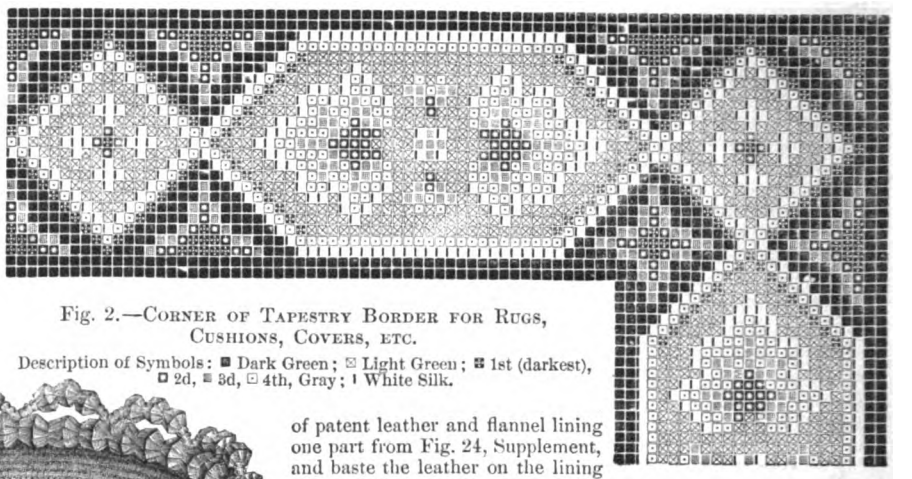

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF TAPESTRY BORDER FOR RUGS, CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC.

Description of Symbols: ■ Dark Green; ▨ Light Green; ▪ 1st (darkest), □ 2d, ▪ 3d, ▫ 4th, Gray; ı White Silk.

Corners of Tapestry Borders for Rugs, Cushions, Covers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE borders are suitable for edging small rugs, cushions, covers, etc., and are worked on canvas in cross stitch. The description of symbols under the illustrations indicates the colors to be used. The borders may also be worked in bead embroidery.

Crystal Bead and Silver Wire Mat for Bottles, Glasses, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS mat is used for glasses, bottles, etc.; it is four inches in diameter, and is made of crystal beads and silver wire. The outer edge is trimmed with a border made of large cut crystal beads and small crystal beads, which forms a standing rim. To make the mat string beads of the size shown by Fig. 2 on a piece of silver wire of the requisite length. With one end of this wire and the first eight beads form a round loop, as shown by the illustration, and between the eight beads fasten eight pieces of wire each four inches and four-fifths long, which are bent double. Each of these wires is twisted once close to the wire of the loop (see illustration). Then lay the wire once around the loop, letting it come between the two ends of each of the eight wire bars, and two beads come between each two bars. Twist each wire bar once close to the last round of beads, make a new round of beads, and continue in this manner, following the illustration, until a flat, round section is formed of the size above mentioned; the number of beads between each two bars must be increased in each successive round as may be necessary. The ends of wire standing over are twisted and fastened to the outer edge of the mat. Next encircle the outer edge with a round of large cut crystal beads, which are strung on wire (the number of beads must be divisible by three). Fasten a new piece of wire between two large beads of the rim, * take up three small beads, take up three large beads, take up three small beads, fasten to the wire of the outer rim after the third following large bead, and repeat from *. After completing the round, fasten the end of the wire and cut it off. Bend the bead scallops upward (see illustration, Fig. 1).

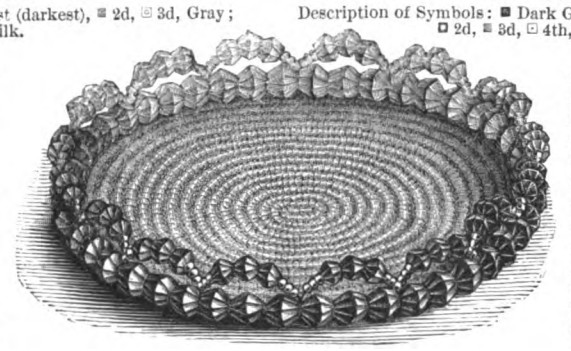

Fig. 1.—CRYSTAL BEAD AND SILVER WIRE MAT FOR BOTTLES, GLASSES, ETC.

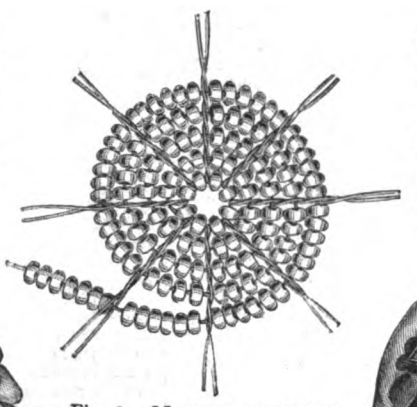

Fig. 2.—MANNER OF MAKING MAT.—CENTRE. FULL SIZE.

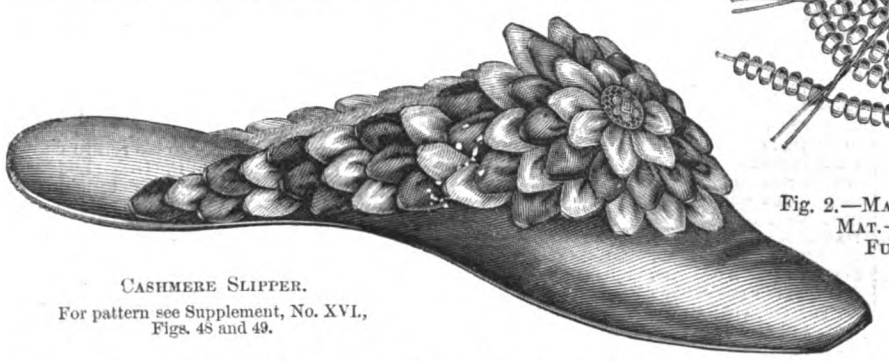


CASHMERE SLIPPER.

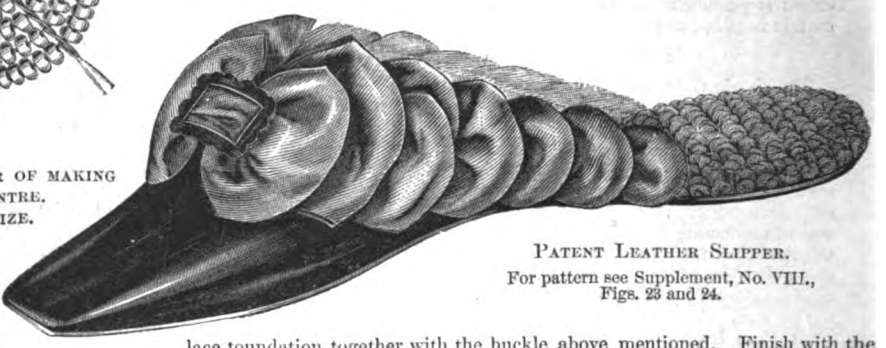
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 48 and 49.

Cashmere Slipper.

THIS slipper is of gray cashmere, thinly wadded, and lined with red flannel. The sole is made of felt, and covered with red flannel on the inside. The trimming of the slipper consists of red satin and gray cashmere leaves, which are arranged on a stiff lace foundation as shown by the illustration. Cut the front of the slipper and the sole from Figs. 23 and 24 of No. VIII., Supplement, cutting the front of cashmere, cotton batting, and flannel, and the sole of felt, cotton batting, and flannel. Cut the stiff lace foundation from Fig. 48, Supplement, and the leaves from Fig. 49. Lay the cotton batting of the front between soft net, and then between the material and flannel lining. Bind the front edge of the front with gray silk ribbon four-fifths of an inch wide. Furnish the sole with the cotton batting interlining, cover with red flannel, and overseam it to the front. Cut the requisite number of leaves of red satin and gray cashmere, turn down the material of the leaves on the under side along the dotted line given, gather the under straight edge, and sew them on the stiff lace foundation in such a manner that each leaf covers the seam made by sewing on the previous one. In the middle of the trimming sew on a button covered with red satin and lace, and, finally, sew the completed trimming on the front edge of the front (see illustration). This trimming may be made of red satin only.

Patent Leather Slipper.

THIS slipper is made of black patent leather, and is lined with red flannel, and furnished with a felt sole. The latter is covered with a crocheted sole on the inside. The trimming consists of leaf bows of red silk ribbon and a black buckle. Cut of patent leather and flannel lining one part from Fig. 24, Supplement, and baste the leather on the lining all around the outer edge. Bind the outer edge of the front with black silk ribbon. Cut the sole of felt, two-fifths of an inch thick, from Fig. 23, Supplement. Work the crochet sole exactly in the shape shown by Fig. 23. Beginning at the back edge, work with a double thread of worsted a foundation of the requisite length, and on this work the 1st round.—All sc. (single crochet). 2d round.—Turn the work, 1 ch. (chain stitch), * 1 sc. on the first sc. of the preceding round, draw out the loop on the needle two-fifths of an inch, take the needle out of the loop, pass it through the front vein of the two upper veins of the same sc., 1 ch., and repeat from *. Divide the double working thread, use one thread as a foundation, and with the other work, first, 1 ch., then 1 sc. on the front vein of every sc. of the preceding round. Repeat these two rounds until the sole is completed. Sew the completed sole on the felt sole, and join the front of the slipper with the sole according to the corresponding figures. For the trimming, make twelve leaves of red ribbon, graduating them in size; the largest are two inches and two-fifths long and two inches wide. Round the upper edge of the leaves, pleat the under edge (see illustration), and sew them on a stiff lace foundation, which must correspond in shape to the upper edge of the front. For the bow-like part of the middle of the trimming cut two pieces of ribbon—one five inches and a fifth long, and the other four inches long, and both three inches and a fifth wide. Round the upper and under edge of each part, lay the smaller part on the larger, pleat them at the middle, and fasten them on the stiff lace foundation together with the buckle above mentioned. Finish with the trimming, as shown by the illustration.



PATENT LEATHER SLIPPER.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 23 and 24.

CROCHET CIGAR-CASE.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 47.

Crochet Cigar-Case.

THIS case consists of two parts, which fit into each other as shown by the illustration. Both parts are made of card-board. The outer part is covered on the outside with a crochet cover worked with three shades of brown silk twist, and on the inside with brown silk. The inner part is covered with brown silk on the outside and inside, and one end is furnished with a crochet cover. Furnish the middle of this end with a loop of brown ribbon. Cut of card-board from Fig. 47, Supplement, two parts, cutting the inner part two-fifths of an inch narrower than the outer. On the inside of both the parts paste brown silk, after which paste together the lengthwise edges of each part. Cover the outside of the inner part with brown silk. For the crochet cover of the end of the inner part work with the medium shade of brown silk a foundation of 6 ch. (chain stitch), close it in a ring with a sl. (slip stitch), and on this work 13 rounds sc. (single crochet), in doing which widen in two opposite parts of the work three to four times at regular intervals, so that a flat oval section, two inches and four-fifths long and two inches and two-fifths wide, is formed. All around this section work six rounds more without widening. Then double this crochet cover, so as to give it the shape of a short bag, and push the rounded point to the inside, so as to form a sharp fold there, which must reach from one side edge to the other. On the inside of the bag crochet a round of sc. on the edge of the fold, so as to define it sharply. To the middle of the fold sew a loop of brown ribbon an inch and a quarter long, and then sew on the part along the straight line given on Fig. 47. Begin the cover for the outer part of the case in the same manner as that for the inner part, but instead of 13 rounds work 15 rounds, widening them so as to make the part a little wider. Then, without changing the number of stitches, work two rounds with the lightest shade of brown silk, one round with the medium shade, one round with the darkest, and then 10 rounds with the medium shade of silk. In the 4th, 6th, 8th, and 10th of these rounds form dots in the design, as shown by the illustration. Each dot consists of 3 dc. (double crochet), which must be worked on the free upper vein of the next st. (stitch) of the round before the preceding round (take no notice

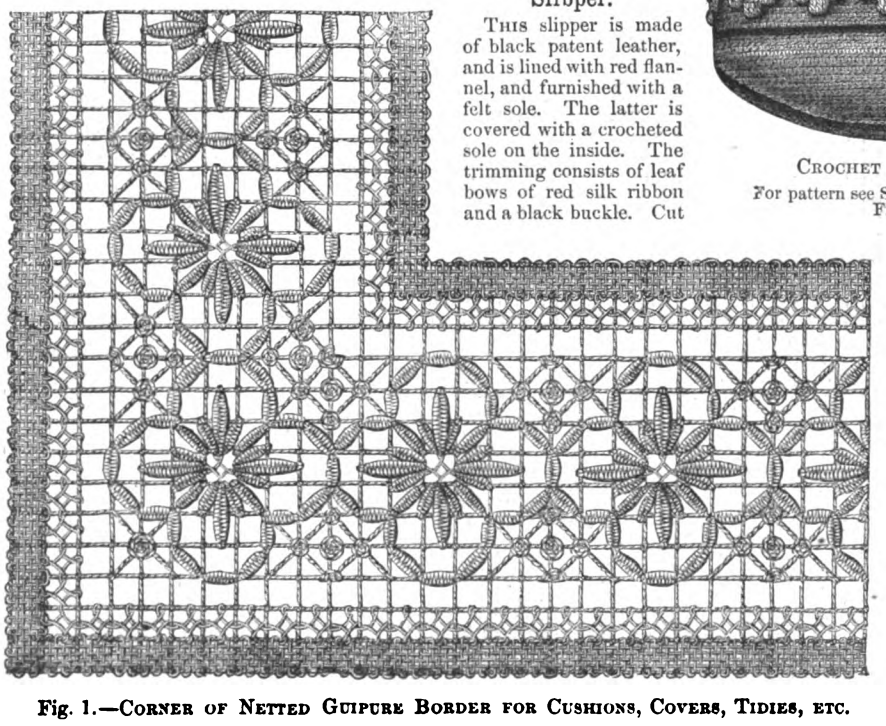


Fig. 1.—CORNER OF NETTED GUIPURE BORDER FOR CUSHIONS, COVERS, TIDIES, ETC.

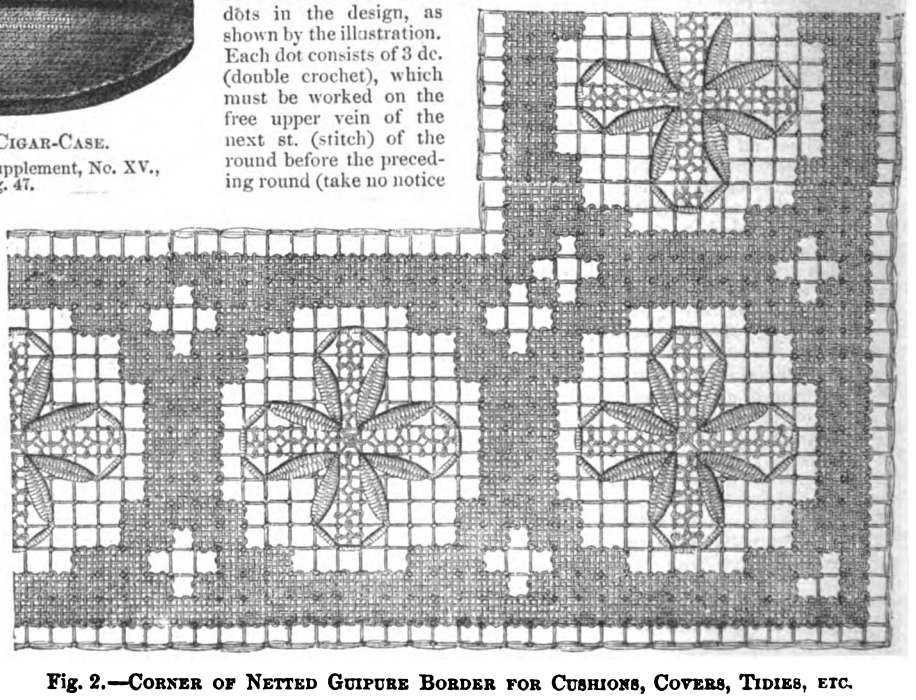

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF NETTED GUIPURE BORDER FOR CUSHIONS, COVERS, TIDIES, ETC.

Digitized by Google

of the next st. of the preceding round). The dots of the 4th round are worked after intervals of 7 st., the dots of the 6th round after intervals of 3 st., and those of the 8th round after intervals of 7 dc., as is shown by the illustration. In the 5th, 7th, and 9th rounds pass over the dots with 1 ch. After completing the 10th round work one round of sc. with dark brown, one round with medium, and two rounds with light brown silk. The number of st. in the last of these two rounds must be divisible by 8, therefore it must be narrowed or widened by a few st. Then work 41 rounds of sc. in the following design: Without cutting off the working thread last used, lay on the dark brown silk, and with it work off the last light brown st. (It is to be observed that in changing the colors in these 41 rounds, the last st. of one color must be worked off with the thread of the following color, and the thread dropped must be carried further on the under side of the work until wanted again.) Then work the 1st round.—∗ 1 dark brown, 2 light brown, 3 medium, 2 light brown st., and repeat from ∗ to the end of the round. 2d round (the first st. of this and every following round must come on the first st. of the preceding round). —∗ 1 medium, 1 dark brown, 2 light brown, 1 medium, 2 light brown, 1 dark brown st.; repeat from ∗. 3d round. —∗ 2 medium, 1 dark brown, 3 light brown, 1 dark brown, 1 medium st.; repeat from ∗. 4th round.—3 medium, 1 dark brown, 1 light brown, 1 dark brown, 2 medium st.; repeat from ∗. 5th round. —∗ 2 medium, 2 light brown, 1 dark brown, 2 light brown, 1 medium st.; repeat from ∗. 6th round.—1 medium, 2 light brown, 1 dark brown, 1 medium, 1 dark brown, 2 light brown st.; repeat from ∗. 7th round.—∗ 2 light brown, 1 dark brown, 3 medium, 1 dark brown, 1 light brown st.; repeat from ∗. 8th round.—∗ 1 light brown, 1 dark brown, 5 medium, 1 dark brown st.; repeat from ∗. Repeat these eight rounds four times more, and then work one round like the first round. Now work two rounds with light brown, one round with medium, one round with dark brown silk, then ten rounds in the dotted design, then one round with dark brown, one round with medium, and, finally, two rounds with light brown silk. Draw the completed cover over the card-board part and sew it on. Then slip the two parts into each other, as shown by the illustration.

Fig. 1.—MUSLIN UNDER-SKIRT FOR TRAINED DRESSES.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 36-41.

Fig. 2.—MUSLIN UNDER-SKIRT FOR TRAINED DRESSES (WITHOUT THE UPPER TRAIN SET ON).

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 36-41.

HORSE-HAIR PANIER WITH PUFFS.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 50.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 1 TO 3 YEARS OLD.

For pattern see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 42 and 43.

Netted Guipure Corners of Borders for Cushions, Covers, Tidies, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

See illustrations on page 180.

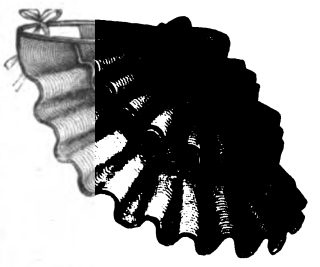
BOTH these borders are suitable for ornamenting pillow-slips, covers, tidies, etc. The foundation of Fig. 1 is worked with medium-sized linen thread over a half-inch mesh, and that of Fig. 2 over a mesh two-fifths of an inch in circumference in straight netting. Work the foundations of such borders as are intended to ornament four-cornered articles as follows: Begin with a foundation of 2 st. (stitches), and, always going backward and forward, work, widening 1 st. at the end of each round, until the work counts twice as many st. as the width of the border, exclusive of the edge stitches. Now work each half of the border separately, that is, on half of the stitches, beginning at the left-hand outer edge; work one round without widening, and after this widen in the following rounds at the outer edge and narrow at the inner edge, alternately widening in one round and narrowing in the next. When the work is of the desired length at the outer lengthwise edge begin to form the inner corner by working, after the last narrowing, 1 st. on the outer edge stitch on that side where the narrowing was heretofore done, and in this way begin the widening for the second inner side of the border. This must be repeated in every second following round, while the widening must be done in the same proportion at the outer side. Continue in this manner until the inner side of the border counts two squares less than the inner lengthwise edge already completed. Work the border in this manner in case it is to form a perfect square; but if it is to be longer than broad, work as many more rounds for the lengthwise sides as may be necessary. Then cut off the thread at the outside of the border, lay it on at the outside of the st. previously left unnoticed, work 1 st. (2 knots) on the first st. there, in order to supply the wanting st. through the division of the st., and then work two rounds. At the end of the second round begin the widening, which, from this out, must be done to correspond with that of the first two sides, as must be the narrowing. Continue working as before until the fourth inner side corresponds to the second inner side, and then work one round on the entire number of stitches (including those of the first half of the border) without widening or narrowing. At the end of the next round begin the narrowing, which must be repeated at the end of every round until there are only 2 st. left. Work these together with one knot, which completes the foundation of the border. Work the foundation of both borders with fine linen thread in point de reprise, point de toile, and point d'esprit, and ornament them with wheels as shown by the illustration.

LEGGING WITH FUR TRIMMING.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 18 and 19.

Dress for Girl from 1 to 3 Years old.

THIS dress is made of blue poplin, and is trimmed with side-pleated ruffles of the material. Cut of the material and lining from Fig. 42, Supplement, one piece for the yoke. At the back edges of the yoke allow three-quarters of an inch extra material; at the left edge this extra material serves as a fly. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 43, observing the contour of the under part of the sleeve. For the body cut of the material and net lining a piece nineteen inches wide and sixty-five inches long, and hem one side an inch and a quarter wide. Face each cross-wise edge with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, and furnish them with buttons and button-holes for closing the dress. Trim the bottom of the body with a side-pleated ruffle nearly five inches wide, as shown by the illustration. Lay the upper edge of the body in pleats three-quarters of an inch wide, which must come close together, and all lie one way, so that the upper edge measures twenty inches in length, and sew it between the double material of the yoke. On each side, between the front and back of the yoke, leave an inch and four-fifths of the body plain, that is, do not pleat it, and cut out a small piece for the arm-hole. At the end of the waist sew through the pleats. Face the back edges of the yoke with a strip of the material an inch and three-quarters wide, and furnish it with buttons and button-holes for closing. Sew up the sleeves according to the corresponding figures, face the bottom with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, trim them as shown by the illustration, and sew them into the corded arm-holes. Trim the outer edge of the yoke and the neck with side-pleated ruffles. These ruffles, and those of the sleeves, are each an inch and a quarter wide. Finish the front of the dress with a bow of the material. A belt an inch and a quarter wide, made of the material, stiff interlining, and lining, is fastened around the waist.



HORSE-HAIR PANIER WITH FRILLS.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Fig. 17.

Fig. 1.—STRIPED GAUZE GRENADINE DRESS WITH CASHMERE TALMA.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-3.

Fig. 2.—GROS GRAIN DRESS WITH SWISS MUSLIN OVER-SKIRT AND FICHU.

For description see Supplement.

Legging with Fur Trimming.

THE original is of light gray cloth, and is trimmed with bands of gray fur and a rosette and tassels. Cut the legging from Figs. 18 and 19, Supplement, but on Fig. 19 cut the outer edge straight instead of scalloped. Sew on the trimming and the strap as shown by the illustration.

WATER-PROOF LEGGING.

For pattern see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 18 and 19.

Water-proof Legging.

THIS legging is of dark gray water-proof, and is lined with gray twilled muslin. Cut of the material and lining from Figs. 18 and 19, Supplement, each one piece. Sew up the two halves of the legging and the button-hole fly according to the corresponding figures, fell the lining and material together at the outer edge of the legging, and stitch it all around an eighth of an inch from the outer edge with black silk. Work the button-holes in the fly, and furnish the part coming under this with the corresponding buttons along the straight line given on Fig. 18. With the under edge of the legging join a strap of black enameled cloth three inches and a quarter wide, sewing it in from : to *. Trim the legging with a rosette and two black silk tassels.

Digitized by Google

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER V.

MISS THELLUSON had always been lamentably deficient in the quality which is called "respect of persons." She tended her servant half the night through as carefully as if poor Grace had been her personal friend, and a lady born. There was, indeed, much of the lady about the girl, which was Hannah's great comfort in having her as nurse—a refinement of manner and feeling, and a fine sense of honor, not always found in her class. For since she had been mistress of a large house and many servants Miss Thelluson had discovered to her grief that, in these days, the moral standard of kitchen and parlor was not always the same. Still in her nurse she had always comfort; and Grace, probably on account of this difference, or for other reasons—now patent enough—had seemed to dislike mixing much with the other servants. Her mistress could trust her thoroughly. She was, indeed, quite a personal friend—as every faithful servant ought to be.

When the poor girl came to herself she poured her whole sad story into her mistress's patient ear.

"I had no idea I was doing wrong—no, that I hadn't!" moaned she. "Two or three in our village had married their sister's husband. What can a poor working-man do when he is left with a lot of children, but get their aunt to come and look after them? And then, if she's young, or, indeed, any how, people are sure to begin talking. Isn't it better to stop their wicked tongues by marrying her at once, and making all right and comfortable? For they're not comfortable—I wasn't. And they're not real brother and sister, whatever master says. And I'm sure they can be married; for there was our old squire, he married two sisters, and had two families, one all girls, the other boys. And the eldest son by the second marriage—young Mr. Melville—came in for the property, and is the squire now. And nobody ever said his mother wasn't lawfully married, no more than, when I came home from London, the neighbors said I wasn't married to Jim. Married in church, too, though we were Methodists both; and neither the parson nor our own minister ever said a word against it."

Though the poor girl talked in a wild, rambling, excited fashion, still there was some sense in her arguments; and when she implored Miss Thelluson to speak to Mr. Rivers again, and repeat all she said, and ask if there was not a chance of his having been mistaken, or if he could not, at least, prevent the marriage with Ann Bridges, Hannah scarcely knew what to say. At last, just to soothe her—for, out of consideration to her mistress, Grace had kept her misery to herself for a day and a half, till it had almost driven her frantic—she promised to do her best in the matter.

"And you'll do it at once, miss; and tell master that whatever is done should be done at once, or Jim will get married, and then what is to become of me and my poor child? It isn't myself that I care for. I didn't do wrong; God knows I didn't! And I don't mind what folk say of me; but it's my poor boy. And it's Jim, too, a little; I don't want Jim to do wrong either."

And she shed a few tears over even the bad fellow, who, she confessed, had in his drunken fits beaten her many a time.

"But I forgive him, for he was drunk," said she, using that too common but mistaken excuse. "And then I had the children to comfort me. Such dear little things they were, and so fond of me! And he'll go and bring that woman Bridges to be step-mother over them, and she is a bad temper, and she's sure to ill-treat them, poor lambs! Jenny's poor little motherless lambs! I must go back to them directly." And she sat up in bed, in an agony of distress. "Oh, miss, please give me my clothes, and I'll get up and dress, and be off by daylight."

This bitter grief, not over her own boy—who, she said, was safe with his grandmother—but over her dead sister's children, touched Hannah to the quick. She could understand it so well.

"You must lie quiet," said she; "or, rather, you must go back to your own bed beside Rosie. You have quite forgotten Rosie."

The right chord was struck. The young woman had evidently a strong sense of duty, besides being excessively fond of her charge; for Rosie was a little creature that won every body. So she sat up, fastened back her disheveled hair, and with her mistress's help tottered back to the nursery. Soon she settled herself in her customary corner, stretching out a caressing hand to the crib beside her bed, where, sleeping quite alone, but as sweetly as if all the angels of heaven were watching over her, little Rosie lay.

"Ah! baby, baby," Grace sobbed, "what would have become of me all these months without you, baby!"

What would become of many a miserable woman if it were not for a baby!

How Grace had ever left her own Hannah could not imagine; but found afterward it was the hard necessity of earning money, the grandmother being very poor, and Jim Dixon having gone off in search of work, and left the whole combined families on the old woman's hands. Now he reclaimed his three eldest, but disowned Grace's unfortunate babe.

"My boy—remember my boy!" implored she, as in the dim dawn of the morning her mistress left her, hoping her utter exhaustion would incline her to sleep. "Promise me that you will speak to the master, if only for the sake of my poor boy."

Hannah promised; but when she went back to her room and thought it all over—for she could not sleep—she was sorely perplexed. There might be some mistake, even though Mr. Rivers, who was a magistrate as well as a clergyman, spoke so decidedly. Grace's arguments were strong; and the case of Mr. Melville, whom she had herself met at the Moat House, was, to say the least, curious. She herself knew nothing of the law. If she could only speak to any body who did know, instead of to her brother-in-law! Once she thought of writing to Lady Dunsmore; but then what would the countess imagine? No doubt that she wanted the information for herself. And Hannah grew hot all over with shame and pain, and another feeling which was neither the one nor the other, and which she did not stay to analyze, except that it made her feel more reluctant than ever to name the subject again to Mr. Rivers.

Still Grace was so unfortunate; so innocently wicked—if wickedness there was. And the projected marriage of Dixon seemed much more so.

"Mr. Rivers will never allow it in his church. He surely would not sanction such a cruel thing, even if it be legal. And there is no time to lose. Whatever it costs me, I must speak to him at once."

With this resolution, and deadening her mind to any other thoughts, Hannah lay down, and tried to sleep, but in vain. After an hour or two of restless tossing, she dressed herself, and descended to the breakfast-room.

There she found Mr. Rivers playing with little Rosie—contrary to his habit; for he seldom saw her of mornings. He looked a little confused at being discovered.

"I sent for the child," said he. "Don't you think, Aunt Hannah, she is old enough to come down to breakfast with us?"

"Not quite," said Hannah, smiling; "but she can stay and play about on the floor. I dare say she will be good—won't she, auntie's darling?"

And auntie clasped fondly the little thing, who had tottered up to her and hid the pretty fair head in her gown-skirt. Mr. Rivers looked at them, and turned suddenly away—as he often did now.

Rosie behaved beautifully—for about five minutes!—and then began to perpetrate a few ignorant naughtinesses; such as pulling down a silver fork, and a butter-knife, with a great clatter; then creeping beneath the table, and trying to stand upright there, which naturally caused a bump on the head, and a scream so violent that Aunt Hannah, frightened out of all proprieties, quitted her seat and walked up and down the room, soothing in her arms the piteous little wailer.

"This will never do," said papa, sternly. "Pray take the child up stairs."

Which Hannah thankfully did, and staid away some minutes; feeling that, after all, the nursery was the safest, the most peaceful, and the pleasantest room in the house.

When she came back, her brother-in-law had finished breakfast, and was standing gazing out of the sunshiny window in a sort of dream. His temporary crossness had subsided; his face, though grave, was exceedingly sweet. Now that she had grown used to it, and it had gradually brightened, if not into happiness, at least into composure and peace, Hannah sometimes thought she had seldom seen so thoroughly sweet a face—such a combination of the man and the woman—that beautiful woman whose picture at the Moat House she often looked at, and wondered what kind of young creature the first Lady Rivers had been. Apparently not like the second Lady Rivers at all.

It was exactly his mother's smile with which Mr. Rivers turned round now.

"So the little maid is comforted at last. What influence you women have over babies, and what helpless beings we men are with them! Why, it is as much as papa can do to keep Miss Rosie quiet for five minutes, and Aunt Hannah has her the whole day. Do you never tire of her?"

"Never. No more does Grace, who has an instinctive love for children—which all women have not, I assure you. This is what makes her so valuable as a nurse."

Hannah said this intentionally; for, not two minutes before, the girl had run after her with a wild white face. "Have you spoken to the master? Will you speak to him? Don't forsake me! Ask him to help me! Oh, Miss Thelluson, I'm fond of your child—think of mine!" Even if Hannah had not liked and respected Grace so much, to her good heart, now open to all children for Rosie's sake, this argument would have struck home.

"I hope the young woman is better this morning, and that you did not fatigue yourself too much with her last night," said Mr. Rivers, coldly; and then began speaking of something else. But Hannah, bracing up her courage, determined to discharge her unpleasant duty at once.

"Have you ten minutes to spare? Because I have a special message to you from Mrs. Dixon."

"What Mrs. Dixon?"

"Grace. She insists upon it she has a legal right to the name."

"She is under a complete delusion, and the sooner she wakes up out of it the better. Pray, Hannah, do not, with your weak womanish pity, encourage her for a moment."

Mr. Rivers spoke sharply—more sharply than any gentleman ought to speak to any lady; though men sometimes think they are justified in doing so—to wives and sisters. But her brother-in-law had never thus spoken to Hannah before—she was not used to it: and she looked at him, first surprised, then slightly indignant.

"My pity is not weak or womanish, nor do I call it pity at all. It is simple love of justice. Either Grace is married or not married. All I want is, for her sake and the child's, to find out the exact law of the case."

"Which is just what I told her last night. No doubt she was married, as she says; only the marriage, being illegal, is null and void."

"But she says such marriages are not uncommon."

"I believe they are not, in the lower classes. Nevertheless, those who risk them must take the consequences. The wife is only the mistress, and the children are base-born. I beg your pardon for putting plain facts into plain language, but you compel me. Why will you meddle in this unpleasant matter? It can be nothing to you."

And he looked at her keenly as he spoke, but Hannah did not perceive it just then. Her interest was too strongly excited for the cruel position of poor Grace. She recalled involuntarily an old argument of Lady Dunsmore on this very subject—whether any wrong could be exactly "nothing" to any honest-minded man or woman, even though he or she were not personally affected thereby.

"Pardon me," she answered, gently, "it is something to me to see any human being in great misery, if by any possibility that misery could be removed. Are you quite sure you are right as to the law? It can not always have been what you say, because Grace tells me of a certain Mr. Melville who visits at the Moat House—" And Hannah repeated the story. "Can it be possible," added she, "that there is one law for the rich and another for the poor?"

"No. But in 1835 the law was altered, or at least modified: all such marriages then existing were confirmed, and all future ones declared illegal. Melville escaped by a hair-breadth only, his parents having been married in 1834."

"Then what was right one year was wrong the next? That is, to my weak womanly notions, a very extraordinary form of justice."

Her brother-in-law regarded her inquiringly. Evidently he was surprised; did not at first take in the intense single-mindedness of the woman who could thus throw herself out of herself, and indignantly argue the cause of another, even though it trenched upon ground so delicate that most feminine instincts would have let it alone. He looked at her; and then his just nature divining the utter innocence and indifference out of which she spoke, he said nothing—only sighed.

"You are a very good woman, Hannah—I know that—and Grace ought to be exceedingly obliged to you. But you can not help her—not in the least."

"And can not you? Could you not, at least, prevent the man's marrying another woman—as he means to do in your very church next Sunday?"

"Does he? The brute!" cried Mr. Rivers, passionately. Then, relapsing into his former coldness—"I fear nothing can be done. The former marriage being invalid, he can contract another at any time—legally, I mean; the moral question is a different thing."

"So it seems," said Hannah, bitterly; for she was vexed at his manner—it seemed so hard, so unlike his usual warm, generous way of judging matters. "But," she argued, resolved to leave not a stone unturned for her poor servant's sake, "if the marriage with Grace was unlawful, why can not he be prosecuted for that, as for bigamy or similar offenses? Either it was a crime, or it was not. If it was, punish it by the law; if not—"

"You reason like a woman," interrupted Mr. Rivers, angrily. "When I, a man, have already argued the question with myself in every possible way—" He stopped abruptly. "I mean that you women will only see two sides of a subject—the right and the wrong."

"Yes, thank Heaven!"

"Whereas there are many sides, and a man requires to see them all. But we are slipping into ethical discussion, which you and I are rather prone to, Aunt Hannah. Suppose, instead, we go and look at our roses?"

Go and look at roses when a fellow-creature was hanging on every breath of theirs for hope or despair! Hannah had never thought her brother-in-law so hard-hearted.

"I can't go," she said. "I must first speak to poor Grace. What shall I say to her?"

"Whatever you like. But I think the less you say the better. And perhaps, if you could gently hint it, the sooner she leaves us the better. Of course she will have to leave."

"Leave!" repeated Hannah, much startled by the new phase which this most unlucky affair was assuming. "Why 'of course?' I never thought of her leaving."

"Do you not see? But no, you can not—you see nothing at all!" muttered Bernard Rivers to himself. "Do you not perceive," continued he, earnestly, "that we live in a house on a hill, morally as well as physically? That a clergyman must keep himself out of the slightest shadow of evil comment? I especially, both as rector of Easterham and as Sir Austin's son, must expect to have my acts and motives sharply criticised, and perhaps many a motive ascribed to me which does not exist. No; I have been thinking the matter over all the morning, and I see no alternative. Grace ought to go. I believe Lady Rivers and all at the Moat House would say the same."

Hannah drew back. She had never resisted her brother-in-law before—not even in cases where she had thought him a little wrong: though this happened seldom. She had found out that, like most men who are neither selfish nor egotistical, he was remarkably just. Now she felt him to be unjust. To send away Rosie's fond and faithful nurse would be to the child herself a very harmful thing—to Grace, in her circumstances, a bitter unkindness, not to say an actual wrong; and Miss Thelluson was not the woman to stand tamely by and see a wrong done to any human being if she could help it.

Still it was needful to be very guarded, and she might even have been less courageous had not the allusion to the Moat House and its opinions—always more or less shallow and worldly—stirred up in her something of that righteous indignation which blazed up, quite unexpectedly sometimes, in Aunt Hannah's quiet bosom.

"Excuse me," she said, more formally than she was used to speak, in the free and pleasant, even affectionate, relations that now subsisted between Mr. Rivers and herself. "Lady Rivers is mistress of the Moat House, but not of the House on the Hill. When you did me the honor to give me that position, you distinctly said I should manage it as I chose. I claim my right. For Rosie's sake, I must beg of you not to send away her nurse."

"Good Heavens! you will not see! How can I, placed as I am, keep in my house a woman who is disgraced for life?"

"Not disgraced; only unfortunate. She is a very good girl indeed. She protests solemnly she had not an idea that in marrying James Dixon she was doing wrong."

"How you women do hold to your point!" said Mr. Rivers, in great irritation, almost agitation. "But she has done wrong. She has broken the law. In the eye of the law she is neither more nor less than a poor seduced girl, mother of a bastard child."

Now Hannah Thelluson was an exceedingly "proper" person. That is, though not ignorant of the wickedness of the world—the things "done in secret," as St. Paul terms them—she agreed with St. Paul that it was a shame to speak of them, unless unavoidable, and for some good end. If duty required, she would have waded through any quantity of filth; but she did not like it; she preferred keeping in clean paths if possible. Oftentimes she had been startled, not to say shocked, by the light way in which some fast young ladies who came about the Moat House, and even the Misses Rivers themselves, talked of things which she and the girls of her generation scarcely knew existed, and certainly would never have spoken about, except to their own mothers. And among the qualities in Mr. Rivers which first drew her toward him was one which women soon instinctively find out in men—as men, they say, in women—that rare delicacy of thought and action which no outward decorum can ever imitate, because it springs from an innate chastity of soul. Thus, when in his excitement, Mr. Rivers used such exceedingly plain, ugly words, Miss Thelluson looked at him in intense astonishment, and blushed all over her face.

Some people called Hannah a plain woman—that is, she was tall and thin and colorless, not unlike the white lily she had been compared to; but when she blushed, it was like the white lily with a rosy sunset glow upon it. For the moment she looked absolutely pretty. Something in Mr. Rivers's eyes made her conscious that he thought so—or, at least, that he was thinking of her, and not of poor Grace or the subject in hand at all.

"Why do you not oftener wear white—I like it so much?" he said, softly touching her gown, a thick muslin, embroidered with black, which she thought would be a sort of medieval compromise. She was so fond of white that it was half regretfully she had decided she was too old to wear it. But among her new dresses she could not resist this one. It pleased her to have it noticed, or would have done, had not her mind been full of other things.

"I was going to the picnic in Langmead Wood, you know; but never mind that just now. Before I start I shall have to tell poor Grace her doom. A heavy blow it will be. Do not ask me to make it worse by telling her she must leave us."

Bernard was silent.

"I can not bear to resist your will," pleaded she. "When I first came here I made up my mind to obey you—that is, in all domestic things—even as she would have done. But even she would have resisted you in this. Were she living now, I am sure she would say exactly as I do—dear, tender-hearted Rosa!"

"Why do you name her?" said Mr. Rivers, in a low tone. "Are you not afraid?"

"Afraid! Why should I be? Of all women I ever knew, my sister had the truest heart, the quickest sense of justice. If she thought a thing was right, she would say it—ay, and do it, too—in face of the whole world. So would I."

"Would you? Are you one of those women who have courage to defy the world?"

"I think I am, if I were tried; but I never have been tried. I hope I never may be; and I hope, too, that you will save me from doing any more in the defiant line," added she, smiling, "by retracting what you said, and letting Grace stay."

"But how can she stay? How can you keep her miserable story a secret?"

"I should not keep it a secret at all. I would tell every body the whole truth, explaining that we drew the line between guilt and innocence; that you refused to marry James Dixon to this new wife of his, but that the poor creature whom he had made believe she was his wife should stay under the shelter of your roof as long as she liked. That, I am sure, would be the just and right way to act. Shall it be so?"

"You are a courageous woman, Hannah. But," added he, with a sad kind of smile, "it is like the courage of little boys venturing on our frozen pond there: they do not know how deep it is. No, no; I can not thus run counter to my own people and to all the world. In truth, I dare not."

"Dare not!" Hannah blazed up, in that sudden way of hers whenever she saw a wrong done—doubly so when any one she cared for did it. She had lived with Mr. Rivers nearly a year now, and, whether she cared for him or not, she had never seen any thing in him which made her cease to respect him. Until now. "Dare not!" she repeated, almost doubting if she had heard truly. "When there is a certain course of conduct open to him, be it right or wrong, I always believed that the last reason an honest man gave for declining it would be, 'I dare not!'"

Digitized by Google

The moment she had made this bitter speech—one of the old sarcastic speeches of her girlhood—Hannah saw it was a mistake; that she was taking with Mr. Rivers a liberty which even a flesh-and-blood sister had no right to take, and she was certain he felt it so. All the proud Norman blood rushed up to his forehead.

"I never knew I was a coward, Miss Thelluson. Since you think me one, I will relieve you of my company."

Opening the French window at once, he passed out of it into the garden, and disappeared.

Hannah stood, overwhelmed. During all the months they had lived under the same roof, and in the close intimacy that was inevitable under the circumstances, she and her brother-in-law had never had any thing approaching to a quarrel. They had differed widely sometimes, but always amicably, and upon abstract rather than personal grounds. Those "sharp words," which even the dearest friends say to one another sometimes, had never passed between them. His extraordinarily sweet temper—oh, how keenly Hannah now appreciated her sister's fond praise of the blessing it was to have a sweet-tempered husband!—his utter absence of worldliness and self-conceit; and that warm, good heart, which, as the cloud of misery slowly passed away from him, shone out in every thing he did and said—all these things made quarreling with Bernard Rivers almost impossible.

"What have I done?" thought Hannah, half laughing, half crying. "He must think me a perfect virago. I will apologize the minute he comes back."

But he did not come back: not though she waited an hour in the breakfast-room, putting off her household duties, and even that other, as painful as it was inevitable—speaking to poor Grace. But he never came. Then, going into the hall, she saw that his hat and coat had vanished. She knew his appointments of the morning, and was sure now that he was gone, and would be away the whole day.

Then Hannah became more than perplexed—thoroughly unhappy. Even Grace's forlorn face, when she told her—she had not the heart to tell more—that Mr. Rivers could promise nothing, but that she hoped he would prevent the marriage, if possible, failed to affect her much; and Rosie's little arms round her neck, and the fond murmur of "Tannie, Tannie," did not give nearly the comfort that they were wont to do.

"Tannie has been naughty," said she, feeling a strange relief in confessing her sins to the unconscious child. "Tannie has vexed papa. When Rosie grows up she must never vex papa. She must try to be a comfort to him: he has no one else."

Poor Hannah! She had done wrong, and she knew it. When this was the case, nothing and nobody could soothe Hannah Thelluson.

With a heavy heart she got ready for the picnic—a family affair between this house and the Moat House, which was still full of visitors. The girls were to fetch first their brother from the school-house, and then herself; but when the carriage came round Mr. Rivers was not in it.

"Bernard is thoroughly sulky to-day," said the eldest sister. "He doesn't seem to know his own mind at all, whether he will go or won't; but perhaps he may turn up by-and-by. Don't let us bother about him. Such a splendid day it is for a picnic, and Langmead Wood at its loveliest time! Do let us enjoy ourselves."

They did enjoy themselves, and certainly, Hannah thought, were not much "bothered" by their brother's sulkiness, or afflicted by his absence. The fraternal bond is so free and easy that, except in cases of very special affection, brothers and sisters can speedily console themselves with somebody else.

But with herself it was not so. She thought the girls rather heartless in missing Bernard so little. She missed him a good deal, and set down her regrets as conscience-stings. They hindered half her enjoyment of the lovely wood, just putting on its green clothing, full of primroses and hyacinths, and nest-building birds pouring out on all sides a rapture of spring-time song. She scarcely heard it, or hearing it only gave her pain.

"I was unkind to him," she thought; "unkind to a man whose wife is dead, who goes lonely through the world, and needs every allowance that can be made for him, every comfort that can be given him. He, too, who is always so considerate and kind to me! How ungrateful I have been!"

So absorbed was she in her contrition that she did not notice for ever so long what otherwise would have interested her much—a very patent love-affair now going on between Adeline Rivers and this same Mr. Melville, the young squire whom Grace had mentioned. To bring him "to the point," as one of the girls confidentially told her, this picnic had been planned, hoping that the tender influence of the woody glades of Langmead would open his heart, and turn it from nebulous courtship to substantial marriage—a marriage evidently highly acceptable to the whole family. Which Hannah thought rather odd, considering what she knew of the family opinions, and that it was but the mere chance of a marriage happening before instead of after the year 1835 which saved Herbert Melville from being in the same position as poor Grace's son—a "base-born" child.

Late in the afternoon Bernard appeared. They were all sitting in a circle round the remnants of the dinner. He shook hands with every body, ending with Miss Thelluson. Words were impossible there; but Hannah tried to make her eyes say, "Are we friends? I am so sorry." The apology fell hopeless: he was looking in another direction; and she shrank back into herself, feeling more unhappy, in a foolish, causeless, childish sort of way, than she remembered to have done for at least ten years.

If

> "To be wroth with one we love > Doth work like madness in the brain," to be wroth with ourselves for having wronged one we love is pretty nearly as bad; except that in such a case we are able to punish ourselves unlimitedly, as Hannah did, with the most laudable pertinacity, for a full hour. She listened with patience to endless discussions, tête-à-tête, among Lady Rivers and her girls, upon the chances and prospects of the young couple for whose benefit the picnic was made—who, poor things, knew well what they were brought there for, and what was expected of them before returning home. At any other time she would have pitied or smiled at this pair of lovers, who finally slipped aside among the trees, out of sight, though not out of comment, of their affectionate families; and she might have felt half amused, half indignant, at the cool, public way in which the whole matter was discussed. But now her heart was too sore and sad; she just listened politely to every body that wanted a listener, and meantime heard painfully every word her brother-in-law said, and saw every movement he made—not one, however, in her direction. She made a martyr of herself, did every thing she did not care to do, and omitted the only thing she longed to do—to go up straight to Mr. Rivers and say, "Are you angry with me still? Do you never mean to forgive me?"

Apparently not, for he kept sedulously out of her way, and yet near her, though not a word between them was possible. This behavior at last tantalized her so much that she fairly ran away: stole quietly out of the circle, and hid herself in a nut-wood dell, filling her hands with blue hyacinths.

"Hannah, what are you doing?"

"Gathering a nosegay to take home to Rosie."

A brief question and answer. Yet they seemed to clear away the cloud. Mr. Rivers stood watching a little while, and then began helping her to gather the flowers.

"How continually you think of Rosie's pleasure. But you do of every body's. What a warm, good heart you have!"

"Have I? I doubt it," answered Hannah, with a faltering voice; for she was touched by his gentleness, by that wonderfully sweet nature he had—so rare in a man, yet not unmanly, if men could only believe this! Hannah had long ceased to wonder why her brother-in-law was so universally beloved.

"I think you and I rather quarreled this morning, Aunt Hannah? We never did so before, did we?"

"No."

"Then don't let us do it again. Here is my hand."

Hannah took it joyfully, tried to speak, and signally failed.

"You don't mean to say you are crying?"

"I am afraid I am. It is very silly, but I can't help it. I never was used to quarreling, and I have been quite unhappy all day. You see"—and she raised her face with the innocent childlike expression it sometimes wore, more childlike, he once told her, than any creature he ever saw over ten years old—"you see, I had behaved so ill to you—you that are unfailingly kind to me."

"Not kind—say grateful. Oh, Hannah!" he said, with great earnestness, "I owe you more, much more, than I can ever repay. I was sinking into a perfect slough of despond, becoming a miserable, useless wretch, a torment to myself and every body about me, when it came into my head to send for you. You roused me; you made me feel that my life was not ended; that I had still work to do, and strength to do it with. Hannah, if any human being ever saved another, you saved me."

Hannah was much moved. Still more so when, drooping his head, and playing absently with a mass of dead leaves, from under which blue violets were springing, he added,

"I sometimes think she must have sent you to me—do you?"

"I think thus much—that she would rejoice if I, or any one, was able to do you any good. Any generous woman would, after she had gone away, and could do you good no more. She would wish you to be happy—even if it were with another woman—another wife."

Hannah said this carefully, deliberately; she had long waited for a chance of saying it, that he might know exactly what was her feeling about second marriages, did he contemplate any thing of the sort. He evidently caught her meaning, and was pained by it.

"Thank you. Rosa said much the same thing to me just before she died. But I have no intention of marrying again. At least not now."

Hannah could not tell why, but she felt relieved—even glad. The incubus of several weeks was taken off at once, as well as that other burden, which she had no idea would have weighed her down so much—the feeling of being at variance with her brother-in-law.

He sat down beside her on a felled log, and they began talking of all sorts of things—the beauty of the wood, the wonderfully delicious spring day; and how Rosie would have enjoyed it; how she would enjoy it by-and-by, when she was old enough to be brought to picnics at Langmead. All trivial subjects, lightly and gayly discussed; but they were straws to show how the wind blew, and Hannah was sure now that the wind blew fair again—that Mr. Rivers had forgiven and forgotten every thing.

Not every thing; for he asked suddenly if she had told Grace the bitter truth, and how she bore it.

"Patiently, of course; but she is nearly broken-hearted."

"Poor soul! And you think, Hannah, that if she—Rosa—had been here, she would have let Grace stay?"

"I am sure she would. She was so just, so pure, so large in all her judgments; she would have seen at once that Grace meant no harm—that no real guilt could attach to her, only misfortune; and, therefore, it was neither necessary nor right to send her away."

"Very well. I came to tell you that she shall not be sent away. I have reconsidered the question, and am prepared to risk all the consequences of keeping her—for my little girl's sake and yours."

Hannah burst into broken thanks, and then fairly began to cry again: She could not tell what was the matter with her. Her joy was as silly and weak-minded as her sorrow. She was so ashamed of herself as to be almost relieved when Mr. Rivers, laughing at her in a kindly, pleasant way, rose up and rejoined his sisters.

The rest of the day she had scarcely ten words with him, yet she felt as happy as possible. Peace was restored between him and herself, and Grace's misery was lightened a little, though, alas! not much. Perhaps, since even her master said she had done no intentional wrong, the poor girl would get used to her lot in time. It could not be a very dreary lot—to take care of Rosie. And Aunt Hannah longed for her little darling—wished she had her in her arms, to show her the heaps of spring flowers, and the rabbits with their funny flashes of white tails, appearing and disappearing beneath the tender ferns that were shooting up under the dead leaves of last year—life out of death, joy out of sorrow, as God meant it to be.

Nay, even the Rivers family and the rest seemed to drop a little of their formal worldliness, and become young men and maidens, rejoicing in the spring. Especially the well-watched pair of lovers, who had evidently come to an understanding, as desired; for when, after a lengthy absence, they reappeared, bringing two small sticks apiece, as their contributions to the fire that was to boil the kettle, their shyness and awkwardness were only equaled by their expression of blushing content.

Why should not old maid Hannah be content likewise, though she was not in her teens like Adeline, and had no lover? But she had a tender feeling about lovers still; and in this blithe and happy spring-time it stirred afresh, and her heart was moved in a strange sort of way—half pleasant, half sad.

Besides, this day happened to be an anniversary. Not that Hannah was among those who keep anniversaries; on the contrary, she carefully avoided them; but she never forgot them. Many a time, when nobody knew, she was living over again, with an ineffaced and ineffaceable vividness, certain days and certain hours burned into her memory with the red-hot iron of affliction. The wounds had healed over, but the scars remained. For years she had never seen yellow November fogs without recalling the day when Arthur sailed; nor cowslips, but she remembered having a bunch of them in her hand when she got the letter telling her of his death, just as he was "getting up May Hill," as they often say of consumptive people. And for years—oh, how many years it seemed!—after that day spring days had given her a cruel pain; as if the world had all come alive again, and Arthur was dead.

To-day, even though it was the very anniversary of his death, she felt differently. There came back into her heart that long-forgotten sense of spring, which always used to come with the primroses and cowslips, when Arthur and she played together among them. The world had come alive again, and Arthur had come alive too, but more as when he was a little boy and her play-fellow than her lover. A strange kind of fancy entered her mind—a wonder what he was like now—boy, or man, or angel; and what he was doing in that land, which, try as we will, we can not realize, and are not meant to realize, in any way that would narrow our duties here. Whether he still remained the same, or had altered, as she was conscious she had altered; grown as she had grown, and suffered; no, he could not suffer as she had suffered these ten, eleven years. Did he want her? or was he happy without her? Would they, when they met, meet as betrothed lovers, or as the angels in heaven, "who neither marry nor are given in marriage?"

All those thoughts, and many more, went flitting across her mind as Miss Thelluson sat in a place she often took—it saved talking, and she liked it—beside the old coachman on the Moat House carriage, as they drove in the soft May twilight, through glade and woodland, moor and down, to Easterham village. And, when far off, she saw the light shining from a window of the House on the Hill, her heart leaped to it—her heart, not her fancy—for there was her warm, happy, human home. There, under that peaceful roof, centred all her duties, all her delights; there, in the quiet nursery, little Rosie lay sleeping, ready to wake up next morning fresh as the flowers, merry as a young lambkin, developing more and more in her opening child-life—the most wonderful and lovely sight God ever gives us, and he gives it us every day—a growing human soul.

"Oh, if Rosa could only see her now—the daughter for whom she died!" sighed Hannah; and then suppressed the sigh as irreligious, unjust. "No. I think if Rosa came back to us, and saw us now—him and her baby, and me—she would not be unhappy. She would say—what I should say myself, if I died—that when God takes our dead from us, he means us not to grieve forever, only to remember."

COUNTING THE COST.

DECISION often turns upon duly counting the cost. Where duty, or the good of other men, puts in no claim, we can not too deliberately estimate the result of any fresh enterprise or line of conduct. Once started on a course of action, it frequently happens that we can not, if we would, draw back. At first nothing may have seemed easier than to have turned here or there; but afterward, not so; at whatever cost, with whatever result, an inexorable necessity may urge us on. So the first counting is the ruling point, if only our estimate is true. Are our abilities equal to the task—our strength proportionate to the work? Will our endurance hold out to the end, and can we give up the things required? Is there reasonable hope that our ardor will not abate ere the prize be won, or the work accomplished? If so, and the object be worthy, then onward, and God speed us. Something we must relinquish for the attainment of any good end: we are here in the midst of contrarieties, and the pursuit of one object frequently necessitates giving up another. Moreover, the stretch and tension of mind consequent upon following up any great result force us to abandon many other things. The measure of the excellence of things and conditions is the grand point; loyal pursuit and our own powers, aided by God, then remain to us. In the ordinary and minor concerns of life, wherever we see our special power, in that direction we do well to go, if no duty hinders. Wherever we find any stronger mental power than usual, there shall we be most likely to succeed; and for that it may be well to make some sacrifice.

It will be found that men who have left the most indelible mark upon their age have been men possessed by one idea, and who steadily followed that, giving up many comforts and pursuits for that master problem. Many such men have followed on steadily to the end they had in view, amidst much hardship and oppression by other and weaker men, with a noble disregard of cost to themselves along the way, after first entering thereon. So we come to see that the question of counting the cost should be taken up first; then, if the object be good, cost should no more concern us. So have the brightest men who ever shed lustre on time worked on enthusiastically, regardless of self, merging self in the universal good. The rest of men see the privation and weariness, the wear and tear of the man, his isolation and loss of many social pleasures; but these he disregards in order to attain his end—to realize his overmastering idea. To such men is our progress in art, science, and commerce mainly due: they, as it were, coerce our knowledge, and push forward the march of our race with wider strides. Possibly the isolation of genius, and its lack of immediate appreciation, is the severest cost of its effort. Great men, of one paramount object and idea, are generally in advance of their day, and so lack due regard while living.

It is a mean spirit that has reference always to cost and remuneration, and lets the opportunity for doing good pass on with the suspicion that "it won't pay." The best and greatest gifts we can confer on one another can have no pay in kind, and may cost us much; but it is a poor thing to neglect them, and in many cases we had better do our best, and leave the question of cost alone. No few men seem to refer nearly all considerations to this standard, and consequently discard many questions involving kindness and advantage to others as not worth their while at all. Benevolent enterprises find in them no supporters, as yielding no adequate return (in their estimation) for the cost incurred. This is, of course, a very selfish mode of looking at things, but it is sadly too common among shrewd tradesmen. Accustomed in daily transactions to weigh pound for pound, and look well for profit on first cost, there is with narrow minds a tendency to carry this practice beyond the counter into the relations of private life, and so to measure things by a material standard only. Many good men of business seem to fall into this hard, matter-of-fact view of things, to their own great loss, as well as that of people around them. They grow to undervaluing the good essentially existing in noble actions, as well as the boon conferred on others; and in too many cases looking at charitable deeds only as they redound to the credit with the public of those bestowing them. A base method this, of counting the cost, and one studiously to be shunned.

As bearing upon the lives of individuals, counting the cost is needful when entering any special line of conduct or any marked enterprise, as showing our ability or not to pursue it to the end, and so to escape failure and the ridicule of men. But as regards repeated daily acts of duty, and daily kindness to those about us, we must not let cost to ourselves withhold good from others, but rather rejoice to see some good thing carried over from us to others, and so enjoy their gladness at possession. We shall probably find the cost returned to us in another form. Sometimes during life we shall arrive at points where the cost demanded from us is very great, and seems almost too heavy to bear; if such occasions come in the course of Providence, we had better not think of cost, but give up as cheerfully as we may what is demanded from us, though we see no return but loss and long privation. In all probability the result will not be so bad as appears at the time. But if so, no matter: we must give up, and then trust. In the future we know not what recompense may be to us; cost cheerfully borne, hope may fairly remain with us. From some high vantage-ground in the future we may look back upon each small cost borne in the path of right and of kindliness to others, and smile at our scanty foresight then, and the littleness of the sacrifice compared with the full measure and superabundance of the good things returned to us.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—DRESS WITH DOUBLE SKIRT AND BASQUE-WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 4–8.

Fig. 3.—DRESS WITH SWISS MUSLIN OVER-SKIRT AND BLOUSE-WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 9–12.

Fig. 4.—DRESS WITH TRAIN AND HEART-SHAPED BASQUE-WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 13–16. For design see Suppl., No. XVIII., Figs. 51 and 52.

Fig. 5.—SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—EVENING DRESS FOR YOUNG LADY.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 7.—DRESS WITH DOUBLE SKIRT AND HEART-SHAPED BASQUE-WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

LADIES' DINNER DRESSES. AND SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—DRESS WITH DOUBLE SKIRT AND BASQUE-WAIST.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 25-30.

Fig. 2.—DRESS WITH SLEEVELESS JACKET.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 31 and 32.

Fig. 3.—SATIN DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 4.—FOULARD DRESS WITH HIGH WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 5.—CASHMERE DRESS WITH DOUBLE SKIRT AND BASQUE-WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 6.—DRESS WITH DOUBLE SKIRT AND BASQUE-WAIST.—BACK.—[See Fig. 1.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 25-30.

Fig. 7.—GROS GRAIN DRESS WITH DOUBLE SKIRT AND HIGH WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 33-35.

Fig. 8.—EMPRESS CLOTH DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 9.—LIGHT BROWN POPLIN DRESS.
For description see Supplement.

LADIES' HOME AND EVENING DRESSES.

Digitized by Google

ONE WOMAN'S MISSION.

"SO you are positive that women have a mission?"

"Yes indeed. And not only women, but men too. I am confident that in this great world, where there is so much wood to be hewed and water to be drawn, every one, irrespective of sex, should put a shoulder to the wheel of life, and give it a push as vigorous as his or her best capacity allows. I believe every body is bound to do the world some good if he can."

"But suppose every body doesn't feel an interest in every body else, and doesn't want to do any good; suppose one cares more for himself—except, possibly, one or two persons—than for all the world and its haps and mishaps; suppose that one is indolent by nature, and doesn't want to step into the miry roads of existence, and help old Time to roll the world's burdens up hill—what would you do with him then? Surely you wouldn't be hard-hearted enough to mark out a path of unselfishness, and compel him to walk in it against his will and inclination, would you, Miss Rose?" And Mr. Roger Thorpe turned a trifle more toward his companion, and drew his Panama hat a shade lower over his regular nose, but not low enough to lose a single glimpse of the sunbeams—a hundred times more shining and golden from contact with Rose Anthon's bright hair—or one dilation of the delicate nostrils, answering to every new emotion of her heart.

"Well, really, Mr. Thorpe, I can hardly say what I should do with such a man—always providing I could do any thing with him, which is doubtful." She looked perfectly in earnest as she said this; and Roger thought it just possible she might mean it; though a pretty woman, as Rose certainly was, who knew not her own power was, in his mind, an anomaly.

"But," she continued, "if I knew a woman who felt so, I should try by every means in my power to show her how much there is for women to do that can not well and ought not to be done by men. I am sure there is as much need of women's labor in the world as of men's, though not in the same fields."

"But surely, Miss Rose, you do not think, like many progressionists, that every woman, to say nothing of every man, ought to earn her own livelihood by daily labor? You don't believe that every woman has a mission to do something unlike what every other woman has been doing from time immemorial?"

"Beware, Mr. Thorpe," playfully shaking her finger at him. "Don't begin a tirade on woman's sphere, because we have enough of that every day in the newspapers; and I don't intend to do or say any thing which will shock your most delicate sensibility. I do not think all persons ought to earn their livelihood. If any have means, they ought to leave all salaried places for those who have little or nothing. But there is so much work to be done that no money can pay for—so much that is peculiarly women's work—that I am anxious they should rouse themselves to it."

"You—you don't intend to lecture, or any thing of that sort, do you?" and Roger Thorpe impatiently pulled apart little bunches of pine needles covering the ground about them.

Rose Anthon laughed—a round, rich, melodious laugh, such as one seldom hears from a woman's throat.

"No, indeed, Mr. Thorpe. Didn't I just say I would not do any thing to shock you? and that would, I know. I don't feel any call to the platform, or 'any thing of that sort,' as you say. It is well for me, however, that I do not regard the world as such a farce as Dr. Jeddler did, since I have my own battle to fight with it. No: my mission is to secure my own oysters and coffee—I can't tolerate bread-and-butter, and won't even contemplate the possibility of coming to them as a regular diet. I have no doubt there is a vacant niche in the world's wall for me somewhere, and, if I look faithfully for it, I shall find it. You know, I suppose (though I can't say why you should, except that every body knows about his neighbors the things that least concern him), that my poor father left barely enough property to provide for my mother?"

Mr. Thorpe did know that the late Charles Anthon, who died several months before, left but little money to his wife and daughter; and he had come that very September afternoon to offer his hand, fortune, and, he believed, his heart, to Rose. The pleasant time had passed without his uttering the words he had intended; and somehow they seemed to have slipped away from him during the last few minutes. Rose was very pretty, he knew; she was good, he thought; and he believed he loved her; ay, would have staked his soul upon it an hour before. And now just those little words of hers about a woman's mission had turned all the currents of his thought; and he felt glad he had not asked her to be his wife. Not that she had said a word which was unwomanly, or expressed a sentiment that could be called "pernicious;" but he could not remember the time when he had not had a dread of a woman with a mission, and an undefinable feeling that such a one would be better as a friend than as a partner for life.

One might have supposed Roger Thorpe had his fortune to make in pine cones, so busily did he gather them into little mountains before him during the silence of the next few minutes. He was trying to reason away his feeling; to assure himself that Rose was the same Rose she had been when he first came; that her words only represented theories which a breath of masculine logic could destroy. His mood was beginning to soften when, between the trees, came the quick, sharp ring of a bell. He sprang to his feet, and Rose got up from the log on which she had been sitting, and said, "Won't you stay to tea, Mr. Thorpe? My mother will be pleased to have you, as well as I."

"I thank you; not to-night. I have an engagement, and you know I leave to-morrow morning. Be good enough to make my adieus to Mrs. Anthon. And believe, though I don't agree with you about missions, that I wish you the greatest success. Good-by, Rose."

Roger gave the slender hand he held a decided pressure in memory of the time when he had intended to ask for it, which, to be sure, was only an hour before. Rose stood watching him till he waved his hand from the top of the hill; then turned in the direction of the house.

And so, because the tea-bell rang too soon, these two lost the happiness they never can recall.

When Roger Thorpe had passed out of Rose Anthon's sight he gradually slackened his pace, and began seriously to reflect—probably as rare an occupation with him as with most men of five-and-twenty, whose faces are handsome, and whose fortunes are ample. He might be said to be having rather than enjoying a retrospective vision of the past three months. The first glance rested, quite naturally, on himself, and he discovered a young man well educated, well bred, well-looking, and, what was by no means least in his estimation, well provided with this world's goods. He had arrived early the preceding June at his former home, now empty of all save the housekeeper and man-of-all-work. He had intended to stay only a few days—long enough to form a plan for summer traveling; but the hot weather came on suddenly, and he had lingered till he had ceased to care to go elsewhere.

His first object in visiting any new place—he had not been there for years—was to find if it contained any agreeable people, and who they were. He was very fond of society, without being gregarious; but had few friends among his own sex. He was too indolent in body to like very energetic men, and too active in mind to sympathize with those who were mentally inert; so he usually sought his companions among bright and clever women, who, in all respects, suited him better. His acquaintance with Rose Anthon had begun almost immediately after his appearance in the neighborhood, and had flourished, for two very obvious reasons. First, her house stood on the road to the little town, in and about which clustered all the society of the region, and was, consequently, directly in his way whenever he went out in search of somebody to entertain him. Second, Rose, being in mourning, was almost always to be found at home; and nothing bored him more than to call when a lady was out. In consequence of these fortuitous circumstances it had been observed by the gossips that Miss Anthon had been the recipient of many calls during the first month of Mr. Thorpe's stay, the object of more decided attentions during the second month, and during the third it was remarked by these wiseacres, with many sagacious nods and winks, that they guessed the Thorpe place would have a mistress next year.

Roger Thorpe had no particular prejudice in favor of or against matrimony, concluded it was the natural law, supposed when the right time came he should be married any how, and there dismissed the subject. But during the last few days he had come to the conclusion—through what mental processes he could not well define—that not only the right time, but the right woman had arrived, and that the fortunate Mrs. Thorpe to be was Rose Anthon.

All this passed again and again through his mind as he walked leisurely on, and occupied his thoughts, to the exclusion of every thing else (the engagement he had pleaded to Rose was a polite fiction), while he sat at his lonely table in his own solitary dining-room. He certainly had been very much in love with Rose; of that he was entirely sure; he was not so sure he had ceased to be. And yet he could not—no, he certainly could not; he was quite certain as to that, at any rate—marry a woman with a mission. He wondered how deeply those unpleasant notions were fixed in Rose's active brain; if the words were the idle utterance of a half-jesting argument, or if below them lay an earnest, serious conviction of their truth. He would have given all he was worth to know, and yet he was afraid to ask. As he thought how lovely Rose had looked in the light of the setting sun, with her nimbus of wonderful golden hair, and her pansy-like eyes, he grew vexed with her for disarranging his domestic plans so suddenly, and in his discomfiture almost forgot to light the inevitable post-prandial cigar of bachelorhood.

In all his reflections the thought never entered Roger's mind that many a woman could find her mission as plainly defined, and be as contented and happy in performing it, within the four walls of her own home as in a larger field of action. He didn't realize that there are women whose mission is just as evidently presiding over households, and managing domestic affairs, as there are those designed by nature to be authors, artists, and musicians. The word "mission" from a woman's lips had a horrible, indefinite significance to him; and before it he had fled as he would have done before an army of Amazons.

The golden chance of his life had come; he had seen the tree which bore for him the fairest fruit in all the world, and he had blindly refused to pluck it, because its shape had been other than he had fancied. Something of this he felt as he determined to go to sleep to rid himself of his thoughts, and something like it next morning, when the cars whirled him away toward the city.

If Rose had been a young woman of much novel-reading and of weak digestion, she would probably have declined food, and lain awake of nights over this abrupt ending of the little romance she had unconsciously woven in the delicious days of the summer passed. But she was a healthy, sensible, fresh-hearted girl, and trouble apparently rested lightly on her round young shoulders. She manipulated the duster with her usual dexterity, her appetite was excellent, and her mother's anxious heart was satisfied there were no painful reminiscences in her daughter's mind of the weeks that were gone. And, considering that Rose was brave and cheerful in her daily life, it may be pardoned her that, often lingering late over her nightly hair-brushing in her own little chamber, she dreamed of what had been, rather than what would be, and acknowledged within herself that the past held for her what the future could never give.

With all the courage of worldly inexperience Rose set about looking for the niche which she fondly believed was awaiting her somewhere, and, like many others in a similar position, was disappointed over and over again. Her most cherished visions were rudely dissipated, her most elaborate plans abruptly dispelled. At last, after weary though patient search, she accepted, from sheer necessity, the position of music-teacher in a boarding-school in the little town near which she lived.

If Rose's life was dreary and unsatisfactory, no less so was Roger's. On his return to the city he did what many another man has done before, deliberately made a business of trying to fall in love with some other woman. The thought of Rose haunted him, and he labored to rid himself of it by devoting himself to her sex generally. With a degree of energy quite new to him he pursued his sentimental purpose. Several times he fancied the old love was conquered by a new, but a remembered word or look of Rose put the notion to flight. He met cleverer women than she, and handsomer, and wiser; for, after all, she was but an undisciplined girl; but the charm, the inexplicable something which had first caught his fancy, and then won his heart, he could find in no other. Thus fixing the remembrance of her more surely in his mind by his endeavors to forget her, he passed the winter; and the summer, with all its sweetness and beauty, found the battle of head and heart still raging. Not one word of Rose had reached him in all the months since he had seen her. Whether she had found her mission, and was performing it, or whether she was still searching for it, he had no idea, though he occupied much time in conjecturing.

One evening he picked up a weekly paper, and, for want of something better to do, began to read a story. It was only a little commonplace love-story, but it impressed him very much. It was in merit hardly an average story. The plot was almost flimsy, the action nothing; but something in it reminded him of his last interview with Rose. In the characters he unwittingly saw himself and her, and through it all ran a vein of sadness that touched him deeply. A dozen times during the evening he thought of it, and before he retired he read it again. It mingled with his dreams, and in the morning, after putting the paper carefully in his pocket, he walked deliberately to the station, and was soon on his way to his old home. It was against his better judgment, but the temptation was strong. He wanted to go—which was the best possible excuse—and he went.

It was not a particularly plain or smooth path that led through the woods where he and Rose parted the year before; but Roger found no difficulty in tracing it the afternoon after his arrival. He fancied he should like to be among the old trees again before he saw Rose; indeed, now that he had come, he was not at all sure he would go to see her at all. His coming was an act of impulse; why or for what he came he could not determine. He strode along, pushing the branches right and left, till he reached the spot where he and she had spent the last afternoon together. There sat Rose on the old dead tree-trunk where she had sat before; but so absorbed she did not notice his approach. He watched her several minutes before she suddenly glanced up and saw him.

"You here!" she exclaimed, springing up, with a nervous laugh.

"Yes, I'm here again," Roger answered, throwing himself down on the pine-needle carpet, and motioning to her to reseat herself.

"Are you going to stay all summer?" asked Rose, after an uncomfortable pause, in which she grew red and white by turns, and devoutly wished the heavens would fall, or some other phenomenon of nature would occur to break the silence.

"I don't know," said Roger; "it depends upon circumstances;" and circumstances in Mr. Roger's mind willfully took the form of a fair-haired maiden with pansy-like eyes.

The young gentleman knew very well he was touching on dangerous ground, as he lay there at Rose's feet, and watched the play of sunlight and shadow over her face and figure. The resolutions to which he had tenaciously clung for a whole year were slipping away, and his contradictory nature scarcely made an effort to retain a lingering grasp upon them. Listening to the sounding stillness; breathing the delicious air, freighted with the pungent, balsamic odors of the pines; half seeing the sparkling river, winding along beyond the trees; contented with Rose's mere presence—he was saturated with the sentiment of the time and place, and lazily wished there might be no end.

A fly lighted on his face, and Rose made an instinctive motion to brush it off; but before she could withdraw her hand Roger's had closed over it, and held it prisoner.

"Rose," asked Roger, after a while, "have you found your mission yet?"

"No, not yet," answered Rose, with a half-vexed laugh. "I find that missions are not always so clearly defined as one could wish; and the opportunities in the world are so limited for women. I believe in my theories just as fully; but I have almost come to the conclusion that my mission must be housekeeping, as I don't succeed very well in any thing else."

"I think so too," cried Roger, springing to his feet, and drawing Rose up with him. "And I believe your mission is to keep my house. Rose, Rose, my darling, do you love me? Will you be my housekeeper?"

And Rose answered by gliding into the outstretched arms.

By-and-by Roger told her all about his love when he had seen her last; that her words about a mission had alarmed him; that he had gone away, and tried to forget her; had tried, indeed, to love somebody else; and that the reading of a foolish little love-story had filled him with irresistible longing to see her.

"And here's the story," added Roger, taking the precious paper out of his pocket, and beginning to read it aloud. Rose glanced at the paper, and flushed to her hair. When he finished it Roger turned to her, saying. "You see there isn't much in it; but it reminded me so much of you, dear, and myself too, and these old woods we used to visit so often together, that I couldn't help coming. Why, by the color of your cheeks, darling, I should fancy you had written the story yourself!" and Roger turned the blushing face toward him.

"I did write it," whispered Rose, hiding her face on his shoulder.

"You wrote it! Have you been turning blue-stocking in my absence, then, little lady?"

"No, no; that is my first, last, and only attempt in literature, Roger; and I suppose I must unconsciously have put you and myself into the characters."

"Then, my love," said Roger, folding Rose closer in his arms, and looking tenderly down in her violet eyes, "since it was your spoken words that came between us and separated us for a year, so now it is your written words that have brought us together again and united us."

"Forever, Roger?"

"Yes, forever, Rose; for love, my own heart tells me, is immortal."

GLIMPSES OF LIFE IN PARIS BEFORE THE WAR.

CHEZ MONSIEUR GRANDHOMME.

M. GRANDHOMME was holding his levée. The Rue de la Paix was lined with carriages, waiting for the fair occupants who were waiting on M. Grandhomme. It was no trifling matter to obtain an audience from M. Grandhomme. To be admitted into the sanctum sanctorum of the man who, from his atelier, ruled the fashion of Europe and America—it was a distinction coveted by all, but granted only to a few. In the choice of those few the despot was controlled by no recognized standard of rank or wealth. They were, of course, drawn from that intangible and exclusive Walhalla known as Society; but he showed no distinct deference to the relative degrees of rank within that hierarchy. Like M. Dalmonferac, M. Grandhomme exacted above all that his protégées should be distinguées and sympathiques. Acting on this first principle, he behaved with startling audacity in the distribution of his favors. An embassadress would be kept "making antichambre," and allowed to return again and again, before being admitted to the presence-chamber; while the autocrat was deliberately devoting the energies of his milliner mind to the decoration of some new beauty from the provinces, whom Madame l'Ambassadrice would hesitate before inviting to her Samedis. A millionaire banker's wife would be dismissed with oracular laconism, and handed over to one of the subaltern priestesses of the Grandhomme temple; while the great man himself attended to the case of one of his favorites—a lady of moderate income, comparatively speaking (all M. Grandhomme's votaries were supposed to be women of fortune), and expended himself in the combination of a succès for her next ball. Like all human beings possessed of absolute power, he was apt to exercise it too often at the bidding of his own caprice.

The first person who caught my eye on this particular day was my beautiful friend Berthe. Indeed, I had begged her to look in there during the afternoon, to keep me in countenance; and as the Grandhomme galleries were a sort of fashionable lounge, where tout Paris met for "combination" and gossip, she made no difficulty of doing so.

"It's very gentille of you to have come," I said, making my way up to her, after answering nods of recognition on either side; "and now you must help me to order my costume."

"What is it to be?"

"Nothing very showy. I thought of having violet gros grain."

"Hum!" muttered Berthe, looking dubiously at my hair; "I doubt the wisdom of that. You are rather pale to venture on violet, chérie. But here comes Monsieur Grandhomme. We will consult him."

Consult M. Grandhomme! Why, I had as soon dreamed of consulting the Grand Lama. Scores of women, whose reckless extravagance could have laid legitimate claim to that honor, had gone on ruining their husbands, season after season, and never been so privileged. But Berthe was in her own way as great a power as M. Grandhomme. If he was l'homme de la mode, she was la femme à la mode; each ruled fashion in a separate empire, and treated together on equal terms.

"What nonsense!" I exclaimed, laughing at the bare notion of such an absurdity. "While all Paris is waiting here to order unlimited wonders, is it likely he will lose his time with me?"

"We shall see," replied Berthe, with a saucy air of conscious supremacy over tout Paris there assembled. "Ah! the Princesse de M—— has caught him, I see, and she's sure to keep him half an hour. Let us sit down and bide our time."

We sat down.

Digitized by Google

"Chère Comptesse, you would be an angel of charity to give me a little advice about my fancy dress for la Marine," said a young girl, running up to Berthe, and taking her hand with pretty beseechingness. "I've come four times, and waited the whole afternoon each time, and lost my singing-lesson twice, in hopes of getting to speak to Monsieur Grandhomme; and he has never even looked at me. Do, please, give me an idea! I have more confidence in you than any one, except Monsieur Grandhomme. Mamma advises me to go en Bergère de Watteau; but I'm afraid I'm too tall for that."

Berthe was good-nature personified; she did not know what jealousy meant; and she took a nice womanly pleasure in helping other women to look their best.

"Well—perhaps," she answered, reflectively; "but I'm not sure. Watteau would suit your face to perfection; and as to your height, I don't see why a shepherdess should invariably be small. Besides, the short petticoat and the hat, and the whole character of the costume, are adapted to take from one's height. On the other hand, there are sure to be flocks of Bergères. My dear child, you should have spoken to me of this before—quietly, when I could have pondered it over with a calm brain. One can not think out a subject seriously in a whirl like this. Come to me this evening; you will find me alone, and we will put our heads together, and combine something delicious and new."

"Dear madame, how good you are!" and the girl kissed her in a rapture of gratitude. "Then I will tell mamma we may go now. She is so tired waiting here day after day, and always disappointed."

"Stop!" cried Berthe, calling after her; "wait a little. Madame de M—— is going to release Monsieur Grandhomme. See; they are moving this way. I shall seize him, and make him decide for you on the spot."

The girl, blushing with delight, did as she was told, and in a nervous flutter of excitement stood close to Berthe, watching the great man drawing nigh.

While the Princesse de M—— was closing her conference, many minor ones were going on all round us.

"I don't feel my mind made up about it," observed a dashing, handsome, and, as she would herself have said, gorgeously dressed person, whose loud voice and nasal intonation left no doubt as to her nationality. "It's not the expense that stops me. Mr. T. K. gives me ten thousand dollars a year for my clothes, and likes me to be as well dressed as any lady in the States. Besides, I'm going over to London by-and-by; and I want the Britishers to think pretty considerable pumpkins of me."

"I reckon they're sure to," replied the lady addressed; "I'd have it, if I were you; you're safe not to see one like it in London; and I know there's nothing takes there in society so much as that style of dress; and, as you say, Mr. T. K. don't mind about the expense."

"Mademoiselle!" called out the first speaker; "I want to give an order."

"Madame is English? American? Ah! good. Will madame take the trouble to pass to the room on the right? She will be attended to at once."

"Are there separate establishments for every nationality?" I inquired of Berthe, who, being a habitué, knew the ways of the house.

"For the Americans, yes. They pay double for most things."

"What a shame!"

"Oh dear, no; they like it—at least the set of which these are specimens. The nice ones don't come here. Oh, see there! Madame de K—— is ordering something pretty."

In a group near us an elderly lady was concentrating her whole soul on the discourse of a première demoiselle, who was holding forth in an earnest, declamatory manner on some "combination" which clearly did not approve itself to the elderly lady's conscience.

"How unfortunate that my daughter-in-law can not return in time to select for herself!" she observed, with grave anxiety; "the world has changed so much since I went to balls—fifteen years ago—that it is very puzzling; and I don't like the responsibility of choosing one out of such a multitude."

"Let Madame la Marquise be tranquil," urged the Frenchwoman, soothingly. "Let her confide in me. I have studied the complexion, the tournure, the physiognomy—in a word, the whole style of Madame la Marquise jeune; and I take on myself the responsibility of the choice."

"But my daughter-in-law is so difficile. If it should not please her? or if some one else should order the same for the same evening? Think what a deception! She would never forgive me!"

"I entreat Madame la Marquise to put her trust in me. Her daughter-in-law left entirely to my imagination the toilette she wore on Thursday last at la Guerre; and if Madame la Marquise reads the Figaro cautiously" (that she should not read it at all was a flight of absurdity that never occurred to the Frenchwoman) "she will have seen the compte-rendu of that toilette. It was the success of the night both in beauty of execution and in becomingness."

"On Thursday night!" repeated the elderly lady, brightening up; "why, then it must be quite fresh, and she can wear it at the Marine. How glad I am you mentioned it!"

"Pardon, madame!" exclaimed the demoiselle, clasping her hands, with an expression half shocked, half amused. "That would, indeed, be a misfortune. What! la Marquise de C—— appear twice in the same ball dress! In Paris! an elegant woman, so much looked up to!"

"And why not, if the dress is so becoming?" boldly demanded the mother-in-law, yet with a vague, uncomfortable sense of impropriety.

The demoiselle shook her head, drew near, and lowering her voice to a tone of confidence:

"Seriously, Madame la Marquise, it can not be. A woman who respects herself does not do such things. In the provinces, or in England," with an exhaustive shrug, "perhaps; but in Paris—impossible!"

"Then I wash my hands of it. I can make nothing out of it. The world is turned topsy-turvy. Women are gone mad. A woman who respects herself!" And, tossing up her head, the mother-in-law walked off, repeating as she went, "A woman who respects herself! What fools they are!"

Meanwhile M. Grandhomme, who occasionally, suiting himself to his company, aped the manners of a courtier, having bowed his princess to the head of the stairs, came back to the gallery; where he had no sooner reappeared than every head was turned toward him in eager expectation, each impatient for a sign. But the enchanter moved among them with averted eye, and an air of patronizing conceit, that bespoke the man "whose chariot was the nucleus of a comet, whose train filled the whole streets." He bowed jauntily on either side of him, with a chorus of supplication ringing in his ears.

Berthe stood up as the Turkish fez in which M. Grandhomme was pleased to cover his noble head approached. She was too good a woman and a gentlewoman to "Dear Monsieur Grandhomme" him, or to stoop to any of the servile graces with which others fawned on his Czarship; she merely said, in her gracious, grande-dame way,

"Good-day, Monsieur Grandhomme. When you are ready, I want you for a moment."

"I am always ready when Madame la Comtesse commands."

He bowed down till the tassel of his fez nearly swept the ground, threw open a door of the long gallery, and motioned her to enter. She beckoned me and her little protégée in first. M. Grandhomme followed, and closed the door behind him. We were in Madame Grandhomme's boudoir. It was a superlative mark of distinction to be admitted into this room. Wonderful stories were current concerning the Asiatic splendor of the furniture, and the beauty of the works of art that adorned it. The effect of the whole was certainly dazzling. But what struck me most was the carpet. It was composed of alternate squares of Aubusson and Zibeline, the design being an inspiration of M. Grandhomme's. Before this original chef-d'œuvre was sent home to its author an exiled queen, who was just then furnishing a hôtel in the Champs Elysées, saw it and envied it; but on hearing by whom it had been ordered, and at what a price—twenty thousand francs—she answered, with a smile,

"Ah, I thought such a costly folly could only be for a reigning sovereign!"

"I want you to give an idea to mademoiselle for a fancy dress," began Berthe, laying a hand on the young girl's arm in a motherly way that she affected with women younger than herself. "What do you say to a pink Bergère?"

"Permit me, mademoiselle."

Monsieur Grandhomme drew her toward the window, set her standing before him, with the light full upon her face, looked at her intently for a moment, and shook his head.

"No?" said Berthe, inquiringly; "she's too tall?"

"Too tall and too pale. But we must see her by night."

He crossed the room, and opened a door into one that was brilliantly illuminated with wax-light. We all trooped in after him.

"Poor child! What a perfidious counsel it was to suggest pink to her!" he said, looking rather reproachfully at Berthe. "Let us see how you bear deep rose."

He stretched out his hand, and, with the rapidity of magic, a satellite, whose talent—only second to that of the great luminary round which she revolved—had promoted her to the high post of assisting Monsieur Grandhomme in his æsthetic combinations, flew toward us with a cloud of tulle of every shade of rose, pink, and crimson in the gamut of carmine. He flung a rose-colored scarf round the girl's shoulders, held it close to her cheek, cast it aside, snatched up a crimson one, applied it in the same way, and threw that from him. He called for a blue gamut. It was brought, tested, and rejected impatiently.

"A very difficult subject, I see," observed Monsieur Grandhomme, drawing his hand across his forehead, and looking down intently at his boots. Presently, glancing up at her, he said, "Did you ever appear as a naïade?"

"Never, monsieur. I should be afraid of the green."

"There is green and green; your pallor would suit certain attenuated shades of it. But no—this is your first fancy costume?"

"Yes, monsieur."

"Then we must run no risks. I shall order you white—all white. You shall appear as a snow-storm.—Write."

He turned to the first satellite. She flew to her combination-book, and wrote:

"Short white satin skirt, tulle puffs in profusion; clouds of tulle over the puffs, with flocks of swan's-down falling over them. Swan's-down slippers, with snow-drops half buried in the down. Coiffure, hair en tourbillon, with a snow-drop here and there. Crystal icicles scattered over the dress from head to foot. A cloud of white tulle enveloping the whole."

"What a dream!" burst from the breathless girl, as she clasped her hands in ecstasy and looked at Berthe.

"And now, madame?" said Monsieur Grandhomme, turning to me with the peremptory manner of a man who knew the value of his time.

I shall spare my readers the platitude of my own costume. It may, however, interest them to know that violet was discarded, as too great a risk for my complexion and for my hair, which, according to M. Grandhomme, had not sufficient tone to relieve it.

"Au revoir, chérie," said Berthe, as we parted at M. Grandhomme's door. "I shall be at Madame Follibel's to-morrow between three and four. Try and look in, and help me about bonnets."

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

OFFICIAL letters from Minister Washburne, in Paris, recognize the kindness and courtesy extended to him by the French authorities during the siege. Mr. Washburne appears to have been successful in protecting all American property from injury, so that when our countrymen return to their homes in Paris they will find them in as good condition as when they left. This result, however, was not accomplished without most vigilant guardianship. Many attempts were made to interfere with American property, such as quartering officers and soldiers in vacant apartments, sheltering refugees from neighboring villages in them, and the like; but uniformly, when the attention of the government of the National Defense was called to such matters, they were promptly remedied. One American only is reported to have lost his life by the bombardment. This was a Mr. Swagar, of Louisville, who was wounded by the bursting of a bomb in his room in the Rue Casimer-Langue. His foot was so mutilated that amputation was found necessary. For some days he bore the surgical operation so well as to give great hopes of recovery; but, although he received every care and attention at the American ambulance, he finally succumbed. Notwithstanding that physicians have cautioned persons not to return to Paris just yet, many Americans—with their proverbial enterprise—have entered the city, desirous of obtaining an early view of affairs. The Grand Hôtel, however, is still an ambulance, and full of wounded men, among whom putrid fever has been violently raging. The building will require a thorough purification before it can be opened to the traveling public.

Euridiki is the name of a new weekly periodical, written in modern Greek, which has recently appeared in Constantinople. It is designed to promote the intellectual development of women, and will contain a series of lives of distinguished women. Emilia Leonzias is the lady editor of this new periodical; and, considering the place of publication, it may be regarded as a significant index of the times.

A singular circumstance is mentioned in connection with the siege of Paris—that during the whole period of the siege only five suicides were committed in the city. That is a wonderful improvement over ordinary times.

"Holmes's Hole" is hereafter to be known by the more pleasant and euphonious name of "Vineyard Haven."

According to the report of a Moravian missionary our favorite hymn, "From Greenland's Icy Mountains," should be modified, or pronounced obsolete. Having labored in that country forty years, he has returned to England, and reports that in all Greenland there is but one station in the neighborhood of which there are heathen. With this exception, all the Greenlanders now profess Christianity.

There are now seventy-two postmistresses in the United States, who receive salaries of one thousand dollars and upward. These offices are reported at Washington to be well managed.

Not long ago a lady missionary, who is accustomed to see much want and misery in the dark places of New York city, visited a damp cellar basement in Stanton Street. There she found the heart-broken wife of a drunkard, who is now confined on the Island. Three little children, one an infant, depended on her for food and clothing. The woman stated that she earned $1 68 per week by making overalls at six cents a pair, hand-made, which she has to carry on foot from her home down to a place near Fulton Street, not being able to pay car fare for herself and bundle. Out of this scanty income $4 per month is paid for rent.

A sad and touching incident occurred in Dorchester County, Maryland, a short time ago. A little boy having ventured near some burning brush on a lot of land about being cleared, his clothes caught fire, and he fell amidst the flaming grass. His cries of agony were soon heard, but before assistance could reach him his flesh was shockingly burned. The child was found on his hands and knees vainly trying to escape the devouring element. During the four hours that intervened between his rescue and his death his sufferings can scarcely be imagined, as he was conscious to the end. But his last words were: "Father, kiss me; I can not move my lips. Please give me water. Do not cry, mamma."

The North German Gazette states that the 84,900 men, under General Bourbaki, who have taken refuge in Switzerland, swell the number of French prisoners and of fugitives interned in neighboring states to more than a million; 930,000 are prisoners of war; nearly 20,900 fled into Belgium after the battles of Metz and Sedan, and more than 80,000 have now crossed the Swiss frontier.

It is no easy task to measure the velocity of the wind on Mount Washington. The anemometer is the instrument used, which consists of four hemispherical cups attached to horizontal bars crossing each other at right angles. These bars are attached in the centre to a vertical shaft, which has at its lower extremity an endless screw, and the latter gives motion to a series of wheels regulating the movement of a dial in a little box above. The dial is divided into one hundred degrees, each degree representing fifty revolutions of the cups, or one-tenth of a mile. A stationary index measures the rate up to five miles an hour, and a second index marks the additional miles. Sometimes the anemometer is made stationary with a self-registering apparatus; but this not being possible on Mount Washington, the observer goes outside the building, and holds the instrument in his hands, where the cups are fully exposed to the action of the wind, long enough to give him a sure basis for calculation—perhaps from two to ten minutes. When the wind is very high a rope is tied around the observer, so that he may be drawn back into the building in case he is likely to be blown away. Often it is necessary to lie down upon the ground while taking the observation; and in any case the exposure to a violent wind, for only a few moments, is very exhausting.

Mr. Spurgeon has written a circular in behalf of the "Working-man's Lord's Day Rest Association," in favor of petitions to Parliament to relieve the twenty thousand letter-carriers from labor on Sundays. These carriers walk sixteen to twenty miles every day, and need one day's rest.

The Dark Blue is the somewhat fanciful name of a new illustrated monthly magazine which is about to be issued in London. Many distinguished writers are numbered among its contributors.

The cathedral of St. Denis was most carefully protected by sand-bags during the bombardment, and has sustained but little injury. Only four shells penetrated to the interior of the building.

Who would not emigrate to San Domingo, and luxuriate upon the fruits of the land? Some of the late accounts are so enthusiastic as to lead to the expectation that the tide will turn that way immediately. A visitor who accompanied the recent commission gives the following appetizing and enchanting description: "Of fruits we have sweet oranges, sour oranges, bananas (ten kinds), plantains, many apples, custard apples (delicious), tamarinds (sweet and sour), rose apples, sugar-cane (four kinds), mangoes, (delightful fruit), figs, grapes of green and purple varieties, lemons (sweet and sour), cocoanuts, limes (sweet and sour), plums (two kinds), nisperas fuma (a pickle pear), moya, and several other varieties. Of vegetables we have palm cabbages, egg-plant, cucumbers (large and small), string-beans, green pease, beans (twenty varieties), squash, cimlyns, yams (a dozen different kinds), sweet-potatoes, Irish potatoes, radishes, turnips, lettuce, corn (two or three kinds), beets, green ginger, tomatoes, green pepper (very hot), sweet peppers, rice. Besides these, coffee, chocolate, sugar, tobacco, grow almost wild; flowers grow in great abundance, and the botanists accompanying the commission will be enabled to collect a very large amount of valuable specimens. The castor-bean, from which castor-oil is made, is found in great abundance. Besides these, the indigo plant, the palm for making hats and fans, the lana, or natural wool for mattresses and pillows, white manilla and mayagua for rope, are met with all over the island. The entire island is one vast garden, capable of producing any thing that can grow in any portion of the world."

Lord Lorne is to wear at his wedding the full Highland costume. So states an Inverness newspaper. Every piece of jewelry will have engraved upon it the arms of the house of Argyle.

The son of the Emperor of Russia on his marriage with the Princess Dagmar, of Denmark, sister of the Princess of Wales, presented to the royal and imperial bride a parure of diamonds, which, if his commands were observed by the manufacturers, was composed entirely of brilliants, not one of which had ever been worn by any human being. It was said at the time that great difficulty was experienced in procuring a sufficient number of uncut stones of the finest water to complete the order. An English journal suggests that the discovery of diamonds at the Cape of Good Hope would render it easy for a similar delicate compliment to be paid to the Princess Louise on the occasion of her approaching marriage.

Robert Browning's latest poem, "Hervé Riel," is republished in Harper's Weekly for March 18, from advance sheets of the London Magazine, for which it was written. For this spirited ballad, which commemorates the heroism of a Breton sailor, Mr. Browning received $500, which he presented to the London fund for the relief of the distress in Paris.

A bill has passed both Houses of Congress providing for a grand centennial celebration of the Declaration of American Independence in Philadelphia, on the 4th of July, 1876.

A movement has been made in England for supplying seed corn and other seeds to the ruined French peasants, to enable them to sow their lands, and prevent famine following in the wake of war.

Professor Agassiz is preparing an illustrated work on the American Salmonidæ. To enable him to make this work complete, he requires live specimens of every variety of trout, salmon, and white-fish found on this continent.

The Princess Louise has the reputation of displaying no common ability as an artist. She has contributed to the exhibition for the relief of the French peasantry three pictures painted by herself.

Smoking in the hall or galleries of the House of Representatives is prohibited in future. The aroma of cigars had grown so prevailing that a rule was found needful in order to protect the dignity of Congress against those members who thought it no breach of decorum to fill a legislative chamber with smoke.

During the siege of Paris presents of jewelry and baubles to ladies were not popular. Any gentleman desirous of winning the favor of a lady would send her butter, beans, potatoes, herring, or, better still, sardines. These were appreciated.

An indefatigable laborer is Madame George Sand, who, although in her sixty-seventh year, has planned a journey through Asia in the spring, for the purpose of collecting material for a new work, to be called the "Religions of the East."

Digitized by Google

ANXIOUS TIMES.

NESTLE beneath God's wing in sleep, my dove,
Or let some angel do thy mother's part;
Thou couldst not rest with warring fear and love,
Husband and country, struggling in my heart.

There's father's helmet, where my pretty smiled
To see her own small face: that image be
Thy guard, dear head, when battle wages wild!
Shield him, O God, for her, and home, and me!

I've frowned down all the tears, and made it bright,
I've bitten back my sobs; I do but pray,
Since thus I yield to God, my land, their right—
Thy human heart, dear Christ, recall this day!

See this dear breast-plate which my head hath pressed,
It shall not lie there, weakly, in "good-by"—
What other home could ever give it rest?
Keep baby's father, Father kind on high!

Half of my heart will battle there with him,
And half of his will rock thy cradle here;
His eyes my unwept tears shall sometimes dim:
Dews that must water flowers of prayer, my dear!

To fight, in glory die, like summer day—
O men, O men! ye have the better part;
We sit at home, and think our hopes away,
And are a hundred times bereaved—in heart.

Wake, darling! Smile! 'Tis father's step. Were this My music silent, dumb all earth would be,
And vain a world ablaze with Conquest's bliss—
The sunshine of my world gone back to thee.

If father went, and called me too, my dove,
These tiny, clinging arms would mother keep.
God pity her!....I was not crying, love,
I did but hush the little one to sleep.

THE LITTLE FIR-TREE.

IT was Christmas-time, and the old hall at the Manor House was decorated with evergreens. They were carried in from the garden, and the children of the house made them into beautiful wreaths and arches, till the hall looked like a green bower. A little fir-tree, growing in the shrubbery, watched her neighbors being carried away to the house, and sighed.

"I should like to be chosen too," she thought, "and planted in the hall, and admired. But there is no hope of this; I am too stiff."

At last, however, the gardener and the gardener's boy came to her and dug her up, with a good deal of earth round her roots, planted her in a green tub, and carried her also into the house.

"It is too good to be true," she thought; but she did not meet with such a pleasant reception from the inmates of the hall as she expected.

"Dear me!" said the ivy wreath, twining round a pillar; "how much room you take up! I always cling as close as ever I can to avoid incommoding my neighbors."

"Have you no berries?" asked the holly over the picture.

"Why don't you hang," said the bunch of mistletoe in the centre of the hall, "instead of standing up so straight? It is considered more graceful."

"Pray, are you for use or ornament?" asked the old clock.

"You had better not come too close," said the fire in the chimney, "for fear of accidents."

The fir-tree felt disappointed. "It was better in one's own house in the shrubbery," she thought. "There, at least, one was in nobody's way. I am not fitted to shine in society. No one will ever admire me."

By-and-by, however, she got plenty of attention. The ladies of the house came round her, pronounced her perfection, and loaded her with gifts. The fir-tree hardly recognized herself, hung all over with beautiful little toys, and on the top of all a little fairy, on one toe, with glittering wings, and skirts covered with silver spangles.

"This is, indeed, a precious gift!" thought the fir-tree. But still she was not as happy as she expected to be. Her companions in the hall were shorter in their manner than before.

"Dear me! how smart we are all of a sudden!" said the holly.

"I am sorry I can't stop to pay compliments," said the clock; "but the household depends on me."

"The tree last year was even finer," said the picture over the chimney-piece.

Late in the evening came the supreme moment. The tapers were set alight, the Christmas-tree blazed forth in all her splendor, and a hundred little eyes gazed upon her with wonder and admiration.

Now, surely, the fir-tree ought to have been satisfied; but no, the jealousy of her companions in the hall grieved her; besides, she felt almost overwhelmed with her own magnificence, and there was an awful sense of responsibility in supporting the weight of that wonderful little fairy.

When the tapers burned low the lady of the manor produced a bag, from which all the children drew numbers, and then all the pretty things off the tree were distributed among them according to what they had drawn. It was all chance work; some of them got handsome toys, and some little besides sugar-plums. A little girl called Effie drew the beautiful fairy, and one very little girl was inconsolable because the fairy did not fall to her share. She cried, and would not be comforted with a negro-faced Jack-in-the-box. Effie hugged her treasure close.

"You will soon be too big for dolls, dear," said her mother; "suppose you give it to the poor little girl who is crying so."

"But it's my own," said Effie.

"Do as you like, then," said her mother.

Effie said nothing; but presently she went up to the other little girl, and put the precious fairy into her arms.

"You may have it," she said.

"For my own to keep?"

"For your very own," said Effie.

The little girl dried her tears, and jumped for joy; and long afterward, when the paint was rubbed off the fairy's cheeks, and her silver spangles were tarnished, and one of her legs was broken, Effie liked to remember the pleasure she had given.

The fir-tree was so occupied in watching the looks of delight all round her that she hardly noticed that she was gradually returning to her own sombre self, with no ornament but her own dark green feathers; but as her tapers burned so low that the hot wax scorched her she began to realize it.

"I wonder why I don't feel sad," she thought, "at losing all my beautiful possessions! On the contrary, I have never felt so light-hearted before. How pleased all the dear little children look! This will be something for me to think of when I go back to my shrubbery; for I suppose they won't care to keep me much longer."

Gradually the merry faces disappeared, and the children went home to bed. The fir-tree, so lately the object of attraction to all, was left alone in the darkened hall, and forgotten. Her companions began to patronize her.

"You look much better without all that finery," said the mistletoe.

"Watch us carefully," said the ivy, "and I should not wonder if you picked up a few ideas of grace."

"You really would not make bad fire-wood when you are a little more withered," said the fire, which was burning very low in the grate.

"It's time to strike twelve; I wish you a very good-night," said the clock, politely.

The fir-tree felt grateful for the kind words, and next day, when she was carried back to her shrubbery, and replanted in the old spot, she was quite content to be left to her life of obscurity. No one was envious of her, and she had a great joy at her heart—the joy of having made others happy.

ANXIOUS TIMES.

Digitized by Google

Gros Grain Cravat Bow.

THIS cravat bow is made of pink gros grain. The ends are raveled an inch wide, as shown by the illustration. Cut three three-cornered pieces of the gros grain. The straight edges of the two pieces designed for the under ends are each nine inches and a half long, and the third end is an inch and three-quarters shorter. Having raveled the straight edges of all the pieces, double each piece, pleat the double material at the bias edge, and arrange the ends on a stiff lace foundation as shown by the illustration. Cover the seam made by sewing on the ends with a half-rosette of the material. For this take a straight strip of gros grain two inches wide, double it lengthwise, and arrange the open lengthwise edge in box-pleats. Finish the middle of the rosette with a pleated band of the material.

GROS GRAIN CRAVAT BOW.

Netted Guipure Squares, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE two squares may be used for trimming lingerie, or be joined for covers, tidies, etc. Work the foundation of the squares with medium-sized linen thread over a mesh a tenth of an inch wide, then embroider it, as shown by the illustration, in point de toile, point d'esprit, and point de reprise, and ornament the foundation with wheels.

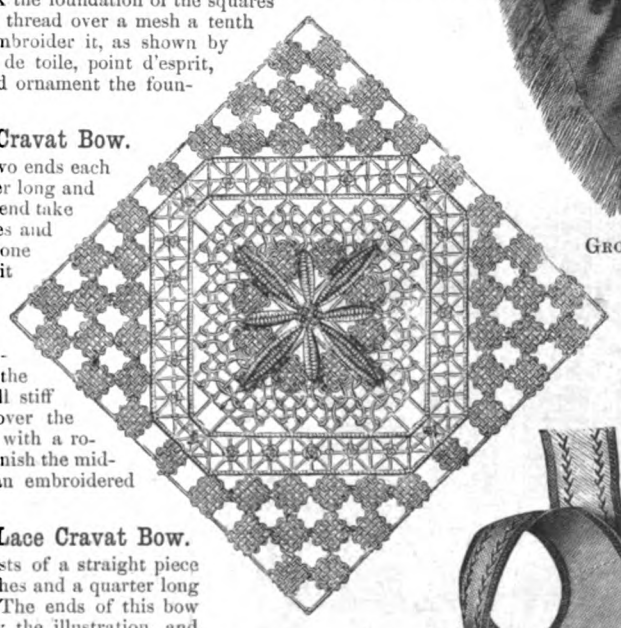

Fig. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

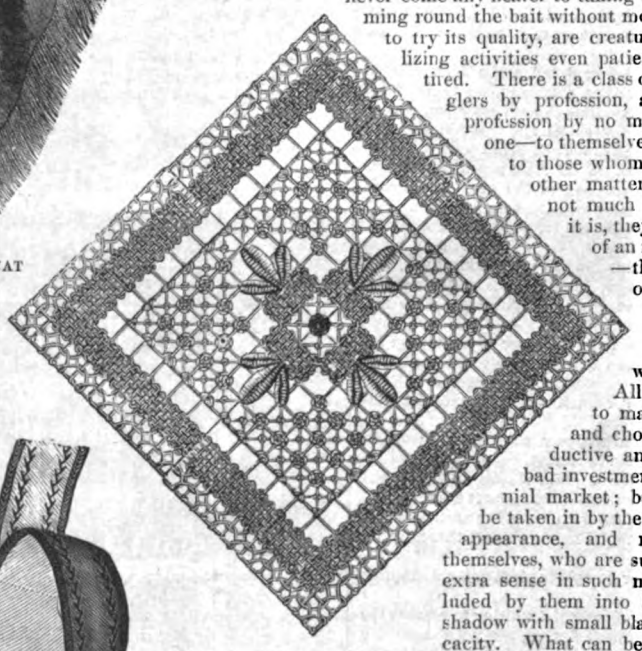

Fig. 2.—NETTED GUIPURE SQUARE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

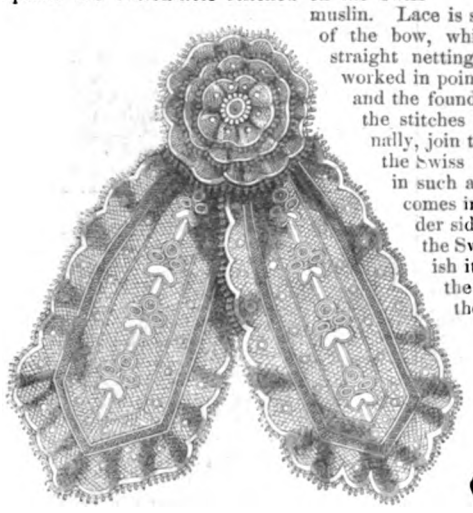
Insertion and Lace Cravat Bow.

THIS bow consists of two ends each seven inches and a quarter long and a lace rosette. For each end take a piece of lace five inches and three-quarters wide, cut one end in a point, and edge it with lace three-quarters of an inch wide, excepting at the upper cross-wise edge. Pleat the upper cross-wise edges of the ends, sew them on a small stiff lace foundation, and cover the seam made by doing this with a rosette of gathered lace. Finish the middle of the rosette with an embroidered figure.

Swiss Muslin and Lace Cravat Bow.

THIS cravat bow consists of a straight piece of Swiss muslin eleven inches and a quarter long and eight inches wide. The ends of this bow are pointed, as shown by the illustration, and ornamented with a square worked in straight netting. The foundation is worked in point de reprise, point d'esprit, and point de toile. These squares are button-hole stitched on the Swiss muslin. Lace is sewed on the outer edge of the bow, which is also worked in straight netting. The outer edge is worked in points in button-hole stitch, and the foundation is embroidered in the stitches above mentioned. Finally, join the lengthwise edges of the Swiss muslin part, and fold it in such a manner that the seam comes in the middle of the under side. At the middle pleat the Swiss muslin part, and finish it with a pleated band of the material, as shown by the illustration.



INSERTION AND LACE CRAVAT BOW.

BROWN JEAN WALKING BELT WITH POINT RUSSE EMBROIDERY.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 44-46.

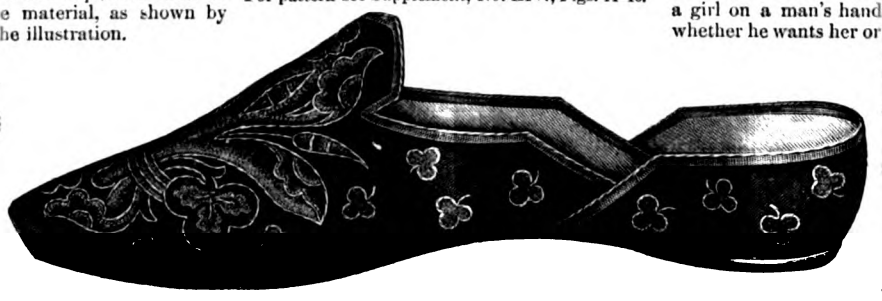


Fig. 1.—SLIPPER WITH ROMAN EMBROIDERY.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 20-22.

Brown Jean Walking Belt with Point Russe Embroidery.

THIS walking belt is made of brown jean, bound with red worsted braid, and embroidered with red worsted in herring-bone stitch. Cut of brown jean and muslin lining from Supplement, Fig. 44, one piece, and from Figs. 45 and 46 each two pieces, allowing an inch and three-quarters extra material at the back edge of Fig. 45. Hem the extra material down on the wrong side, and furnish the back with metal eyelets for lacing and thin whalebones. Join the front and back from 29 to 30, and then the back with the shoulders from : to * and from 31 to 32. In making the latter seam sew in a strip of the material an inch and a half wide and twenty-four inches long, whose lengthwise edges and under edge are bound with red braid and embroidered with red worsted in herring-bone stitch. Bind the under and upper edges of the belt, ornament it with herring-bone stitch, as shown by the illustration, and furnish with strings for lacing.

Slipper with Roman Embroidery, Figs. 1 and 2.

THIS slipper is made of black cloth, and is ornamented with Roman embroidery worked with various colors of sewing silk and fine gold cord. The inside of the slipper is lined with red silk and cotton batting. The sole is of cork. To make the slipper, cut of the cloth, silk, and cotton batting from Figs. 20 and 21 of the Supplement each one piece, and embroider the cloth parts (Fig. 2 gives the design for the front of the slipper in full size). Transfer this design to the front of the slipper, and add the still wanting foundation figures as shown by Fig. 1. Draw the foundation figures on the back of the slipper like those of the front. The long leaf-shaped figures are worked in three shades of gray; the shell-like parts in which the leaf-shaped figures end are worked in three shades of pink and three shades of blue. The large clover leaves are worked with gray and two shades of green; the small clover leaves are worked with green only. The buds and the figures in the middle of the design are worked with green and pink silk. The band is worked with blue, gray, and white silk. All the figures are ornamented with gold cord. Embroider the back of the slipper in a similar manner, as shown by the illustration. Baste the embroidered parts on the lining, bind the side and upper edges of the front and back with a bias strip of silk, and finish the edges with cord, as shown by the illustration. Sew the back on the front according to the corresponding signs, and with the under edge of these parts join a sole made of silk and cotton batting, which must be cut from Fig. 22, Supplement. Finally, set this sole on the outer cork sole, which must be cut from the same pattern.

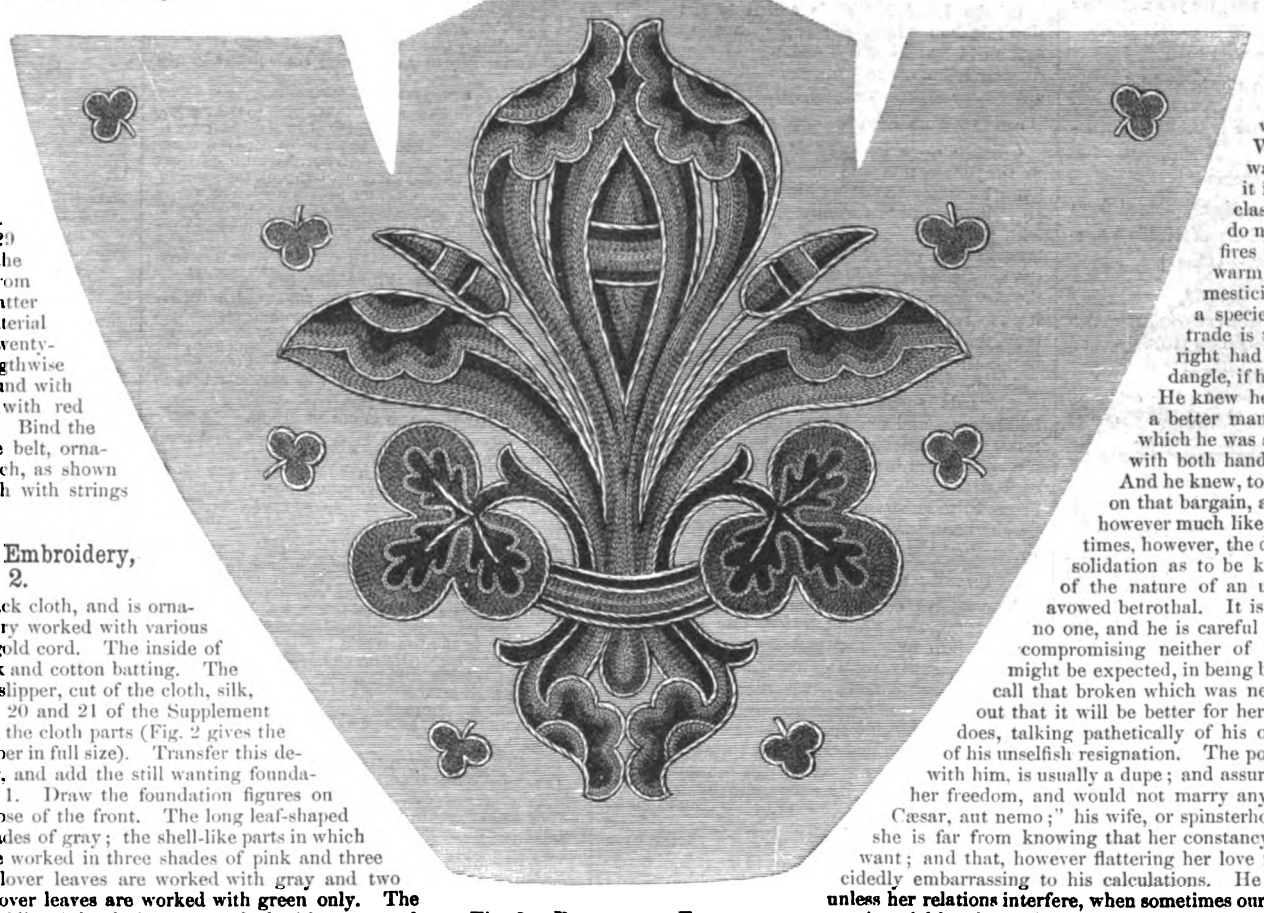

Fig. 2.—DESIGN FOR FRONT OF SLIPPER IN ROMAN EMBROIDERY.

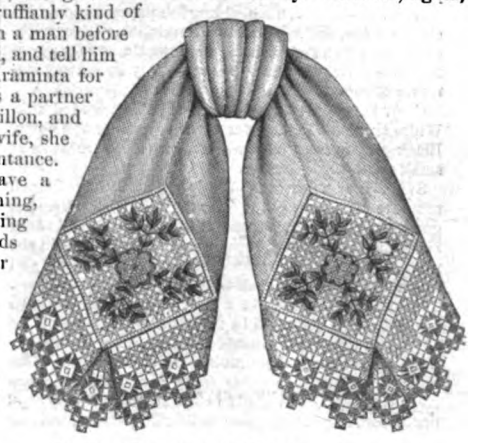
DANGLERS.

ROOTS must strike before fruits can ripen, and dangling is the prelude to taking hold. But an unreasonable time devoted to the elaboration of cotyledons justifies one's doubt of a rooting power at all, and danglers who never come any nearer to taking hold, like fish swimming round the bait without more than a sly nibble to try its quality, are creatures of whose tantalizing activities even patient Job would have tired. There is a class of men who are danglers by profession, and who find that profession by no means an unpleasant one—to themselves. What it may be to those whom it concerns is another matter, and one that does not much disturb them. As it is, they are in the position of an intending purchaser—the potential owner of all within their means—the possible possessor of every pretty girl within their sphere. All they have to do is to make up their mind, and choose. Danglers, seductive and delusive, are the bad investments of the matrimonial market; but the wariest may be taken in by the plausibility of their appearance, and managing mothers themselves, who are supposed to have an extra sense in such matters, may be deluded by them into laying traps for a shadow with small blame to their perspicacity. What can be thought of a man young enough to love, with enough to marry, and sufficiently interested to dangle, but that he is a good investment of one's hopes? Besides, where does the time of legitimate hesitation end, and that of insufferable dangling begin? The point is a fine one, and given to few to hit exactly. Besides, again, Americans think it a ruffianly kind of thing to come down on a man before he knows his own mind, and tell him he must either take Araminta for life or renounce her as a partner for croquet and the cotillon, and that if she is not his wife, she shall not be his acquaintance. Fathers, as a rule, have a horror of this kind of thing, which looks like thrusting a girl on a man's hands whether he wants her or not; and our daughters, thank Heaven, have no need of that! So, out of delicacy for the one part, and the conviction that Araminta is at a premium in the market for the other, danglers are suffered to abound, and if mischief comes of it, we make a row when too late, and shut the stable door after the steed has been stolen.



SWISS MUSLIN AND NETTED GUIPURE CRAVAT BOW.

Taking society all round, the one who fails most signally in his duty is the bachelor dangler who could marry but does not. So, at least, women think, and a few fathers. With the multitudes of nice girls waiting pensively for husbands, it is really too bad to see a whole class of men feeding hopes they do not mean to realize, and fanning fires by which they never intend to warm themselves in comfortable domesticity. Besides, is not a dangler a species of swindler, whose stock in trade is made up of dummies? What right had he to come day after day and dangle, if he meant nothing like business? He knew he was standing in the way of a better man, and that the bargain about which he was so fastidious others would take with both hands if only they had the chance. And he knew, too, that he never meant to close on that bargain, and that he was but a dangler, however much like taking hold he looked. Sometimes, however, the dangler goes so far toward consolidation as to be kept half engaged, a ceremony of the nature of an understanding rather than an avowed betrothal. It is a state of things which binds no one, and he is careful to point out its advantages in compromising neither of them. It generally ends, as might be expected, in being broken off; if, indeed, one can call that broken which was never fast. He somehow finds out that it will be better for her if he gives her up, and so he does, talking pathetically of his own feelings, and quite nobly of his unselfish resignation. The poor girl, who is honestly in love with him, is usually a dupe; and assures him that she does not want her freedom, and would not marry any one else for worlds. "Aut Cæsar, aut nemo;" his wife, or spinsterhood for life! Poor little soul! she is far from knowing that her constancy is just the thing he does not want; and that, however flattering her love may be to his vanity, it is decidedly embarrassing to his calculations. He gets rid of her, nevertheless, unless her relations interfere, when sometimes our free-trader gets put under the matrimonial hatches before he knows where he is, and made a prisoner for life. As a rule, he rarely makes a satisfactory marriage when the time really comes.

Digitized by Google

Moreover, the propensities of his bachelorhood reproduce themselves after marriage, and the unsettled dangler becomes the inconstant husband. He can not give up old habits because of new conditions. He has dangled and flirted so long that even when he has been carried off by some dashing coup de main, or more subtly stalked and run down—even then he can not give up, but still carries on the old bad game, and dangles to less purpose, yet to more danger.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. E. B.—If you have a thin neck and arms, by all means make a postillion basque of your pink silk. The cut paper pattern of the Worth Basque House Dress, illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., is just what you want. Trim with lace or with narrow ruffles of the silk.

BOB.—Ruffles, pleated or fluted, and a thick cluster of tucks, make a prettier trimming, we think, than the English embroidery, though both are worn. Lonsdale muslin is nice for skirts and gowns; but the heavier Wamsutta or New York Mills are better for chemises and drawers. Your ideas about the brown alpaca dress for the house and the gray poplin suit are good, and the dresses will answer all season. For the basque and over-skirt use the pattern of the Worth Basque Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV.

ORA.—Moisten a muslin cloth with chloroform, and rub the spots of grease. It sometimes succeeds when benzine fails, but yet is not infallible.—We do not give addresses.

MRS. R. A. B.—We have not time to write you by mail, and do not know why your letters have failed hitherto. Your last was correctly addressed.

MISS F. A. R.—Try French chalk for cleaning undressed kid gloves.

MRS. R. H. K.—White alpaca suits are not worn in the city to church or on the street, but are not unsuitable in the country. Gros grain ribbon sashes are but little worn, as basques look best without sashes.

MRS. M. B.—We know nothing of the nostrums that are said to make straight hair curl, and therefore do not commend them.

ANNIE C. B.—Your sample is plum-colored empress cloth.

LADY OF SHALOTT.—Use moist whiting to remove the green canker from bronze figures, and polish with dry whiting. Gold and enameled jewelry are not worn in mourning. Jet, onyx, and rubber are preferred.

BACKWOODS.—Make your black alpaca by directions given in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV. For the other dresses a postillion basque and demi-trained skirt will be suitable. The patterns of these you have in the Worth Basque House Dress.

N. M. H.—Thick, unruled English paper, of commercial note size, and square, large envelopes, with or without monogram, are the fashionable stationery for a gentleman's private correspondence. Any Broadway stationer of repute will supply you.

C. A. D.—Poult de soie is a soft, thick-corded silk. White silk is handsome for any lady to wear at a party. Black silk dresses with white over-skirts are worn at small parties.

SYBIL K. AND OTHERS.—We do not know how French scourers clean laces, but offer the following plan as a good way of washing them. Let the laces lie all night in a suds made of tepid water and white soap. In the morning add boiling water. Move the laces up and down repeatedly, squeezing but not rubbing them. Then tie them loosely in a muslin bag, and boil two hours in soap-suds. If in the country, they should be spread on the grass, without rinsing, and sprinkled occasionally to keep them moist. If in town, put them in a tub of boiling water for a day and night, then rinse through cold water to clear them perfectly, and dry before starching. Use well-boiled starch, putting the laces in while the starch is warm; then clap or beat with the hands, but do not wring or twist. Then fold in a damp cloth. Use a thick ironing blanket, as this raises the figures of the lace. If it is desirable that the lace should not look stiff, pass it through clear cold water after starching, then squeeze it out, slightly beat between the palms, and gently draw out into shape by the ball of the thumb and the forefinger—not by the nails.

L. K. H.—We do not furnish special designs in worsted work at the request of our readers.

PRINCE.—We regret that we can give you no further information on the subject.

WHEN YOU FEEL A COUGH or bronchial affection creeping on the lungs, take AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL, and cure it before it becomes incurable.—[Com.]

DANDRUFF may be effectually eradicated from the scalp by a few applications of Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

DRUNKENNESS permanently cured. For evidence, send stamp to Dr. C. C. BEERS, 12 East 12th St., N. Y.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

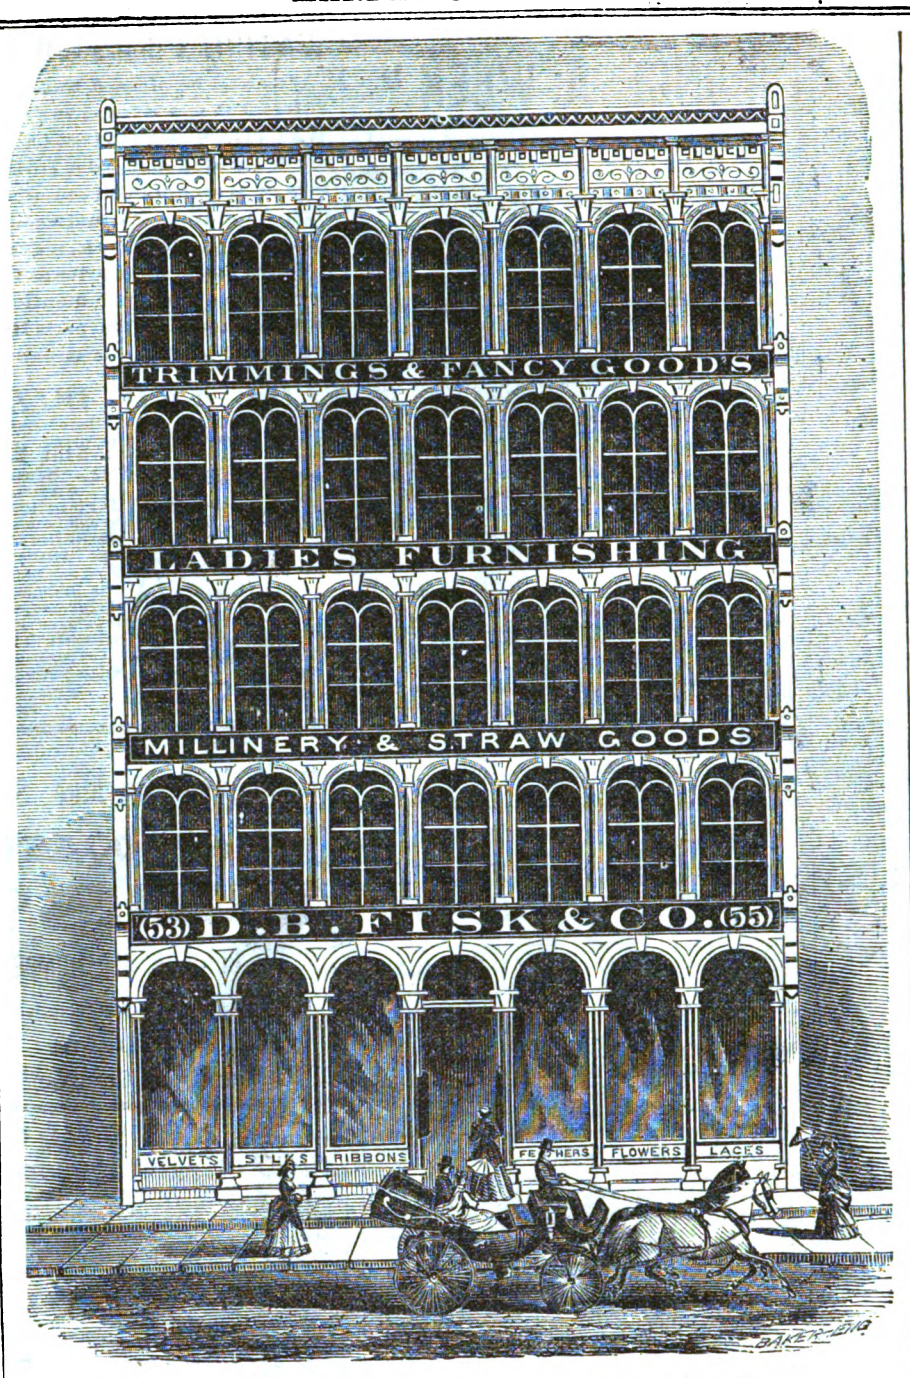
ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 86 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.



WESTERN ENTERPRISE.

THE growth of Chicago, from 40,000 people to 300,000, in eighteen years, is one of the marvels of history. But the increase of its trade, commerce, and wealth, has greatly exceeded its increase of population. As a mart for lumber, grain, beef, and pork, it surpasses all Western cities. As the centre of a great net-work of gigantic railways spanning the continent and uniting the Northern lakes with the Mexican Gulf, and as the entrepôt for the agricultural and mineral products of the Northwest, it has no rival. It has become the great distributing point to the Northwest and Southwest for the products of the Atlantic and Pacific slopes, and the manufactures, teas, silks, etc., of the Eastern world, and is the great metropolitan city for the vast portion of this country west of the Alleghanies.

INCREASE OF POPULATION.

Of the 7,641,746 souls added to the Union the last ten years, according to the census, 4,739,671 have been added within the district directly tributary to Chicago, without including any States east or south of Illinois.

OBLIGATIONS OF CHICAGO TO YOUNG MEN.

Chicago owes its unexampled growth largely to the enterprise and energy of young men. They have laid the foundations and built the superstructure of her fortunes. Her business men, with the fresh, warm blood of a vigorous manhood in their veins, have made her what she is—the wonder of modern times. They have raised the city from six to ten feet out of the mud, given it perfect drainage, paved it, tunneled Lake Michigan, and supplied the city with the best water in this country; improved its sanitary condition; established a system of magnificent Parks and Boulevards surrounding the city, comprising 3000 acres, and making a drive of twenty-five miles; built double roadways under a navigable river—the first instance in the world; attracted capital from abroad for permanent investment; erected the most substantial and imposing business structures, and given her character and fame throughout the Union.

CHANGE IN THE COURSE OF TRADE.

The course of trade has changed materially since 1860, the wholesale business having expanded into unwonted and unexpected proportions. Formerly, most of our country merchants came to New York twice a year and bought a six months' supply. Now they buy limited amounts at Chicago, try the temper of the home market, replenish their stocks as they become reduced with only such goods as they can sell, and receive them in from twelve hours to two days. So that their goods are often sold long before they could be received if purchased in Eastern markets. They are thus enabled to supply their customers with fresh goods of the latest styles, and avoid the loss of carrying over unsalable stock.

As an illustration of the growth of Western trade, and a type of Chicago and her business men, take the well-known firm of importers and wholesale dealers in millinery, straw goods, ladies' furnishing, fancy goods, and trimmings, whose store is represented by the above engraving. It is the pioneer wholesale millinery house of the Northwest, was established in the spring of 1853, on Wells Street, between Lake and South Water, and was regarded at the time as a hazardous experiment. The city then numbered about 40,000 people, the surrounding country was new and sparsely settled, railroads were not, money was scarce, and the people poor. In 1854 they moved to 134 Lake Street. From 1855 to 1857 they were at 165 and 167 Lake Street, up stairs. In the spring of 1857, their business having steadily increased, they removed to the splendid iron building where they now are, occupying the second and third floors. Two years ago their business had so outgrown their accommodations that they took the whole building—the two floors above them for manufacturing and packing rooms, and converted the two stores below into one, for a salesroom and counting-room—and fitted it throughout in the most substantial and elegant style, with toilet rooms on the first floor for their lady customers.

D. B. FISK & CO.,

AN ACRE AND A QUARTER OF MILLINERY GOODS.

So that, including the basement, they now have six floors, 50 by 165 feet—193⅓ square rods, or nearly an acre and a quarter of floor room for the display and sale of millinery goods—it being the largest store devoted exclusively to the millinery trade in the United States.

EXTENT OF THEIR TRADE.

Their trade extends from the Wabash to the Pacific, and from the Red River country of British America to Texas. Beginning with annual sales of a few thousand dollars, they have swelled into the millions, their sales last year exceeding by 33 per cent. the sales of the previous year. Western people are more liberal in their expenditures than Eastern people, and the ladies, especially in our thriving Western cities and villages, require even more fashionable and costly styles of dress and millinery goods than their Eastern sisters.

SYSTEM AND PROMPTNESS.

Every thing in this house is systematized, and their arrangements with the telegraph and express companies are so perfect that they can send orders to their buyers in New York on Friday night, and have the goods ordered delivered at their store in Chicago at 8 o'clock on Monday morning, in season for their morning customers.

LARGEST AND FRESHEST STOCK.

They always have the largest, freshest, and most complete stock of goods in their line to be found under one roof in this country, thus saving their customers the time and expense of coming East, and the extra freight on their goods, and reducing the time between purchasing or ordering their goods from days to hours.

REASONS OF THEIR SUCCESS.

Their great success has been achieved by their enterprise, sagacity, affability, integrity, industry, good taste in the selection of their stock, promptness in procuring the latest and best styles, ample means and rare facilities for making the manufactures of their goods, both in the Old World and in the New, tributary to their wishes; thorough acquaintance with the wants of the trade, and constant attention to the interests of their customers; and by keeping only those in their employ who are efficient and trustworthy assistants, and who take a personal interest in the business of the firm.

WHAT SUCH MEN HAVE DONE.

It is such as they who have transformed Chicago, within a few years, from a mud village, struggling for existence between a waste of waters and a pathless wilderness, into a gigantic city, whose business houses, of mammoth proportions, are as substantial as marble and iron can make them; whose temples of science, art, and religion rival those of cities a hundred years old; whose trade and commerce embrace both hemispheres, and whose name has gone abroad into all the earth.

SILK DEPARTMENT,
Rotunda.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

a Fresh Importation of the

A. T. STEWART & CO.'S FAMILY BLACK SILK

(admitted for many years to be the most reliable for wear and brilliancy), at the following reduced prices:

Quality.	Former Price.	Present Price.
A	$3 50	$3 00 per yard
B	3 75	3 25 "
C	4 00	3 50 "
D	4 25	3 75 "
E	4 50	4 00 "
F	5 00	4 25 "
G	5 50	4 75 "
H	6 00	5 00 "
I	6 50	5 25 "

Bonnet's "CYCLOP" Silk and Ponsen's "Aleazar" at proportionate reductions.

100 Pieces PLAIN DRESS SILKS, in all the new colorings, at $2 50, $2 75, and $3 00 per yard.

110 Pieces 24-inch COLORED and CREPE DE CHINE, $3 per yard, worth $4 50.

A Complete Stock of REAL IRISH POPLINS, of the very best manufacture, $2 per yard.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

GENTLEMEN'S FURNISHING DEPT.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

are constantly receiving new and beautiful styles in Cravats, Ties, Bows, and Scarfs; Ready-made Shirts, Collars, and Cuffs; Embroidered Shirt Fronts, Plain Plait Bosoms; Hosiery and Undergarments, of every description; Ladies' Soft Windsor Ties, in all the new shades.

N. B.—Special attention is called to our SHIRT DEPARTMENT, where every care will be taken to insure satisfaction.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

NEW SILKS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

are offering a fine stock of NEW SPRING SILKS.

Black and White Stripes and Checks, Griselle Stripes, Fancy Colored Stripes; Plain Colored Taffetas, Failles, Japanese Poplins, Pongees, Serges, &c.

Also, BLACK SILKS of every grade, and from the VERY BEST MANUFACTURERS, at THE LOWEST PRICES.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

LACES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.

have open a splendid assortment of Point and Applique Shawls, Flouncings, Hdkfs., and Trimming Laces, in all widths; White and Black Duchess Trimming Laces; Valenciennes Flouncings and Trimmings; Black Thread Lace Flouncings, Parasol Covers, Barbes, Sashes, and Trimming Laces; Black Guipure Laces.

Also, a fine stock of PARIS EMBROIDERED HDKFS., in new and beautiful designs.

CAMBRIC and LAWN HDKFS., in every grade.

Hamburg Edgings, Insertions, Ruffings, &c., &c.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

NEW AND USEFUL INVENTION FOR SEWING MACHINES.

CHURCH'S PATENT MACHINE-FILLED SHUTTLE-BOBBIN,

Fitted for the following machines: Singer's, Weed F. F., Elias Howe, Florence, Grover & Baker, and Empire. Try it! It is cheaper, gives a perfect tension, does better work, and saves time and trouble of winding. Sample package 2200 yards best six-cord thread, assorted numbers 50 to 100, with set of equipments, with directions for using, sent, postage paid, on receipt of $1 25. In ordering, state style of machine.

Address MERRICK THREAD CO.,
Holyoke, Mass.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

"TRY IT AND SEE!"—THE PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL sent six months "on trial" for $1 00; or, with either of HARPER'S a year, $5 00. (Price $3 a year.) Specimens FREE.
S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

Digitized by Google

RARE AND BEAUTIFUL FLOWERS
AND CHOICE VEGETABLES
CAN ALWAYS BE GROWN BY SOWING

The Seventeenth Annual Edition of their Seed Catalogue and Amateur's Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden is now ready for distribution, and will be mailed to all applicants upon receipt of 25 cents; an edition beautifully bound in cloth, 50 cents.

This is without exception the largest and best Catalogue ever published in this or any other country. It contains 192 pages—56 of which are finely executed engravings, including four beautifully colored lithographs of favorite Flowers and Vegetables, and 136 pages of closely printed matter, giving a descriptive list of upward of 2500 species and varieties of

Flower and Vegetable Seeds,

including all the novelties of the past season, with directions for their culture; also, a list of upward of One Hundred Varieties of Choice Gladiolus, with many other Summer-Flowering Bulbs, and much useful information upon the subject of gardening generally. Also, a Descriptive Price-List of Small Fruits, embracing all the leading varieties of Strawberries, Raspberries, Currants, Grapes, &c.

Address
B. K. BLISS & SONS,
23 Park Place and 20 Murray Street,
(P. O. Box 5712), NEW YORK.

ELEGANT DESIGNS
IN WALNUT AND ASH,
With Mottled-Oak Ornaments, - - - - - - - - - $2
Same, with Nottingham Lace Curtains included, $3

The annexed cut represents the WASHSTAND CORNICE, with Nottingham Lace Curtains suspended over the Washstand by a simple attachment which secures it to the wall, and is as readily adjusted as a picture-frame.

Nothing is so unpleasant to a tidy housekeeper as to see the walls behind the Washstand bespattered with water and soiled with dust. To obviate the difficulty, strips of paper, muslin, or lace are pinned upon the wall; but these cover one defect by displaying another.

This WASHSTAND CORNICE not only serves as a complete protection to the wall, but makes the Washstand

A Beautiful Article of Furniture.

Attached to the Cornice are two arms, swinging on a pivot, to which may be added a LAMBREQUIN of either Muslin, Rep, or Lace; or they can be swung out and used for a Towel-Rack.

Sent to any part of the country on receipt of amount.

Parties out of town ordering will be particular to give name of Town and State, and full Shipping directions.

All orders addressed to
LORD & TAYLOR, Sole Agents,
Cor. Broadway & 20th St., New York.

HOVEY & CO.'S
ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE OF SEEDS, AND GUIDE TO THE FLOWER and VEGETABLE GARDEN
FOR 1871,
Now ready. Containing 125 pages. The most extensive and complete Seed Catalogue published. Giving plain directions for the culture of Flowers and Vegetables. Sent gratis to all on receipt of two stamps.
Address HOVEY & CO.,
53 North Market Street, Boston, Mass.

PERFUMERY.
For the largest assortment and best terms, call upon or address
C. B. WOODWORTH & SON,
Rochester, N. Y.
N. Y. Office, 335 Broadway.

THE NEW EMPIRE
SEWING MACHINES
Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

Grocers Every Where Keep It.
WHY? Because DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER has achieved a reputation second to none for strength, purity, reliability, and economy. It produces most elegant light biscuits, rolls, &c.; and, so exact are the proportions of each ingredient, that the same results follow each time. It permits no waste of flour, is convenient to use, and the food prepared with it is such that it can be eaten and relished by the most sensitive dyspeptic or invalid without fear of indigestion. Manufactured by DOOLEY & BROTHER, 69 New Street, New York, and for sale at retail by all grocers.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

NEW PUBLICATION OF
"ONCE A WEEK,"
The Young Lady's Own Journal.
Specially designed for family reading, and more particularly addressed to young ladies. The utmost discrimination has been used in selecting the ORIGINAL TALES, ROMANCES, POETRY, FAMILY AND MISCELLANEOUS MATTERS that form its interesting and varied contents; and it may safely challenge the closest scrutiny, as no line of it can offend the most scrupulous taste. Its illustrations are very marked and attractive features, and in execution, as in sentiment, will, we think, be found unexceptionable; while its will doubtless be most acceptable to its young lady patrons. It is now before the public, and will plead, we believe, successfully its own cause.
FASHION PLATE

The N. Y. Evening Express, February 22d, says:
"The publication of 'ONCE A WEEK,' by Frank Leslie, is a very happy idea well carried out. It is especially adapted to the young ladies, and the contents are well selected for that purpose, and can not fail to be one of Frank Leslie's best serials. The price is six cents each number. It is a publication of sixteen pages, small folio, and beautifully gotten up."

The Press, of Philadelphia, says:
"It is illustrated, neatly printed, publishes the fashions illustrated by plates, and its reading-matter, ranging from grave to gay, from lively to severe, is very agreeable and interesting."

The Matinée says:
"Frank Leslie has commenced the publication of a very handsome illustrated weekly literary paper with the above title. It is intended more especially for young ladies."

The Stage says:
"It is a welcome addition to our current literature, and will, we think, find numberless subscribers among the young ladies, to whom it is particularly addressed, having for its second title the taking one of the Young Lady's Own Journal."

THE ROYAL VICTORIA
HAIR-CORD SKIRT.
THE MOST LADY-LIKE AND ELEGANT SKIRT EVER INTRODUCED.
PATRONIZED BY HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.
Samples can now be seen at our Office and Store, No. 761 Broadway, New York.

Use none but TRADE MARK  THE BEST!!!
OX AND SHEEP
SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION.
Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in housekeeping!! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the same that received the highest prizes at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and that is supplied to the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signature of BARON LIEBIG, the inventor, on every jar.
J. MILHAU'S SONS, Company's Agents, 183 Broadway, New York. For sale every where.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH; or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

FIRE EXTINGUISHER, PLANT SYRINGE,
Window-Washer, and Garden Engine for $5. Unequaled for applying liquids to destroy insects on plants, vines, and fruit-trees. N. PAGE, Jr., Danvers, Mass.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 397 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Cut Paper Patterns
OF SUITS IN
HARPER'S BAZAR.
Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	"	24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
HALF-FITTING CLOAK WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	"	11

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.
In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.
HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WATCHES that are WATCHES.
We shall be pleased to send our DESCRIPTIVE PRICE-LIST of Genuine WALTHAM WATCHES, together with an illustrated pamphlet entitled a History of Watchmaking, to all who send us their address. No matter how remote you are from New York, we can sell you a Watch at the same price as if you were here. When you write, mention that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.
HOWARD & CO., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

THE NEW WILSON
Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!
For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co.,
CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.
FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

FREE Try samples of our great $1 Weekly. The GAZETTE, Hallowell, Maine.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have just published:
OUR GIRLS.
By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D.
12mo, Cloth, $1 50.
If Americans would listen to George Combe and our countryman Dio Lewis, they would become a wiser, better, and happier people.—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.
Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.
Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.
Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.
☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE GOSPELS, Explanatory and Practical. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES, Author of "Notes on the Psalms," "Lectures on the Evidences of Christianity," &c. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 2 vols. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE ACTS. Notes, Explanatory and Practical, on the Acts of the Apostles. Designed for Sunday-School Teachers and Bible-Classes. By ALBERT BARNES. New Edition, Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

BEECHER'S MORNING AND EVENING EXERCISES. Morning and Evening Devotional Exercises: selected from the Published and Unpublished Writings of the Rev. Henry Ward Beecher. Edited by LYMAN ABBOTT, Author of "Jesus of Nazareth," "Old Testament Shadows," &c. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $2 00.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 90 cents.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Ready.)

Fresh Novels,
PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

DAISY NICHOL. By Lady HARDY. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

EARL'S DENE. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

A SIREN. By T. ADOLPHUS TROLLOPE, Author of "Lindisfarn Chase," &c. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.
THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!
Agents wanted in every Town.
Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

TO ALL FAT PEOPLE.—I know a simple and harmless remedy that will reduce you at the rate of 20 pounds per month. Write by express, with postage stamp, to Mrs. WILLIS ST. CROIX, San Francisco, Cal.

LATEST Styles Ladies' Shawls, Cloaks, Bonnets, and Dress Goods purchased at the most fashionable stores in Philadelphia, and sent by Express. You can send money by mail in registered letter. Samples of Dress Goods by mail for 10 cts. Address JAS. R. BROWNE, Purchasing Agent, Box 218, Norristown, Pa.

FRESH GARDEN AND FLOWER, FRUIT, HERB, TREE AND SHRUB, AND EVERGREEN SEEDS, postpaid by Mail. 25 different packets of either class for $1 00. The six classes, $5 00. Catalogues gratis. Agents wanted. Seeds on commission. B. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

$4 A LINE for an advertisement in 400 Newspapers. Where cuts are used, only six required for the whole list, and no extra charge. For lists, estimates, and particulars, address NEW YORK NEWSPAPER UNION, 13 Park Row, New York.

AGENTS! READ THIS!
WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

ONE of the workmen at the navy-yard, who has been employed there for twenty years, upon being rallied upon the likelihood of his discharge in consequence of a change in the administration, replied that he would like to see the administration change any quicker than he could!

GIRLS OF THE PERIOD—Female compositors.

TOUCHY.—A lady who was acting as gratuitous amanuensis, in writing a letter for a lady friend last week, had the impudence to throw the letter in the fire when nearly finished, for the simple reason that the lady for whom she was writing modestly requested her to close the letter by saying, "Please excuse bad spelling and writing."

A pernicious boy in a public school out West, who stands high in geography, was recently asked by his teacher where Africa was located. He very promptly answered, "All over the United States."

FINANCIAL ILLUSTRATIONS—Drawing checks.

"Looking at the aurora borealis" is the excuse heads of families and young men give now at breakfast for being out late the previous evening.

THE CAPITAL TO BEGIN LIFE WITH—A capital wife.

In Pennsylvania lately, a clock-peddler was tramping along—hot, dusty, and tired—when he came to a meeting-house, wherein sundry Friends were engaged in silent devotion. The peripatetic tradesman thought he would walk in and rest himself. He took a seat upon a bench, doffed his hat, and placed his clocks upon the floor. There was a painful stillness in the meeting-house, which was broken by one of the clocks, which commenced striking furiously. The peddler was in an agony, but he hoped every minute that the clock would stop. Instead of that, it struck just four hundred and thirty times by the actual count of every Friend at the meeting, for the best disciplined of them couldn't help numbering the strokes. Then up rose one of the eldest Friends, at the end of the four hundred and thirtieth stroke, and said, "Friend, as it is so very late, perhaps thee had better proceed on thy journey, or thee will not reach thy destination, unless thee is as energetic as thy vehement timepiece!"

A PLEDGE OF LOVE—Pawning the engagement ring.

The following stanza is said to have been copied from the tombstone of a husband and wife:

"Within this grave do lie,
Back to back, my wife and I;
When the last trump the air shall fill,
If she gets up, I'll just lie still."

What's the proper age for a parson?—The parsonage, of course.

IRRITATING THE FEELINGS—After rolling all night in your berth at sea till you are miserably sick, to have a steward ask you in the morning if you will have a fresh roll for breakfast.

The following bills are proposed for the consideration of our legislators:

A Bill for the Establishment of a Cheerful Newspaper.

A Bill for the Introduction of Uniformity in the Length of the Months of the Year. [This is a measure which will do away with much uncertainty and confusion, and render unnecessary many millions of questions at present of annual recurrence.]

A Bill for the better Regulation of the Practice of asking Eminent Characters for their Autographs.

A Bill for the Total Abolition of Encores, Fees, and Gratuities at Places of Public Entertainment.

A Bill to reduce the Exorbitant Price of Oysters.

A Bill to restrain Photographers from putting Likenesses in their Windows against the express Wish and Injunction of the Persons misrepresented.

A Bill for the better Regulation of Penny-a-lying.

A Bill to provide Itinerant Vendors with Vocal Instruction.

A Bill to subject all Young Men wearing an Eye-glass to Surgical Examination.

A prominent dry-goods merchant of Boston worked half an hour on the following proposition, and failed to give the answer: "If fourteen men build a stone-wall in nine days, how long will it take five men to build a like wall in six days?"

SHARP-SHOOTERS—Meteors.

When is a ship in love?—When it is attached to the buoys!

The fellow who called tight boots comfortable, defended his position by saying that they make a man forget all his other miseries.

RACES THAT SHOULD BECOME EXTINCT—Steamboat races on the Mississippi.

A man not a thousand miles from here once asked another who he liked the best to hear preach.

"Why," said he, "I like to hear Mr. —— preach best, because I don't like any preaching, and his comes nearest to nothing of any that I ever heard."

HOME MUSIC—Hus-bands.

"I don't like these shoes," said a lady customer, "because the soles are too thick."

"Is that the only objection?" blandly asked the salesman.

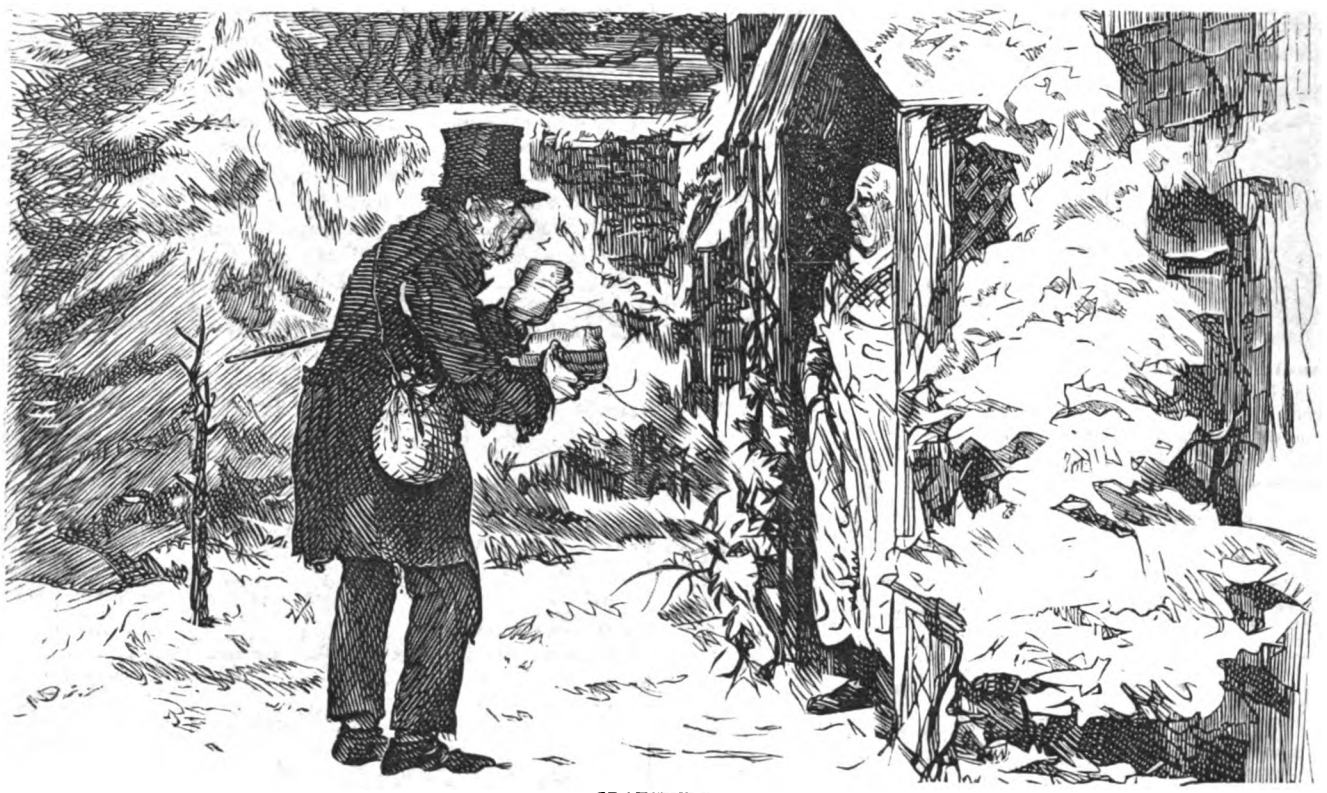
"Yes," was the reply.

"Then, madame, if you take the shoes, I can assure you that that objection will gradually wear away."

Twenty quires make one ream; one ream makes a statue.

RIFLEMEN—Burglars.

One of the miseries of life is to be beaten in an argument, and immediately afterward to think of some expression that would have totally annihilated your opponent.



GRATITUDE.

FASTIDIOUS VAGRANT "And they ain't 'alf Buttered! I could 'a Done as well if I'd Gone up the Lane to the Poor-house!"

"A NIGHT OF IT."

YOUNG WIFE (2 A.M.). "Dinner at Delmonico's! the Theatre! and Supper and a Rubber at the Club! Well, Henry, I wonder you did not Go to All the Places of Amusement in New York, and (sobbing) not come Home all Night!"

HENRY. "My dear, all th' other Plashes Shu' rup!"

ROGUES FALLING OUT.

MAMMA. "What is Baby Crying for, Maggie?"

MAGGIE. "I don't know."

MAMMA. "And what are you Looking so Indignant about?"

MAGGIE. "That Nasty, Greedy Dog's been and Took and Eaten my 'Punge-take!"

MAMMA. "Why, I saw you Eating a Sponge-cake a Minute ago!"

MAGGIE. "Oh, that was Baby's!"

A GIFT.

A Bavarian officer in France found one of his men cleaning a chicken. "Hallo, fellow," cried he, "where did you get that chicken? Don't you know that stealing has been forbidden on pain of death?"

"A peasant woman gave it to me," was the answer.

"And what did she say?"

"Well, she didn't say much; she only cried!"

A philosopher has discovered that men don't object to be overrated—except by assessors.

A man "down East" was living with his second wife. One day she asked him where he wished to be buried when he died. He replied,

"In L——, where my wife was buried."

"And where would you bury me if I should die?" said wife No. 2.

"In L——, of course," said the husband.

"I won't go a step," was the reply. "I don't know a soul up there, and I know lots in this grave-yard!"

WHAT COLUMBUS DID—A notion crossed him, and he crossed an ocean.

The most remarkable instance of a hybrid animal is the cricket-bat.

What kind of pine is the most difficult to saw into timber?—The porcupine.

THE UNNECESSARIES OF LIFE.—Paint—on the face, morning calls, long sermons, newspaper interviewers, internal tax gatherers, carpet-baggers, railway directors, grand juries, Cumming's prophecies, Tupper's philosophies, nine out of ten new novels, black beetles, poor relations, and the compliments of the season.

RIVERS WITH QUERIES.—The river Wye, and the river Ware for?

THE REAL SHOOTING SEASON.—Spring.

AN UNSUSPECTED INFIRMITY.—Milton must have been conscious of a disposition in himself to yield to the pleasures of the table, otherwise he would not (as in "L'Allégro") have desired a preventive "against eating cares."

WORKMEN GENERALLY ON STRIKE—Blacksmiths.

A bachelor friend compares a shirt-button to life, because it so often hangs by a thread.

A SPOT HAZARD—Practicing at a rifle range.

A Canadian hotel once had a sign in the reading-room thus, "Gentlemen learning to spell will please take yesterday's papers."

"SPEAKING BY THE CARD"—A whist-player leading off.

SAD FATE.—A country paper expresses the deliberate conviction that "a man who will not do any thing himself, nor let any one else do any thing, by way of public improvement, ought to keep tavern after every body else is dead!"

HOW TO MAKE TIME GO FAST—Use the spur of the moment.

There is no commoner grammatical mistake than the inversion which produces such a ludicrous effect as this: "Wanted—a bedroom for a single gentleman eighteen feet long." I have just found the following in an old newspaper: "Mr. Pitt went to the House upon crutches, which was the fullest ever known."

THE GROUND OF INSANITY—The battle-field.

It was a very hard-shell Baptist, of Tennessee, who suggested, when he heard of the reformation of an ungodly neighbor, that no ordinary baptism would do for that man—the only sure way would be to tie a grindstone to his feet, and "anchor him overnight in the middle of the river."

The Indianapolis Sentinel tells a good story of a railroad conductor who resides in that city. In his absence his wife presented him with a fine boy. Some of his wife's friends, who are of a waggish turn of mind, suggested that they borrow two other babies in the neighborhood, and present the three youngsters to the happy father on his return. The plan was carried out, and, upon the arrival of the train in the evening, the young husband, who had heard that all was well, hurried home. After fondly kissing his wife, he asked to see the little stranger. Imagine his surprise on beholding three babies when the coverlet was turned down. After gazing at them in profound astonishment for several minutes, he turned to his wife, and coolly asked, "Did any get away?"

THE BEST MAGAZINES—Cereals for France.

A Hibernian Senator, speaking of suicide, said, "The only way to stop it is to make it a capital offense, punishable with death."

The man who didn't believe in advertising has gone into partnership with the sheriff, and they are going to have an auction.

"Have you, in your album, any original poetry?" asked one young lady of another.

"No," was the reply; "but some of my friends have favored me with original spelling."

An old lady being in a store at Waterbury, Connecticut, recently sat down and reached out her half-frozen feet to the Herring safe, remarking that she always did like those air-tight stoves.

EXCEPTION FROM THE GENERAL RULE—Bachelors.

The "divorce suit" is the name of the most stylish traveling dress in Chicago.

A poem in an agricultural paper, called "Song of the Farmer Boy," very appropriately commences with "Ho, brothers, ho!"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 13.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Apron-polonaise Walking Suit.

THIS new and elegant apron-front polonaise is copied from a model imported from Paris by one of our most exclusive and fashionable modistes, who has kindly granted us the favor. The shape and draping are peculiarly stylish, and the graceful front is cut without a seam, thus making a perfect tablier. The garment may be made of any kind of cloth or silk, and used either for suits, or of a material different from the skirt. The back is nearly tight-fitting; the front is loose, and made with one dart, and the whole is belted in at the waist. A simple bow at the back finishes the belt. Two rows of passementerie gimp surround the polonaise, cross in front and form a square on the apron, and pass over the shoulder, as shown by the illustration. The garment is edged with fringe or lace. The trimming, of course, can be varied to suit the taste. The walking skirt furnished with the suit is of convenient length, just clearing the ground.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

To take bust measure, pass a tape measure entirely around the body under the arms, across the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest. Nine sizes are published, viz., 30, 32, 34, 36, 38, 40, 42, 44, and 46 inches. Where no measure accompanies the order, the medium size is sent.

This suit comprises two articles—apron-front polonaise, and walking skirt.

APRON-FRONT POLONAISE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, side piece, back, belt, and sleeve. The fronts are fitted with one dart, and have an apron front, which is left open nine inches below the waist line, and is cut without a seam in the middle. The opening below the waist is closed with hooks and eyes or buttons, and a lap is sewed on to conceal the fastening. A belt confines the polonaise at the waist. The side body and back form four large box-pleats below the waist line on the outside. The extra fullness of the skirt at the top on the under side is gathered into a belt, which fastens in front under the garment. The notches in the seams of the skirt show where the pleats are to be laid. Pleats five inches deep are laid in the three back seams. One pleat five inches, and one two inches deep are laid in the seams which join the apron fronts, all the pleats turning upward. The notches come together to form the depth of each pleat. The perforations in the front and over the shoulder show where to sew on the trimming and make the darts in front. One row of the trimming covers the darts. The sleeve is left open six inches from the bottom, and is trimmed on the outer seam up to the armhole. Baste up the garment, and try it on wrong side out before sewing the seams.

Quantity of material, 30 inches wide, 8 yards.

Passementerie gimp trimming, 16¾ yards.

Fringe or lace for bottom of polonaise, 5 yards.

WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, side gore, and three straight breadths for the back.

Quantity of material, 30 inches wide, for skirt, 7½ yards.

Material for each four-inch flounce, 1½ yards.

APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT.

[Cut Paper Pattern of this entire Suit, to fit any Figure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Bust Measure.]

Digitized by Google

FORTUNE'S WHEEL.

My love was a poor man's daughter,
And I was a poor man's son,
And oft we walked by the sea-shore,
When the work o' the day was done—
Hand in hand on the gleaming sand,
And our two hearts beat as one.

My love was meek and gentle,
And she was wondrous fair,
With hazel dyes in her slumbrous eyes,
And chestnut shades on her hair;
And we raked hay on the meadow,
And I gave my heart in her care.

But the great notched wheel of Fortune
Kept turning on and on,
And she was a rich man's daughter,
And I was a poor man's son;
And she had a score of lovers or more,
But I was the favored one.

And I passed hard by her window,
Nor turned my face to see
The lady fair with gems in her hair,
As fine as fine could be,
Though I knew her heart was dying
For just one word from me.

My love grew pale as the lily,
And faded day by day,
And I passed by and heard her sigh,
And turned my head away;
For I was proud as the proudest,
And her gold between us lay.

And the great notched wheel of Fortune
Kept rolling on and on,
And she was a poor man's daughter,
And I was a rich man's son;
And maids of grace smiled in my face,
But I saw only one.

I found my love in the cottage
Where first I sought her side,
And I shall not tell how I wooed, but well,
For she had not my pride;
And I gave my heart in her keeping,
And won her for my bride.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain a great variety of patterns and illustrations of Bridal Dresses and Coiffures; Suits for Elderly Ladies; Evening Dresses for Young Ladies; Paletots; Basque-Waists; Shawl Suits; Watteau and Gored Wrappers; Water-proof and Traveling Hoods; Breakfast and Dress Caps; Wall Tidies; Point Lace Collars, etc., etc.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Apron-Polonaise Walking Suit, on our first page, are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 207 of this Number.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Markets and Prices.

DEAR RALPH,—The other morning I met a lady—a friend of ours—who had an air of business, and who spoke to me with so preoccupied an air that I was very curious to know where she had been and what she was doing; not that it was especially any concern of mine, but that loitering old fellows like me, and those gentlemen whom you see in the morning at the windows of the Union Club, smoking, are essentially gossips, and we speculate with profound interest upon the affairs of other people because we have none of importance of our own. It was not far from the Union Club; in fact, it was in Broadway that I met our friend, whom I joined, notwithstanding her absorption, and as courteously as I could I asked if I could not help her. "I see that you are troubled about something," I ventured to remark; "and if I could be of assistance to you, you know how glad I should be."

She looked at me with a very sweet smile, and said: "Oh no, I thank you, I am not troubled. I have only been pricing things."

She pronounced the word as if it had been spelled with a z, and with an air of delight as if she had been Di Vernon speaking of a hunt and the inspiring harkaway.

"Pricing things?" I asked, doubtfully.

"Yes; going through the shops and finding the cost of spring goods, you know; feeling the market, as you men say, I believe."

There was a charming animation in her manner, and I hoped in the most sympathetic tone that she had had a successful tour.

"Oh, delightful! There's nothing like going through the shops when they open the new goods, and pricing things."

She continued in a strain of enthusiasm, remarking that New York was, after all, only a great market, and that the whole world sent its products thither. Every thing was for sale. You could buy what you wanted. And she rattled on so warmly that I understood what is meant by a shop-keeping people. For here was a little lady whose very soul seemed absorbed in shopping; and if I could only remember what she told me, during our brief promenade, of the prices of every kind of dry-goods, I should be so wise as to be of some actual use in society, and I might even hope to find employment at Stewart's.

But my little friend's zeal quickened her pace so that I found it difficult to keep up with her comfortably, and presently wished her good-morning and more shops to conquer, and took leave of her just as she was entering Constable's, kissing her hand to me as she went, and her face glowing with expectation. I walked on more slowly, and meditated her remark that the great city was a great market. And why not all the world? If it be a stage, and men and women merely players, as our poet tells us, is it any less a market, in which every man and woman has a price? Robert Walpole said it, or was said to have said it, of the public men of his day. Is it any less true now, dear Ralph? If you should go to Washington would you find the Capitol a market, and Senators and Representatives duly priced? I make no assertion, my dear boy. I am only conducting a philosophical inquiry and observation. Or, to limit the range of our observation, could you, by any stretch of your fancy, suppose our own beloved Legislature, the statesmen who make laws for us at our own capital, to be, so to speak, disposable—to have a marketable price?

Suppose, Ralph, that you and I should set forth for the capital, and escaping the railroad bridges and other traps upon the way, should arrive in that city, and that presently we should find our way to the halls in which the representative wisdom of the commonwealth is assembled. As we enter, let us suppose a smooth-tongued gentleman meets us, who somehow impresses us very much like the excellent white-frocked butchers at Tompkins Market or elsewhere—that is, with an undeniable air of business. He is very polite, and rubs his hands, we will fancy, and he says, "Any thing in my line this morning, gentlemen?" so that we look around as if we should see a fine fat quarter of beef, or a saddle of mutton, or a haunch of venison, or a rabbit, or a dozen squabs—innocents, greenlings. But we really see no such things, and are confused by remarking that, instead of marketable provisions or butcher's meat, we are in a hall, and that various legislators are before us, large and small, indeed, old and new, in office; but where is the beef? where are the squabs that we involuntarily thought to see?

And the smooth-tongued gentleman looks at us so curiously, and is evidently so sure that we are bent upon trade, that it really seems to us—does it not?—as if he said—he doesn't say so, but somehow it seems so—"Are you for a Senator or two this morning, or shall I put you in a neat little lot of Assemblymen?" And again we look about, as if we should see these commodities hanging by the leg or arm to sharp hooks overhead, as we do see choice bits at the markets. And suppose that, following the whim of our fancies, we should say that we were merely feeling the market—pricing things, as the little lady said—and our guide should reply, "All right, gentlemen," and then proceed like a market-man who is discussing the scope and extent of your projected feast: "You can be suited at every price, gentlemen. If it is a mere private bill, I could perhaps give you half a dozen tender Representatives and a spare-rib of a Senator, or so, at a very reasonable figure. If it is any bit of local legislation, the price is really ridiculous; members are a drug. But if you were thinking of a city railroad, as gentlemen of your character most probably are, I can give you the most elegant and appetizing majority you ever saw; but, of course, you would expect to pay accordingly. I have several very superior Senatorial joints always on hand, warranted to bend any way. I have always given satisfaction, and the market was never in a better condition."

If, I say, my dear Ralph, we should be accosted in this manner, should we not be obliged to believe that the august Capitol of the State was as much a market as the Fulton, or the Washington, or the Tompkins, in the city; that the people's representatives had their price as certainly as butcher's-meat, or greens, or offal; and that legislation was sold by the vote, as beef and mutton are sold by the pound? And if we give this kind of fancy play, where will it stop? The world is a huge market, then, and the great departments of industry and activity, the professions, the trades, are but stalls, in which men and their talent and their exertions are exposed for sale? And is character for sale also? Has honor a price? Can you buy manhood? Do they sell conscience for dog's-meat? Has every man and every woman a price, like the cuffs and collars that the little lady was so busily seeing? A lawyer, for instance, enters into collusion with those who would evade the spirit of the law for the worst purposes. He strains all his talent and ingenuity to stretch the letter of the law over huge frauds, and conceal them with a show of legality. He connives at acts for which men would be kicked out of the society of gentlemen. He struggles to give thieving, lying, and forging the name of propriety and the air of regularity. He tries to smother justice with law. And if he does all this, and you see that he is enormously paid for it, what are you doing by such observation? You are pricing things, as the little lady said. You are ascertaining that a lawyer will sell all that to many men is invaluable, if only he can be paid enough for it. He is a man whose price is money. There is no deception in it, no romance. Such a man sells his honor for money. When a woman does the same, what is thought of her?

Here is another, whose heart is inflamed with the passion of political power. He has been fairly elected to office, but, like a man who has unwarily tasted ardent spirits, office kindles an unquenchable thirst. He finds that he has patronage, and that patronage is power, and that power makes power, as capital breeds capital. He wishes to go on. He will rise from place to place. His ambition finds vanity, jealousy, all the meaner passions its faithful slaves. Other men stoop and whisper and lie. He will beat them with their own weapons. It is better that he should be in power than they. And to buy that power he sells every thing, and is himself sold by the bargain. This man, too, has his price, like the saddle of mutton, like the legislator, like the lace cuff, like the lawyer. A shrewd pricer of the market would buy him, if he wanted him, as surely as you would buy a pair of prairie-chickens, my dear Ralph, if you wanted them for supper.

And you, Aspasia—who may be reading this letter over Ralph's shoulder—have you, too, a price? If you are poor and beautiful, if you have fine tastes and social ambition, and here on one side is Robbie Burns, who can only woo you by his song, "'Tis sweeter for thee despairing than aught in the world beside," and on the other is Crœsus, with splendid house and horses and carriages, and social position and diamonds and feasts, and Newport and Saratoga and the grand tour—what then? Have you a price, Aspasia? Are you in the market? Fate is pricing you, my dear. You may deceive yourself, others you can not. You may say that you want wider opportunities of benevolence; that you are so unhappily constituted that you must have comforts; that you have generous and lavish habits; that you can make mother and sisters and friends so happy, and you ought to make the sacrifice; that poverty slays love, and the pauper has no honey-moon—the question is not changed, Are you in the market? Can you be sold for a price, and is this offer high enough?

Upon how many of us, dear Ralph, the price is plainly labeled! This beef for forty cents a pound. This legislator for a hundred shares of the stock. This governor for a nomination. This statesman for the control of patronage. This lawyer for a huge fee. This man for flattery, for fame, for a fortune. This woman for jealousy, for revenge, for despair, for an establishment. What is often called shrewdness and sagacity is merely ability to price things accurately. A man would be a fool who should offer Mr. Plover in the market a string of glass beads for a loin of veal; but he could buy a great deal of land from an Indian at that price. So he would be very unwise who should offer you and me a thousand dollars for our votes; but how if he offered us the mission to Siberia? This critic may frown you out of the door if you offer a bottle of Champagne for a friendly word; but how if you tell him that it is his opinion mainly, not that of the ordinary scribblers, in which you are interested? There are plenty of men who are as busily pricing us all as our little friend was busy pricing the dry-goods in the pretty shops. And life itself—does it never seem to you, Ralph, the divine method of testing who can and who can not be bought and sold? who can and who can not stand fast by himself? And is there a more comfortable gospel to meditate upon our journey than the celestial irony of the question, "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?"

Always your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE JEWEL OF CONSISTENCY.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

IT is very sad to go to the great hotels and see the little children decked in elaborate finery, and dancing and prancing through the vast rooms before gazing crowds at hours when they ought to be fast asleep in their beds. We religious folk inveigh earnestly against the children's balls and parties in which you of the world indulge; and, thank Heaven, we mean to keep our little ones in the sheltered ways of home!

But what objectionable feature of children's balls was wanting in the series of Pilgrim Memorial festivities lately held in Tremont Temple, Boston? Late hours, fine clothes, gazing crowds, intense excitement, all were there; and the mothers were not there in a position to exercise constant care over the wild little creatures. When I alighted before the door, out almost upon the sidewalk rushed a little lady whom I knew to meet me, out into the midst of the crowd, out into the cold, dark night—a tiny thing scarcely ten years old, in flimsy white gown and thin slippers, unshawled, bare-headed, unattended except by a girl of her own age. Half crazy with excitement, the little chits were curveting around from room to room, breathless and eager, unable to be quiet, their nearest approach to standing still a nervous hopping and skipping. Presently they were marshaled, and indeed it was a pretty sight! They fluttered into their places, tier above tier of white-robed girls rising before us like a bank of lilies; and over against them the contrasting shadow of sober-hued boys; and behind, and far above all, an arched throne occupied by a single little girl, who, I suppose, represented Liberty, or some such virtuous abstraction, and who kept one in constant fear that she would drop asleep and fall off. Then they sang, and their young fresh voices thrilled out on the air, and filled the great hall with melody. They rose, and it was like the bursting of a bud into broad white blossom. They waved suddenly their hidden flags, and the lily bank was alive with color. Faith, Hope, and Charity, Justice and Peace, and all the United States, grouped themselves in their appointed places, and sang their appointed songs; and so the Pilgrims were memorialized.

And there were evening concerts and matinées, and for these I do not know how many rehearsals. A large number of the children were from neighboring towns, and could scarcely have reached home before eleven o'clock. If they were like one little lady, they were not asleep before twelve; and school began next day at nine, as usual. And was it for this, O God, beneath thy guiding hand, our exiled fathers crossed the sea?

Yet people who would on no account send their children to dancing-school let them out to these concerts; and religious papers, that are the first to condemn the frivolities of fashionable mammas, were the first to denounce the Boston public for not filling the Temple to witness this sacrifice of the lambs.

If it were not too serious, it would be grotesque. When "the fashionable mother" takes her little one to the ball-room, and sets her spinning, she honestly gives her of her best. She starts her in the life which she herself most values, for the prizes which herself holds highest. But we Pilgrims profess to scout all that. We deprecate the show, the admiration, the absorption, as the worst things for our children. Yet here we are deliberately bringing it all upon them. We are farming out their youth, their innocence, their fresh, winsome beauty, for paper currency—children fifty cents, reserved seats one dollar. Is not that worse than the fashionable mother? She, at least, does not sell the gift of God for money. If it is right to keep children up till midnight, to show them off before promiscuous assemblies, to set them on fire with excitement, what difference does it make whether we use their toes or their tongues? What difference does it make whether it is in the Tremont Temple or in the Ocean House parlors? If it is right, let us say no more about it. If it is wrong, does the building of a Congregational house with the proceeds make it right? We may have been mistaken hitherto in our abjurations and adjurations; but if we were not, the adoption of such a mode of church-building is very much like laying the foundations of Jericho in the blood of our first-born.

If, when these little goddesses of Liberty and Hope and Charity grow to woman's estate, they choose to go upon the stage in dresses as thin and short as they wore at this Pilgrim opera, and sing drinking-songs instead of greeting-songs, and enact the "Bohemian Girl" instead of the United States, their fathers and mothers may not be able to hinder them. But to thrust them upon the stage in their tender years—to train them for public performances, and feed them with public applause—is a thing which nobody but their parents can do, and for which their parents, aided and abetted, but not governed, by the religious press, are alone responsible.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE APRON-POLONAISE.

THE apron-polonaise, illustrated on our first page, is a most graceful over dress for spring suits. It differs from the polonaise-casaque in having a perfect apron front without a seam down the centre, and in being but half adjusted behind. The fullness in the back is confined by a belt. Belted garments are cooler than close-fitting ones, and are exceedingly becoming to slight figures. Our model is quite simple. The back has two side forms and two centre pieces, making a seam down the middle of the back. The waist and skirt pieces are cut together. Four widths of silk are required for the back, the body pieces being shaped from the centre of each width, and the remainder of the entire width added for fullness in the skirt. This fullness is first arranged in a large box-pleat, and then gathered beneath the belt. The looping is done by taking a single deep pleat in each seam. The belt is three folds, with a small bow behind without sash ends.

The model illustrated is of black silk, and is a stylish over garment for the black silk suit that ladies find so desirable in the spring. It may be trimmed with passementerie and fringe, or lace. The trimming passes down the front and crosses on the apron, making a very dressy tablier. Some polonaises are provided with over-sleeves in the flowing oriental style. The skirt of this black silk suit is trimmed with four overlapping bias ruffles a finger deep when bound. They are alternately gathered and box-pleated. The lowest ruffle is gathered; the upper, in box-pleats, is finished as a heading for the cluster of ruffles by having a narrow band of bias silk or of passementerie stitched on an inch from the top of the ruffle.

Digitized by Google

All sorts of woolen stuffs, especially the soft flexible pongees and summer serges so largely imported, are now being made into such suits. If the woolen goods is fine enough to justify the expense, the suit is trimmed with gros grain ruffles of a similar shade, or else darker. For instance, a gray pongee has a two-inch band of gray silk for the polonaise trimming, while the skirt has gathered ruffles of gray silk alternating with box-pleated ruffles of pongee. The ruffles extend to the knee, and the effect is remarkably pretty. A pongee suit of Frou Frou brown (yellow-tinted) has ruffles of darker brown silk.

We commend this polonaise also for the white muslin and buff linen suits that ladies who do their own sewing are now making for midsummer wear. The polonaise, when made of bishop's lawn, should be trimmed with a bias fold of the same, or a band of narrow tucks inserted in the design shown in the engraving, and the edge finished with a ruffle or ruche. On nansook, needle-worked insertion and embroidered ruffles are used; for Swiss muslin, duchesse or Valenciennes insertion and lace. These long white polonaises are not worn with white skirts alone, but with colored silk skirts, and are considered especially stylish over black silk. Buff linen polonaises, made in the same way, are trimmed with the unbleached Flemish guipure lace, made of linen thread. Thin écru linen lawn is selected for such garments; and these buff polonaises will also be worn over black silk.

The polonaise casaque with postilion back, illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., retains its popularity, and is given an improved effect by being buttoned down the entire front, or fastened by fancy brandebourgs, or by bows made of the material of the trimming. This garment is more becoming to stout figures than the apron-polonaise.

IMPORTED SUITS.

A quantity of suits just arrived from Berlin shows a variety of styles for the approaching warm weather without disclosing any thing especially novel. To itemize: there is no change in the breadths of lower skirts of suits. Their shape is the flat gored front and sides with full back, their width is from three and a half to four yards around the bottom, and their length is a matter of taste. Ultra fashionables and extremists let the skirt drag an inch or two behind, while sensible women make it just short enough to escape the ground. All suits have an upper skirt, or a polonaise that has the effect of one. The long over-skirt will not continue to be so exclusively worn, since very short and very long over-skirts are among the importations. The former are very dressy for light, thin fabrics that do not drape well, and require to be arranged in some fanciful manner. The latter are plain widths, very slightly gored and very simply draped. Many suits are belted, and ornamented with a bow behind, but without sash ends. Elaborate sashes are abandoned. Loose sacques are longer and are less slashed than those of last year. They are closed on the sides, and only open in the centre of the back to prevent hooping over the full tournure. The loose paletot of last summer and the basque of the present season are combined to form a very jaunty wrap. The front is short, loose, and square, like the sailor jacket; the back is a regular postilion basque, with a little fullness added below the waist in the side forms. These garments are more frequently made of summer cloth the color of the suit than of the material of the suit. Small revers or Marie Antoinette collars finish the throat when it is pointed and opened low, but ruches and standing bands close around the throat are much used. The sleeve of the season is the half-flowing sleeve, fitting the arm smoothly from the shoulder to midway between the elbow and wrist, where it is widened, and the fullness held in a box-pleat covered by a bow or passementerie ornament, or else the sleeve is cut off all around, and finished by a pleated ruffle.

An original idea for suits intended for summer wear dispenses with an outer wrap, and thus gives but one covering for the body and arms. The waist, which must be put on first, is a chemise Russe with darts in front, and loose back. This corsage is lined with soft muslin or with cotton satine. The dress skirt, belted over the chemise Russe to hold it in place, has the apron front of the over-skirt attached to it, and prettily caught up at the sides. To complete the suit a belt—of folds bound on each edge—is added, and from this belt is pendent the bouffant back that completes the over-skirt. This is a stylish and convenient design for business, shopping, and traveling suits that are donned in a hurry, as each part is so well arranged that it is almost impossible to fail in adjusting the dress at once. When worn the suit has the effect of an elaborate polonaise and skirt.

Correspondents ask, Shall we trim with ruffles or flat bands? Do either, or both, we say in reply, for there is no fixed fashion in the matter, and here is the coveted opportunity for a display of individual tastes. However, the modistes have a few rules that it is well enough not to transgress. For instance, a single deep flounce is not so stylish as two, three, or four narrower ones; if a deep flounce is preferred, it must have a narrow ruffle on its lower edge, the heading must be elaborate, and the flounce must be set above the edge of the dress, while a narrow pleating or a ruche finishes the edge. Side pleating is too heavy for silks in summer, but will be retained for lighter fabrics. An elegant style is to put a deep treble box-pleating in the centre of each of the six gored widths of a skirt, place elaborate bows or passementerie ornaments in the space between, and head all with folds of repped silk and passementerie. For narrower ruffles avoid every thing systematic in arrangement. Gather and pleat them alternately; make overlapping or in groups; use different shades for alternate ruffles, or else different fabrics of the same shade. Instead of double folds, single bias bands are used. These are generally finished on the upper side, and sometimes on both sides, by a tiny piping fold of a darker shade. For black gros grain dresses these tiny folds are of the heavy repped ottoman silk, and by way of ornament the centre band of gros grain is dotted with passementerie figures, or with very small buttons. Wash poplins and many other spring goods are trimmed with bands of the same material, of a darker shade. This pretty fashion has entirely superseded the plan of trimming every color with black. Five bias bands, each two inches wide, piped with a darker shade, or with a different material, are placed an inch apart around skirts. For still plainer dresses two bands, each four inches wide, are used. All trimmings surround garments as borders. There is no elaborate festooning on skirts, or fanciful epaulets or collars on waists. The beauty of basques and paletots is in the fit, and the trimming merely outlines the graceful garment. The only exception we discover to this is when the trimming outlines a vest on basques, or is passed straight up the centre of the back of paletots. A bow or a brandebourg of gimp is placed on sleeves, or at the back of a postilion.

The gray and brown shades that are always popular in spring are very largely represented. Poussière, or dust-color, dove gray, ashes of roses, and the yellow-browns and buffs called Frou Frou, are the colors most largely imported. Few contrasts are seen. Dark steel gray trimmed with nut brown is a stylish combination. The favorite choice for handsome street attire at present is black cashmere and black silk, to be succeeded in summer by suits of black grenadine.

SPRING PALETOTS.

The short paletots imported to complete suits are made of light twilled cloth, scarcely heavier than serge. The newest shape is that already described, with loose front and fitted postilion back. These have false pocket flaps on the sides, reversed collar, half-open sleeves, and for trimming a bias band of the cloth of a darker shade, headed by a delicate braiding pattern in silk cord. Two straight rows of cord, and a curled row above these, is simple but tasteful. The English jacket with double-hearted front and slightly slashed back is also shown. Many shades of light gray and brown are displayed in these goods, at prices ranging from $10 to $17. They are made by the neat sewers of Berlin in the most exquisite manner, and would cost, if made here, almost twice the amount asked for them. For gay young girls there are white serge cloth jackets, edged with a narrow fold of colored velvet—blue, brown, or black—with revers, cuffs, and buttons to match. For old ladies there are double talmas of cashmere, arranged with a Watteau fold in the upper cape, a small hood, and long scarfs to tie in front. The trimmings are silk bands and fringes, and the price is $19.

The Park jackets, for driving, are of black cashmere, embroided or braided in colors. Some are needle-worked in blocks, in the Japanese fashion, and are fringed with crimped silk of the colors of the embroidery.

For information received we are indebted to the courtesy of Mesdames DIEDEN; and SIBLEY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.

PERSONAL.

SIR JOHN A. MACDONALD, the Canadian Parliamentary leader, and a member of the British High Commission, is not only able as a public man, but has social gifts that for five-and-twenty years past have made him conspicuous and welcome every where. He has rare talent as a raconteur. He is now fifty-seven, was born in Scotland, but came to Canada when a youth. He conducted all the negotiations in England for the confederation of Canada. Lady MACDONALD is his second wife, is a native of Jamaica, and of noble blood. Of her characteristics as a woman and a wife too much can not be said, especially for her charitable disposition. She has a daughter aged ten. Sir JOHN has by his first marriage a son, now a law student in Canada.

—Mr. HENRY D. COOKE, who has finally accepted the governorship of the District of Columbia, is in the prime of life, and possesses admirable qualifications for the position. For, as commenceth the second paragraph of the Declaration of Independence, "we hold this truth to be self-evident," that any man who can successfully conduct a daily paper, and profitably manage a banking business, is competent to the duties of governor of any State or Territory in any part of the world. After receiving a collegiate education he became a contributor to the Philadelphia Gazette and New York Courier and Enquirer, and subsequently was editor of the Ohio State Journal. In 1861 he accepted a position in the banking house of JAY COOKE & Co., where he has since remained, and accumulated a large fortune.

—Germany does produce some queer people. For instance, AGNES SCHUBERT, the vocalist, who recently died in Stuttgart, was divorced some years since from STRAUSS, author of the "Life of Jesus," on the ground of his extreme penuriousness.

—GEORGE CRUIKSHANK had no idea of artistic fame when young. He commenced life as a sailor, was afterward an actor, and finally took up the pencil simply as a means of aiding his parents, who were very poor. He at once succeeded, and soon became rich as well as famous.

—It is proposed to insert a memorial window to ALICE CARY in the "Church of the Strangers," in New York. From this church Miss CARY was buried. It was the last to which she was attached. It is the church of her surviving sister, Miss PHŒBE CARY. A memorial window has been decided by her friends as more appropriate than a tablet. An artist is engaged on the design, and the window will be made as rich as the contributions of her friends will justify. It is necessary only to state this object to secure the necessary funds. A few dollars from each of her many friends and admirers will make this graceful monument to her memory. Contributions will be received by the leading publishers of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, and by the pastor, Dr. DEEMS, 4 Winthrop Place, New York city. Let the responses be promptly made. When finished a circular will be sent to the subscribers, with an acknowledgment of their contributions.

—Senator REVELS, at the close of his term, is to be a lecturing agent, at the South, of the Congressional Temperance Society.

—Mrs. HAWTHORNE, who died on the 26th of February, in London, was in all respects a worthy helpmeet and companion for the distinguished novelist. She was a lady of rare mental ability and graces of character, and belonged to a family whose services to literature, and especially to the cause of education, have been valuable. She leaves a son and two daughters.

—The vivacity of the American character was happily illustrated by the late Dr. RAY, of the Chicago Post, who during his life is said to have made and lost five fortunes. Five, however, in Chicago, is understood to be a little under the average.

—Speaking of copyright, it is not a little curious that the first man in England who had copy-money—i. e., a price for the copyright of a literary work—was a clergyman, the Rev. Dr. HAMMOND, and the work was his "Annota on the New Testament." He was one of the most accomplished scholars of his time. This was two hundred years ago.

—Miss CORNELIA JEFFERSON RANDOLPH, a granddaughter of THOMAS JEFFERSON, died a few days since in Alexandria, Virginia, at the age of seventy-three.

—Miss FANNY R. SPRAGUE has been appointed phonographic amanuensis in the Treasury Department, Washington, at nearly double the pay of the other lady clerks, who write only long-hand.

—HANS CHRISTIAN ANDERSEN was the son of a shoe-maker, and his family were so poor that at an early age he was apprenticed by his mother to a tailor; but he always detested manual labor, and made clever verses when he was twelve years old.

—Mr. RICHARD WALLACE, son and heir of the Marquis of Hertford, during the late siege of Paris, at an expense of $60,000, established an ambulance, paid down $10,000 for the behoof of the victims of the bombardment, set up a hospital at his own expense, and established in his own house another hospital for thirty patients. He has in six months done more for charity than his father and grandfather did in sixty years.

—Mr. MOTLEY and family have arrived at the Hague, and taken possession of the charming old-fashioned villa which the Queen of Holland has placed at his disposal. It has beautiful gardens, kept only as the Dutch can keep them, and adjoins and communicates with the royal park.

—HOPE & Co., the celebrated bankers of Amsterdam, are said to be worth not less than forty millions of dollars, most of which has been made in the last ten years.

—Some two years ago HEALY painted a portrait of the Pope for Archbishop SPALDING, of Baltimore. It being impossible to obtain a private sitting, the picture was painted from photographs and from occasional views obtained in public. Cardinal ANTONELLI finally saw it, and liked it so much that he asked to send it to the Vatican, and thus Mr. HEALY has obtained a private sitting for the last picture that will be taken of the Pope, who, if he survive until the 13th of May next, will be seventy-eight years of age. The great interest, however, that attaches to PIUS IX. is in the fact that if he lives until the 16th of June next—only three months—he will have occupied the papal chair longer than any pope since St. PETER himself. There have been two or three instances where a pope has almost reached the twenty-fifth year, but not one who has fully entered upon it.

—M. OLLIVIER, late Prime Minister of France, who has founded an asylum at Pollone, in Piedmont, is preparing for publication a work entitled "My Ministry of the Second of January." The first volume will be entitled "The Plebiscite;" the second, "The War."

—SPURGEON is often spoken of as an extraordinary specimen of precocity, having commenced preaching at Teversham when only seventeen, and making his first appearance in London when only nineteen. A similar precocity, however, is found in two of the most eloquent preachers France has produced—FÉNÉLON and BOSSUET. The former began to preach at the College of Plessis when only seventeen, and the latter, at the same age, before the most brilliant assemblage in Paris, and with the greatest applause. It is added that his sermon was entirely extemporaneous, and that he was allowed only a few moments to think upon the subject he was to discuss.

—President BAEZ, who is just now doing the amiable to our Commissioners, is a gentleman of about fifty-seven, courtly and pleasant, speaks Spanish and French with equal fluency, but English only tolerably well. With the easy air of a perfect man of the world, he impresses one as a perfectly upright man, and that is the reputation, on the whole, that he bears among the San Domingoes.

—It was very graceful in the Hon. S. S. Cox to propose the vote of thanks to Speaker BLAINE, which was unanimously carried in the House of Representatives (except MUNGEN), but rendered doubly graceful by the admirable little speech made by Mr. Cox prefatory to the resolution. Those little amenities constitute the charm of political life in Washington.

—Mrs. BISMARCK, according to a correspondent at Berlin, very seldom appears in public, or in the society of Berlin. In appearance she is an exceedingly plain woman.

—WILLIAM HOWITT, who is now seventy-six, is so fresh-looking and quick and strong in his movements that he would not be taken for over fifty-five. His conversation is delightful, full of anecdote, and told in the nicest, purest English, without accent or affectation. MARY HOWITT is ten or fifteen years younger, dresses like a gay Quaker, and has something of the manners of a Friend. They have a daughter, a bright girl, possessing much artistic and literary talent, and who is equally as lovable as the father and mother. The parents are Spiritualists, and were at one time, for three years, mediums; but now they say the medium power is, with them, "played out."

—NILSSON has to that extent became infatuated about Chicago that she has determined to plant about $75,000 there in real estate, and see what it will produce. DAVID A. GAGE, one of those bright, engaging men for whom Chicago seems to be famous, is the man who has talked so sweetly to her about Chicago lots, and who expects to realize for her a "very, very large fortune in silvure and gold." It is to be remarked, in this connection, that Miss NILSSON has thrown up her London opera engagement for this season, and will spend the summer in the White Mountains and other nice places attractive to charming young ladies of about her years.

—Dr. WILLIAM HOWARD RUSSELL, who seems to be one of the necessities of modern warfare as much as the commissariat, is an Irishman by birth, and combines the solid attainments and somewhat sullen gravity of the Englishman with the proverbial diffidence of the Celt. He lives like a "fine old Irish gentleman" at Versailles, keeps an excellent table, half a dozen horses, servants in proportion, and sometimes covers himself with decorations received from various potentates of Europe.

—Little LOTTA, the actress, was "christened" at New Orleans two or three weeks ago by the Rev. Dr. LEACOCK. She was simply and modestly attired, like a little lady, as she is, in the full meaning of the word, in a black silk underskirt, deeply pleated at the hem, with an overskirt and bodice of the same material, the overskirt being looped at the sides. Over the bodice she wore bretelles of a light blue silk, which contrasted charmingly with the black of her dress, and was in excellent harmony with her fresh complexion and auburn hair, and looked as bright as the beautiful sky outside, which poured its gorgeous light into the room with a generous warmth. At a signal of the venerable minister the company arose, and LOTTA knelt before a chair at the centre-table, and the company joined in prayer. The ceremony of baptism was then performed, Mr. LEACOCK reading the exercises from a relic of the past, which had been loaned for the occasion by Miss BETTIE IRWIN, a granddaughter of the sage of Ashland, upon the fly-leaf of which was inscribed the following: "Hon. H. CLAY, Ashland, Kentucky, with the respectful regards of Mrs. T. ALLEBONE, Philadelphia, 1848," and presented by that lady when the great Harry of the West joined the Episcopal Church. After the christening they all went into the other room, where Thomas had provided certain things edible and potable that appealed to the finer sensibilities of those who were present.

—Another sketch of Mr. DISRAELI, by a Boston man, who begins by admiring his clothes. "Never," says he, "was there a finer triumph than in Mr. DISRAELI'S frock-coat. The fit is perfect, but it is not the fit. There is a finish and a poetry about his clothes which escape definition." As for his manner, "his peculiarity is his restlessness as to his hands. Ordinarily this is a mark of nervousness, but Mr. DISRAELI, one would think, is not afflicted by misery of that description. However that may be, he can not keep his hands in one position for two minutes together. He puts them on the box which is on the table before him; he shuts them; opens them; places one in his coat pocket behind; puts two there; takes out his handkerchief and puts it in again; folds his hands; opens them; puts his fingers merely on a table; boldly sticks his thumbs under his armpits, and tosses the collar of his coat back; again drops them at his side. Such are some of the movements he keeps up while delivering one of his set orations. Another peculiarity I will jot down for the benefit of the curious in orators' distresses. I have observed that when he is about to say something satirical, one of those witty phrases that rest in the memory, and which are certainly not the creatures of the moment, he slightly opens his legs and in a scarcely perceptible fashion bows down his body. As the cheers break out his figure seems quickened. If you are behind him you notice a change immediately. His accustomed confidence develops into audacity, and for a minute or two he appears to rule his audience."

—Mr. DONN PIATT met Mr. Mark Twain at a little dinner the other day in Washington, and was made merry by that man. Says Twain wears things, but evidently don't think whether they are clothes or not. From under his bushy hair his face peers out, presenting a square, well-proportioned forehead, keen gray eyes, and hooked nose, a well-developed mouth, exhibiting a good deal of decision, and a chin that rounds out, supporting the whole—in no part of which will you find a particle of the humor for which he is distinguished. His face, on the contrary, is a sad one, and when all are in roars about him he continues in a state of dense solemnity. His voice is something quite extraordinary—a sort of cross between that of HORACE GREELEY and Mr. LINCOLN, and he drawls his words out in the most preposterous manner, that gives a drollery to what he says utterly beyond description.

—Mr. WILLIAM C. PRIME, one of the proprietors of the Journal of Commerce, and one of the most agreeable writers of the day, as well as a very traveled man, recently delivered in this city a lecture, in which, speaking of the location of the Church of the Sepulchre, at Jerusalem, he says that, while examining that location last spring, he discovered a portion of an ancient Hebrew wall, which he described as remaining some three hundred feet east of the Church of the Sepulchre. Should this prove to be a portion of the long-sought second wall, it sets at rest one great point of topographical discussion, and decides the fact that the Church of the Sepulchre is located on land which was outside of the ancient city walls.

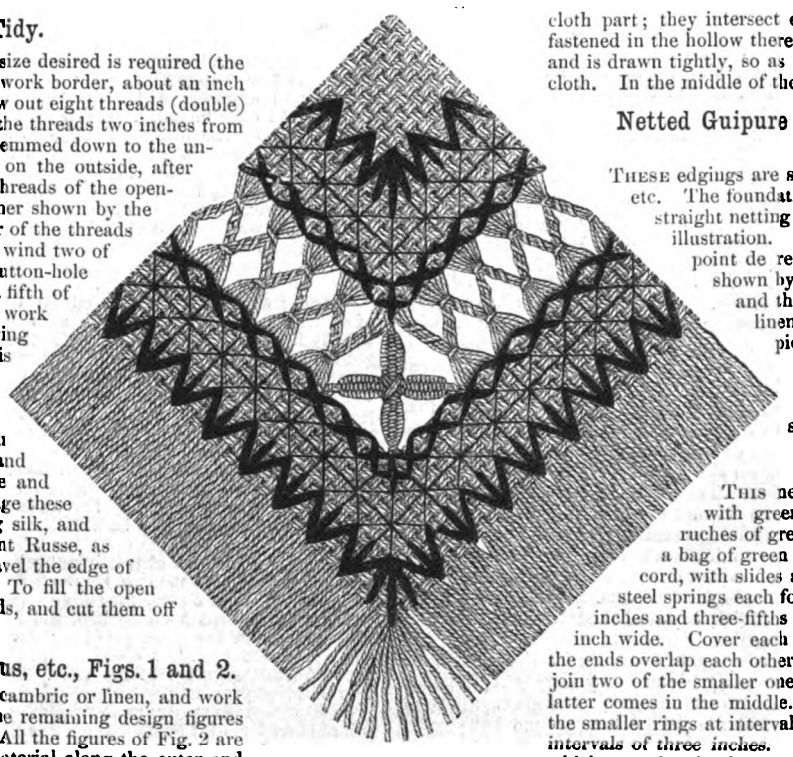
—Many of the most profound scholars and ablest publicists of the day are of Hebrew descent. Among others may be named DISRAELI, CRÉMIEUX, BORNE, MONTEFIORE, AUERBACH, HEINRICH HEINE, JULES JANIN, GRACE AGUILAR, FOULD. In music—HERZ, MEYERBEER, HALÉVY, GOTTSCHALK. In drama—RACHEL. In the United States—RAPHAEL, WISE, LILIENTHAL, LEESER, EINHORN, NOAH, ISAACS.

—Miss BELLE SMITH, of Indiana, has just completed for the Common Council of Washington a full-length portrait of the late Secretary STANTON that is said to be the best likeness extant of the great war minister.

Digitized by Google

Embroidered Java Canvas Tidy.

To make this tidy a piece of white Java canvas of the size desired is required (the original is sixteen inches square). First work the open-work border, about an inch and a quarter from the outer edge. For this border draw out eight threads (double) of the canvas; to do this it is necessary to cut through the threads two inches from the outer edge. The projecting ends thus formed are hemmed down to the under side of the tidy, in such a manner as not to show on the outside, after having drawn out the threads. Sew the free crosswise threads of the open-work strip together with white linen thread in the manner shown by the illustration. To do this work a button-hole stitch on four of the threads a fifth of an inch from one end, divide the four threads, wind two of them several times with the working thread, work a button-hole stitch on these two threads and two of the free threads a fifth of an inch from the other end, wind the last two threads and work them together at the still free end with the two following threads a fifth of an inch from the end. Continue in this manner. Fill the open space in the corner with a four-leaved figure worked with white linen thread in point de reprise. Cross stitch with black worsted the threads on each side of the open-work strip; the stitches which come in the corners must be worked on two lengthwise and two crosswise threads, and the others on four lengthwise and two crosswise threads, as shown by the illustration. Edge these stitches with point Russe worked with fine black sewing silk, and along this work points with black twisted wool in point Russe, as shown by the illustration. In order to form the fringe ravel the edge of the tidy to the points worked with the twisted wool. To fill the open spaces at the corners work in a few of the raveled threads, and cut them off to correspond in length to the remainder of the fringe.



EMBROIDERED JAVA CANVAS TIDY.

Trimmings for Blouse-Waists, Lingerie, Fichus, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

To make these trimmings transfer the designs to fine cambric or linen, and work the shell-shaped figures of Fig. 1 in satin stitch, and the remaining design figures in button-hole stitches, which are worked very loosely. All the figures of Fig. 2 are worked in satin and half-polka stitch. Cut away the material along the outer and inner edges of each figure, and run velvet, gros grain, silk, or satin ribbon through the strip as shown by the illustration.

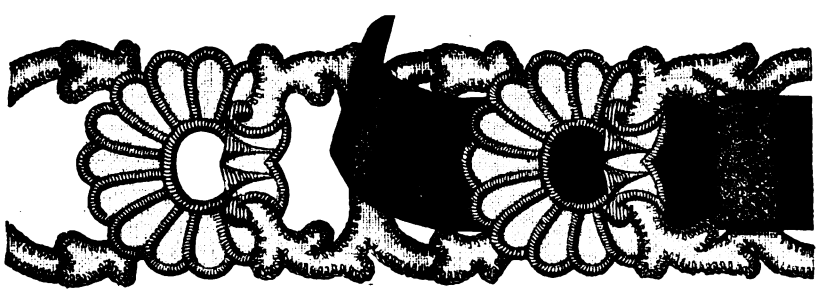


FIG. 1.—TRIMMING FOR BLOUSES, LINGERIE, ETC.—WHITE NEEDLE-WORK.

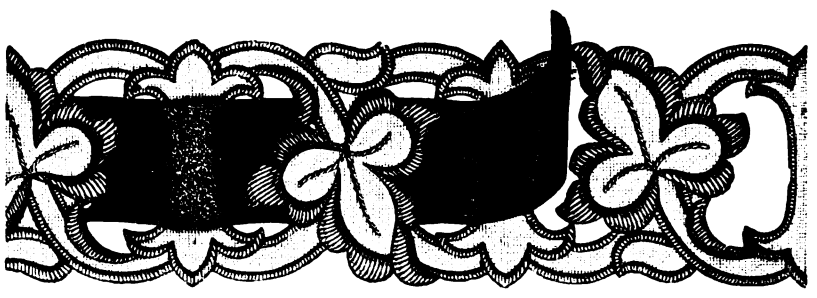

FIG. 2.—TRIMMING FOR BLOUSES, LINGERIE, ETC.—WHITE NEEDLE-WORK.

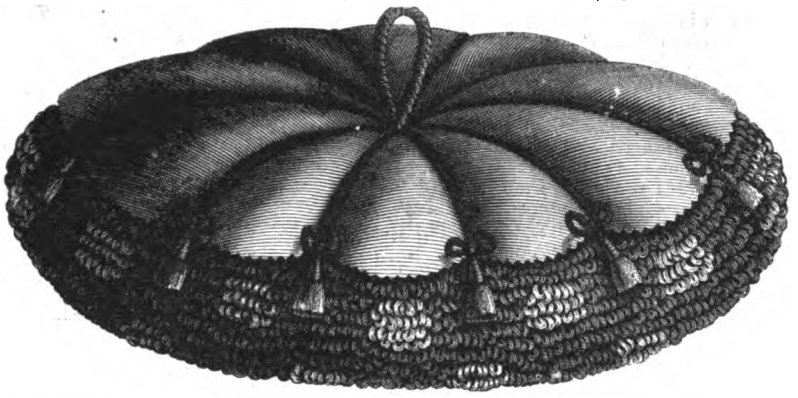
Brioche with Cloth and Knitted Cover.

THIS round brioche is eighteen inches in diameter and six inches and a half deep, and is made of gray linen and curled hair. Furnish the outer edge of the brioche with a cover worked with dark red and light red worsted in loop stitch, and the remainder with a covering of red cloth. Dark red cord and tassels trim the brioche as shown by the illustration. For the knitted cover of the edge crochet a chain stitch foundation with dark red worsted, which must be of the same length as the circumference of the brioche, and three inches and three-quarters from the outer edge. Gather the upper veins of the stitches on a wooden knitting-needle, take a second wooden knitting-needle and work as follows: 1st round.—Sl. (slip) the first st. (stitch), then hold a netting mesh two inches in circumference to the under side of the work, pass the right-hand needle through the next st., as if to knit off, lay the thread around the needle as for knitting off, pass the thread down around the mesh, again around the needle and around the mesh; finally, once more around the needle, and then pass the three threads thrown over the needle through the stitch on the needle. This forms one loop st. In this way work one loop st. on each foundation st. K. (knit plain) the last st. Without drawing out the mesh turn the work, and knit the second round plain. Then draw out the mesh. Repeat these two rounds until the work is completed, but in the course of the work widen a st. at regular intervals, so that the cover corresponds to the shape of the brioche. This widening must be done in the rounds which are worked plain. Having reached the part of the cover coming on the edge of the brioche, work without changing the number of st. Besides this, form small spots in the course of the work. For this lay on the light red worsted at the proper point, and with it work six loop st. without cutting off the dark thread, pass the latter loosely over the under side of the six light st.; then work with the dark thread unto the point for the next light spot. In the following plain round knit off the light st. with the light thread and the dark st. with the dark thread. Repeat these two rounds twice more for a row of spots. Having completed the knitted cover cast off, and sew the ends of the cover together so as not to show the seam on the outside; draw the cover over the brioche, and cover the bottom of the latter, and at the same time the seam made by sewing on the cover, with dark red or black enameled cloth. For the cloth cover cut a round piece of red cloth thirteen inches and three-quarters in diameter, cut the outer edge in ten equal, large, shallow scallops, pink the edges of the latter, and sew the cloth part on the uncovered part of the brioche. On the latter first sew a thin muslin cushion stuffed with wool or moss. Sew through the middle of the brioche with cord, and draw it tight, so as to form a hollow there. Then pass over the brioche five coarse red worsted cords, the ends of which are each finished with two loops and a tassel. These cords are somewhat longer than the diameter of the cloth part; they intersect each other at the middle of the brioche, and are, first, fastened in the hollow there, after which one cord comes between each two scallops, and is drawn tightly, so as to form a groove, and fastened at the outer edge of the cloth. In the middle of the brioche place a cord loop.



BRIOCHE WITH CLOTH AND KNITTED COVER.

Netted Guipure Edgings for Lingerie, Handkerchiefs, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE edgings are suitable for ornamenting lingerie, handkerchiefs, covers, etc. The foundation of both is worked with medium-sized linen thread in straight netting; the size of the mesh to be used may be seen from the illustration. Embroider the foundation of Fig. 2 in point d'esprit and point de reprise, and work the outer edge in button-hole stitch, as shown by the illustration. Fig. 1 is embroidered in point de toile, and the figures afterward surrounded with running stitches of linen floss. In button-hole stitching the outer edge, form picots as shown by the illustration. To do this let the thread stand over as a loop after working the button-hole stitch at the point where the picot is to be formed. Cut away the surplus material below the button-hole stitch edge.

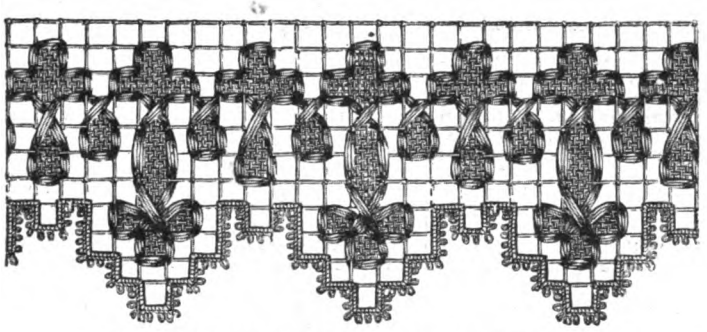


FIG. 1.—NETTED GUIPURE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC.

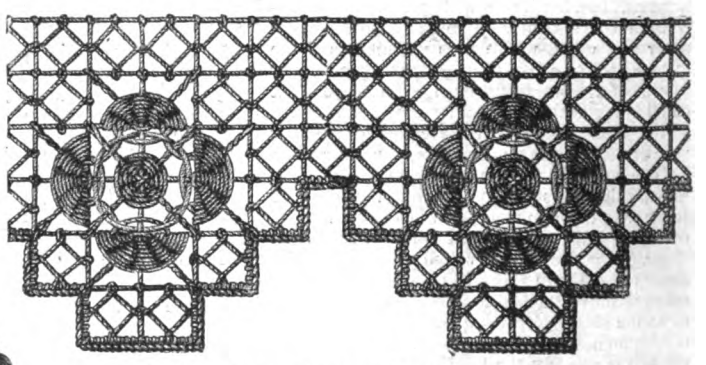

FIG. 2.—NETTED GUIPURE EDGING FOR LINGERIE, HANDKERCHIEFS, ETC.

Negligé Basket trimmed with Ruches.

THIS negligé basket is made of steel springs and wire, covered with green cashmere arranged in box-pleats, and trimmed with ruches of green satin ribbon. On the upper edge of the basket is set a bag of green cashmere furnished with a shirr. Coarse green worsted cord, with slides and tassels, form the handle. To make the basket three steel springs each forty-one inches and a fifth long, and one spring fifty-one inches and three-fifths long, are required. Each spring must be two-fifths of an inch wide. Cover each spring with cashmere, and close it in a ring by letting the ends overlap each other two-fifths of an inch and sewing them together. Then join two of the smaller ones by means of wire bars with the large ring, so that the latter comes in the middle. To do this make a perpendicular mark with chalk on the smaller rings at intervals of two inches and two-fifths, and on the large ring at intervals of three inches. Sew the end of a piece of bonnet wire 160 inches long, which must be closely wound with green worsted, in an upright position to one of the smaller rings at one of the points marked with chalk, then, after an interval of two inches and four-fifths, fasten it to the larger ring at one of the points marked with chalk, and then, after an interval of two inches and four-fifths, to the still free smaller ring. Now carry the wire along the last ring to the next point marked with chalk, sew it to the ring, bend it down, and after an interval of two inches and four-fifths fasten it to the large ring at the next point marked with chalk, and, after an interval of two inches and four-fifths, fasten it to the following smaller ring; bend it and proceed as before, until the rings are connected by seventeen such bars. Set on a box-pleated strip of green cashmere three inches and a fifth wide between the upper and middle ring, and cover the space between the middle and under rings in the same manner. To the inside of the under ring sew a pasteboard bottom covered with green cashmere on both sides, and corresponding in circumference to the ring. With the under edge of the under ring join the small ring left over for a stand. To the upper edge of the basket thus far completed sew a bag of cashmere eleven inches and a quarter deep, and of the requisite width, the upper edge of which is hemmed an inch wide, and furnished with a shirr, through which run two pieces of green worsted braid. Each of these strings is passed through a wooden ring covered with green worsted. The handle is formed of two pieces of coarse green worsted cord, each twenty-seven inches long, which are passed through two wooden rings covered with green worsted and finished with tassels, the ends of which are fastened separately to the upper edge of the basket, as shown by the illustration. Finally, cover each ring of the basket, and at the same time the seam made by sewing on the cashmere strips, with a box-pleated ruche made of green satin ribbon an inch and a quarter wide.

NEGLIGÉ BASKET TRIMMED WITH RUCHES.

Tapestry Border for Chairs, Sofas, etc.

See illustration on page 197.

THIS border, joined with strips of plush, forms a beautiful covering for chairs, sofas, etc. It is worked on canvas with worsted and silk in cross stitch. The description of symbols under the illustration indicates the colors to be used. Work the bird with silk in the colors indicated, and the remaining figures with worsted.

THE LADIES OF LLANGOLLEN.

THE Ladies of Llangollen belonged by birth to a distinguished circle, Lady Eleanor Butler being sister to John, sixteenth Earl of Ormonde; while Miss Ponsonby, "the serene Zara," was a member of the Bessborough family. Born in Dublin—local tradition says on the same day of the same year, though other accounts give Lady Eleanor some years' seniority—they lost their parents during infancy, and early resolved to retire together from the world.

Young, beautiful, and accomplished, their friends were naturally opposed to the idea of losing them, especially those of Lady Eleanor, for whose hand there were many suitors, and whose relatives placed her under close surveillance. From this she managed to escape, and was for some time missing; but at length she and Miss Ponsonby were discovered in disguise on board a merchant vessel about to sail from Waterford Harbor.

Digitized by Google

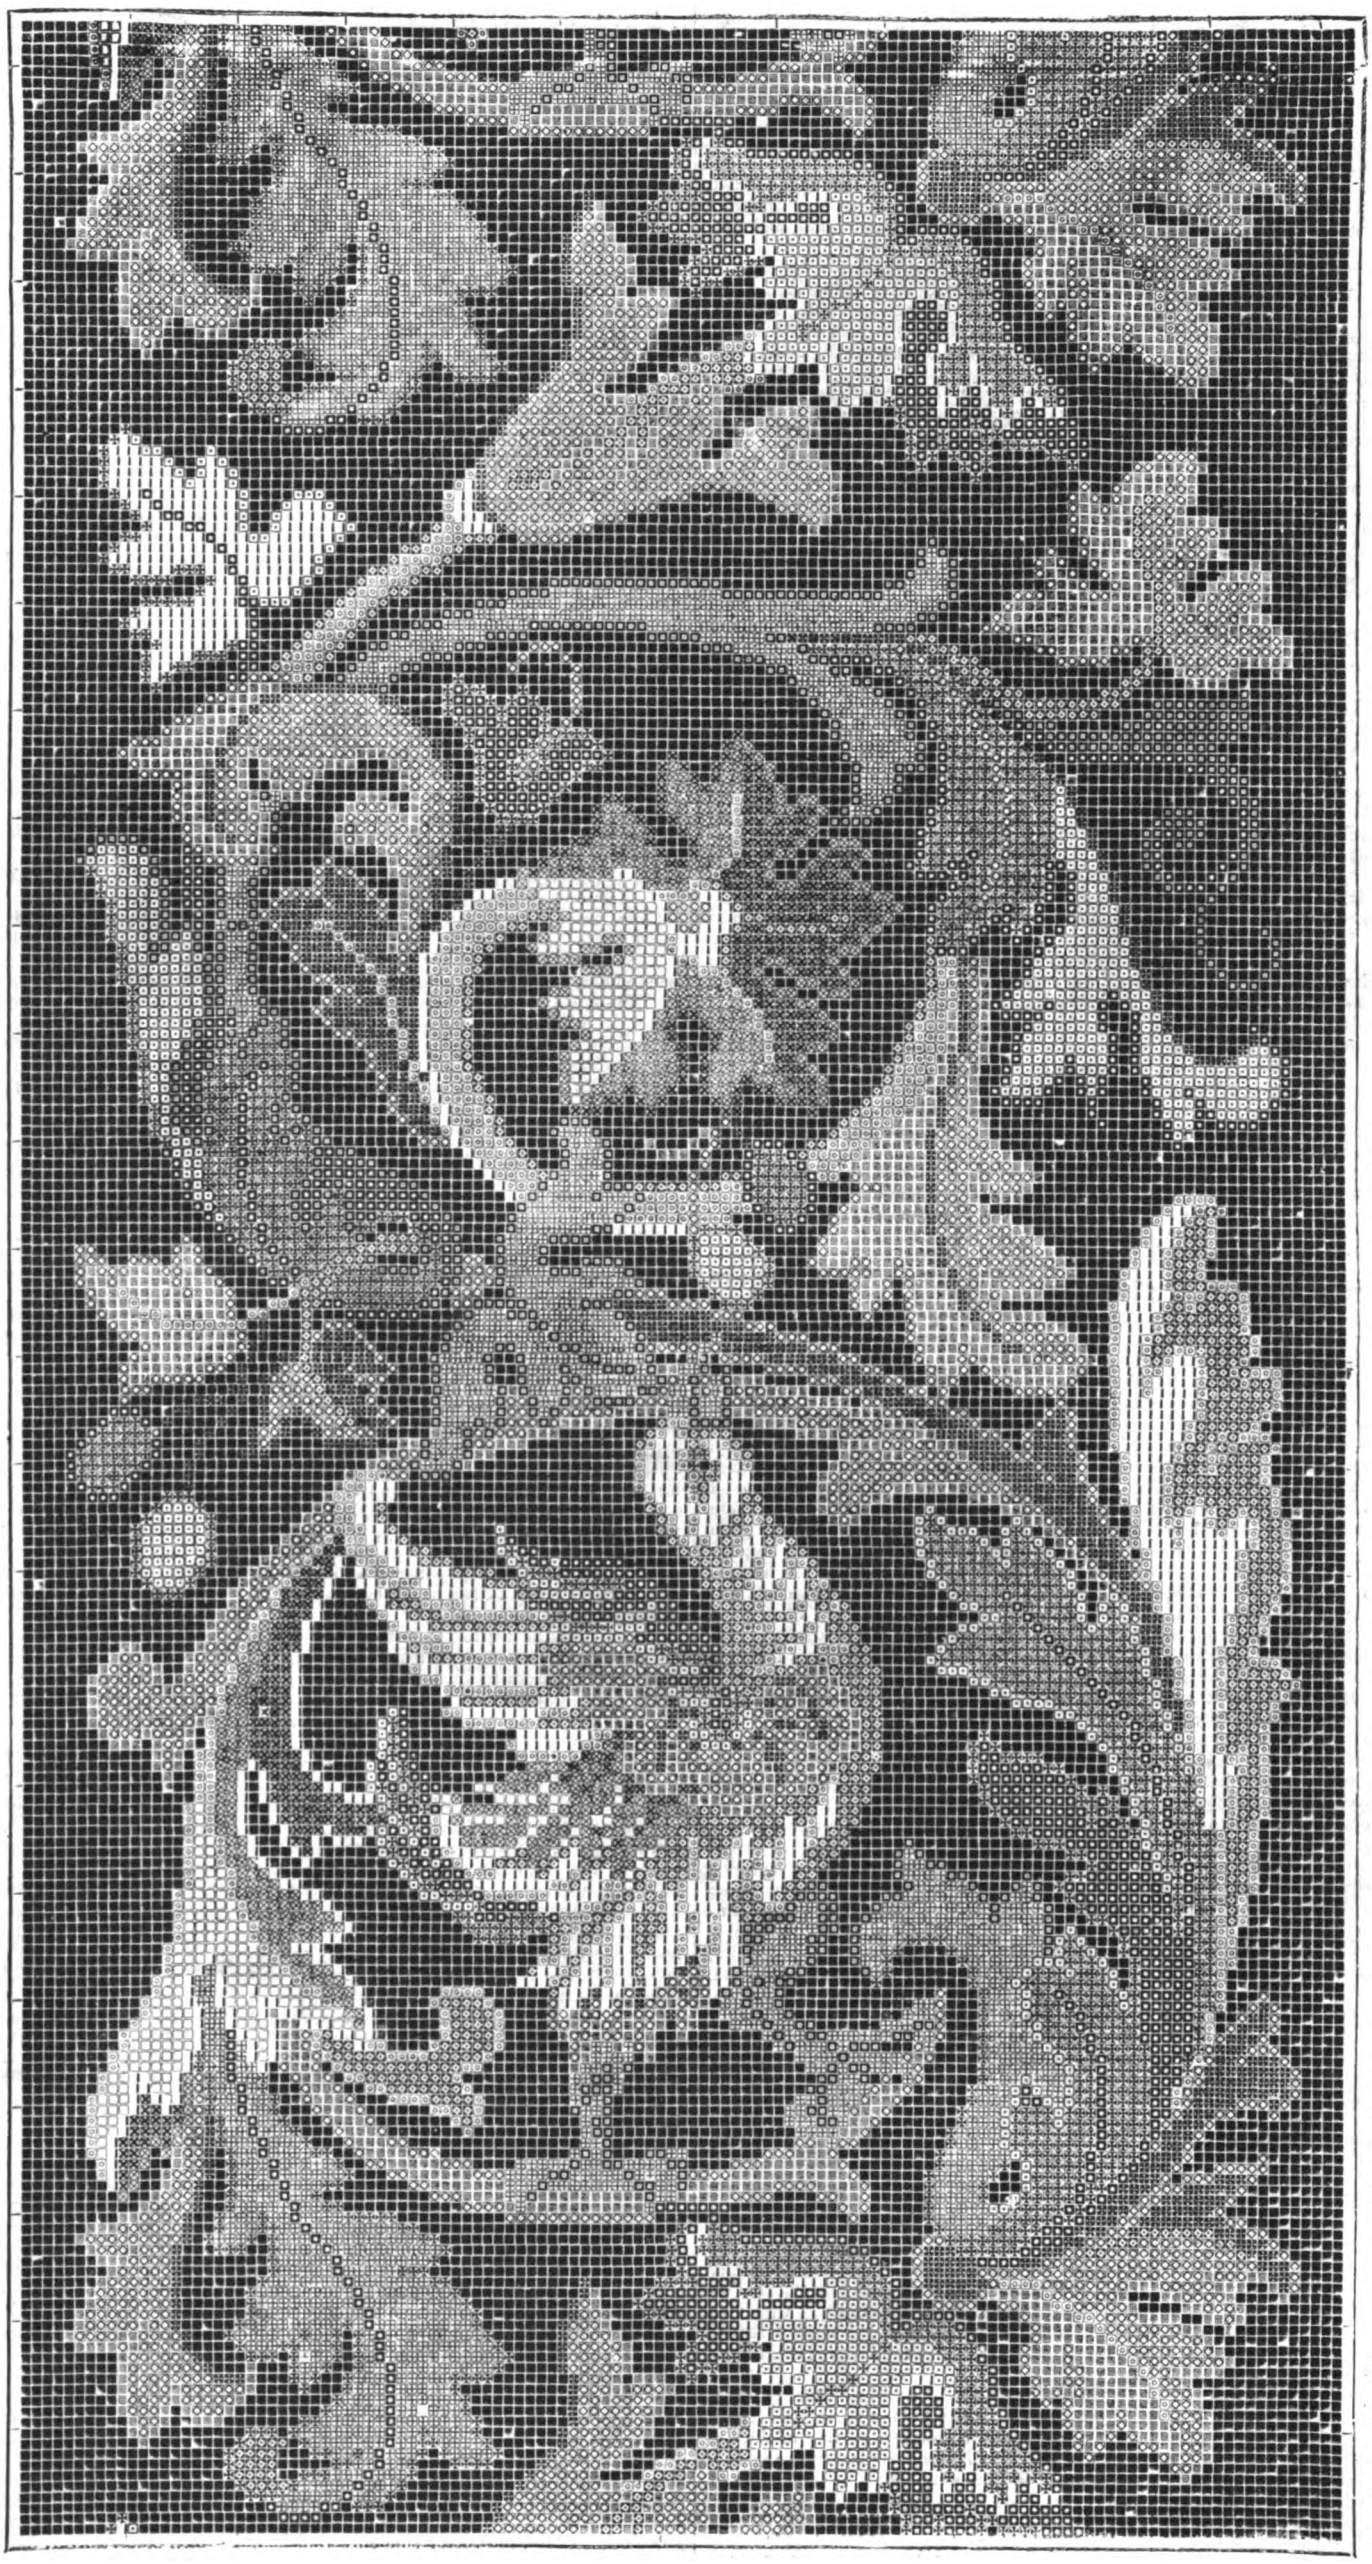
Though captured and carried home, all attempts to alienate them were vain. Opposition only strengthened their romantic resolution, and in 1778 they again eloped to a sea-port, whence they sailed in a trading vessel for North Wales. This time they took a trusted servant of the house of Ormonde into their confidence, and telling her their destination, deputed her to announce their safe arrival, and request that their allowances be transmitted to them. Vanquished at last by the determination of the devoted couple, their relations yielded, and so far increased their income that they were enabled to form a lovely retreat in Plas Newydd, near Llangollen. Their cottage was surrounded by two acres of pleasure-grounds, which Lady Eleanor specially superintended, while Miss Ponsonby managed the house and directed two female servants. Their humble neighbors, who knew them only as "the Ladies of the Vale," soon discovered their kind hearts and open hands, and sought assistance and counsel from them in every difficulty.

Meantime their singular story grew widely known, and it became the fashion to visit their picturesque seclusion. Many pilgrimages were made expressly to their abode, and no traveler of any social or intellectual distinction ever quitted North Wales without endeavoring to see the two heroines of Llangollen. As they were cheerful, hospitable, and accessible, and their recluse life sprang from no misanthropy, and in no degree lessened their interest in the outer world, would-be visitors were rarely disappointed.

One of the most remarkable of these, and the first to give a detailed record of her visit, was Madame De Genlis. "We reached the cottage," says she, "about sunset; the two friends had been prepared for our arrival by a letter sent by courier that morning. We were received with a grace, cordiality, and amiability of which it is impossible to give an idea. I could not tire of observing these persons, so interesting by their united and devoted life. I saw no trace of the vanity which enjoys exciting wonder. They loved and lived with such simplicity that the astonishment of spectators was soon changed to affection. Their manners and conversation were equally unaffected and sincere. I was surprised to find with what fluency and correctness they spoke French after so many years of profound seclusion. I was also struck by the contrast in their appearance. Lady Eleanor had a charming face, beaming with health and freshness, and an air of the most sparkling vivacity. Miss Ponsonby was tall, with a beautiful figure, and a pale, pensive face. It seemed as though the one had been born in that solitude in which she was so happy, for her untroubled air did not evince the slightest memory of the world's idle pleasures. While the other, gentle and reflective, though too frankly innocent to feel secret remorse for her immurement, appeared to cherish some regrets. A fine library, containing the best works in English, French, and Italian, supplied them with inexhaustible occupation and amusement; because reading is not really profitable unless there is time to read again. The interior of the house was enchanting, from its well-proportioned rooms, elegant furniture and ornaments, and exquisite views disclosed by every window. The drawing-room was decorated with charming landscapes drawn from nature by Miss Ponsonby. Lady Eleanor was an excellent musician; both of them adorned the house with marvelously beautiful needle-work. Miss Ponsonby, who had the prettiest handwriting I ever saw, made some choice manuscript selections in verse and prose, and ornamented them with vignettes and borders in the best taste, which formed a precious volume."

The last record of a visit to the Ladies of the Vale presents them in that eccentric light which we suppose grew stronger with the advance of years. The oddities so piquant and enchanting in youth became tiresome and absurd in age, but Prince Puchlee Muskan—soldier, author, wit—though himself a young, gay, and gallant gentleman, had yet sympathy enough to discern not only traces of courtly breeding, but the soul of faithful mutual tenderness in the two eccentric old women. Writing to a lady in Germany in July, 1828, he says that while at Llangollen he accepted from them "a graceful invitation to lunch," and proceeds to describe his reception: "I arrived amidst the most charming neighborhood, driving through a very nice pleasure-ground, at a small, tasteful Gothic house, just opposite Castle Dinas Bran, to view which apertures had been cut through the foliage of lofty trees. The two ladies met me at the foot of the stairs. Fortunately I was prepared for their singularities; otherwise I might have lost countenance. Imagine two ladies, one eighty-three, small and brisk in figure; the other apparently somewhat younger, tall and imposing. Both wore their still abundant hair combed straight and powdered, a gentleman's round hat, cravat, boots, and waistcoat, a short skirt, and a blue cloth garment over all, which was a happy medium between a male coat and a female riding-habit. Appended to this amazing costume Lady Eleanor wore the grand cordon of St. Louis round her waist, the same order round her neck, the cross at her button-hole, and a silk



TAPESTRY BORDER FOR CHAIRS, SOFAS, ETC.

Description of Symbols: ■ Black; ■ 1st (darkest), ■ 2d, ■ 3d (lightest), Green; ■ 1st (darkest), ■ 2d, ■ 3d (lightest), Red; ■ 1st (darkest) ■ 2d, 3d (lightest), Fawn; ■ 1st (darkest), ■ 2d, ■ 3d (lightest), Blue; ■ 1st (darkest), ■ 2d (lightest), Gray.

Digitized by Google

ver lily (almost life-size) as a star on her breast. These were presents from the Bourbons. The coup d'œil, you see, was ludicrous enough; but in manner these ladies were cordial, easy, yet retaining the stateliness of the ancien régime—courteous without the slightest formality, with that charmingly cheerful, unobtrusive politeness characteristic of great people in a past epoch, but unhappily swept away in the turmoil of our industrial century, when every one is so earnest and business-like. It was touching to remark the unceasing tenderness with which the younger of the two watched her somewhat feeble friend, quietly supplying her wants and anticipating her wishes." The clever and kind-hearted German prince was only just in time to see the old friends together. In the following June Lady Eleanor died, and her bereaved friend followed her in 1831. Their cottage was long since said to be a ruin, but their names are recorded, with that of an attached servant, on a pyramidal monument in Plas Newydd church-yard, and the poor of the neighborhood still cherish traditions of the good and charitable Ladies of the Vale.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER VI.

HANNAH was fond of the Moat House; in the way that we are often fond of people thrown temporarily in our way, thinking, "I should like you if I knew you," but well aware that this will never happen. Often, as in her walks she passed by the gray old walls, she could quite understand Mr. Rivers's strong clinging to the only home he ever knew, the resting-place of his family for generations. She sympathized keenly in his admiration for its quaint nooks and corners within—its quainter aspect without; for the moat had been drained, and turned into a terraced garden, and the old draw-bridge into a bridge leading to it; so that it was the most original and interesting house possible.

Miss Thelluson would have gone there often, but for a conviction that its inhabitants did not approve of this. Wide as their circle was, and endless as were their entertainments, it was not what Hannah called a hospitable house. That is, it opened its doors wide at stated times; gave the most splendid dinners and balls; but if you went in accidentally or uninvited, you were received both by the family and servants with civil surprise. Hannah was once calling of an evening after an early dinner, when the effort to get her an egg to her tea seemed to throw the whole establishment, from the butler downward, into such dire confusion that she never owned to being "hungry" at the Moat House again.

Nor was it a place to bring a child to. Rosie, always good at home, was sure to be naughty at the Moat House; and then grandmamma and aunts always told papa of it, and papa came back and complained to Aunt Hannah; and Aunt Hannah was sometimes sorry, sometimes indignant. So the end was that she and the child never went there unless specially invited; and that paradise of most little people—"grandmamma's house" and "grandmamma's garden"—was to Rosie Rivers a perfect blank.

Nevertheless, Aunt Hannah never looked at the lovely old house without a sense of tender regret; for it was so very lovely, and might have been so dear. Perhaps it would be, one day, when Rosie, its heir's sole heiress, reigned as mistress there. A change which another ten or fifteen years were likely enough to bring about, as Sir Austin was an old man, and young Austin, the hapless eldest son, would never inherit any thing. Every body knew, though nobody said it, that the Reverend Bernard Rivers would be in reality his father's successor. Even Lady Rivers, who was a rich young widow when she became Sir Austin's wife, and had a comfortable jointure house in another county, openly referred to that time, and as openly regretted that her step-son did not turn his thoughts to a second marriage.

"But he will soon, of course; and you ought to take every opportunity of suggesting it to him, Miss Thelluson; for, in his position, it is really his duty, and he says one of the great advantages you are to him is that you always keep him up to his duty."

To these remarks Hannah seldom answered more than a polite smile. She made a point of never discussing Mr. Rivers's marriage; first, because if his family had no delicacy on the subject, she had; and second, because every day convinced her more and more that he was sincere when he told her he had no present intention of the kind.

Yet he was perfectly cheerful now—not exactly in his old buoyant fashion, but in a contented, equable way, that Hannah, at least, liked much better. Theirs was a cheerful house, too. "Use hospitality without grudging" was Bernard's motto; and he used it, as she once suggested to him, principally to those "who can not repay thee." So the House on the Hill—the clergyman's house—was seldom empty, but had always bed and board at the service of any who required it or enjoyed it. Still this kind of hospitality, simple as it was, kept Hannah very busy always. Not that she objected to it—nay, she rather liked it; it roused her dormant social qualities, made her talk more and look brighter and better—indeed, some people congratulated her on having grown ten years younger since she came to Easterham. She felt so herself, at any rate.

Besides this outside cheerfulness in their daily life, she and her brother-in-law, since their quarrel and its making-up, seemed to have got on together better than ever. Her mind was settled on the marriage question; she dreaded no immediate changes, and he seemed to respect her all the more for having "shown fight" on the question of Grace Dixon—alas! Mrs. Dixon no longer now—she took off her wedding-ring, and was called plain Grace; she had no right to any other name.

"And my boy has no name either," she said once, with a pale, patient face, when, the worst of her sorrow having spent itself, she went about her duties, outwardly resigned.

"Never mind!" Hannah replied, with a choke in her throat. "He must make himself one." And then they laid the subject aside, and discussed it no more.

Neither did she and her brother-in-law open it up again. It was one of the sore inevitables, the painful awkwardnesses, best not talked about. In truth—in the position in which she and Mr. Rivers stood to one another—how could they talk about it?

The Rivers family did sometimes; they had a genius for discussing unpleasant topics. But happily the approaching marriage of Mr. Melville and Adeline annihilated this one.

"Under the circumstances nobody could speak to him about it, you know; it might hurt his feelings," said the happy bride elect. "And pray keep Grace out of his way, for he knows her well; she was brought up in his family. A very nice family, are they not?"

Hannah allowed they were. She sometimes watched the dowager Mrs. Melville among her tribe of step-daughters, whom she had brought up, and who returned her care with unwonted tenderness, thought of poor Grace, and—sighed.

Adeline's marriage was carried out without delay. It seemed a great satisfaction to every body, and a relief likewise. Young Mr. Melville, who was rather of a butterfly temperament, had fluttered about this nosegay of pretty girls for the last ten years. He had, in fact, loved through the family, beginning with the eldest, when they were playfellows, then transferring his affections to Helen, and being supposed to receive a death-blow on her engagement; which, however, he speedily recovered, to carry on a long flirtation with the handsome Bertha; finally, to every body's wonder, he settled down to Adeline, who was the quietest, the least pretty, and the only one out of the four who really loved him.

Bertha was vexed at first, but soon took consolation. "After all, I only cared to flirt with him, and I can do it just as well when he is my brother-in-law. Brothers are so stupid; but a brother-in-law, of one's own age, will be so very convenient. Miss Thelluson, don't you find it so?"

Hannah scarcely answered this—one of the many odd things which she often heard said at the Moat House. However, she did not consider it her province to notice them. The Riverses were Bernard's "people," as he affectionately called them, and his loving eye saw all their faults very small, and their virtues very large. Hannah tried, for his sake, to do the same. Only, the better she knew them the more she determined on one thing—to hold firmly to her point, that she, and she alone, should have the bringing up of little Rosie.

"I dare say you will think me very conceited," she said one night to Rosie's father—the winter evenings were drawing in again, and they were sitting together talking, in that peaceful hour after "the children are asleep"—"but I do believe that I, her mother's sister, can bring up Rosie better than any body else. First, because I love her best, she being of my own blood; secondly, because not all women, not even all mothers, have the real motherly heart. Shall I tell you a story I heard to-day, and Lady Rivers instanced it as 'right discipline?' But it is only a baby story; it may weary you."

"Nothing ever wearies me that concerns Rosie—and you."

"Well, then, there is an Easterham lady—you meet her often at dinner-parties—young and pretty, and capital at talking of maternal duties. She has a little girl of six, and the little girl did wrong in some small way, and was told to say she was sorry. 'I have said it, mamma, seventy times seven—to myself.' (A queer speech; but children do say such queer things sometimes; Rosie does already.) 'But you must say it to me,' said mamma. 'I won't,' said the child. And then the mother stood, beating and shaking her, at intervals, for nearly an hour. At last the little thing fell into convulsions of sobbing. 'Fetch me the water-jug, and I'll pour it over her.' (Which she did, wetting her through.) 'This is the way I conquer my children.' Now," said Hannah Thelluson, with flashing eyes, "if any strange woman were ever to try to 'conquer' my child—"

"Keep yourself quiet, Hannah," said Mr. Rivers, half smiling, and gently patting her hand. "No 'strange woman' shall ever interfere between you and Rosie."

"And you will promise never to send her to school at Paris or any where else, as Lady Rivers proposed the other day, when she is old enough? Oh, papa" (she sometimes called him "papa," as a compromise between "Bernard," which he wished, and "Mr. Rivers"), "I think I should go frantic if any body were to take my child away from me."

"Nobody ever shall," said he, earnestly pressing her hand, which he had not yet let go. Then, after a pause, and a troubled stirring of the fire—his habit when he was perplexed—he added, "Hannah, do you ever look into the future at all?"

"Rosie's future? Yes, often."

"No; your own."

"I think—not much," Hannah replied, after slight hesitation, and trying to be as truthful as she could. "When first I came here I was doubtful how our plan would answer; but it has answered admirably. I desire no change. I am only too happy in my present life."

"Perfectly happy? Are you quite sure?"

"Quite sure."

"Then I suppose I ought to be."

Yet he sighed, and very soon after he rose with some excuse about a sermon he had to look over; went into his study, whence, contrary to his custom, he did not emerge for the rest of the evening.

Hannah sat alone, and rather uncomfortable. Had she vexed him in any way? Was he not glad she declared herself happy, since, of necessity, his kindness helped to make her so? For months now there had never come a cloud between them. Their first quarrel was also their last. By this time they had, of course, grown perfectly used to one another's ways; their life flowed on in its even course—a pleasant river, busy as it was smooth. Upon its surface floated peacefully that happy, childish life, developing into more beauty every day. Rosie was not exactly a baby now; and often when she trotted along the broad garden walk, holding tightly papa's hand on one side and auntie's on the other, there came into Hannah's mind that lovely picture of Tennyson's:

> "And in their double love secure
> The little maiden walked demure,
> Pacing with downward eyelids pure."

That was the picture which she saw in a vision, and had referred to—why had it vexed the father? Did he think she "spoiled" Rosie? But love never spoils any child, and Aunt Hannah could be stern too, if necessary. She made as few laws as possible; but those she did make were irrevocable, and Rosie knew this already. She never cried for a thing twice over—and, oh, how touching was her trust, how patient her resigning!

"I don't know how far you will educate your little niece," wrote Lady Dunsmore, in the early days of Hannah's willing task; "but I am quite certain she will educate you."

So she did; and Hannah continually watched in wonder the little new-born soul, growing as fast as the body, and spreading out its wings daily in farther and fairer flights, learning, she knew not how, more things than she had taught it, or could teach.

Then Rosie comforted her aunt so—with the same sweet, dumb comfort that Hannah used to get from flowers and birds and trees. But here was a living flower, which God had given her to train up into beauty, blessing her with twice the blessedness she gave. In all her little household worries, Rosie s unconscious and perpetual well-spring of happiness soothed Hannah indescribably, and never more so than in some bitter days which followed that day, when Mr. Rivers seemed to have suddenly returned to his old miserable self, and to be dissatisfied with every thing and every body.

Even herself. She could not guess why; but sometimes her brother-in-law actually scolded her, or, what was worse, he scolded Rosie; quite needlessly, for the child was an exceedingly good child. And then Aunt Hannah's indignation was roused. More than once she thought of giving him a severe lecture, as she had occasionally done before, and he declared it did him good. But a certain diffidence restrained her. What right, indeed, had she to "pitch into him," as he had laughingly called it, when they were no blood relations?—if blood gives the right of fault-finding, which some people suppose. Good friends, as she and Mr. Rivers were, Hannah scrupled to claim more than the rights of friendship, which scarcely justify a lady in saying to a gentleman in his own house, "You are growing a perfect bear, and I would much rather have your room than your company."

Which was the truth. Just now, if she had not had Rosie's nursery to take refuge in, and Rosie's little bosom to fly to, burying her head there oftentimes, and drying her wet eyes upon the baby pinafore, Aunt Hannah would have had a sore time of it.

And yet she was so sorry for him—so sorry! If the old cloud were permanently to return, what should she do? What possible influence had she over him? She was neither his mother nor sister, if, indeed, either of those ties permanently affect a man who has once been married, and known the closest sympathy, the strongest influence a man can know. Many a time, when he was very disagreeable, her heart sank down like lead; she would carry Rosie sorrowfully out of papa's way, lest she should vex him, or be made naughty by him; conscious, as she clasped the child to her bosom, of that dangerous feeling which men sometimes rouse in women—even fathers in mothers—that their children are much pleasanter company than themselves.

Poor Bernard! poor Hannah! Perhaps the former should have been wiser, the latter more quick-sighted. But men are not always Solons; and Hannah was a rather peculiar sort of woman. She had so completely taken her own measure, and settled her voluntary destiny, that it never occurred to her she was not quite the old maid she thought herself, or that, like other mortal creatures, her lot, as well as her individuality, was liable to be modified by circumstances. When Bernard once told her she was a well-liked person, growing very popular at Easterham, she smiled, rather pleased than not; but when he hinted that an elderly rector, a rich widower, who had lately taken to visiting constantly at the House on the Hill, did not visit there on his account, but hers, Miss Thelluson at first looked innocently uncomprehending, then annoyed, as if her brother-in-law had made an unseemly jest. He never made it again. And soon afterward, either from her extreme coldness of manner, or some other cause, the rector suddenly vanished, and was no more seen.

Presently, and just at the time when she would have been most glad of visitors to cheer up her brother-in-law, their house seemed to grow strangely empty. Invitations ceased, even those at the Moat House being fewer and more formal. And in one of her rare visits there Lady Rivers had much annoyed her by dragging in—apropos of Adeline's marriage, and the great advantage it was for girls to get early settled in life—a pointed allusion to the aforesaid rector, and his persistent attentions.

"Which, of course, every body noticed, my dear. Every body notices every thing in Easterham. And allow me to say that if he does mean any thing, you may count on my best wishes. Indeed, I think, all things considered, to marry him would be the very best thing you could do."

"Thank you; but I have not the slightest intention of doing it."

"Then do you never mean to marry at all?"

"Probably not," replied Hannah, trying hard to keep up that air of smiling politeness, which she had hitherto found as repellent as a crystal wall against impertinent intrusiveness. "But, really, these things can not possibly interest any one but myself. Not even benevolent Easterham."

"Pardon me. Benevolent Easterham is taking far too much interest in the matter, and in yourself, too, I am sorry to say," observed Lady Rivers, mysteriously. "But, of course, it is no business of mine."

And with a displeased look the old lady disappeared to other guests, giving Hannah unmistakably "the cold shoulder" for the remainder of the evening.

This did not afflict her much, for she was used to it. Of far greater consequence was it when, a little while after, she saw by Bernard's looks that his spirits had risen, and he was almost his old self again. It always pleased him when his sister-in-law was invited to the Moat House, and made herself agreeable there, as she resolutely did. The habit of accepting a man's bread and salt, and then making one's self disagreeable in the eating of it, or abusing it afterward, was a phase of fashionable morality not yet attained to by Miss Thelluson. She did not care to visit much; but when she did go out, she enjoyed herself as much as possible.

"Yes, it has been a very pleasant evening; quite lively—for the Moat House," she would have added, but checked herself. It was touching to see Bernard's innocent admiration of every thing at the Moat House. The only occasions when it vexed her was when they showed so little appreciation of him.

"Oh, why can he not always be as good as he is to-night!" thought Hannah, when, as they walked home together, which they did sometimes of fine evenings instead of ordering the carriage, he talked pleasantly and cheerfully the whole way. They passed through the silent, shut-up village, and up the equally silent hill-road to the smooth "down" at its top. There the extreme quietness and loneliness, and the mysterious beauty of the frosty starlight, seemed to soothe him into a more earnest mood, imparting something of the feeling which bright winter nights always gave to Hannah—that sense of nearness to the invisible which levels all human griefs, and comforts all mortal pain.

"Perhaps, after all," said he, when they had been speaking on this subject, "it does not so very much matter whether one is happy or miserable during one's short life here; or one is inclined to feel so on a night like this, and talking together as you and I do now. The only thing of moment seems to be to have patience and do one's duty."

"I think it does matter," Hannah answered; but gently, so as not to frighten away the good angel which she rejoiced to see returning. "People do their duty much better when they are happy. I can not imagine a God who could accept only the sacrifices of the miserable. We must all suffer, less or more; but I never would suffer one whit more, or longer, than I could help."

"Would you not?"

"No, nor would I make others suffer. What do you think the child said to me yesterday, when I was removing her playthings at bed-time? I suppose I looked grave, for she said, 'Poor Tannie! Isn't Tannie sorry to take away Rosie's toys?' Tannie was sorry, and would gladly have given them all back again if she could. Don't you think," and Hannah lifted her soft, gray, truthful eyes to the winter sky, "that if Tannie feels thus, so surely must God?"

Mr. Rivers said nothing; but he pressed slightly the arm within his, and they walked on, taking the "sweet counsel together" which is the best privilege of real friends. It was like old days come back again, and Hannah felt so glad.

"Now you may perceive," Bernard said, after a little, apropos of nothing, "why the charming young ladies who come about my sisters, and whom they think I don't admire half enough, do not attract me as I suppose they ought to do. They might have done so once, before I had known sorrow; but now they seem to me so 'young,' shallow, and small. One half of me—the deepest half—they never touch; nor do my own people either. For instance, the things we have been talking of to-night I should never dream of speaking about to any body—except you."

"Thank you," replied Hannah, gratified.

Had she thought herself bound to tell the full truth, she might have confessed that there was a time when she, on her part, thought Mr. Rivers, as he thought these girls, "young, shallow, and small." She did not now. Either he had altered very much, or she had much misjudged him. Probably both was the case. He had grown older, graver, more earnest. She did not feel the least like his mother now; he was on a much wiser than she, and she gladly owned this. It would have relieved her honest mind to own likewise a few other trifles on which she had been egregiously mistaken. But in some things, and especially those which concerned herself and her own feelings, Hannah was still a very shy woman.

Digitized by Google

"Not that I have a word to say against those charming girls," continued he, relapsing into his gay mood. "No doubt they are very charming, the Misses Melville and the rest.

'He that loves a rosy cheek,
And a coral lip admires,' may find enough to admire in them. Only—only—you remember the last verse?" And he repeated it, with a tender intonation that rather surprised Hannah—

"'But a true and constant mind,
Gentle thoughts and calm desires,
Hearts in equal love combined,
Kindle never-dying fires.'

That is my theory of loving—is it yours?"

"I should fancy it is most people's who have ever deeply thought about the matter."

"Another theory I have, too," he went on, apparently half in earnest, half in jest, "that the passion comes to different people, and at different times of their lives, in very contrary ways. Some 'fall' in love as I did, at first sight, with my lost darling"—he paused a full minute. "Others walk into love deliberately, with their eyes open; while a few creep into it blindfold, and know not where they are going till the bandage drops, and then—"

"And which of these do you suppose was the case of Adeline and Mr. Melville?"

"Good Heavens! I was not thinking of Adeline and Mr. Melville at all."

He spoke with such needless acerbity that Hannah actually laughed, and then begged his pardon, which seemed to offend him only the more. She did not know how to take him, his moods were so various and unaccountable. But whatever they were, or whatever he was, she felt bound to put up with him; nay, she was happier with him in any mood than when far apart from him, as when he had held himself aloof from her of late.

"You are very cross to me," said she, simply, "but I do not mind it. I know you have many things to vex you; only do please try to be as good as you can. And you might as well as not be good to me."

"Be good to you!"

"Yes; for though I may vex you sometimes, as I seem to have done lately, I do not really mean any harm."

"Harm! Poor Hannah! Why, you wouldn't harm a fly. And yet"—he stopped suddenly, took both her hands, and looked her hard in the face—"there are times when I feel as if I hated the very sight of you."

Hannah stood aghast. Such unkind, causelessly unkind words! Hate her—why? Because she reminded him of his wife! And yet, except for a certain occasional "family" look, no two sisters could be more unlike than she and Rosa. Even were it not so, what a silly, nay, cruel reason for disliking her! And why had not the dislike shown itself months ago, when he seemed to prize her all the more for belonging to the departed one, whom he still fondly called his "lost darling?"

Miss Thelluson could not understand it at all. She was first startled; then inexpressibly pained. The tears came and choked her. She would have run away if she could; but as she could not, she walked on, saying nothing, for she literally had not a word to say.

Mr. Rivers walked after her. "I beg your pardon. I have spoken wildly, ridiculously. You must forgive. You see I am not such a calm, even temperament as you. Oh, Hannah, do forgive me. I did not mean what I said—I did not, indeed."

"What did you mean, then?"

A question which some people, well versed in the science which Mr. Rivers had just been so eloquently discussing, may consider foolish in the extreme, showing Hannah to have been, not merely the least self-conscious, but the most purblind of her sex. She was neither. But there are natures so exceedingly single-minded and straightforward that what seems to them not a right or fitting thing to be done they no more think of doing themselves, or of suspecting others of doing, than of performing that celebrated feat of "jumping over the moon." Besides, her idea of herself was, in many ways, as purely imaginary as her idea of her brother-in-law. The known, notable fact that "hate" is often only the agonized expression of a very opposite feeling never once suggested itself to the innocent mind of Hannah Thelluson.

They had by this time reached their own gate. Her hand was on the latch, not reluctantly. He took it off.

"Don't go in—not just this moment, when you are displeased with me. The night is so fine, and there is nobody about." (What would that matter? Hannah thought.) "Just walk a few steps further, while I say to you something which I have had on my mind to say for weeks past: a message—no, not a message, but a sort of commission from a friend of mine."

By his hesitation, his extreme awkwardness and uncomfortableness of manner, Hannah guessed directly what it was. "Et tu, Brute!" she could have bitterly said, remembering the annoyance to which she had been just subjected by Lady Rivers, whom she had seen afterward in close conclave with Bernard. Had he, then, been enlisted on the same side—of the obnoxious rector? Well, what matter? She had better hear all, and have done with it.

But there was delay, and for fully ten minutes; first by Bernard's silence, out of which she was determined not to help him in the least; and secondly, by their encountering a couple out walking like themselves, the village apothecary and the village milliner—known well to be lovers—who looked equally shy at being met by, and astonished at meeting, their clergyman and his sister-in-law out on the hill at that late hour. Mr. Rivers himself looked much vexed, and hastily proposed turning homeward, as if forgetting altogether what they had to say, till they once more reached the gate.

"Just one turn in the garden, Hannah—I must deliver my message, and do my duty, as Lady Rivers says I ought. I beg your pardon," he added, formally; "it is trenching on delicate ground; but my friend, Mr. Morecamb, has asked me confidentially to tell him whether you have any objection to his visiting our house."

"Our house? Certainly not."

"But the house means you—visits paid to you with a certain definite end. In plain terms, he wishes to marry you."

"And has confided that intention to you, and to all Easterham! How very kind! But would it not have been kinder to put the question to me himself, instead of making it public through a third party?"

"If by the 'third party' you mean me, I assure you I was no willing party; and also that I have sedulously kept the secret forced upon me. Even to-night, when Lady Rivers was questioning me on the subject, I was careful not to let her suspect, in the smallest degree, that there was any foundation for the report beyond Easterham gossip at Morecamb's frequent visits. I kept my own counsel, ay, and submitted to be rated roundly for my indifference to your interests, and told that I was hindering you from making a good marriage. Is it so?"

"You ought to have known me better than to suppose I should ever make a 'good' marriage, which means, in Lady Rivers's vocabulary, a marriage of convenience. She is very kind to take my affairs so completely into her own hands. I am deeply indebted to her—and to you."

The tone was so bitter and satirical, so unlike herself, that Bernard turned to look at her in the starlight—the pale, pure face, neither young nor old, which, he sometimes said, never would be either younger or older, because no wear and tear of human passion troubled its celestial peace.

"I have offended you, I see. Can it be possible that—"

"Nothing is impossible, apparently. But I should have supposed that you yourself would have been the first to put down all remarks of this kind; aware that it was, at least, highly improbable I could have any feeling concerning Mr. Morecamb—unless it was resentment at his having made me a public talk in this way."

"He could not help it, I suppose."

"He ought to have helped it. Any man who really loves a woman will hide her under a bushel, so to speak—shelter her from the faintest breath of gossip, take any trouble, any blame even, upon himself, rather than let her be talked about. At least that is how I should feel if I were a man and loved a woman. But I don't understand you men—less and less the more I know of you. You seem to see things in a different light, and live after a different pattern from what we women do."

"That is only too true—the more the pity," said Mr. Rivers, sighing. "But as to gossip: the man might not be able to prevent it. There might be circumstances— What do you think Morecamb ought to have done?"

Hannah thought a moment. "He should have held his tongue till he knew his own mind fully, or guessed mine. Then he should have put the question to me direct, and I would have answered it the same, and also held my tongue. Half the love-miseries in the world arise, not from the love itself, but from people's talking about it. I say to all my young friends who fall in love, whether happily or unhappily, 'Keep it to yourself; whatever happens, hold your tongue.'"

"Oracular advice—as if from a prophetess superior to all these human weaknesses," said Bernard, bitterly. "A pity it was not given in time to poor Mr. Morecamb. What do you dislike in him—his age?"

"No; it is generally a good thing for the man to be older than the woman—even much older."

"His being a widower, then?"

"Not at all; but—" and Hannah stopped, as indignant as if she had really loved Mr. Morecamb. That her brother-in-law should be pleading the cause of a gentleman who wanted to marry her, or that any gentleman should be wanting to marry her, seemed equally extraordinary. She could have laughed at the whole matter had she not felt so strangely, absurdly angry. She stood—twirling her hands in and out of her muff, and patting with fierce little feet the frosty ground, and waited for Mr. Rivers to speak next. He did so at length, very formally.

"I have, then, to convey to my friend a simple negative, and say that you desire his visits here to cease?"

"Not if he is your friend, and you wish them to continue. What right have I to shut the door upon any of your guests? My position is most awkward, most uncomfortable. Why did not you spare me this? If you had tried, I think—I think you might."

It was a woman's involuntary outcry of pain, an appeal for protection—until she remembered she was making it to a sham protector; a man who had no legal rights toward her; who was neither husband, father, nor brother; who, though she was living under his roof, could not shelter her in the smallest degree, except as an ordinary friend. He was that, any how, for he burst out in earnest and passionate rejoinder:

"How could I have spared you—only tell me! You talk of rights—what right had I to prevent the man's seeking you—to stand in the way of your marrying, as they tell me I do? Oh, Hannah! if you knew what misapprehension, what blame, I have subjected myself to, in all these weeks of silence! And yet now you—even you—turn round and accuse me."

"I accuse you!"

"Well, well, perhaps we are taking a too tragical view of the whole matter. You do not quite hate me?"

"No; on the contrary, it was you who said you hated me."

And that sudden change from pathos to bathos, from the sublime to the ridiculous, which, in talk, constantly takes place between people who are very familiar with one another, came now to soothe the agitation of both.

"Let us make a paction, for it will never do to have another quarrel, or even a coolness," said Mr. Rivers, with that bright, pleasant manner of his, which always warmed Hannah through and through like sunshine; she whose life before she came to Easterham had been, if placid, a little sunless, cold, and pale. "I know, whenever you tap your foot in that way, it is a sign you are waxing wroth. Presently you will burst out, and tear me limb from limb, as—allegorically speaking—you delight to do, you being a 'big lion,' as Rosie says, and I as innocent as a lamb the whole time."

Hannah laughed, and "got down from her high horse," as he used to call it, immediately. She always did when he appealed to her in that irresistibly winning, good-humored way. It is one of the greatest of mysteries—the influence one human being has over another. Oftener than not because of extreme dissimilarity. Upon Hannah's grave and silent nature the very youthfulness, buoyantness, and frankness of this young man came with a charm and freshness which she never found in grave, silent, middle-aged people. Even his face, which she had once called too handsome—uninterestingly handsome—she had come to look at with a tender pride, as his mother (so she said to herself at least) might have done.

"Well, papa," she replied, "I don't know whether you are a lamb or a lion, but you are without doubt the sweetest-tempered man I ever knew. It is a blessing to live with you, as Rosa once said."

"Did she say that? poor darling! And—and do you think it? Oh, Hannah!"—and he lifted up in the starlight a suddenly grave, even solemn face—"if you knew every thing—if she were looking at us two here—would she not say—I am sure she would—"

But the sentence was never ended; for just as they stood at the hall door a scream resounded from within—an unmistakable woman's scream.

"That is Grace's voice. Oh, my baby, my baby!" cried Hannah, and darted away, Mr. Rivers following her.

OLD LADIES' FLOWERS.

IT has been our good fortune all through life to be surrounded by floral novelties of the choicest beauty; yet we often find ourselves turning with fond delight and pleasure to the older, but now in too many cases the neglected, and, we might say, by some despised, inhabitants of our gardens. We have a fondness and admiration for many of the older annuals and hardy perennials, and are old-fogyish enough to think that they are equal in beauty, if not more beautiful than many vaunted plants of more recent introduction. Morning-glories, nasturtiums, rocket larkspurs, gillyflowers, asters, balsams, pansies, carnations, columbines, Canterbury bells, sweet-williams, cowslips, auriculas, polyanthuses, peonies, flowers-de-luce, wall-flowers, daffodils, and numerous other flowers cultivated by ladies of the past generation, are certainly more beautiful and intrinsically of more value than much of the deceptively advertised trash which too often encumbers our gardens at the present time.

Although we do not deny that verbenas, petunias, coleuses, dahlias, bedding geraniums, and a multitude of similar flowers, to be found in the bewildering catalogues of the florists of the present day, have many and distinctive beauties, yet we feel that the present fashion of discarding the old favorites is a species of ungrateful floral sacrilege. The new-comers, moreover, are not embalmed, as many of the older ones are, in the poesy of some of the finest poets of our language. These have a sweet æsthetic fragrance which does not belong to modern favorites; and, however much the last may delight us, they do not make us call to mind those delightful passages of our older poets that made our imaginations paint scenes of simple, rural, floral beauty and loveliness that no artistic pencil can realize; but these "old ladies' flowers," or "flowers of the poets," often unveil to us some lovely picture or scene that long since, in our earlier readings, we had painted in the chambers of our heart, and from which memory, thus assisted, removes a pile of modern rubbish that had well-nigh buried it in oblivion. Hence it is that while we would not banish our new friends from our gardens, we would still put in a plea for the retaining, we might say, indeed, the restoration, of the older ones. Their beauty is as great and their cultivation is as easy as that of any of the new-comers, and their associations far more delightful, for they call to remembrance our early days, our childhood homes, and the floral loves of our mothers.

We therefore recommend our garden-loving readers to appropriate at least one flower bed in their gardens to these flowers, for we feel assured that they will find them possessed of an interest and charm peculiarly their own, which their more showy or more modern rivals do not possess.

Of many of the flowers we have named, new and improved varieties have been of late years originated by cultivators in Europe, where they still retain their places in gardens. As the time for selecting and sowing annual flower seeds is now close at hand, we shall at present notice the older-cultivated species of annuals, viz.:

Amaranthus.—Love-lies-bleeding of the poets. A new species, A. melancholicus, with blood-red foliage, is desirable on account of its effect as a foliage plant; but few of this class of plants surpass the old tricolored amaranthus, or Joseph's-coat, in beauty as regards variegated foliage.

Asters.—These may now be divided into two classes—the French, with flat, reflexed, or incurved petals; and the German, with quilled petals. Of the first, what are known as Truffaut's peony-flowered are the most desirable; of the German class, Reid's improved quilled is probably the best. The centre of the flower is closely quilled with broad, flat guard petals. To grow asters in perfection they should have a light, rich soil, and in dry, hot weather they should be mulched with rotted manure, and be liberally supplied with manure water.

Balsams.—The camellia-flowered and the rose-flowered varieties are the finest. They can be had in ten or more colors and varieties, some of which are as beautifully striped as a carnation. They should be treated in the same way as asters to get flowers in perfection.

Dianthus, or Pinks.—In the Chinese or annual species much improvement has been made, and some of the double varieties are very fine, particularly those of the two varieties known as heddewigii and laciniatus, the flowers of which are from two to three inches in diameter; those of laciniatus, as its name imports, being beautifully fringed.

Delphinium, or Larkspur.—Many new and improved varieties have been lately introduced. The stock-flowering varieties of the rocket class are very fine, having spikes of double flowers eighteen inches in length, of various shades of color.

Ipomœa, Convolvulus, or Morning-glory.—This tribe of plants stands unrivaled as annual climbers, and surpasses in beauty many or all of the bedding-out climbers. The newer species and varieties are very fine, especially I. limbata, I. hederacea, and their varieties. The star cypress vine of the older gardens is now being brought out as a comparatively new plant. It and the old crimson, white, and the more modern rose-colored cypress vine are beautiful climbers when trained on cords, as in the old gardens.

Lupines.—The older varieties of lupines are surpassed by some of the new species of late introduction, of which L. hartwegii, L. hybridus, and their varieties, L. subcarnosus, L. magnificus, L. menziesii, and L. pubescens elegans, are especially worthy of cultivation.

Marigolds.—Cultivators have greatly improved these flowers, and while retaining the beauty of the blossoms, have done away with the somewhat coarse, weedy habit of growth of the plant, and we now have them growing from only six inches to a foot in height, and loaded with a profusion of double orange, brown, yellow, and striped flowers. The double-flowered English marigold, or marybuddes of our older poets, is too seldom seen in our gardens; its large, rich, golden-colored flowers add much to enlivening a border.

Marvel of Peru, or Four-o'clocks.—An old inhabitant of our gardens, the varieties of which are now largely increased and improved, both in the size and colors of the flowers, and in the habit of the plant, being dwarfer and more densely branching.

Nasturtium.—Instead of the one variety with orange-colored flowers of former times, we now have two classes—one climbing and the other dwarf. Of the first we have dark crimson, flesh-colored, spotted, and striped flowered varieties; of the dwarf set, attaining only twelve to eighteen inches in height, and of bushy habit, there are numerous varieties, with white, yellow, orange, buff, scarlet, crimson, maroon, and variegated flowers. The canary-bird nasturtium is a very beautiful climber which we especially recommend.

Poppies.—These are among the most showy and desirable of annuals. There are two species which have, from time immemorial (we might almost say), been cultivated in our gardens—Papaver somniferum, or opium poppy, and P. rhœas, the corn-field poppy. The French, who largely value and cultivate them for garden decoration, divide the first into two classes—viz., the peony-flowered, in which the petals are entire, or only slightly fimbriated on their edges; and the other, in which the petals are deeply fringed or frizzled; the shades of color ranging from pure white to deep violet, the red shades being very brilliant. The flowers of the double varieties of the corn-field poppy are similar in appearance to a good hollyhock flower, the guard petals generally being of a different color to the centre ones. This is the pavot coquelicot of the French. The seeds should always be sown where the plants are to remain, as the poppy does not bear transplanting well. The plants should be thinned out to from eight to ten inches apart.

Pansies.—In few flowers has the skill of the floriculturist produced greater changes than in this. The English and German strains produce flowers from two to two and a half inches across, ranging in color from pure white, pale yellow, golden yellow, crimson, bronze, sky blue, dark blue, and maroon, to coal black, either in self-color, or freaked or pied in party-colors. To have them in perfection the seed should be sown in August or September, and the plants protected during winter with branches of evergreens; the soil should be made very rich with well-rotted manure.

Sweet-Peas.—These old favorites are not as often seen in gardens as formerly, although, besides their intrinsic beauty, they are very useful for training on trellis-work, or up the naked stems of small trees and shrubs. Their effect is increased by intermixing the canary-bird nasturtium with them. They should always be planted in rich soil, and mulched in hot, dry weather. By plucking off the pods, which form after the flowers drop, the season of their blooming may be much prolonged.

Sweet-Scabious, or Mourning-Bride.—Formerly there was not much variety in the colors of the flowers of this plant, they being of more or less deep shades of purple; but now we have white, crimson or scarlet, and rose-color, and, in addition, we have dwarf varieties of the same colors, not growing more than a foot high.

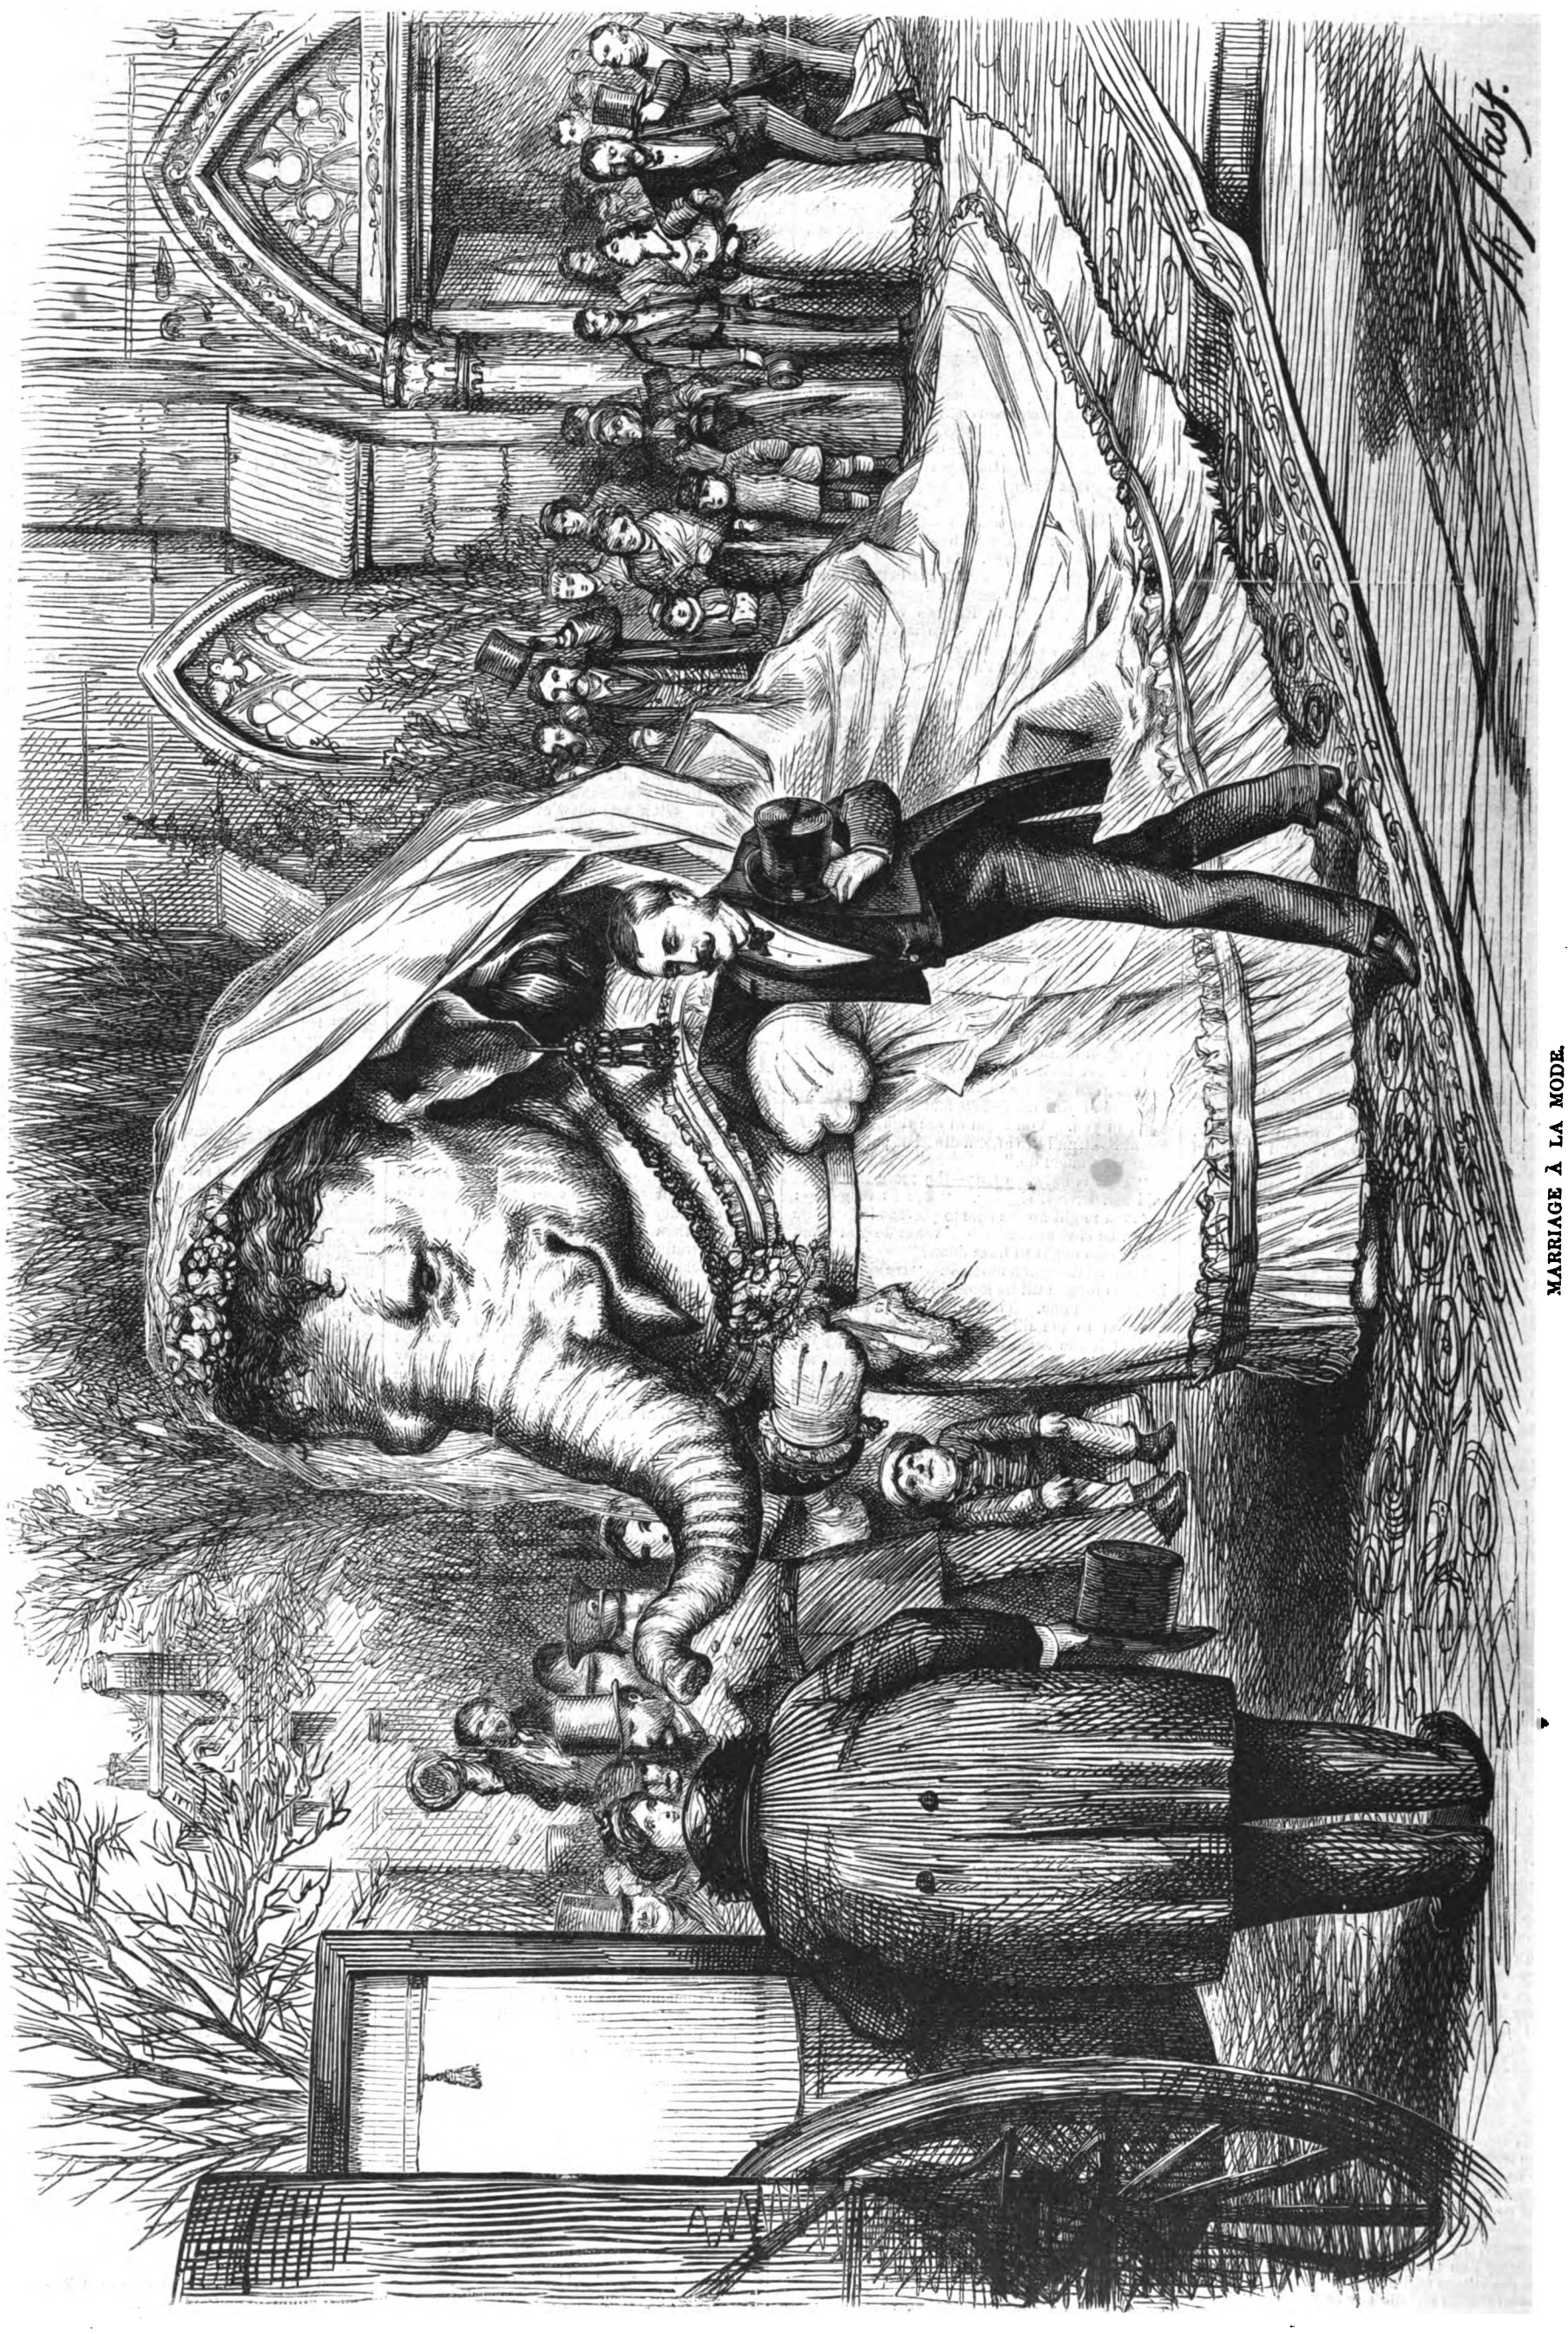
Stocks, or Gillyflowers.—What is known among gardeners as the ten-weeks stock is the sort generally grown as an annual. There are five classes of them—the dwarf, miniature, large-flowered, pyramidal, and wall-flower-leaved. The first grow about fifteen or sixteen inches high, are somewhat branching, and have compact spikes of flowers; the miniature stocks only grow about four to six inches high; the large-flowered have much larger flowers than the dwarf, and are, therefore, more desirable; the pyramidal have very large flowers, with a less compact spike, and the spikes of flowers assume a pyramidal form; the wall-flower-leaved differ from the others in having smooth, deep green, not woolly, glaucous foliage, as the others. They require to be sown as early in the season as possible, to have rich soil, and to be lightly but frequently watered with manure water. They are frequently subject to the attacks of the black fly, which may be driven off by dusting the plants with lime or soot. The shades of color in the flowers of these plants are very numerous. We have had thirty or forty at a time.

Scarlet Runners and White Runners.—More useful and beautiful strong-growing annual vines than these can not be had; their rapid growth, large foliage, and brilliant flowers make them well adapted for covering unsightly walls or buildings. To these we must also add the hyacinth bean, both the purple and white varieties.

Zinnias.—The double varieties of this flower are among the greatest acquisitions we have had among annuals for the past ten or twelve years, rivaling the dahlia in the beauty of form and coloring of the flowers. They are indispensable in a collection of choice annuals.

Should any of our readers follow out our suggestion of setting aside a flower bed in their gardens for the above flowers, and properly arrange it, having suitable poles for the climbers in the centre of the bed, and then plant a corresponding bed with coleus, aschyranthus, cobæa, maurandia, thunbergia, anagallis, lobelias, and other plants of that class, we shall not have the least fear with respect to their decision in the autumn as to which will be the most admired, and give the most satisfaction.

Digitized by Google



MARRIAGE À LA MODE.

"BOY BLOWING BUBBLES."

THIS drawing, by the English master of water-colors, William Hunt, is the property of Miss Burdett Coutts, and forms an item in the loan portion of the London Exhibition for the Benefit of the Distressed Peasantry of France. As regards the drawing itself, comment is scarcely needed. It is one of a class by the same painter with which all must be familiar. William Hunt, as a painter of boys, is almost on a par with William Hunt, the painter of still-life par excellence; and this is one of the most characteristic examples of his power in the former category. A few of his paintings have been on exhibition in this country. He was born in 1790, and died quite recently. He was remarkable as a faithful student of nature.

"BOY BLOWING BUBBLES."—[FROM A PICTURE BY THE LATE W. HUNT.]

A BIRD'S-EYE VIEW OF FRENCH HISTORY.

IN studying ancient history we trace results from the foundations of nations, marking the changes. It is strange how we neglect this principle in modern history; we take the occurrences of our present civilization by piecemeal, by single periods and facts, stumbling about among the nations of Europe as if they were so many blocks of stone, unimpressionable to the influence of circumstances and time.

That great Franconian empire, which was formed from the débris of a portion of the western Roman power, and which, a thousand years ago, occupied the area between the Baltic and the Atlantic, the North Sea and the Adriatic, had been originated by a German nationality (the Franks) with whom many minor tribes had amalgamated. From this empire drifted off to the east the German realm with the imperial dignity, and to the west, France. Since then both have gone their own way, up to our time, and the vicissitudes of a thousand years have ended in the reassertion of that great Teutonic nation which seemed almost crippled into insignificance at various times. And how have these thousand years been employed by both? After the first separation France was left to flounder for a hundred years under the Carlovingians, and began, under the family of Hugh Capet, that career of consolidation into a unified state which must naturally have led to a great development of military strength, but also laid the nation open to the oft-repeated calamity of being governed exclusively by one personality or one dominant passion. For three hundred and fifty years did the Capets rule France, and during the latter part of that period the towns had gained sufficient strength to be represented in the "États Généraux;" but the royal power was rather strengthened, as opposed to the nobility, by this move, and when the Valois became the governors of France for two hundred and fifty years, the crown became stronger still, and annexed further provinces. The endless wars of succession with England, the struggles between the royal prerogative and the nobility, the attacks made by the princes of the blood upon each other, the long series of wars with Austria, during which the three German bishopries of Metz, Verdun, and Toul came, three hundred years ago, for the first time, under French supremacy, and lastly, the bloody and fierce disturbances between

Digitized by Google

Protestants and Catholics, had again and again brought the country to the verge of ruin, had devastated its glorious fields and vineyards, trodden under foot the rights of the people, and dismantled its towns; till the end of the Valois dynasty left France torn into factious discontent, but, as a united monarchy, strong and martial in its development against its neighbors.

With Henry of Navarre the Bourbons mounted the throne of France, and occupied it for two hundred years, till their disastrous fall—two hundred years, comprising the highest material development of the country, and ending in its utter dissolution. There is no period of French history so indicative of the pernicious influence of single-handed power as that of Louis XIV., and his favorite maxim, "L'état c'est moi," may be said to have wrought even the disastrous consequences of our own time.

AN APOLOGY.

'Tis true that my glances have wandered
O'er the faces around me that bloom,
And many the smile I have squandered;
But ask not when, where, and on whom.

If my looks are so brimful of meaning,
I vow I would rather be blind
Than to feel, while enjoyment I'm gleaning,
That a lecture will follow behind:

It were idle to cast a reflection
On the needle's consistence and worth,
Though it wavers in every direction
Ere it steadfastly points to the north.

All day though the bee seems a rover,
As he murmurs o'er garden and green,
He carries the sweets of the clover
At eve to the feet of his queen.

There are blossoms that owe all their brightness
To the hue that each chiefly displays,
But you are the snow-drop whose whiteness
Is the blending of infinite rays.

As the gay tints of Art wake a yearning
For Nature's sweet emerald hue,
So is born in my glances returning
New light as they rest upon you.

CHUBB JACKSON.

DOES any body, I wonder, know Throgmorton? It is in the weald of Kent; and yet not actually in the weald, but on a little outlying spur of it which projects into the great plain of Romney. There the tough clay has married the lily-white sand, and a bounteous offspring has blessed the union. There flourish noble oaks, broad-leaved chestnuts, aspiring elms in rich luxuriance of leaf; and emerald pastures are set among their shades, and rich corn fields and smiling hop gardens checker the sides of the gently swelling slopes.

Loiter with me on the pleasant field path winding in and out among the meadows and corn fields; look back on the red-roofed town crowned by a massive Gothic tower—the evening chimes are tinkling in the still air with a loving, lingering cadence, suggesting I know not what subtile pathos of long-forgotten days—and own with me that broad England can show few fairer nooks than fair Throgmorton town.

My story hasn't much to do with Throgmorton; but there it was I first knew Chubb Jackson. He wasn't unlike a chub, either, as a boy—wide-mouthed, with little teeth set far back in his head, and freckles so brown that you might take them for scales. He was a school-fellow of mine, at the Manor-house School. Old Hookey (not thirty then), our head-master, had taken him in as an incorrigible, at a double fee, to try and make something of him. Possibly the attempt might have been worth the money; but, at any rate, it didn't succeed. Passed through the regulation mill, Chubb came out more ink-and-tear-stained, more sulky, and more lazy than ever. Dragged through the Æneid, he tumbled over "Arma virumque cano;" shoved into logarithms, he couldn't even go through the multiplication-table. His life was a continual round of expiation, of impositions which he never got through, of unlearned tasks which no mortal power could force him to learn: only the holidays freed him from the ever-accumulating load of punishment.

And yet I think he enjoyed himself. I fancy, as he sat by the open window, looking over the rambling old-fashioned garden to the pleasant apple and cherry orchards beyond, his eyes and mind far away from the wretched old lexicon and classics under his nose, that the bees as they hummed, and the birds as they twittered, and all the hushed sounds of country life, said a say for him which they uttered not for us, as we swiped and bowled and fielded and kept wicket in the cricket field over beyond the Oast House.

I was the only chum he had: perhaps a corresponding vein of idlesse made us sympathize; at all events, we were great friends; and when his aunt, Miss, or, as she was called by courtesy, Mrs. Chubb—he was an orphan, poor fellow, and under the care of a maiden aunt—when she came to take him home for the midsummer holidays, she had a liking for me for her nephew's sake, and wanted me to come and see them at Pelham Crescent, Hastings. But I never went; and I saw no more of Chubb Jackson for I don't know how many years.

I was serving out my articles with Bump & Podgers, of Lincoln's Inn, living in lodgings in Stanhope Street, Hampstead Road, when, coming from Charing Cross one evening by a yellow bus, I recognized next to me on the knife-board the image of Chubb Jackson. It couldn't be the inky boy of my school-days; for this was a painful swell in lavender gloves, most shiny hat, and shirt collar of portentous size. Now Chubb as a lad had a most inveterate stutter. So when the youth turned to me, intending, I think, to ask for a light, having an unlit cigar in his mouth, and fumbling vainly in his waistcoat pocket, and I saw his mouth working in painful throes to deliver itself of the embryo words, I knew that he must be my former school-fellow, and cried, unconsciously imitating his stammer, "W-why, you must be C-chubb Jackson!"

He was living, I found, still with his aunt Chubb, in Albany Street, close by; and we renewed our school friendship forthwith.

Mrs. Chubb was always delighted to see me. I was so steady, she said; judging, I fear, rather from my antecedents than from any actual knowledge of my habits; and she always felt comfortable when Chubb was with me. But there was another attraction at 294 Albany Street. Letitia Cuttshon was there on a visit—a protracted visit, having no apparent commencement or ending, but which was always to end at some time or other, but never did.

The second time I went to see them Mrs. Chubb told me, as a great secret, that she hoped Letitia and Chubb would come together. Letitia was the orphaned daughter of the dearest friend she ever had—she gave a little sigh as she said it, which made me think perhaps there was some woman's romance hidden below her placid front—and it was the dearest wish of her heart that the two should be married; but she wanted Chubb to make something of himself first. He was now apprenticed to a wood-engraver, and he really seemed to have found his particular hole; for he had a wonderfully neat and careful hand, and had considerable talent for design. He worked a good deal at home in a little atelier on the second-floor; and you would hear him, as he chipped away, humming sometimes, and sometimes caroling, when you came to the hall door in quiet Albany Street.

Looking upon Letitia as already engaged, I had no intention of falling in love with her; but I couldn't help becoming very fond of her, meeting her as I did constantly in intimate society, for she was so good and lovable. Chubb was much attached to her, I fancied; but I don't know whether he was quite such a good boy as his aunt imagined, and I used to doubt sometimes whether the career open to him pleased him altogether.

Being not swells at all, but quiet unpretentious folk, we would sometimes go to the pit of the Princess's. Mrs. Chubb would pilot her nephew through, and I would have to take care of Letty in the crowd, and sometimes, under pressure of circumstances, would find my arm around her waist, or take her little plump hand in mine. Delicious pleasures! forbidden, but how sweet!

It happened, however, that some literary friend of Chubb offered him a box for a particular night at the Olympic; and it was then and there determined that we would all go. Chubb was to come to my office at half past six, and Aunt Chubb and Letitia were to call for us there.

I had had a very busy day at Lincoln's Inn, and I had not noticed the flight of time, when I heard a cab stop outside: it was seven o'clock. I was vexed with Chubb that he hadn't kept his appointment; for I had relied upon his coming in time for me to dress before the ladies arrived. Now I had to run out in my office coat, and ask Mrs. Chubb to wait till I could struggle into my evening suit.

"Don't be more than ten minutes, Edward," she said, "or we shall have to pay extra for waiting. Chubb must follow us, the careless boy."

There was nothing remarkable in his not keeping his appointment; I don't think he had ever kept one in his life. I contented myself with leaving a message with Mrs. Tomkins, the housekeeper, that he was to dress as quickly as possible, and follow us. I charged her specially to have a jug of hot water ready on the hob, that he mightn't have any excuse for sitting down in his shirt sleeves and smoking a pipe, which he would be only too glad to do on the slightest hitch in his preparations.

I remember the entertainment at the Olympic well. It was the last time I ever saw R—— act. The shadow of death was upon the poor fellow then; but he fired up once or twice with something of his old spirit. It was a grotesque drama they played, but it saddened me, too; there was something weird and ghostly about the fun.

Act succeeded act, but still no Chubb Jackson. Ever and again I turned my head, thinking I heard him enter the box. My uneasiness seized my companions also; they, too, began to look over their shoulders each minute. It was a hot midsummer night, but the theatre felt chilly. Aunt and Letitia drew their shawls round them. I fancied, too, that the audience on the other side began to notice our uneasiness: lorgnettes were leveled at our box.

All of a sudden the box door was thrown violently open, hung suspended for a moment—the instant during which a person might pass in—and then closed heavily. I jumped up, and ran into the passage. Not a soul was there. Letitia had given a little scream; she looked deadly pale and almost fainting. Aunt Chubb was perplexed and distrait. The play was coming to an end. I took them out of the theatre, and put them into a cab. It would be a relief to get back to Albany Street, and to find Chubb in his little snuggery, smoking a pipe and chipping away at his blocks; a relief to give him a good scolding for putting us out so.

But when we got back to Albany Street the house was dark and desolate. The servants had gone to bed, according to orders. The supper tray was in the dining-room, in readiness for our refection: a few dozen oysters, a brown loaf, a half-cut ham. But there was no trace of Chubb's presence, no opened shells, no empty bottle of Guinness. Where could he be?

It was necessary that I should go out to look after the missing Chubb. I embraced my mission very reluctantly; for I was tired and hungry, and I thought that Chubb was indulging in some freak. His aunt would not hear of the possibility of such a thing; her boy had never been out so late as this without her knowledge, and she felt convinced some evil had come to him. She besought me to lose not a moment in putting the police in motion, in advertising, in offering a reward of a hundred pounds for any information.

"Had he any money with him, aunt?"

I had grown so intimate with the family that Mrs. Chubb had adopted me as her nephew.

"Oh dear, yes; and a great deal. I paid him his half year's allowance, fifty pounds, this very morning, in Bank of England notes; and he stuffed them into his breast coat-pocket in his careless way, and I—"

"Have you got the numbers?"

"Oh yes; I put them down; they're in my desk. See here."

"Nothing but the numbers! no date, no distinguishing letters! Dear me, aunt, how unbusiness-like you are!"

"Oh, is it necessary, Edward? I didn't know."

"This list will do well enough for stopping the notes; but if they were lost, you'd never get any thing out of the bank for them. But now the point is to find Chubb. Good-by, aunt; I'll send the young scamp home to you fast enough, never fear."

"Please God, I trust you will."

Letty was in the hall as I went out. She came to me, pale and trembling.

"Oh, Edward, do you think there is any thing wrong with Chubb?"

"No, nothing wrong, I trust, Letty. Don't worry about him; he's sure to be all right."

I took her hand as I spoke. Her sweet gray eyes sought mine in unsuspecting sisterly confidence.

"You will come back with him. We sha'n't go to bed till you come back. Good-by, Edward."

It was a hot, dull, sodden night—a night on which one felt the oppressive weight of undefinable wretchedness. As I made my way to the cab stand I felt that I was upon a bootless errand.

Chubb hadn't been at Lincoln's Inn; the housekeeper, whom I roused out of her first sleep, was sure of that. I must go on to Enfield Street, to the shop of the eminent wood-engravers where Chubb was employed. The premises were locked up; an iron bar across the door, with a great padlock securing it, showed that no one slept in the house. What should I do next? In my perplexity, I found my way to the police office. The inspector smiled at my grave air when he heard my tale.

"There's a good many young gents as don't get home as soon as their mas would like, Sir. But I'll send a sergeant with you, Sir. The man on the beat will know where the foreman of the shop lives, no doubt, Sir."

The police sergeant, a grizzled [illegible]-worn man, started with me to the beat. [illegible]er on duty knew where the foreman of [illegible] & Jardine lived; it was in a street off the Tottenham Court Road. Another short cab-drive, and we were knocking at Mr. White's door. Mr. White was a bachelor and a lodger. He was evidently giving a party that night; the front-room was lighted up, and there was a piano going, and a song with a thundering chorus. My heart felt a great relief; Chubb was here, of course; this was the very sort of thing in which he delighted, for which he'd give up any kind of civilized society. Wouldn't he be wild at being fetched home by a police sergeant and a friend!

White came to the door in his shirt sleeves; he had a long clay pipe in his hand, with which he was beating time to the chorus. He seemed too perfectly happy to feel any surprise at the sight of two strangers at his gate, although one of them was a police constable. A rich tenor voice inside was singing, "Hard times come again no more."

"Chubb Jackson here? No, he isn't—'Tis a song, a sigh of the weary, hard times'—but if you're a friend of his, come in and join us." Again he was led away by the chorus, "Around my cabin door—come again no more."

The police sergeant sighed; he'd a soft heart, I fancy, under his blue coat; and few who have had hard times themselves can hear unmoved the plaintive refrain.

"Can you give us a few minutes' conversation on a matter of importance?"

"Certainly; only don't interrupt the song. Come in; there. 'Hard times, hard times, come again no more;' now chorus, all!"

We stood there in the hall under the lamp; Mr. White waving his pipe to the time, and the police sergeant joining gruffly in the strain.

"Bravo! thank ye, gentlemen. Now, then, what have you got to say to me?"

I told him briefly of Chubb being missing, and asked him what clew he had to give me.

"Why, let's see. Chubb went away first thing this morning; he wasn't a quarter of an hour at the shop. He'd been drawing some tin, hadn't he? He don't often show much at the shop on such occasions. Where he went to I don't know. Yes, I do, though. I can tell you where he started from, at least. He went to the Essex Street pier; for he was asking Brown if it was open again, as it had been repairing lately, and Brown said it was. But where he went after that I know no more than the dead. But, bless you, he'll turn up all right."

We took our leave sadly; it didn't seem a very hopeful trail.

"I don't like a track as ends in the river, Sir. You don't often get any farther than that."

We didn't get any farther.

At the early dawn I found myself wearily walking along Albany Street, with a feeble hope that Chubb might have come home in the mean time. But there was only Mrs. Chubb, sitting up, sad and wan, and looking ten years older in that single night.

"My poor boy, my poor boy!" she could only cry, quite broken down, quite past comfort. Letty took her up stairs, and I didn't venture to see her for a month after.

I had the direction of all the inquiries which were made. Spurred on by the reward of £250, the police exerted themselves most strenuously. But not the faintest trail could they find of Chubb Jackson. One of the notes he had received from his aunt was traced to a low public-house in the Waterloo Road; but although the house was watched for months, and the haunts of all the doubtful characters who resorted there thoroughly searched, they failed to get a glimpse of the fate of poor Chubb.

The atelier on the second-floor in Albany Street was shut up from that time. Aunt Chubb would let no one enter it but herself. Once a week she would go in and dust it with her own hands. Poor Letitia thought herself almost a widow, and wore deep mourning for her lost sweetheart.

It was a year after Chubb's untimely fate that I ventured one day—she was sewing a button on my sleeve at the time: the sight of her sweet, patient face and downcast eyes was too much for me, and I took her in my arms, and asked her if she'd let me take the vacant place in her heart. She was dreadfully shocked, and wouldn't forgive me for a long time; but Aunt Chubb was my friend, and told my darling the time for grief was past, and that it was her dearest wish now that we two should be married; and then Letitia relented, and gave me all her heart.

Aunt Chubb roused up wonderfully now. In our happiness she seemed to live again, for the soul wearies of hopeless grief. In the preparations for the wedding, in the necessary house-hunting and furniture-buying, Aunt Chubb took great interest. But I couldn't help feeling a little nettled at finding how completely in the mind of aunt, and partially in Letty's view, I was simply a representative of the lost Chubb. We were not to live in St. John's Wood, because Chubb detested St. John's Wood. We must live in the neighborhood of Regent's Park, because Chubb thought it was the healthiest part of London. The dining-room curtains were to be blue, for that was Chubb's favorite color; the drawing-room was to be upholstered in white and gold, for Chubb had been heard to say that when he had a house of his own that would be his choice. In other respects, however, it was more satisfactory to stand in Chubb's shoes. His aunt had announced her intention of making us the same allowance she had intended for Chubb when he married; and she told us that, having no near relations of her own, she proposed to make us and ours her heirs; but, after all, it wasn't pleasant to be considered in the light of a proxy or deputy; and the way in which those two women set up an idol, an ideal Chubb about as like the real formerly existing Chubb as the butterfly is to the grub, and expecting every body to burn incense before it, was especially aggravating. But I bore all patiently, abiding the time when I should take the reins into my own hands.

It was just two years since poor Chubb disappeared, and we were to be married to-morrow.

I had wound up all my affairs at Lincoln's Inn, and I had made up my mind to leave the office at three, having to make a few purchases; and I had planned taking a Citizen steamboat to Cadogan Pier, there to have a quiet half hour under the trees of Cheyne Walk, to take leave of my old self. For before I knew Letitia I had been a very lonely man, lonely in a crowd, and I had learned to know myself—yes, and to like myself, and to take a pleasure in my own thoughts; and I felt a little sad, as though I were parting with an old friend at the gate of my new life.

But, locking up my papers and changing my coat, I was conscious of a peculiar stir and tumult astonishing the quiet inn; a clatter and a clank, a ringing of steel accoutrements, and the sharp clash of hoofs on the paved court-yard. I heard, too, the rush of pattering feet, which betokened that the London gamin was awake to the prospect of a little excitement. Now, looking from my window, I saw a small detachment of hussars drawn up outside our office. Opposite the door was a cab, a policeman on the box. Half a dozen mounted police were drawn up on either side, and the British public massed itself behind the cavalcade.

I heard a clerk flying up the stairs, and he burst into my room, exclaiming, "Oh, Mr. Brown, you're wanted immediately by the Chief Commissioner of Police!"

Had it come for me, then, this cavalcade? Was I to be carried off on the eve of my wedding-day? Was I to be spirited away to join my poor friend Chubb? I remembered such things in weird stories I had read as a boy: and I was really so much shaken that had I found myself crammed into the carriage, and disappearing in a thunder-cloud, I shouldn't have been much astounded.

No, not more astounded than I was when, going to the window of the cab, I saw sitting beside a police officer and heavily ironed, CHUBB JACKSON!

He wasn't a bit altered, only browned and more manly.

"Ned, old fellow, I can't shake hands with you for these confounded handcuffs; but you're looking jolly. I want you to come with me to the police office to identify me. They want to make out that I'm Colonel Brady, the head-centre of the Fenians: but you can tell them better than that, eh, Ned? Come, jump in."

I got into the cab in a maze of bewilderment.

How did I stand? Was I going to be married to-morrow, or would Chubb usurp my place? Who did the house in Regent's Park belong to? and the portmanteau ready packed at my lodgings? No, that was mine, at all events. And the month's holiday? Good Heavens! why didn't the fellow stop another day? What did he mean by sitting there grinning at me, looking so happy? Happy; of course he was happy. Wasn't he going home to his Letitia?

Digitized by Google

Why should I be bail for this man? What did I know about him? The last two years might have made a Fenian of him. Was I certain he wasn't Colonel Brady? Was it a fiend which whispered in my ear, Keep him locked up till the day after to-morrow?

But the fiends may whisper as they will; the habit of truth and honesty is the best exorciser of demons. When we arrived at the police station, and were shown into the magistrate's private room, my course was plain. Mr. Pusslewit, the magistrate, knew me well enough.

I could answer for the man in custody; he was not a Fenian at all. He was Chubb Jackson, an intimate friend of my own. His detention would be a very serious affair for the police; but released now, I would undertake that no action should be brought against the government. The upshot was that half an hour saw Chubb and myself walking toward Charing Cross arm in arm.

I had made up my mind as to the course I should adopt. Chubb had satisfied me that he had not intentionally left us in the dark as to his fate. His laches were not so great as to debar him from equity. I felt that he had the prior claim; that I could not resist the decree of the court above. I would take him to Letitia; tell her in half a dozen words that I resigned her to him; leave them to be happy together; and then—ah! time enough to think of that when the then came.

"Chubb, we'll have a cab, and go to your aunt's at once."

"But, Ned, I'm so horribly hungry. I've had nothing to eat since breakfast this morning on board the Hamburg; and if I remember right, aunt has tea about this time, and her larder is not framed for emergencies. Let's go to the Wellington and have a jolly good dinner; I'll stand sam, for I'm flush to a degree."

We went to the Wellington, and Chubb took great pains in ordering the dinner. I think we drank a good deal of wine, but I couldn't taste it, nor had it any perceptible effect upon me.

Chubb was full of his adventures. He had sailed for America from Southampton on the day of his disappearance; he had posted letters to us all, explaining the cause of his exodus; we afterward found the letters in the breast pocket of the old coat hanging up in his atelier. He had found out at New York some relations of his own, who, it turned out, were people of influence in America, some of them being high in office. His desire being to serve in the war of secession then going on, his friends procured him a commission in a fighting regiment, and Chubb had seen good service. "Ask any body who knows if there's any thing said about the Forty-second Pennsylvanians and English Jackson," said Chubb, with a flush of pride in his face. He'd written home "several times," he said, vaguely, but postal communications were irregular, and Chubb wrote such a shocking scrawl, that I wasn't surprised his letters never came to hand.

Wouldn't his aunt, all being explained, really go down on her knees and worship the young hero? Her own nephew one of the braves of the great army of liberty! And Letitia, too; he'd gone through all this for her, to make himself worthy of her love.

How happy they'd all be! Only I, a miserable pale-faced lawyer's clerk—only I in the way.

"Come, Chubb, let's go," said I, hoarsely.

"Let's have a chasse café and a smoke before we go, Ned."

"No, no; come now, come now."

If I didn't get it over soon I should break down.

"But I've something to tell you, Ned. Come along."

I gave way. I really thirsted for a reprieve. We sat in the smoking-room: I before my untasted coffee, rolling my unlit cigar in my damp fingers; he with his leg comfortably twisted round the arm of the chair, lolling back and blowing great wreaths of smoke from his fat, jolly cheeks.

"Ned, do you think Letitia was very fond of me?"

"Devoted to you, Chubb. She mourned you as a widow might mourn her dead husband."

Chubb looked rather queer.

"Do you know that's devilish awkward?"

"What do you mean?"

"Why, I mean—in fact, I'm married to an American. I sent her on to Paris while I ran over to see you."

I jumped up, upsetting the table between us, and grasped Chubb by both his hands.

"Chubb, my dear old friend, my dear old friend; indeed we'll kill the fatted calf for you to-night. I am going to marry Letitia to-morrow!"

What an agitating night that was! I shall never forget Letitia's look of horror when I told her Chubb Jackson had come back; and then how she flung her arms round my neck, and cried to me that I must hold her fast against her aunt and Chubb and all the world; how I exploded then into a passion of love and joy, and quite frightened poor Letty. She was a little disappointed, though, when she found we were not called upon to do defiance to all the world; rather vexed with Chubb, too, for having forgotten her so easily.

As for Aunt Chubb, she laughed and cried, and cried and laughed again. Yes, it was very nice to see the faithful old aunt and her young scapegrace of a nephew so happy.

We were married the next day, Letty and I; and Chubb gave her away.

Mrs. Chubb started for Paris next day to see her niece, Mrs. Chubb Jackson; and we presently joined them all there, and were introduced to the fair Américaine, her father and brothers. She was a charming little body, and I was delighted with her; but Letitia didn't get on with her quite so well.

Chubb has gone back to America, where, in conjunction with his father-in-law, he carries on a dry-goods warehouse, a monster hotel, and a line of steamboats, besides conducting an illustrated paper. Report says they are making piles of dollars.

Letitia and I are very happy, and have heaps of babies.

FAMILY BREAKFASTS AND DINNERS.

BREAKFAST.

English Breakfast Tea, Boiled Mackerel, Stewed Potatoes, Graham Bread, Flannel Cakes.

ENGLISH BREAKFAST TEA (from a recipe furnished by an old English housekeeper).—Put the table tea-pot near the fire until it is quite hot. Put in the dry tea leaves, and replace the pot, closely covered, near the fire for five minutes. Have the tea-urn full of boiling water. Fill the tea-pot from the urn, and stand on the table three minutes before pouring out.

BOILED MACKEREL (a Maine recipe).—Wash the salt from a large mackerel, cut off the points of the head and tail, and sprinkle on a little black pepper, and a small onion chopped very fine. Cover the fish with cold water, and put over a clear fire. Boil till the bones are loose from the flesh. When done, put the fish on a flat dish, cover with small pieces of butter and sprigs of paraley, or, if preferred, pour over it a good drawn butter.

STEWED POTATOES.—Peel and slice the potatoes. Put the slices in a sauce-pan, cover with boiling water, and boil till tender. Pour off the water. Roll a large piece of butter in flour, and beat it in half a pint of hot milk till smooth. Season with pepper and salt, and boil. When boiling, put in the potatoes, stew together for five minutes, and serve very hot.

GRAHAM BREAD.—To two pounds of Graham flour allow a pint of milk, a pint of water, a wine-glassful of molasses, a tea-spoonful of salt, half a tea-spoonful of soda, and two table-spoonfuls of strong yeast. Beat the yeast, molasses, soda, and salt in lukewarm milk and water. Stir in the flour until too stiff to use a spoon. Knead with the hands till the remainder of the flour is mixed in. Form into loaves, and bake in well-buttered pans.

AUNTIE'S CAKES (a Mississippi recipe).—To one quart of sweet milk allow four eggs, butter the size of an egg, three table-spoonfuls of yeast, a tea-spoonful of salt, and flour enough to form a thin batter. Warm the milk and butter together till they are mixed, and let them cool. Beat the eggs till light, add to the milk and butter, and stir in the flour to a thin batter. Add the other ingredients, the yeast last, and stand to rise for three hours. Bake on a well-buttered griddle, and as each cake is taken off put on it a piece of butter and a sprinkling of powdered sugar and cinnamon.

DINNER.

Mutton Broth, Boiled Halibut, Boiled Corned Beef, Cabbage, Parsnips, Stewed Oysters, Celery Sauce, Pickled Cucumbers, Boiled Batter Pudding.

MUTTON BROTH.—Remove all the fat from a fresh neck of mutton, put it in three quarts of water, with a bunch of sweet herbs, two onions, and three turnips peeled and sliced. As the scum rises skim it off, and pour in half a pint of cold water to check the boiling. Simmer for two hours, strain, season with salt and pepper, and serve with a little chopped parsley sprinkled in the tureen. If preferred, a little rice or barley may be boiled in the broth after it is strained.

BOILED HALIBUT.—Place the piece of halibut in your fish-pot upon the strainer, or if you have not a strainer cover the bottom of the pot with a dish, upon which place a towel, so arranged that you can lift it out by the corners, and upon this lay your fish. Rub it over with some coarse salt. Cover it with cold water. Put it upon the fire, and when it begins to boil set it back where it will simmer slowly until done.

SAUCE FOR HALIBUT.—Put half a pint of milk in a sauce-pan; beat one egg till light, stir it in the milk, and set it over the fire until it thickens, stirring all the time. Add a large piece of butter, beating all well together, and season with pepper, salt, and a little chopped parsley, or a hard-boiled egg chopped fine.

BOILED CORNED BEEF (à la Soyer).—Put in the pot a piece weighing six pounds; add four quarts of cold water; boil very gently for three hours. One hour before serving wash clean, and cut away the roots of two cabbages, which cut up in four pieces, and put in the pot with the meat. When done, drain the cabbage, and place round the beef on the dish, and serve. Leave the broth or liquor from the meat on the fire, put in two pounds of split pease, a little pepper and brown sugar; boil slowly till done, and put by, uncovered, for next day, to use with the cold meat. If more salt or pepper is required, add it; if, on the contrary, it should be too salt, add more water, and a pound of potatoes. Or skim-milk may be added, and about one pound of toasted bread, cut into slices, and put in the soup when serving; or half a pound of flour mixed with a pint of water. Every part of salted beef may be boiled thus, using about four ounces of vegetables to every pound of meat, instead of cabbage. Turnip tops, carrots, turnips, parsnips—any root vegetables, in fact, may be used. Suet dumplings may also be served with it.

STEWED OYSTERS.—Strain the liquor carefully from the oysters into a sauce-pan. Dip each oyster, separately into clear, very cold water, and put again into the liquor. Let them come to a boil, and take them off before actually boiling. Strain off the liquor, add half a pint of rich, sweet milk, and set back on the fire. Mix an ounce each of flour and butter smoothly in a dish; stir this into the liquor and milk (if it should have any lumps, strain it), add pepper, salt, and a few blades of mace. Let it boil up once, add the oysters, and simmer for five minutes, not allowing it to boil after the oysters are added.

CABBAGE.—Prepared with the beef, as given in the recipe for boiled corned beef.

BOILED PARSNIPS.—Wash and scrape the parsnips, and throw them in boiling water. When tender, split each one in half, and serve with butter, pepper, and salt.

CELERY SAUCE.—Wash four stalks of celery, and cut in inch pieces. Boil these till tender, and pour into a colander to drain. Return the water to the sauce-pan, and thicken with an ounce of butter rolled in flour; add white pepper and salt, and boil all together. Pour in a wine-glassful of cream, and a few blades of mace; put the celery back, boil up once, and serve.

PICKLED CUCUMBERS.—Cut six large, ripe cucumbers into thick slices, cover them with salt, and let them stand twenty-four hours. Drain for six hours; cover with boiling vinegar, and soak for three hours. Drain off the vinegar, add to it one ounce of whole pepper, and one of mixed allspice and cloves. Boil these together, pour over the cucumbers in jars, cover tightly, and stand aside for three days before using.

BOILED BATTER PUDDING.—To one pound of flour allow one pint of sweet milk, one ounce of butter, and six eggs. Beat the flour and milk together till smooth. Beat the eggs till light, and add to the flour and milk. Stir all well together, adding the butter in tiny lumps. Pour into a well-floured bag, tie up, and put in boiling water. Boil one hour. The best sauce for a boiled batter pudding is made of fine white sugar and butter beaten to a cream, and flavored with lemon-juice, nutmeg, or rose-water, as preferred.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

IF a stranger to American customs—an intelligent Japanese, for example—were invited to watch the proceedings of that honorable body who figure on the floor of the House of Representatives at Washington from an eligible seat in the galleries, we fancy his prominent feeling would be amazement. "Can good laws come out of such tumultuous confusion?" would be his involuntary query. Enter, and look down with the eye of an outsider. A handsomely carpeted and furnished hall, containing desks and seats for about two hundred and fifty persons. Some members are sitting; some are standing and walking about; some are addressing the Speaker; more are chatting among themselves. A confusing din continually arises, amidst which one often strives in vain to catch any idea of the topic under discussion; while mingling with it, yet distinct, is heard the frequent sharp snapping of fingers, or clapping of hands—which is a summons to the agile little pages—and the decisive gavel of the Speaker demanding order. Order, however, does not appear, excepting to the limited extent of preventing one member from unduly interrupting another while speaking. There is no apparent attempt to listen to a speaker; occasionally one bears the aspect of attention, but the majority seem to give little heed. Involuntarily one is reminded of a great school of boys, who are allowed to take their recess within doors on a rainy day. Viewed in this aspect the school may be said to behave creditably; though, as teacher, we should warmly protest against spitting on the carpet, when every brace of desks is provided with a spittoon, and should give a black mark to every boy who persisted in tearing all his waste paper into minute fragments and scattering it ad libitum upon the floor, and request some of the noisier ones to sit down and resume their lessons. Penetrating through the roaring din comes the stentorian voice of the Clerk. Bless us! what a pair of lungs he possesses! And when his are worn out, does America contain such another pair? Meditating upon this problem, we retire from the House, and calm any confusion of brain which has arisen by a glimpse at the Senators. Graver, more deliberate, and quieter, there is an aspect of genuine business of a serious nature among them. They appear to give attention to what is being done; no wild confusion exists; really there seems to be a chance for something to be accomplished intelligently and considerately in the Senate. If one desires to have confidence in the legislation of the country, a visit to the Senate may satisfy him; if he wants to be amused, let him go to the House.

"The Berners"—so named from the street on which it is located—is a London ladies' club. The object of it is to afford to ladies with small incomes a comfortable house, which shall be really a home as to society and accommodations. There are now three hundred and fifty members. The board provided is unexceptionable—and a coffee-room, a drawing, and a reading room with plenty of books are provided.

During 1870 no less than 5661 diamonds, valued at £124,910, have been shipped from South Africa. This number does not include the "Star of South Africa" and some others sent by private means to Europe. Many of these Cape diamonds are of an inferior description.

Rhode Island is a smart little State, being the only one in the Union which has as yet responded to a request of Congress that all the States should send to the Capitol statues of their most distinguished citizens. The statues of Roger Williams and General Breen have been contributed by Rhode Island.

One of the four young women who recently graduated from the New England Medical College is shortly to go as missionary physician to Constantinople under the auspices of the American Board.

An attorney-at-law residing in Breslau, Prussia, and bearing the name of Neidorstetter, found himself puzzled by a question of law, and wrote to Judge Barnard, of the Supreme Court, for his opinion in the matter. The point at issue was respecting the legality of a marriage which took place in 1864, in the city of Erfurt, between an American Christian and a Hungarian Jewess, the ceremony having been performed by a rabbi officiating out of his own diocese. Such a marriage is null and void in Prussia; but Neidorstetter desired to know the American law upon the case. Judge Barnard referred the matter to Judge Joachimsen, of the Marine Court, who replied that in this State such a marriage would be considered valid, marriage being regarded purely as a civil contract in New York.

At the time of the great exhibition at Paris, in 1851, a large collection of French wheats was sent to it by order of the National Assembly. After the close of the exhibition these samples were stored in the galleries of the Conservatoire des Arts et Métiers. During the latter portion of the siege the directors of the museum, and the sick and wounded for whom beds had been prepared in the building, have lived upon bread made from these samples.

A singular case recently revealed the strait to which France was reduced in order to supply men to defend the country. A deaf and dumb couple from France begged assistance at Aarau, on their journey to Zurich. It was ascertained that the husband was, a few weeks ago, in a corps of francs-tireurs, consisting of four hundred deaf and dumb volunteers, commanded by an officer in the enjoyment of all his senses. He had received a ball in the left leg, and fell into the hands of the Germans, by whom he was healed and then released. When he returned home he found every thing in ruins, and accordingly he resolved to take his wife with him and go to Switzerland.

A Massachusetts court recently decided that while every householder had a right to collect rain or snow on his roof if he chose, the roof must be so constructed as not to endanger the persons or property of other citizens. By this decision a lady who had been injured by a snow-slide from the roof of a house she was passing received damages therefor. Accidents of this kind are not uncommon.

It is stated that the French artist Regnault was so disfigured by the wounds which caused his death that those who first found him were not sure of his identity, and, unable to carry away the body, they cut off the number on his coat and took it to his family, who recognized it as his. When the search was renewed the body could nowhere be found, although the Prussians gave their aid. In the public funeral another corpse was substituted for that of the great painter.

The theatres in Paris are preparing to reopen. The scenery has been saved, although there was an erroneous report that most of it was burned.

Henry Ward Beecher once hearing one of his own published sermons delivered in an obscure village, accosted the preacher on his way out, and said, "That was a very good discourse; how long did it take you to write it?" "Oh, I tossed it off one evening, when I had leisure," was the reply. "Indeed!" said Mr. Beecher; "it took me longer than that to think out the very frame-work of that very sermon." "Are you Henry Ward Beecher?" exclaimed the clergyman. "I am," was the reply. "Well, then," said the unabashed preacher, "all that I have to say is, that I ain't ashamed to preach one of your sermons any where!"

If one sets his heart on becoming wealthy it is pretty evident that he will do better as a railroad contractor than as a "literary gentleman." In proof whereof may be cited two wills that have recently been admitted to probate in London. One was the will of Mr. Brassey, a famous railway contractor, whose personalty alone, exclusive of his vast landed estates, amounted to six and a half millions. The other will was that of Mr. Mark Lemon, late editor of Punch, who left behind him only the sum of £800.

A pitiful story is told of a young man, scarcely seventeen, a student at Avignon, who was found not far from Montbéliard, in a house with eight dead Frenchmen, whose bodies were in an advanced state of decomposition. A Prussian grenade had torn his two legs below the knees. He had remained in this state seven whole days without being attended to, without water, and entangled among all those corpses. He had wrapped up his wounds in the rags of his uniform, and the cold had stopped the hemorrhage; he had crawled up to his companions, and taken bits of biscuit out of their pockets, which sufficed for his subsistence, and slaked his burning thirst by drinking the great flakes of snow which fell in at the window. He had lived thus a week. The unhappy man has been taken to Switzerland, and the doctor thinks he will live.

A singular but touching incident was witnessed a short time ago on the Missouri River, near Leavenworth. Out in the middle of the river, floating down stream on a cake of ice, stood a large white Newfoundland dog. Firmly braced on his frail, dissolving bark, he remained motionless, though warned of danger by his strong instinct, his bright brass collar glittering in the sun. On he drifted, with heroic dignity, leaving those who watched him uncertain whether he swam safely to shore, or sank beneath the waters.

A singular instance of lead-poisoning is related by an Iowa newspaper. A gentleman of Davenport had been in the habit of carrying a whalebone cane with a covered lead head. Some weeks since the cover wore off, and the use of the cane was still continued. Not long after the gentleman discovered that his arm was becoming partially paralyzed. The difficulty increased; but at length an article on lead-poisoning attracted his attention, and he began to think that possibly his own ailment was the result of the contact of the lead-headed cane and his hand. He discontinued its use, and his arm immediately began to recover its accustomed vigor.

A Woman's Christian Association is about to be incorporated at Scranton, Pennsylvania. A lot of land and five hundred dollars have also been donated in the same place for the purpose of establishing a Home for Friendless Women. The Home of the Woman's Christian Association in Cincinnati is especially intended as a boarding-house for young women whose wages are under six dollars a week, and who desire pleasant and salutary associations. Over one hundred have been admitted during the present year. The price of board is $3 50 a week, and those not able to pay this amount receive assistance.

Most truthfully has it been remarked that one may recollect that certain thoughts or facts are to be found in a certain book; but, without a good index, such a recollection may hardly be more available than that of the cabin-boy, who knew where the ship's tea-kettle was, because he saw it fall overboard.

An exchange remarks that many a congregation sings

"My drowsy powers, why sleep ye so?"

when the potent and sufficient answer to a newcomer is, "Foul air!" No exhortation could so much arouse spiritual vigor as proper ventilation in churches and chapels.

Digitized by Google

FORGET-ME-NOT.

FORGET-ME-NOT.

A SMALL blue flower has fallen from thine hair;
Thou hast no care,
Clérice, to raise it, lying where it fell;
Still thy sweet smile
A little while
Sorrow may shadow, if its tale I tell.

Its tale—an old wife's tale, which yet may fill,
Against thy will,
With tears thine eyes, and change to white thy red;
But wouldst thou jeer,
These can not hear—
No ridicule can reach the happy dead.

They long ago sat by the fabled Rhine,
Lovers: like thine
The lady's eyes, and deeply musing she,
Till on the tide
By chance they spied
A little blue flower floating out to sea.

"Oh, little flower, thou makest my heart to rue;
Thy disk of blue
What reckless hand to these wild waters gave?
To know no more
Thine own still shore,
Lost, lost forever on the weltering wave!"

Already, ere her honeyed words had end—
Words which could bend
Him, whom love made as heated steel which bends—
He for that prize,
Before her eyes,
Against those waters wild, too wild contends.

Swift flows the flower, he follows swifter still;
And follows till
He grasps it: but, alas! returns no more.
He seeks in vain
Her hand to gain,
Who prays for his vexed life on that lone shore—

Prays voiceless, fixed, and still as breathing stone,
With hair back thrown.
Yet ere the dark waves o'er his dear head meet,
On that fell strand,
Cast from his hand,
The little weeping flower falls at her feet.

And ere the dark waves closed, his last voice cried,
"My love is tried;
Forget me not, my—" and then came the end.
Ah, little flower!
That fated hour
Must sadness ever with thy beauty blend.

Strange, empty horror held the silent air;
Still stood she there,
Till dew-sprent Hesper buried in heaven the day:
Beyond all tears,
All words, all years,
She knew her grief remediless for aye.

And ofttimes, "Of my idle dreams," she cried,
"Dreamt by thy side,
No part is left me any, any where—
No kiss of thine,
No fireside shine,
No sound of pattering feet upon the stair."

So, never light of morn made light her woe,
Nor crescent bow,
Nor perfect round of night relieved her pain:
So, till she fell,
As in some dell
Falls, where none hears, a leaf tired out with rain.

The flower lay on her bosom when she died;
And there beside
The Rhine, where buds of early roses bloom,
And maidens weep,
In dreamless sleep
Lie those lost lovers, in one common tomb.

Ay me! I tell a tale of long ago.
No stone can show
Now where those lovers rest; no rose is there;
The Rhine alone,
With changeless moan,
Mourns them to Echo, listening child of air.

COMMON UGLINESS.

HOW strange that, while our internal mechanism and organization are so perfect, perfect symmetry in the outer man should be so rare! that there should be so many plain people in the world! Such is the not unreasonable lament of a refined taste, looking abroad for the gratification of its love for beauty and fair proportion, and finding such rare and scanty indulgence of the heaven-born longing. It is a truth that most of the people we meet in the streets and highways are plain. We have a different standard for our home friends, for relations and intimates, but out-of-doors it is an exception to meet a comely, nobly formed, handsome man or woman. It is a surprise when we do meet with such. So unusual, indeed, is it to meet with perfect, or any thing approaching to perfect symmetry, that one of the attendants on beauty is surprise. We gaze upon something rare, unaccustomed, startling from its singularity. This reflection has been put by the acutest of our female novelists into the mouth of a vain, "well-looking" man, who cynically complains of a watering-place for the multitude of its plain women. If by chance you see a pretty woman (let us explain that this was written half a century ago), she is sure to be followed by thirty or thirty-five frights; and once, though to be sure it was on a frosty day, he had counted eighty-seven in succession without a tolerable face among them. And with the men it was even worse, so that a decent-looking man excited quite an embarrassing sensation. The universality of this fact, stated broadly, is fortunate for those among us who can not boast of any thing typical or godlike in face or form. There are enough plain people—ordinary, some persons call it, to show how universal is the doom—to keep us in countenance. It would be dreadful to be the only ugly fellow in the world. But, even as it is, it can not but be annoying to men—and especially to women—whose place or works or deeds give them prominence, not to be better worth looking at; to be so little good-looking as, sooth to say, they often are. "What do you think when so many people come to see you?" Miss Bremer was asked by her American adorers. "I wish that I was handsomer," was her reply. "When all things are blossoming," writes a woman of showy, conspicuous genius, "it seems strange not to blossom too; man is the slowest aloe, and I am such a shabby plant, of such coarse tissue. I hate not be beautiful when all around is so." Who can tell how much Goldsmith's ugliness, which made him a butt in childhood, was at the bottom of the restless, unsatisfied vanity of which so much is written? With men, however, the consciousness of ugliness has constantly acted as an intellectual stimulus. Because Richard III. was rudely stamped, wanting love's majesty, he shaped out a great, unscrupulous career for himself; and Mirabeau and Wilkes might perhaps not have made so public a figure if they had been less conspicuously ill-favored. But the draught was probably bitter all the same. The most successful jester on his own ill looks finds the fun very flat in his solitary hours, but consciousness makes him restless; and where it is hopeless to pass unnoticed, his best expedient is to be pleasant upon himself. By a well-turned bon mot he may persuade the world to view his ugliness from his own indulgent stand-point.

BROTHERS-AT-ARMS.

TRAMP, tramp! went the black steed,
Caracole! went the gray,
As the twain rode forth from the old town,
Bound for the wild foray;
While a third knight in dark armor dight
O'ertook them on their way.

He that bestrode the gray steed
Was gallant, gay, and fair;
While he that rode the black steed
Was bent and bowed with care;
But the stranger on his pale white steed
Was old and wan and spare.

Cried Lancelot on the gray steed,
"Whence comest thou, stranger, say?"
Quoth Anselm on the black steed,
"Wilt join us on our way?"
"I follow," muttered the strange knight,
"All men by night and day."

"All rusted is thine armor old,
And dinted deep thy shield—
Say, comrade, knowest thou battle's clang?
Hast foughten in the field?"
"Yea, ever since the world began:
All men to me must yield."

Much marveling at his answer stern,
They gaze on him, the twain,
Saying, "Now we be lances free
Of royal Charlemagne;
Full oft in fight we guard his right
To sunny Allemagne.

"And forth we ride, in this fair spring-tide,
His name and fame to ring.
Who is thy liege? whom dost thou serve?"
Thus they rode questioning.
"A greater Lord I serve than ye:
My Lord's King of thy king."

"How say'st thou? King above our king!
Caitiff, we say thee nay!
There is none mightier than our king;
No tribute doth he pay!"
"Yea, but he doth: e'en with his life,
When my Lord gives the say."

Pondering in silence, on they rode Toward the setting sun;
The birds are mute, the flowerets fade,
The leaves drop one by one;
The twilight closes chill and pale,
The day is nearly done.

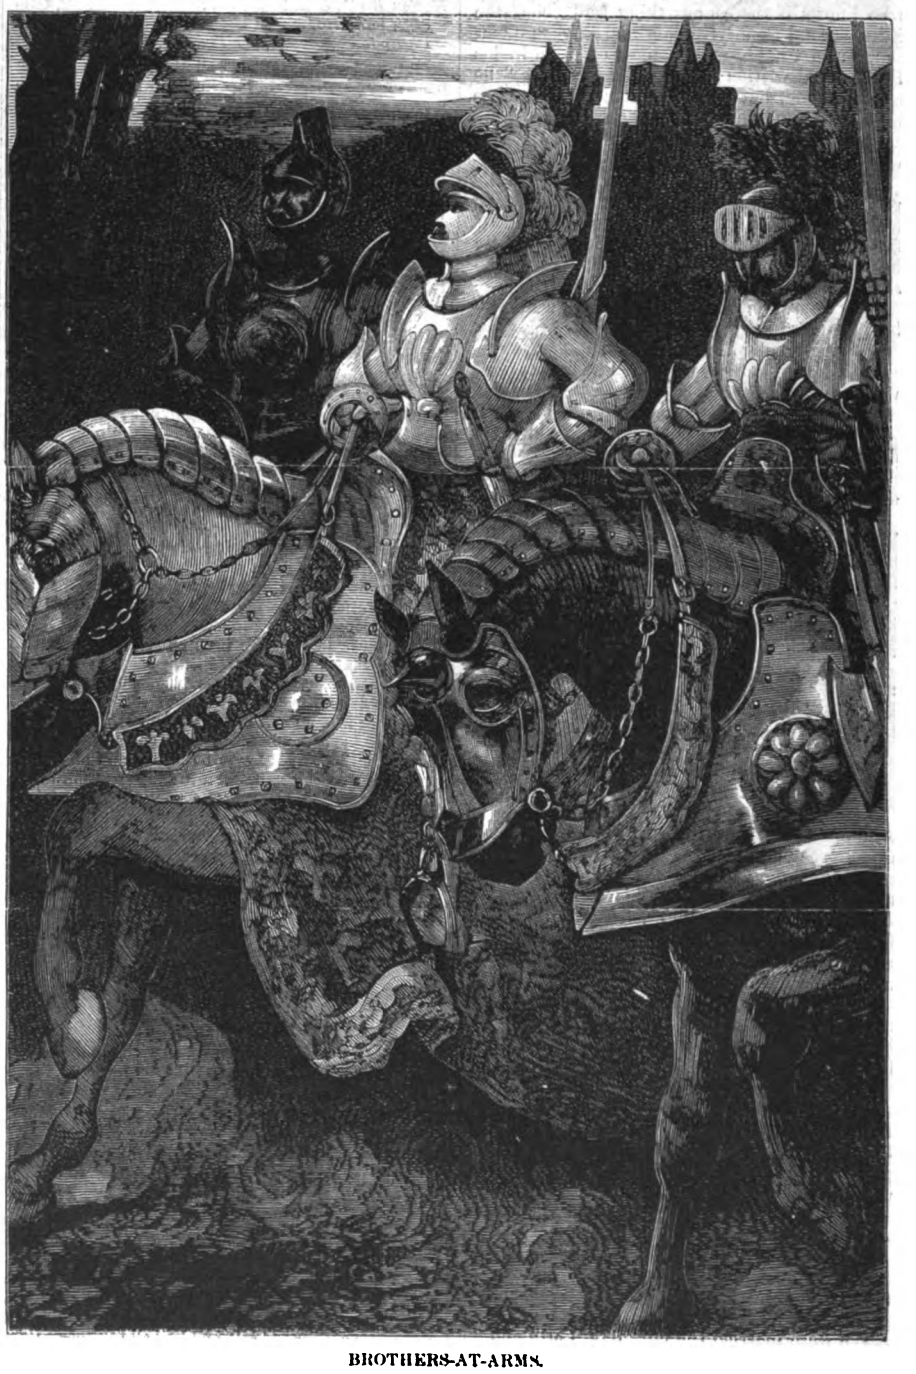
Said Lancelot on the gray steed,
"To-morrow I shall wed!"
Sighed Anselm on the black steed,
"My love lies with the dead."
Quoth the stranger on the pale white steed,
"Her soul to heaven hath sped."

Mourned Anselm to the stranger,
"Would I were by her side!"
"Wait but a while," said the dark knight,
"And naught shall ye divide.
But thou"—he turn'd to Lancelot—
"Shalt clasp a widowed bride!"

"A widowed bride!" cried Lancelot;
"Nay, she's loved none save me.
Whoe'er thou art, I'll stake my life
Upon her purity!
Guard thyself, traitor! Thou shalt die
For this foul calumny!"

He laid his spear upon its rest,
And with a mighty shock
Thundered against the stranger knight,
Who sat firm as a rock;
But seemed meanwhile, with ashen smile,
His youthful foe to mock.

They met: the spear in splinters flew.
With skeleton fingers gray
The stranger touched Sir Lancelot,
Who dropped dead on his way.
The victor Death on the Pale Horse
Through the twilight rode away.



BROTHERS-AT-ARMS.

Digitized by Google

APRIL SHOWERS.

THIS pretty engraving tells its own tale in the most graphic manner. The weather here is evidently as variable within as without. The handsome couple before us have been indulging in one of those lovers' quarrels which are reputed so common, and have taken up a dos-à-dos position—the one to study the coals, and the other to gaze out of the window at the passing crowd taking refuge under awnings and umbrellas from the sudden shower. But the barometer already indicates a change. The gentleman is furtively glancing over his shoulder at his fair companion to see whether he can venture on overtures of peace, and should he meet her eye, will probably find there all the encouragement he desires. Both are heartily sick of the quarrel, and it is safe to predict that by the time the clouds pass away from the sky a serener atmosphere will prevail at the fireside, and a reconciliation will be established by those who seem to have disagreed only for the pleasure of making friends.

APRIL SHOWERS.—[Drawn by W. B. Myers.]

TRICKS OF COUNTENANCE.

HOW much of the depressing ugliness of the world is of man's own making, and need not be if people did not fall into tricks and bad habits of feature and countenance! We are not going deep; we are not entering into the question how far the principle of selection might improve the aspect of humanity; how high thought might elevate, the practice of virtue beautify, immunity from poverty and vulgar cares ennoble the race. What we note here is the universality of tricks and bad habits of countenance which need not have a worse source than neglect of appearances, inducing an aggregate of uncomeliness for which nature is not accountable. In keen wind and frost people can not command their best looks; but observe one face after another as we drive along the road on a summer's day. How many faces are twisted into a permanence of ill looks merely by screwing up the eyes against the sun's rays! The poor tramp can not help the tan, nor the sunburnt hair, nor the freckles, but the utter abandonment to the screw—nose, mouth, forehead, all gathered into an unnatural coalition for miles at a time—implies an absence of self-respect: and this he could help. It is the instinct of the observer to call himself to account on meeting one of these masks—to compose his features lest he should have given way to the degrading yet natural temptation. Again, that too common downward look and heavy mouth is a trick. One would not like to pass the scowling laborer in an unfrequented lane; but the fellow is honest and hard-working, the scowl is but a trick acquired behind his wheelbarrow. So is the grin which confers such a peculiar turpitude on many a countenance, for which heart and brain are by no means answerable. And the women of the poorer class in streets and railway stations! What blinking eyes, what lowering brows, what abandonment of the mouth, till it has grown to twice the size civilization would have kept it. What seams and wrinkles and crinkles; what misplaced angles and corners! If some invisible hand could smooth them all away, and show us only the natural wear and tear of time, what a transformation!

But, after all, active tricks belong rather to another and a higher class. There is the simper, which, though sometimes indicative of mental qualities, may be only a habit of the muscles; the grimaces of preoccupation; the unmeaning elevation of eyebrows carrying the ears along with them, which strangely varies the repose of some physiognomies: the stare of absent eyes, the scowl of near-sightedness, the winks and twitches of restlessness, all indicating a certain carelessness, an indifference of what others think of us, which results in an injustice to nature. It is only in some occult way that they are characteristics; they need not be, and the man would have been handsomer without them. And how many tricks disfigure the laugh! "You shall see him laugh till his face be like a wet cloak ill laid up," says Falstaff of Prince Hal—a self-abandonment which he acquired in company where self-restraint of any sort was least in his thoughts. And all tricks are objectionable, not only because they spoil a good face, and exaggerate the worst points on a bad one, but because in their degree they outrage propriety. De Quincey, who expatiates on the meanness of Dr. Parr's personal appearance and his coarse and ignoble features, is careful to explain, first, that "I that write this paper have myself a mean personal appearance," and next, that "I love men of mean appearance;" but he remarks how this original unkindness of nature "is enhanced by grimace, and further by the basilisk function of the eye," illustrating this by the trial it was to a nervous preacher to see a comical-looking old man from below leveling one eye at him. Tricks arise either from absence, shyness, or a sense of superiority and indifference to the opinion of the vulgar. Biography is full of the absurd personal habits of great men thus lifted out of the sphere of honest remonstrance. We have just read in "Wickham's Correspondence" of Suwarrow, who looked a man when engaged in business, but while entertaining company would walk about the room with bent knees and head, and hands hanging down like an idiot. Miss Seward, the biographer of Dr. Darwin, reports a habit in her hero which recalls that of the brutal Duke of Lauderdale who figures in the torture scene of "Old Mortality." We give it in her own would-be Johnsonian periods: "A strange habit was imputed to Dr. Darwin, which presents such an exterior of idiot-seeming indelicacy that the author of this tract is tempted to express here entire disbelief of its truth—namely, that his tongue was generally hanging out of his mouth when he walked alone. She has often of late years met him in the streets of Lichfield, alone and musing, and never witnessed a custom so indecent." Certainly the "hard features on a rough surface and general clumsiness" attributed to the poet of the Botanical Garden did not need this aggravation. As a fact, the tricks we speak of are recorded mostly of persons who have no beauty to spare. Thus Margaret Fuller is described as of extreme plainness, and with a trick of incessantly opening and shutting her eyelids. No doubt the consciousness of good looks, the memory of the image reflected in the morning mirror, is a preservative against distortion and grimace; while plain folks may throw themselves upon expression, and trust, as is often the case, that their glass does them less than justice, and that play of feature atones for ruggedness, clumsiness, or poverty of outline. But also the working of thought does in some people involve a visible effort and displacement of feature from mere innocent intentness. Especially where the mind guides the hand we may almost see pulleys at work, as in Sam Weller writing his letter. Clinched teeth, lips drawn into a line, receding chin, all betoken a fixed determination to compass the matter in hand. The features in ungainly pantomime picture forth the inner struggle, till we learn to undervalue a result bought at such cost and pains, and to justify the seeming unfairness which prefers "felicities" to the achievements of industry, "for they seem gifts, while the other seem pennyworths," and often dear at the money.

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

A CONSTANT READER.—It is the height of rudeness to carry on a conversation in an under-tone, or under cover of fictitious names, at the table, and none but under-bred persons would dream of doing such a thing. It is equally rude to seem to comment in any way on the food in the presence of the hostess, whether you are her guest or boarder. Many people who pride themselves on their good-breeding seem to think themselves at liberty to become genuine boors the moment they enter a boarding-house.

QUERO.—If a lady friend enters a car when you are seated, it would be presumption in you to pay her fare.—We can not tell you of any cosmetic that will certainly remove freckles.

GRATIA.—The stitches of which you speak have been repeatedly described in the Bazar.

J. S. F.—We have been unable to obtain the information you desire.

J. P. R.—We can not tell you how to obtain a photograph of Gail Hamilton. We asked her for one once ourselves, and received the characteristic answer, "Photographs, thank Heaven, have I none." Perhaps you might be more successful.

MANSION.—The President's mansion is called the White House, we presume, because it is such. There is no need to go far to seek for a reason. And "cheap" as the name may be, it is very expressive and of world-wide renown.

LATE.—The Bazar is electrotyped, and back Numbers can be supplied from the beginning. The first Number of the Bazar bears date November 4, 1868.

H. E. C.—In preparing MSS. for the press write on one side of the paper in a clear, legible hand, page, punctuate, and mark the paragraphs carefully, and never roll them up. It is just as easy to send flat as rolled packages through the mail; and closely rolled MSS. are read with such difficulty that the attention is apt to be about equally divided between the struggle to keep the paper open and to comprehend the subject. Write your address in full at the head of your article, send it, when ready, to the paper for which you design it, with the fewest possible words, and trust to its merit to win it favor with both editor and public.

SARAH.—Under the circumstances, you can do nothing but to wait for the gentleman to define his position, whether friend or lover. But a man acts basely in bestowing lover-like attentions on a young girl for years, lavishing gifts on her, escorting her every where, and giving her every reason to think that he loves her, yet all the while leaving her in the dark as to his real intentions. In Europe her friends would call him to account; but here, where young people take these matters in their own hands, it is more difficult to prevent such wrecking of young girls' happiness.

A CONSTANT READER.—Demosthenes cured himself of stammering by declaiming with pebbles in his mouth. The process is cheap and easy. Why not try it, since you can not afford to pay a physician's fees?—Embroidered yokes and stocking supporters can be purchased at fancy stores. The prices vary according to the quality.

MARY V. S.—The length of the acquaintance matters little in inviting a gentleman to become your escort to a wedding, provided your friends are willing to intrust you to his charge. It is quite proper for you to send a carriage for the gentleman thus invited. It is not necessary that your escort should be acquainted with the parties sending the invitation, unless some special circumstance demands exclusiveness.

KATIE L.—Sorry that we can not help you to solve your puzzle.

A. C. P.—Thanks for your appreciative letter.—Your method of stitching the back of the Bazar on the sewing-machine, and then cutting the leaves, is an excellent one, and may interest our readers.—We are sorry you are unable to renew your subscriptions to all our periodicals, and would gladly send them to you without charge, only it would never do to show such partiality; and you can readily see that if we made the practice universal, we might some day have no periodicals to send.

MRS. H.—You had better consult some good physician with respect to the best hospital in which to place your brother. We can not undertake the responsibility of such advice, which belongs to the medical profession.

MOUNT VERNON.—We have given full information with respect to the scouring of floor coverings.—We should think that no one in his right mind could dispute the acidity of lemons and vinegar, or affirm that of freshly made coffee; but tastes differ; or perhaps your friend was under some strange psychological influence, which sweetened the lemons and soured the coffee according to the will of the magnetizer.

SCHOOL-GIRL.—Read Dr. Dio Lewis's new book, "Our Girls," for the best cosmetics nature affords. We think it decidedly indecorous for a young girl to dance a fast polka, or be "fast" in any way in such a manner as to cause remarks. And since you wait for our advice before venturing on such a course, we most earnestly counsel you to sobriety of deportment.

WM. H. H.—Boccaccio is the name of an author, and not merely of a series of tales. The "Blotting Papers" bear the name of Gail Hamilton as author, beyond which we are not at liberty to give any information respecting her personality.

ELISE D.—There are several good manuals of phonography, but we can not recommend one system above another. It would be difficult, though not impossible, for you to acquire the art of reporting without a teacher.

COUNTRY READER.—We have published several articles on the care of the hair, and have nothing to add to the information already given. As to nostrums, we can only advise you to let them alone. If your hair is whitening, nothing will be certain to arrest it, while the use of hair-dyes will only blanch it more rapidly. Let it alone; nothing is more stylish than silvered hair with a youthful complexion, the brilliancy of which it sets off admirably.

H. L. S.—"Smith's Classical Dictionary" contains numerous illustrations of antique costumes.

D. S.—It is customary to line the thin silks throughout.

CARRIE.—The over-skirt of the pattern sent you is the mode! for spring. Make your plaid black and white silk suit with two skirts and a paletot trimmed with velvet ribbon and narrow lace.

KAPPA PHI.—The refreshments you mention are suitable for a small party.—$3 a yard will buy white silk like your sample. Your ideas of an outfit for a bride are tasteful and good.

MINNIE LEE.—The white Swiss dress would be far prettiest for a bride-maid. White kid gloves; sash ribbons the color of the flowers worn. It is not necessary to wear a different dress at every reception; one will do for all the bridal parties.

NICOL & DAVIDSON,

686 Broadway, successors to E. V. Haughwout & Co., offer at great BARGAINS their spring stock (now opening) of 800 packages of FRENCH CHINA, GLASSWARE, and ENGLISH STONE CHINA.

Complete English Dinner Sets, $20; French China Dinner Sets, $32; Decorated Dinner Sets, $50; Tea Sets, $13; Breakfast Sets, 43 pieces, $12; Decorated Toilet Sets, $5 50; White Toilet Sets, $2 50 and $1 50; Goblets, $1 50 per dozen.

Sets made to order with crests, arms, monograms, or initials.

Goods delivered free in the city or suburbs.—[Com.]

LADIES LIKE IT. Every reader of the Bazar may have a Half-Yearly Volume of the first-class $3 PHRENOLOGICAL JOURNAL on TRIAL for $1. Sample numbers sent FREE, by S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.—[Com.]

TAKE AYER'S SARSAPARILLA to purify the blood and purge out the humors, pimples, boils, and sores which are merely emblems of the rottenness within.—[Com.]

To increase and thicken the growth of the hair, use Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer. Nothing better known to science.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., OR CHICAGO, ILL.

"NILSSON ELASTIC."

The most beautiful, elegant, and comfortable Garter ever worn—combining healthfulness and economy with durability and elegance of design. Patented Aug. 16, 1870. Large profits for Agents. Sample pairs (silver plated) sent, prepaid, on receipt of 30 cts. Address all orders to the HELIX WIRE CO., Bridgeport, Conn.

KID GLOVES CLEANED, and returned in a few minutes, at the KID GLOVE DYE WORKS, 892 Bowery, N. Y. Country orders solicited.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

A HANDSOME STOCK

of

LADIES' LEGHORN, CHIP, AND STRAW HATS, BONNETS, &c.,

Trimmed and Untrimmed.

FRENCH FLOWERS, FEATHERS, and a

GENERAL ASSORTMENT

of

MILLINERY ARTICLES.

THE LATEST IMPORTATION.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

NEW FRENCH AND ENGLISH

DRESS GOODS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have just received a fine stock of

New Designs in POPLINS and SERGES, FRENCH SUITINGS (with Fringes and Satin Stripes for Trimmings).

SILK AND WOOL SERGES, CREPE DE CHINE, POPLINS, and VELOURS, in all the new colorings.

BALERMO POPLINS, JAPANESE SERGES AND FOULARDS, a new material, in all colors.

BATTISTE ROBES—the Latest Novelty.

Cambrics, Piques, French, English, and Domestic Prints, &c., &c.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

CARPETS.

Fresh Importations of the following goods just received:

FRENCH AND ENGLISH AXMINSTERS.
FRENCH MOQUETTES.
ENGLISH ROYAL WILTONS.
Do. BODY BRUSSELS.
Do. TAPESTRY AND VELVETS.
Do. KIDDERMINSTER INGRAINS.
Do. FLOOR OILCLOTHS, &c., &c.
AMERICAN THREE-PLYS and INGRAINS.
In the Newest Patterns,
WHOLESALE AND RETAIL,
At the LOWEST MARKET PRICES.

Also,

UPHOLSTERY GOODS, of every description.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO., Broadway, corner Nineteenth St.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle

SEWING MACHINES!

$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

HUNTING, Trapping, and Fishing. All about it. SENT FREE. Address "HUNTER," Hinsdale, N. H.

RARE AND BEAUTIFUL FLOWERS AND CHOICE VEGETABLES

CAN ALWAYS BE GROWN BY SOWING

The Seventeenth Annual Edition of their Seed Catalogue and Amateur's Guide to the Flower and Kitchen Garden is now ready for distribution, and will be mailed to all applicants upon receipt of 25 cents; an edition beautifully bound in cloth, 50 cents.

This is without exception the largest and best Catalogue ever published in this or any other country. It contains 192 pages—56 of which are finely executed engravings, including four beautifully colored lithographs of favorite Flowers and Vegetables, and 136 pages of closely printed matter, giving a descriptive list of upward of 2500 species and varieties of including all the novelties of the past season, with directions for their culture; also, a list of upward of One Hundred Varieties of Choice Gladiolus, with many other Summer-Flowering Bulbs, and much useful information upon the subject of gardening generally. Also, a Descriptive Price-List of Small Fruits, embracing all the leading varieties of Strawberries, Raspberries, Currants, Grapes, &c.

Flower and Vegetable Seeds,

Address

B. K. BLISS & SONS,
23 Park Place and 20 Murray Street,
(P. O. Box 5712), NEW YORK.

WATCHES that are WATCHES.

We shall be pleased to send our DESCRIPTIVE PRICE-LIST of Genuine WALTHAM WATCHES, together with an illustrated pamphlet entitled a History of Watchmaking, to all who send us their address. No matter how remote you are from New York, we can sell you a Watch at the same price as if you were here. When you write, mention that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT.

Dr. ABEL STEVENS is now associated with Dr. Crooks in the editorial management of a live, wide-awake, independent, scholarly, sound, and reliable Family Newspaper, acceptable to all lovers of Earnest Christianity, whether Methodists or not.

THE METHODIST,

☞ To meet a growing demand for The Methodist, we have made arrangements by which the American News Company will act as our exclusive agents for supplying Newsdealers, so that hereafter the paper may be found at the news-stands.

☞ Every week a Lecture-Room Talk, by Rev. H. W. Beecher.

☞ Every other week a Great Sermon in full from Spurgeon and others.

☞ Yearly Subscriptions of $2 50 may be sent direct to our office (by registered letter, money order, or draft), or paid to a local canvassing agent. Specimen copies free.

G. C. HALSTED, Publisher,
114 Nassau St., New York.

THE ROYAL VICTORIA HAIR-CORD SKIRT.

THE MOST LADY-LIKE AND ELEGANT SKIRT EVER INTRODUCED.

PATRONIZED BY HER MAJESTY QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE ROYAL FAMILY.

Samples can now be seen at our Office and Store, No. 761 Broadway, New York.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 50 cts. on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK, have just published:

OUR GIRLS.

By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D.

12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

The book not only deserves to be read, however: it will be read because it is full of interest, concerning itself, as it does, with such matters as girls' boots and shoes; how girls should walk; low neck and short sleeves; outrages upon the body; stockings supporters; why are women so small? idleness among girls; sunshine and health; a word about baths; what you should eat; how to manage a cold; fat and thin girls, etc., etc.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Dr. Lewis is well known as an acute observer, a man of great practical sagacity in sanitary reform, and a lively and brilliant writer upon medical subjects.—N. Y. Observer.

Dr. Dio Lewis has inaugurated a new era in American education.—N. Y. Independent.

There is revolution in his clear-headed enthusiasm.—N. Y. Tribune.

If Americans would listen to George Combe and our countryman Dio Lewis, they would become a wiser, better, and happier people.—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

SPRING GOODS.

SILKS.—A full line of Bonnet's, Poncet Pere et Fils, and other celebrated makes of Black Silks, from $1 25 to $12 per yard. Also, check and striped Silks in great variety, and an assortment of new Foulard Silks, at low prices. Also, Colored Silks, in all the new shades.

DRESS GOODS.—Japanese Poplins, best quality, at 25c.; Gray Princess Cloth at 25c.; Newport Suitings at 25c.; Silk and Wool Pongees, new shades; plain, figured, and striped Grenadines; Hernanis, Empress Cloths, and an invoice of Pim Brothers & Co.'s Irish Poplins, in the newest Spring Colorings, just received.

SHAWLS.—New Broche Shawls, ex steamer Fenella, just arrived; Ottoman Shawls in great variety; English, Scotch, and Berlin Shawls, new styles and colorings; Black Cashmere and Grenadine Shawls.

MOURNING GOODS.—Black Alpacas, Delaines, Cashmere, Bombazines, Crepes, &c. Suits made to order in twenty-four hours.

GENTS' FURNISHING.—Shirts to order, warranted to fit; Collars, Cuffs, Ties, Cravats, Breakfast and Smoking Jackets; Hosiery, Gloves, Umbrellas, &c., much below the usual prices.

LORD & TAYLOR,

BROADWAY AND 20th STREET,
GRAND AND CHRYSTIE STREETS.

Digitized by Google

LEA & PERRINS'

WORCESTERSHIRE

SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY

GOOD Sauce,

and applicable to

EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

Every baby must have it. Is THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 532 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

FIRE EXTINGUISHER, PLANT SYRINGE,

Window-Washer, and Garden Engine for $5. Unequaled for applying liquids to destroy insects on plants, vines, and fruit-trees. N. PAGE, Jr., Danvers, Mass.

$250 A Month with Stencil and Key-Check Dies. Don't fail to secure Circular and Samples, free. Address S. M. SPENCER, Brattleboro, Vt.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

---

500 VOLUMES IN ONE.

Agents Wanted

FOR

The Library of Poetry and Song,

Being Choice Selections from the Best Poets,

English, Scotch, Irish, and American,

With an Introduction

By WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT,

Under whose critical supervision the volume was compiled.

The handsomest and cheapest subscription book extant. Over 800 pages, beautifully printed, choicely illustrated, handsomely bound. A Library of over 500 volumes in one book, whose contents, of no ephemeral nature or interest, will never grow old or stale. It can be, and will be, read and re-read with pleasure, as long as its leaves hold together.

"A perfect surprise. Scarcely any thing at all a favorite, or at all worthy of place here, is neglected. It is a book for every household."—N. Y. Mail.

"We know of no similar collection in the English language which, in copiousness and felicity of selection and arrangement, can at all compare with it."—N. Y. Times.

Terms liberal. Selling very rapidly. Send for Circular and Terms to J. B. FORD & CO., 39 Park Row, N. Y.

PERFUMERY.

For the largest assortment and best terms, call upon or address

C. B. WOODWORTH & SON,
Rochester, N. Y.
N. Y. Office, 335 Broadway.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER
THE BEST
TRY IT, SOLD BY GROCERS.

FRESH GARDEN AND FLOWER, FRUIT, HERB, TREE AND SHRUB, AND EVERGREEN SEEDS, postpaid by Mail. 25 different packets of either class for $1 00. The six classes, $5 00. Catalogues gratis. Agents wanted. Seeds on commission. B. M. WATSON, Plymouth, Mass.

CURL YOUR HAIR!

A BOTTLE of MAGNETIC CURLIQUE sent Free for 25 cts. It curls straight hair in beautiful curls on the first application, and will remain in curl 10 days. Address R. BYRON & CO., Garrettsville, Ohio.

HARPER'S NEW MONTHLY MAGAZINE FOR APRIL, 1871.

CONTENTS:

THE AMERICAN BARON. By the AUTHOR OF "THE DODGE CLUB," "THE CRYPTOGRAM," &c.
CHAPTER IX. New Embarrassments.
CHAPTER X. A Fearful Discovery.
CHAPTER XI. False and Forgetful.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—"She caught Minnie in her Arms."—"If I ever see him, I'll let him know what I think of him."—"Hallo, old Man, what's up now?"—"I stood transfixed."—"It's he!' she murmured."—"Then she flung herself upon the Sofa."

THE PITCAIRN ISLANDERS.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—George H. Nobbs, Pastor of Pitcairn.—Chart of Part of the South Sea.—Wreck of the Pandora.—On the Sandy Islet.—Map of Pitcairn Island.—Maria Christian, Ellen Quintal, Sarah M'Koy.—Landing at Pitcairn Island.—Map of Norfolk Island.—Map of Kingston.—Landing-Place, Sidney Bay, Norfolk Island.—Interior of Norfolk Island.—Naomi Nobbs, Jane Nobbs.—Pitcairn Settlement, Norfolk Island.

BOWERY, SATURDAY NIGHT.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Infant Germany.—Old Clo' Shop.—The Bowery Shop-Girl.—Unattractive Exile.—Fruit Stand.—Old Bowery Theatre.—Patent Soap Vendor.—A very low Liver.—Not at Home.—Redeeming a Pledge.—A German Institution.—The Hero of the Bowery Drama.—Celebrating the Capitulation of Sedan at the "Atlantic Garden."

FREDERICK THE GREAT.—XVII. THE CLOSE OF THE SEVEN YEARS' WAR, AND THE PARTITION OF POLAND.
ILLUSTRATIONS.—The King's Bivouac.—The Empress Catherine.—Assassination of Peter III.—The Officer and the Curate.—Map of the East.

JOHN EASTMAN'S COMPENSATION.

THE GULF STREAM AND THE TRADE-WINDS.—THEIR ORIGIN AND LAW OF MOVEMENT. By WILLIAM L. WALKER.

CRUISING.

ALONG THE FLORIDA REEF. (Third Paper.)
ILLUSTRATIONS.—Sponge Fishing.—The Hurricane.—A Wrecker of the Reef.—Fort Taylor, Key West.—Cocoa Palms.—Date Palm.—Banana, and Night-blooming Cereus.—Uncle George's Cabin.—Contest of Crabs.—The Hermit at Home.

ANNA VALLAYER-COSTER.
With a Portrait.

HER HERO.

DOMINIC AND THE INQUISITION.

THE MUMMY'S FOOT.

OUR FRENCH ALLIES.

"EH! WHAT IS IT?"

ANTEROS. (Omitted from this Number, the Author having failed to furnish copy in time for publication.)

ANNE FURNESS. (Omitted from this Number, the advance sheets not arriving in time for publication.)

EDITOR'S EASY CHAIR.

EDITOR'S LITERARY RECORD.

EDITOR'S SCIENTIFIC RECORD.

EDITOR'S HISTORICAL RECORD.

EDITOR'S DRAWER.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

MAGAZINE, One Copy for One Year.....$4 00
WEEKLY, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00
BAZAR, One Copy for One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for APRIL, 1871.

LOCAL TAXATION: being a Report of the Commission appointed by the Governor of New York, under the Authority of the Legislature, to Revise the Laws for the Assessment and Collection of State and Local Taxes. DAVID A. WELLS, EDWIN DODGE, GEORGE W. CUYLER, Commissioners. Revised and Corrected Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE MUTINEERS OF THE BOUNTY. Some Account of the Mutineers of the Bounty and their Descendants in Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. By LADY BELCHER. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

BARNES'S NOTES. New Edition. Notes on the New Testament. By ALBERT BARNES. Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. Notes on the Gospels (2 vols.) and Notes on the Acts (1 vol.) now ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Ready.)

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

BRED IN THE BONE; or, Like Father, Like Son. By the Author of "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAISY NICHOL. By Lady HARDY. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

EARL'S DENE. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

All Deformities permanently cured by Dr. J. P. MANN, No. 133 West 41st St., New York. Send for Circular.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

RICH RARE, & RACY READING. Wit, humor, fun. Sent free. Address BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

At once the most popular and, in its scheme, the most original of our Magazines. * * * All the periodicals which the Harpers publish are almost ideally well edited.—Nation.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

Harper's Weekly is the best and most interesting illustrated newspaper. Nor does its value depend on its illustrations alone. Its reading-matter is of a high order of literary merit—varied, instructive, entertaining, and unexceptionable.—N. Y. Sun.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

This paper at the outset occupied a place not filled by any American periodical, and won for itself a deserved popularity. It is really the only illustrated chronicler of fashion in the country. Its supplements alone are worth the subscription price of the paper. While fully maintaining its position as a mirror of fashion, it also contains stories, poems, brilliant essays, besides general and personal gossip. The publishers appear to have spared no labor or expense necessary to make the Bazar the most attractive journal that can possibly be made.—Boston Saturday Evening Gazette.

TERMS FOR 1871.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

$4 A LINE for an advertisement in 400 Newspapers. Where cuts are used, only six required for the whole list, and no extra charge. For lists, estimates, and particulars, address NEW YORK NEWSPAPER UNION, 13 Park Row, New York.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

AGENTS WANTED—($225 A MONTH) by the AMERICAN KNITTING MACHINE CO. BOSTON, Mass., or ST. LOUIS, Mo.

For 50c ☞ FIFTY-TWO German Bristol Cards, with your name neatly printed and sent by mail prepaid. Address SMITH & MILLS, Argus Office, ATLANTA, Illinois.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

A MODEL.

STRANGER IN TOWN. "Look here, I say. How do People Dress now? What's the Correct Fashion, eh?"
POMPOUS TAILOR. "As I Stand, Sir!"

A REASONABLE COMPLAINT.

OLD GENT. "Well, Charlie, what sort of Book is that? Interesting, eh?"
BLOOD-THIRSTY YOUNG RASCAL. "Not a bit. It's a great muff. I've read Sixty Pages, and there is only One Man Killed yet."

FACETIÆ.

CANING a boy for whistling on the Sabbath is perhaps the best, yes, perhaps the very best, way to make him cordially detest that weekly event forever afterward; it is quite as sure a way as taking him three times to church every Sunday of his holidays.

It is not so bad being only a little "loose;" it's the being frequently "tight" that is so objectionable.

DE LUNA-tic-O.—The moon furnishes the first instance on record of trust—she shines with borrowed light.

MRS. BOUNCER ON PEEL.

When I goes to draw my dividends, which I wish they weren't so small,
It's only my agility as saves me from a fall.
Talk as you will of Fenians, them Orangemen is worse;
No wonder when I thinks of them I blossoms into verse;
For oh! those orange skins, my dear, as every body knows,
If you only puts your foot on one you scream, and down you goes;
Though Bouncer says it's not the men as sells them,
it's the cads
That eats the fruit and drops the skins, instead, like careful lads,
Of taking 'em home to their mammas for making marmalade,
Which it isn't one in twenty-score as does so, I'm afraid.
My husband's very crochety, and before I've said my say
He very often takes his hat, and coughs, and walks away;
But one thing we're agreed on, which it's what the public feel,
What is the use of Peelers, if they won't pick up the peel?

LADIES' CABIN, WALL STREET FERRY, 1872.

THE WISDOM OF NATIONS.

"A friend in need's a friend indeed;"
I'm told so, but I doubt it;
With some experience of the breed,
I don't care much about it.
His manners may be very nice,
I grant it for the minute;
But when he comes to give advice
He has a motive in it.

"A stitch in time," as I am told,
"Saves nine" on all occasions;
But proverbs, however old,
Are often weak evasions.
Let Reason prose, or Logic rhyme,
Or Social Science wheedle;
One stitch is never worth the time
It takes to thread a needle.

"A penny saved's a penny got;"
A piece of information
That I, for one, would rather not Put into operation.
From Avarice's point of view,
Suppose you like to try it;
You save a penny, it is true,
But lose a pen'orth by it.

They tell us we should "never judge
According to appearance;"
Of all such antiquated fudge
It's time to make a clearance.
You'd lend, of course, a thousand pounds
(And hope for their repayment)
To one who walks his daily rounds
With holes about his raiment?

When is a concert-singer silent?—When he holds his piece.

Why is the fashionable lady a prudent one?—Because she tries to make her waist as small as possible.

GOSSIPS.

FIRST GAEL (just come ashore from the Herrin' Fushin'). "Hoo's a' wi' you, Donal'? Hae ye ony News yonder?"
SECOND GAEL. "Na, I hear Naething—oo, aye—they were sayin' Mac Callum Mohr's Son's goin' to get Marri't!"
FIRST GAEL. "Ay! ay! An' wha's he goin' to get Marri't on?"
SECOND GAEL. "Ye ken the Queen, e-ch?"
FIRST GAEL. "Ay—a ken the Queen."
SECOND GAEL. "A-weel, it's on her young Dochter he's goin' to get Marri't."
FIRST GAEL. "E-ch! Dod! the Queen mun be the Frood Woman!"

ON THE SAFE SIDE, ANYHOW.

MISS DEBORAH (a precise Old Maid of strict principles). "Why, Rebecca, you never Cleaned those Windows, and they were actually Dirty on the Sabbath-day."
MAID-OF-ALL-WORK (anxious to be equally strict). "Indeed, Mum, I hadn't no time, but I'll do 'em To-morrow, if I'm spared; and, if not, on Wednesday."

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 14.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Bridal Coiffures, Figs. 1–4.

Figs. 1 and 2.—To make this coiffure divide the front and back hair from ear to ear. Divide the back hair in two parts. Arrange each of these in a three-strand braid, and leave them loose for the present. Comb the front hair back over crêpes, and fasten the ends so that they do not show. Cross the two back braids so that they fall on the neck as shown by Fig. 2 (this shows the coiffure without wreath or flowers), fasten the ends on the crown of the head, and conceal them under a knot of hair ending in curls, which supplies the place of a chignon of curls. Fig. 1 shows the manner of arranging the veil and wreath. If the natural hair is not thick enough, false braids may be used.

Figs. 3 and 4.—This coiffure is very becoming and easily arranged (see Fig. 4, which shows the coiffure without the veil and wreath, and without the two long curls at the left side). Divide the front and back hair from ear to ear, and then divide the front hair in two parts. Comb the back hair to the right side, tie it back of the ear, and arrange it in a three-strand braid; arrange the latter so that it falls on the neck, and fasten it at the right side, afterward covering it with the front hair. Then divide each half of the front hair, which must be slightly crimped, in two parts; comb back the part next the ear, and then arrange the part next the middle so that it falls over the forehead and the hair combed back, as shown by Figs. 3 and 4. Twist the ends of each half of the front hair loosely, as shown by Fig. 4, and then fasten them on the back of the head, simulating a chignon (see illustration). On the left side fasten two long curls as shown by Fig. 3. This illustration shows the manner of arranging the wreath, which must be secured with hair-pins, and the veil, which is hemmed an inch and a half wide all around, and which is pleated three inches from the upper straight edge, and pinned on so as to form a rosette (see illustration).

Fig. 1.—Bridal Coiffure with Wreath and Veil.—[See Fig. 2.]

Fig. 2.—Arrangement of Hair for Bridal Coiffure, Fig. 1.

Fig. 4.—Arrangement of Hair for Bridal Coiffure, Fig. 3.

BRIDAL COIFFURES, Figs. 1–4.

Fig. 3.—Bridal Coiffure with Wreath and Veil.—[See Fig. 4.]

GLYCERINE.

WHEN, amidst the smoke and dust of the laboratory, Scheele first separated glycerine from its combinations, and gave it a distinct existence and a name, he doubtless had little thought of the extensive applications that it would meet, and still less could he suppose that it would find its way to the toilette-tables of delicate ladies, or become a boon to suffering infants. It is not many years since it was thrown away as worthless, it being a waste product in the manufacture of certain pharmaceutical preparations; or, if it did chance to be saved, it was kept merely by curious chemists, who retailed it at almost fabulous prices. Now it is a regular article of commerce; it is prepared of great purity and at moderate cost, and being an indispensable article on the toilette-table, every lady ought to understand its peculiarities and the best methods of using it.

Glycerine is prepared from fat, of which it forms a prominent constituent. At first sight this might create a feeling of disgust; but when we trace the chemical processes through which it passes, we shall find that it is purified as with fire, and there is no more room for disgust at the idea of glycerine being prepared from fat than there is at the idea of luscious strawberries, delicate peaches, and refreshing grapes being produced from the contents of the garbage wagon. In both cases the resulting product is sublimed and purified, and bears no more resemblance to the source that furnished it than aqua fortis bears to the air we breathe; and yet we know that both aqua fortis and air are composed of the same elements.

The prominent characteristics that render glycerine valuable for toilette purposes are its neutrality, its fixedness, and its strong affinity for water. By neutrality we mean the fact that it is neither acid nor alkaline. It exerts no corroding action on any animal tissue, and when properly prepared it may be applied to the most delicate parts without producing pain or injury. Its name signifies "the sweet base," and it has a very sweet and pleasant taste. Moreover, it is so far nutritious that a German chemist supported himself upon it alone for several days. It has no specific action upon the system, and seems to act merely as a not very powerful form of nutriment; so that when applied to the lips, or when used where young children have access to it, no fear need be entertained in regard to its effects. By its fixedness is meant the fact that it does not evaporate or dry up. So marked is this feature that it is used extensively by microscopists for the purpose of preserving moist preparations, and we have in our possession a slide which was put up a dozen years ago, and which is perfect to this day, although it never was very well sealed up. The glycerine is, in this case, kept between two thin plates of glass, one of which is about three-quarters of an inch in diameter, and in all this long time the glycerine has not dried up to any perceptible degree. No more convincing proof could be given of the non-volatility of glycerine. This property renders it of peculiar value as an application to the hair, which it keeps moist and healthy, thus preventing, in a large measure, that torment to ladies—brittleness of the hair, which causes it to break off at all sorts of lengths, and present a "fuzzy" or "towsy" appearance. As a means of keeping the skin moist glycerine is unequaled, and there is no better preventive of chapped hands, and no better application to hands that are chapped. It renders the skin soft, flexible, clear, and white, and is said, though with how much truth we do not know, to prevent freckles. We somewhat doubt this point, but would advise a trial, as what sometimes fails in certain cases may succeed in others. As an article for use in the nursery glycerine is invaluable. It is altogether the best application for chafed surfaces, though many ladies have been disappointed in its use from not having followed certain directions which will be hereafter noted. It never becomes rancid, like oil, nor does it turn sour, like vegetable or sugary solutions. This is due in a large measure to the fact that it does not absorb any thing from the air, nor does it even permit the access of air to any thing immersed in it. This is not the case with water, which readily dissolves a considerable percentage of air, and thus conveys it to whatever may be covered with it. This peculiarity of glycerine has caused it to be quite extensively used in the preservation of fruits and vegetables—a point that will doubtless interest ladies, though it does not concern the toilette-table. Another application of glycerine, which falls in the same category, is its value when mixed with cements. We all know the difficulty of causing labels and similar objects to stick to glass or highly varnished articles when the latter are exposed to the continued drying action of a very warm room. The gum or paste dries up and cracks off, thus producing very serious annoyance. One or two drops of glycerine in a small bottle of mucilage will entirely prevent this result. We must beware, however, of adding too much glycerine, or the cement will fail to harden at all.

Digitized by Google

The property which has caused most annoyance in the use of glycerine is its strong affinity for water. Although glycerine has a pleasant, sweetish taste, yet the first sensation that is felt when it is applied to the tongue is one of pain and burning. This is caused by the fact that the glycerine absorbs all the moisture from the surface that it touches, and thus dries it up and parches the nerves. Ignorant of this fact, nurses and mothers have applied pure glycerine to the chafed skin of infants, and produced great pain. The glycerine ought to have been first mixed with an equal bulk of water, or at least with so much as would remove its burning action on the sense of taste. This being done, it may be applied to the most tender surfaces without producing injury, and as it does not dry up, virtually maintains the parts in a constantly moist condition, excluding the air and promoting the healing process. We may hint to the ladies that a small quantity poured into the shaving cups of their husbands, brothers, or friends will prove a pleasant addition, preventing entirely any possibility of the lather drying or hardening.

LOSS.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

WITHERED and brown, some constant leaves
Still cling about the tree;
But all the glory of the year—
The fleeting lustre of the sea,
The tenderness of summer eves,
The haze that made the distance dear—
Has vanished utterly.

A dreary cloud the whole day long
Sobs to itself unblest,
And bitterly the night winds blow
Into the frozen west;
And, flooded late with happy song,
Now cold and cruelly the snow
Lies deep in last year's nest.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 8, 1871.

☞ Our next Number will contain an illustration, accompanied with Cut Paper Pattern, of a new and elegant Postilion-Basque Walking Suit; together with a large number of beautiful engravings, and a choice variety of reading matter. For complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 223 of this Number.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with full-sized patterns and illustrations of a large variety of Spring and Summer Suits for Masters and Misses from three to fifteen years old; Commencement, Confirmation, and First-Communion Dresses; Ladies' and Misses' Spring and Summer Talmas, Paletots, Sacques, and Jackets; Pen-wipers, Needle-books, Work-boxes, Clothes-bags, Tidies, embroidery patterns, etc., etc.

☞ HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 1 contains the opening chapters of CHARLES READE'S new story,

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION,

with original illustrations, in addition to those which appear in the English edition.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Spring.

MY DEAR MAY,—It was the same instinct that carried us both to the Central Park yesterday. The sap begins to stir in our veins as in the trees and shrubs. The blithest hopes and expectations sweetly twitter in your heart, I know; and when in the early mornings I hear the bubbling of the birds' songs, I think of you, my dear young lady. It is a universal magic. If you do not think of the singing of birds and the blooming of crocuses and hyacinths when you see me—and I beg my dear May to forgive the preposterous suggestion—yet you have observed in the woods how the toughest oaks and the most ancient elms feel the tender touch of the renewing year, and respond in swelling twigs and budding leaves. Our journey has brought us steadily forward, and our road lies through the bloom and blossom of another spring. How beautiful it is, dear May! How much more beautiful than any other moment of the year through which we travel!

And the oldest songs in its praise are still the most beautiful also. Here we are sweeping along upon the great journey, rolling over the same road by which all the travelers of the remotest ages have passed. And they saw what we see, and felt what we feel. Does any thing give us a deeper sense of the identity of the race? You go up to the Park in the bright sunshine after the heavy rains. You see the broad meadow that shall soon be green. Every where you hear the sound of birds; you feel the generous warm air, and mark the delicate green flushing along the tender bark. And all the soft beginning of spring without seems but the reflection of the bright, hopeful feeling within. You see painted upon the air what you feel in your own heart. Every thing seems young and renewed because you are so. The sun is not so much in the sky as in your soul. The birds warble because your heart sings. See what inexpressible tenderness of tone in that horizon line! But are you looking out or in? What depthless tenderness of heavenly emotion stretches before your inlooking eye!

Now, my dear May, if I had opened the magazine which I carried in my hand yesterday, and had asked you to let me read you a spring song—such as I used to meet the sentimental German youth writing in the Thiergarten, or park, near Berlin—if it had been the very freshest and most fragrant strain of our sweetest singer, would it have seemed fresher or more delightful to you than this:

"For, lo, the winter is past, the rain is over and gone;

"The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come, and the voice of the turtle is heard in our land;

"The fig-tree putteth forth her green figs, and the vines with the tender grape give a good smell. Arise, my love, my fair one, and come away."

Is there any song that more truly expresses your own feeling and delight in the spring than that? Could there be a simpler, more universal strain? It is as pure a song as a bird's. The natural emotion of a healthy and susceptible mind sings through the poet. The song is as transparent as air. There is no mixture of personality. There is no meditation, nor moralizing, nor improvement; no sentimentality, nor vaporing, nor morbid conceit. It is clear as a crystal rill. The deep delight blossoms into musical song as the vines into the tender grape with the good smell. And scarcely elsewhere than in this oldest song of spring will you find an allusion to the penetrating, exquisite fragrance of the grape blossom. But in all the best songs, all those which the heart treasures, and hums over and over again, mother and daughter and granddaughter, and generation after generation in endless succession, you will find this same tone expressive of universal experience; nothing quaint or obscure, or, in the limited sense, personal. For great genius seems to be colorless. It transmits the rays of feeling untainted and untinted. It is so in Shakespeare and in Burns, my dear May; and where it is not so it is a fashion which passeth away. The same daylight and common air that you feel and see in these verses are in Homer also. It is, indeed, the morning air. But then real genius is perpetual morning, and all its flowers and landscapes are set in that same blithe, clear atmosphere.

So the old poet who sang this song far away beyond two seas, and beyond two thousand years, perhaps, was yet a fellow-traveler of ours, seeing and hearing and feeling and enjoying just what we do. He looked out upon the same road that we traverse, and the sky was as blue, and the clouds as round and fair, and the plains and hills and trees and streams were as various, and the whole world was apparently just as old and just as new as that we see in the Central Park to-day. Some day, perhaps, dear May, you will go to Egypt and ascend the Nile, and see the shattered statue of Memnon, as it is called, at Thebes—Memnon, son of the morning, whose lips the first rays of the rising sun touched into music. It is crumbling now, but still it sits stately and most imposing upon the wide Theban plain. But miracles never cease, dear girl. Long ago I stood upon the plain and beheld the famous statue, with its story vivid in my heart. But yesterday, as I sat in the Central Park, I saw the sun touch lips as lovely as ever Memnon's were—lips of a daughter of the morning—and the music that followed was sweeter than ever Thebes heard from Memnon.

And, indeed, is not every one of us travelers who keeps the freshness of his heart unworn a son of the morning? And may he not know that he is of royal lineage if, when the spring comes, like a splendid sun, and strikes his heart with beauty as Memnon's mouth was touched with light, it instantly answers in song like that of Solomon? It need not be his own, except in the emotion. The man who feels as the poet felt may let the poet speak for him, yet in feeling be as much a poet as the singer. For what is youth but freshness of the heart? and whoever keeps that lives in the time of the singing of birds forever. Some of us, my dear May, are born in the autumn or the winter, and we never get out of that season. I know people who were born sere and yellow. They never had any green leaves, nor bursting sap, nor thick-crowding blossoms. The young birds never built in their branches, nor did they ever rock the warbling darlings in the great summer gales. They were crisp and dry from the beginning. The richness and passion of spring, the ardor of June and July, the glow and ecstasy of life—they seem never to have known them. They were always grave and sombre and sad. It was perpetual autumn with them—gray, weeping, misty, melancholy.

Then, you see, my dear May, the old text, that we live not for ourselves alone, is true always and every where. We can no more help affecting others than an apple blossom can help smelling sweetly, or a cathedral can help throwing a shadow. So these people cast gloomy and chilling shadows, in which ice and snow linger, and the green of spring comes not. Their shadow is heavy. It seems to fall with actual weight, and to crush what it touches. I have seen a tender plant overtaken by the shadow of a tree as the sun moved round, and gradually it began to droop and wither, and slowly faded wholly away. And even so the dry and yellow people blight their neighbors. They cynically sneer at eagerness as folly. They denounce impulse and generosity as idle dreams and delusions. They wither the roots of hope. They dry the springs of faith. Youth dwindles and pines and expires in their neighborhood. They have never had any morning in their hearts, and the sun and the spring, therefore, never touch them into music.

Happy, then, my dear May, those who are born of the spring; they make sunshine all the year. The green figs never fail upon the tree, nor the tender grapes upon the vine. That eternal spring in the heart, that unfading lustre of the morning, is the best dowry any young woman can have. The young men talk a great deal about heiresses, and the "cutting up" of parents, and there is a great deal of writing and speculating upon the impossibility of marrying when the salaries of marriageable young men bear so hopeless a relation to the extravagance in dress of marriageable young women. There are a great many young gentlemen who assure me, over their wine and cigars at the club, that they could not think of asking a princess to leave her father's palace upon Murray Hill to come and share their humble rooms, and to starve and pinch upon a lean salary. Well, my dear May, there is reason in all things. A gentleman who must have wine and cigars at dinner certainly should not marry upon five hundred dollars a year. But how many of their parents married upon that sum, and were happy! And my opinion is that if they would spare the wine and tobacco, and, having a moderate salary, should be so lucky as to win the heart of a daughter of the morning, of one of the princesses of the spring, they might venture to do what so many of the happiest people in the world have done before them, and ask no other portion with the bride than that temperament and disposition which make the flowers always appear on the earth, and cause the happy house to feel continually that the rain is over and gone.

Yes, my dear May, I know what you mean to ask. It is whether you or any young woman ought not to look just as severely for the same eternal spring in a young man. I see in your eyes, or I know that I should see in them if I were with you, the look which accuses me of the old, old habit of talking of what the young woman is to bring, as if the husband alone were to be consulted. "She brought her husband a fair face, a fine fortune, and an ancient name," says the old story. Did she, indeed! And what did he bring her? If he brings winter and gloomy autumn, silence and frosty air, all the spring in the world might struggle with them in vain. Dear fellow-traveler, our manners upon the great journey will surely be what our hearts are. Yours, dear May, are the spring sunshine and the fragrant vine; and when you appear, our hearts begin to chant, "The flowers appear on the earth; the time of the singing of birds is come."

Your truthful friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

WHAT ENEMY HATH DONE THIS?

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

SOME observing father in Boston has been circulating a petition asking that the Saturday session of the Latin School in that city be abolished, and finds himself at once set up as the standard-bearer of an army which is to rescue our children from the clutches of their oppressors. Vigorous pens are set in motion. All the horrors of overtasked brains, multiplied lessons, too many hours in school, too many studies out of school, unventilated rooms, and premature disease and death are pointed out, and parents are called upon to rise in their might and demand a redress of all these grievances, or threaten a withdrawal of their children from "your schools."

The situation is grotesque, though the evil is as real as sin. Whose schools, pray, are they from which the children are to be withdrawn in default of a reformation? Who prescribes the curriculum of study? Who appoints the school-hours? Who limits the vacations? Who builds the school-houses? There would seem to be a vague notion afloat that the teacher is the absolute despot who is to be brought to terms by armed revolution. He it is who imposes tasks so severe as to soften the brains of his innocent charges, and who sucks all the oxygen out of the air before he permits them to breathe it. He is the cruel, exacting, irresponsible tyrant, tramping to his goal over the brains of the helpless, bringing to naught the hopes of fond fathers, and paving the way for paralysis and general idiocy.

Here is where the absurdity appears. The evil itself can scarcely be exaggerated, especially as regards ventilation. There is probably not a well-ventilated school-house in the country. I have been in a great many, and I do not recollect one that was not nasty with foul air. Enter the main hall during the morning exercises, and you may be sufficiently comfortable; but go into a recitation-room during the latter half of the recitation hours and you are actually smitten by the noisome atmosphere. It is not actually potato-rot, but it makes you think of potato-rot. It does not knock you down, but it gives you the sensation of being knocked down, and it makes you long to knock somebody down. In this filthy bath the delicate lungs of delicate children are immersed and soaked and steeped, hour after hour, for days and months and years, till the nastiness is well incorporated into blood and brain and heart.

And the parents do not care. The fault is wholly and solely with them. The teachers do every thing they can do to mitigate the evil. They open the ventilators; they open the windows, as far as draughts are permissible. At the close of each recitation they give the rooms as complete an airing as possible. It is the parents who build school-houses and put their children into them. It is the parents who cram their children's lungs with the same old, used-up, spoiled air over and over again. They do not object to it. They hear talk and make talk about fresh air, but they do not supply fresh air. They would just as soon their children would breathe the foul as the fresh. If they wanted the pure air they would have it. They do not wash their children's faces in dirty water; and clean air is more accessible than clean water. As they do not use it, the inference is that they do not want it.

So of hours and terms and tasks—they all emanate from the parent. The school session is six hours long, when it should be no more than five; but not only is the teacher not responsible for this, but let him advocate earnestly a reduction to five hours, and parents would say he did it for the sake of shirking the hour's work himself. They would think they were not getting their money's worth if school closed at four instead of five. We want our children in the school-room six hours. When they are at school we feel that they are safe. We don't mind what they are breathing, but we know they are not roaming the street; they are not drowning, or fighting, or running after a circus. They are taken care of. If you dismiss school at four, our duration of mental ease is shortened by an hour and shall you indolent and easy-placed teachers have only five hours of work, while fathers and mothers bear the burden and heat of a never-ending day?

The course of studies is possibly a little more under the control of the teacher, but only a very little. So many years are given to the primary, so many to the grammar, so many to the high school. So many studies the father wishes his son to prosecute. The subdivision is as rigid as mathematics. The teacher is powerless. The parent is powerful. He can take out lessons or put in years. He can make his high school course five years long instead of four, or he can dismiss a language or a science from the course. If he does not choose to do it, it is not the teacher's place to do it. Let the teacher attempt it and he immediately lays himself open to the allegation of desiring to diminish his own work. It is his part to teach what he is appointed to teach, and if he paralyzes the children's brains it is no affair of his. He was put there to paralyze them. That is the way he earns his salary. When the farmer sends his grain to mill the natural inference is that he wants it ground.

It is comfortable to see people uncomfortable in this matter; but it is ridiculous to see them angry with any body but themselves.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WEDDING TOILETTES.

THERE are two seasons for fashionable weddings. The first follows the winter gayeties of the city, and the second comes after the summer campaign at the watering-places. Preparations are now making for the first of these. Most of our fair fiancées object to being married during Lent, notwithstanding the example of the Princess Louise; but they are not too devout to spend the quiet penitential season in selecting elaborate trousseaus, to be displayed immediately after Easter. White repped silk with point duchesse flounces is the first choice for bridal dresses at the approaching weddings. Satin is pronounced too old for the young brides of the season, and the once poetic muslin is now too commonly worn to be in favor for this one grand occasion of a woman's life. The heaviest ottoman repped silk is chosen by those who can afford it, but lighter qualities of gros grain and the handsome Irish poplins are used by those who can pay but $4 a yard instead of $8. Two flounces of duchesse lace six or eight inches wide are preferred to the one deep flounce hitherto used: $20 a yard buys beautiful flounces of this lace, though not the finest specimens. China crape flounces and over-skirt, or else misty tulle drapery, or ruffles of white Chambery gauze, are less expensive than lace, and are used to beautify low-priced silks, as they look lighter than the ruffles of the material so much worn during the winter.

Digitized by Google

A low corsage, with pointed front, deep postilion back, round neck, Grecian folds on the bosom, and short puffed sleeves, is the prevailing style for wedding dresses; the upper skirt has a short apron front, with long, bouffant back; the train is shortened to sixty inches for ladies of medium height. When a high corsage is preferred, the neck is pointed very low and filled in with lace. The sleeves are duchesse-shaped, or else plain to the elbow and ruffled below. A cluster of orange flowers is placed high on the left side of the corsage, and trailing vines loop the apron of the over-skirt on each side, while a short spray takes the place of a sash.

The handsomest tulle veil made lately is a single width of tulle three and a half yards wide, and long enough to reach very near the end of the train. Around the edge is a three-inch hem, finished at the top with a thick cord covered with the silk of the dress. The lower corners are rounded; the upper edge is passed plainly over the head just back of the Pompadour roll of hair, and pinned securely behind the ears. There is no short veil for the face. $16 is the price.

The bridal chaplet is a slender garland of half-blown orange buds, mingled with spiral and starry jasmine. It is laid across the Pompadour roll, and hangs down each side, or else trails over the back hair. An elaborate chatelaine braid, a single plait as wide as the two braids usually worn, and soft hanging curls, are the bridal coiffure. The front is slightly frizzed over a Pompadour pad, or else the roll is plainly covered; and on the forehead droops short hair, neither frizzed nor straight, but curved in half rings, fluffy and careless-looking. Long side locks, curling toward the ear, are still worn. The bride's gloves are long-wristed white kid, fastened by four buttons at least, and without ornamental stitching: price $3 50 a pair.

Gray poplin for the traveling dress, and a gray silk suit for visiting and church, are still prescribed as items of a trousseau; but as these proclaim the bride as plainly as do orange flowers, other colors are often chosen. A traveling suit lately made for a wealthy bride has a skirt of Havana brown silk with two flounces of darker nut brown, and a cashmere polonaise of the darkest shade, trimmed with silk bands like the flounces, piped with silk of the lighter Havana shade. This stylish suit might be worn by any lady, and does not publish the bridehood of the wearer. The gipsy bonnet worn with this is a soft brown straw, trimmed with brown gros grain ribbon, a brown ostrich tip, brown quilled silk for face trimming, and a cluster of pale salmon tea-roses. A pretty model for those who adhere to the conventional gray suit is one of fine gray pongee, with a short paletot and open-front over-skirt, like that illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. III. A bias band of gray silk edges the jacket and skirt. The lower skirt has a bias gathered silk ruffle four inches wide around the bottom. A box-pleated ruffle of pongee of the same width overlaps this. A second silk ruffle and another of pongee held by a bias silk band complete the trimming. The gipsy bonnet was of the silk used in the dress trimming, with a fringed scarf of gray China crape, and a pink rose spray for ornament. Gray undressed kid gloves with long wrists. Square ottoman repped shawl in broad stripes, carried in straps.

The suit for returning calls is of silk or poplin of any favorite shade of the quiet colors now worn. The pretty grisaille silks are serviceable, and many brides use elaborate suits of black silk, with plenty of white lace at the throat and wrists. Carriage costumes to be worn in May are of pale écru silk, or mauve, or pearl gray, trimmed with flounces, finished with narrowest edging of point duchesse scarcely half an inch wide, yet costing $1 25 a yard. The bonnet matches the suit in color, or is of black lace. White silk and lace bonnets are not worn.

Wrappers for brides are supplied by the furnishing houses, and consist of fine soft nansooks and piqué made in the shape illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. Embroidery is the favorite trimming, especially two needle-worked ruffles extending down the front from each side of the neck and around the edge of the skirt. Hamburg work is much used for these ruffles, and is exceedingly pretty.

MISCELLANEOUS.

DRESS GOODS.

Soft flexible stuffs of light neutral tints continue to arrive for spring and summer suits. These are to be trimmed with silk of a darker shade, and will comprise the foundation at least of many of the shaded suits that are to be a noticeable feature in summer outfits. Most popular among these are the Japanese serges and foulards, improved fabrics of mixed silk and wool. The first is twilled, the last has a plain surface, and both are as soft as the India silk used for neck-ties. They are in light brown, buff, and mode tints, and cost from $1 to $1 25 a yard. Japanese crape, imitating the fine crinkle of China crape, is made strong by being mixed with wool. In delicate colors, and twenty-four inches wide, the price is $1 10 a yard. A similar fabric, altogether wool, without the silken gloss of that just described, is 80 cents. Fine pongees, crisp to the touch, yet forming graceful, soft drapery, are shown in excellent quality, light, glossy, and of perfect gray shades, for $1 25 a yard. Heavy repped épingelines, with the silk all thrown on the surface, are $1 50 a yard. Fine French poplins cost from $1 25 to $1 75 a yard. These Lyons poplins and the famous Irish poplins are both silk and wool mixtures, but French poplins are of light quality, and have small reps not clearly defined, while Irish poplins have the thick regular reps of gros grain, are narrow, and cost from $2 upward. These poplins are reversible, as the silk warp is thrown on the outer sides, covering the woof of wool that forms the reps. We have said this before, but repeat it to many correspondents who ask if Pym's Irish poplin is not all silk. If it were, it would not be poplin, but silk.

Summer cashmere is a novelty. It is a soft, all-wool, twilled fabric of very light quality, in broken plaids, checks, and cross-bars. The selvedges are finished as fringe, to be used in trimming flounces and the over garments. It is six-quarters wide, and $1 50 a yard. As many object to these self-fringed goods on account of their resemblance to the shawl suits that are now somewhat passée, the fringe can be dispensed with. At any rate, we know of no more beautiful fabric than this, especially for ladies' wrappers and for children's suits. The bright blue and white plaids are among the prettiest; and another stylish combination is black and white plaid with maroon bars between. Lower-priced cashmeres, slightly mixed with cotton, are $1 25 a yard.

All-wool serges, as fine and soft as ladies' cloth, and wool poplins a full yard wide, are shown in the buff and brown shades, with a darker stripe and fringe on one edge, for $1 10 a yard. Mixed with cotton, they are 80 cents. Very lustrous mohairs in all the spring shades, and the heavier Palermo poplins with fine reps, are 65 cents a yard.

Batiste robes are plain cambrics, self-colored, with a stripe for bordering near the edges. They are 35 cents a yard, or about $4 25 the dress pattern. Linen lawns of palest unbleached buff or light gray are sold for 25 cents a yard. The furnishing houses sell suits of these, ready made, with postilion basque, the Worth over-skirt, illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., and a lower skirt, trimmed with four or five narrow ruffles edged with guipure lace of the same shade, for $23. These are stylish and inexpensive suits, but the problem to be solved is, how shall they be washed? The buff linen lawns invariably have a pinkish hue after having been wet, and gray lawn is apt to be streaked and shaded.

THE VON MOLTKE COLLAR.

The newest lace collar, called the Von Moltke, is pointed at the throat, to be worn very low, has square outer corners, and grows narrow toward the neck. It resembles the shape of the Marie Antoinette collar.

REGALIA.

A similar shaped collarette, which ladies call regalia, is made of sheer white muslin in soft folds, edged with point duchesse lace. One of these made to wear over a black velvet dress is $23; simply trimmed with Valenciennes, they are $10 or $12. For light mourning they are of white muslin, trimmed with very fine side pleating edged with footing: price $4. Cuffs or foils for the wrists are made to match. Pale blue or mauve regalias of China crape or soft India silk, trimmed with white lace, are made for young ladies to wear over white or black dresses. These are new and very dressy.

Black guipure edging for trimming flounces of grenadine and silk is sold in half-inch widths for 15 cents to 25 cents a yard. Fine white muslin, in tiny side pleats edged with very narrow footing, the whole when complete only two inches wide, is shown for wearing inside duchesse sleeves, low-throated dresses, and for putting on silk flounces beneath lace or silk ruffles: price 35 cents a yard.

Square handkerchiefs of light blue silk are worn by blondes outside of the linen collar, folded three-cornered or in sailor square, and pinned below the brooch. Brunettes complete street costumes by scarfs of guipure or other black net worn similarly.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames DIEDEN; and SIBLEY; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

THE Rev. HENRY WARD BEECHER, in one of his recent Lecture-room Talks, asked this question: "Did you ever think of the mingled dignity and delicacy of affection with which Christ treated women, the highest and the lowest? There is not in literature recorded such an exquisite treatment of woman as that which she received at the hands of Christ."

—The Russian Emperor is openly spoken of in St. Petersburg as having become a confirmed inebriate, imbibing nothing but the strongest kind of alcoholic liquors. All the efforts of his family to reclaim him have proved fruitless.

—Count VON BEUST is said to feel keenly the ingratitude of the Austrian court, where he has been so much slighted as to cause him to withdraw almost entirely from society.

—Viscount Macduff, only son of the Earl of Fife, is a candidate to represent West Aberdeenshire in Parliament at the next vacancy. It is to be hoped he may maintain the family repute. The first MACDUFF of history, as SHAKSPEARE makes him, was an honest, brave-hearted gentleman, a good father, a good fighter, of manly and patriotic impulses, and who did a neat thing in that little affair of his with MACBETH.

—The official records of the secret police of Paris, which to some extent have recently been made public, give minute account of the way of life of the ex-Empress EUGÉNIE and her mother when first they came to live in Paris. In 1848 they occupied a third-floor in the Rue St. Antoine, and there LOUIS NAPOLEON, after his election to the Presidency, commenced paying her attentions. Madame DE MONTIJO was separated in Spain from her husband, came to Paris, went thence for a time to England, returned to Paris, and was constantly under the surveillance of the police. Her social position was by no means of a very exalted character. The daughter, however, was irreproachable, and the Emperor finally thought the best thing he could do would be to marry her, which he did on the 30th January, 1853.

—Mrs. HENRY M. FIELD, the talented wife of the editor of the Evangelist, has been giving some interesting reminiscences of the house of Orleans in that excellent journal. The Comte de Paris, the head of this house, is just now regarded as having an excellent chance for the succession to the throne, which his family might never have lost had his popular father, the Duke of Orleans, lived. This much-beloved prince, the eldest son of LOUIS PHILIPPE, was thrown from his carriage and instantly killed—an event which changed the whole destinies of France. Mrs. FIELD says of the widowed Duchess of Orleans that the memory of her husband was for her a sort of worship. All in his apartments remained as he left it; his books, the pen with which he had signed some orders just as he was stepping into his carriage, and on which the ink was hardly dry when he expired, even the cup of chocolate, half emptied, and the glove fallen on the floor, that had still the impress of his hand. Nothing was ever touched but by her. A cabinet of ebony, always covered with fresh flowers, and jealously closed, contained the last impression taken in plaster of his countenance, which death, coming so suddenly, had hardly changed. Into this private apartment she often retired to meditate and pray. Every year, on the anniversary of his death, she repaired to the château of Dreux, to spend some days near his tomb; and in her exile regretted nothing so much as the privilege of this mournful pilgrimage.

—We learn from one of the committee on the fund for the benefit of the family of the late GEORGE HOLLAND that, after paying all the expenses attendant upon the same, there will be left for the family the handsome sum of thirteen thousand five hundred dollars.

—The Rev. Dr. POTTER, of Grace Church, who last year spent a few days among the Mormons in Utah, expresses the opinion that to the great governing power of YOUNG the success of Mormonism is mainly attributable, and that the Pacific Railway and the not far off disappearance of YOUNG from the terrestrial stage will rapidly remove that pesterly ism from existence.

—It is incorrect to say that the day of the oil prince has vanished. We read in the organs of public opinion of Petroleum Centre, that Mr. JAMES S. M'CRAY, of that metropolis, is the cheerful recipient of $7000 a day from his wells, and that there seems to be no probability of their failing to yield that diurnal supply.

—Miss NETTIE CHASE, soon to be married to Mr. WM. SPRAGUE HOYT, has long been one of the Sisters of St. John's Church, Washington—a society of unmarried ladies, who spend alternate months in their Orphans' Home, nursing the sick children of the poor. A few mornings since Miss CHASE slipped into the hand of one of her "sisters" a fifty-dollar note, saying, "that although she must soon pass from the society forever, it could never pass from her love." Miss C. is not only one of the most talented, but one of the best-loved young ladies of Washington.

—Earl De Grey and Ripon views his fellow-beings through a single glass screwed into his aristocratic eye. He is affable, quick, and nervous, and has the honor to be Grand Master of the Masonic fraternity of England. He is a blonde, wearing yellow beard and mustache.

—Mr. DU CHAILLU, whose books, published by the HARPERS, are having wide sale, has nearly finished a very successful lecture-season. In Columbus, Ohio, flocks of people went to hear him week before last. He is the grand favorite of the American youth, who regard him, next to G. WASHINGTON, as the best man yet seen in the U. S.

—It has already become a fact in history that the chirography of Mr. GREELEY, whenever on view, is promotive of mirth. But Mr. G. has now a rival in illegibility—Mr. BLOSS, of the Cincinnati Enquirer, who has achieved the bad eminence of being the worst penman in the world. On a recent wager as to the significance of his signature one printer guessed it was "Bird of Freedom," and another "Warranted to Wash." Mr. BLOSS himself, having been questioned and shown the wonderful scrawl, unhesitatingly declared it to mean "France as a Republic."

—One ROBERT BARNES, of Evansville, Indiana, who bequeathed $500,000 for the building and perpetual support of a college for the benefit of the orphans of the State, tacked on to the bequest the following curious clause: "I enjoin and require that no ecclesiastic, missionary, or minister, of any sect whatsoever, shall ever hold or exercise any station or duty whatsoever in said college, nor any such person ever be admitted for any purpose, or as a visitor, within the premises appropriated to the purposes of said college."

—The recent marriage of Miss MOTLEY to Mr. SHERIDAN, a grandson of the famous RICHARD BRINSLEY SHERIDAN, recalls a remark—the last he ever made—of the Rev. Dr. SHERIDAN, grandfather of the great wit and orator. On the 10th of September, 1738, the Rev. Dr. SHERIDAN was sitting after dinner in the house of a friend. The conversation happening to turn on the force and direction of the wind, the Doctor said, "Let the wind blow east, west, north, or south, the immortal soul will take its flight to the destined point;" and leaning back in his chair, instantly expired.

—The largest personal estate ever transmitted by any one person in England, and probably in the world, is that of the late railway contractor, Mr. BRASSEY, whose will has recently been admitted to probate. His personalty alone, exclusive of his vast landed estates, amounted to $32,500,000. Of this large sum $15,000,000 passed to his children in equal shares, and the remainder was settled in trusts to their equal benefit.

—The heir-apparent to the throne of Austria is described by a gentleman who lately had an opportunity to observe him very closely, as a timid, good-natured boy, whose chief enjoyment is to fiddle. He possesses fine musical talents.

—As Mrs. MYRA CLARK GAINES was going into the court-house at New Orleans, a few days ago, she was sketched by a viewer for the press in words to this effect: "She was dressed in a handsome green silk, trimmed with a darker shade of green satin, and an elegant velvet cloak, fringed with black lace. A profusion of blonde curls was becomingly arranged beneath a black velvet hat, which was ornamented with a green plume, the exact shade of the dress and gloves. Mrs. GAINES mounted the long staircase leading to the court-room with the vim of youth, and she walks with the elasticity of a healthy English girl taking a morning constitutional."

—Another lady benefactress—Mrs. FRANKLIN SIMONDS, of Warner, New Hampshire, who bequeathed $10,000 to the high school founded by her husband in that town, and $4000 to religious associations in the neighborhood.

—The manuscripts of that superior Quaker, WILLIAM PENN, have been purchased by a number of citizens of Philadelphia, who intend to present them to the Historical Society of Pennsylvania.

—The palace in which ALEXANDRE DUMAS resided for four years, at Naples, has been purchased by a pecunious Englishman for eighty thousand lire. A. DUMAS bought it on credit, but let his paper go to protest, and now the property goes into possession of a son of "perfidious Albion."

—KOSSUTH, who has nearly completed his autobiography in very many volumes, has been unable to find, in Germany or Italy, that publisher who has the grand confidence in its pecuniary success sufficient to warrant the payment of a heavy copyright.

—Mr. ELLIOTT, the Hon. colored M.C. from South Carolina, who made a creditable speech in the House of Rep's a few days since, is the first negro whose voice has been heard in that branch of the national legislature. He is the ablest of the five colored M.C.'s of the House, is well educated, has a good delivery, and rather inclined to be impassioned. He had a fair chance, and was listened to attentively.

—Lord and Lady Willoughby, after an extensive tour of the States, are now guests at the Fifth Avenue Hotel; very nice, intelligent, courteous people, who manifest a lively interest in American affairs of all sorts—social, political, etc., etc.

—The English deans have, as a general thing, done creditable things for English literature, notably Deans MILMAN and STANLEY; but ALFORD, MERIVALE, HOOK, and GOULBURN have contributed their full share, and shown how proper a thing it is to hold out these very reverend deaneries to those who can attain eminence in scholarship.

—The Rt. Hon. Mr. LAYARD, British minister to Spain, and author of the books about Nineveh, lives in very fine style in Madrid. He married a daughter of the late Sir JOHN GUEST, proprietor of the vast Dowlais iron-works, in Wales. Mrs. LAYARD's mother was a daughter of the Earl of Lindsay, and a woman of remarkable ability. Mrs. L.'s is at present one of the most fashionable salons of the Spanish capital.

—HARRIET MARTINEAU has probably written over more reams of paper than any woman who ever pervaded this planet. Three hundred volumes and pamphlets is the fearful aggregate she is said to have cast upon the world. She commenced in 1823, and ended by "taking the life" of Lord Palmerston in 1865.

—Madame PAREPA-ROSA is to sing for four or five months in Italian opera, in London, in the same company with PATTI, LUCCA, SESSI, MARIO, NAUDIN, and such.

—During our "unpleasantness" the successes of the army were mainly achieved by men under fifty. Not so in the war between Germany and France. VON MOLTKE, VON ROON, BISMARCK, the King, and most of the German corps commanders are over fifty, and from that to seventy-five. THIERS, at seventy-five, has the vim and vivacity of a boy. DUFAURE, the Minister of Justice, is seventy-three. GUIZOT, past eighty. In England, where men are reckoned young till they are past fifty, splendid examples of vigorous old age have not been wanting. PALMERSTON, LYNDHURST, and BROUGHAM, octogenarians all of them, led public opinion in Great Britain to the end of their days, and died in the harness. It is said of the first of the three that, after a field-night in the House of Commons, he would be seen at daylight walking home at a pace which a young man could hardly equal. THOMAS CARLYLE, over seventy, abates nothing of his intellectual vigor; while Earl RUSSELL, though creeping toward eighty, still attends the Upper House of Parliament Our own country, too, furnishes as striking instances of hearty old age. STEWART, DREW, and VANDERBILT, the money-kings of this city, are old men, as the years are counted, but still hold firmly in their grasp the great interests which they control.

—Saith CHARLES LAMB, in his charming essay on "All-Fools Day," "The compliments of the season to my worthy masters, and a merry 1st of April to us all! Many happy returns of this day to you—and you—and you, Sir—nay, never frown, man, nor put a long face upon the matter. Do we not know one another? What need of ceremony among friends? We have all a touch of that same—you understand me—a speck of the motley. I have never made an acquaintance that lasted, or a friendship that answered, with any that had not some tincture of the absurd in their characters. I venerate an honest obliquity of understanding. The more laughable blunders a man shall commit in your company, the more tests he giveth you that he will not betray or overreach you. I love the safety which a palpable hallucination warrants—the security which a word out of season ratifies. And take my word for this, reader, and say a fool told it you, if you please, that he who hath not a dram of folly in his mixture hath pounds of much worse matter in his composition. It is observed that 'the foolisher the fowl or fish, the finer the flesh thereof;' and what are commonly the world's received fools but such whereof the world is not worthy? And what have been some of the kindliest patterns of our species but so many darlings of absurdity, minions of the goddess, and her white boys? Reader, if you wrest my words beyond their fair construction, it is you, and not I, that are the April Fool."

—The British government do the correct thing for gentlemen who invent ingenious instruments for killing. They have just given $80,000 to Mr. SNIDER, Colonel RODEN, and Mr. WILSON for a plan to convert muzzle-loading muskets into breech-loaders; $75,000 to Major PALLISER for chilled projectiles; $50,000 to Captain MONCREIFF for a method of mounting guns; $40,000 to Mr. HALE for a sanguinary rocket; and $20,000 to Mr. LANCASTER for rifling guns. We haven't room to specify the names of the people who get from $3000 to $10,000 for all sorts of ingenious shooting contrivances.

Digitized by Google

GLIMPSES OF PARIS BEFORE THE WAR.

"COCHER, AUX TUILERIES!"

IT was striking eight. The cards of invitation said nine; but the habitués knew that their only chance of a seat, or even a stand-point which promised a good view of the imperial hosts, lay in their being at the palace an hour before the time named by the Grand Chamberlain. The Place du Carrousel had already a goodly show of carriages drawn up in front of the illuminated windows; but we were not kept long "making queue" before we alighted at the palace door.

A beautiful scene was this opening act of the ball—like the porch of a fairy hall. The velvet-carpeted entrance hall was thronged with fair women and brave men, whose jeweled heads and glittering breasts sparkled and flashed with every stone under the earth, and every order on it. The Cent Gardes stood in single file on either side of the noble staircase—a Garde on each step. They stood as motionless as statues. Not a muscle in their bodies moved; not a hair of their plumes stirred. The flood of light poured down on the steel and brass of their helmets and breastplates, making them glance and shine with responsive flashes; but the men were as still and as dumb as if they were hewn out of stone. Magnificent men they were! They looked like giants set up there for show, clad in silver and blue; drawn up, not "in battle's magnificently stern array," but in order serviceable—bright-harnessed heralds of some pageant of Peace. Strangers were always very much struck by the splendor of these Cent Gardes—by the majesty of their bearing, by their gorgeous uniform, so picturesque, yet martial too, withal. The effect produced by their extraordinary immobility was particularly striking when, at the moment of relieving guard, the two giants at the foot of the stairs started from their post, vibrating suddenly like dead men galvanized, their iron heels ringing on the pavement, their sabres clanging, and the metal of their regimentals clicking, as if the whole were spontaneously set going, like a clock, by the touch of some hidden spring.

I remember once a Frenchman who was ascending the stairs with us, exasperated by the supernatural immobility of the men, caught one of them by the arm, and shaking him soundly—"Say, Cent Garde, are you dead or alive?" The soldier let his arm drop heavily, like a dead-weight, without answering so much as by a smile.

But if I loiter on the stairs so long, there will not be a vacant spot in the Salle des Maréchaux, and we have a friend with us who has never seen a court ball in Paris before, and who wants, above all, to have a good view of the Empress. Let us go on, then. The Grand Chamberlain greets us at the entrance of the salle de bal with a courtly bow. As I expected—not a spot to be had in the Salle des Maréchaux! My friend gets separated from me in the crowd. I move on toward the Porte de l'Empereur, and get standing room at a right angle with the throne. There was more than half an hour to wait before their Majesties would appear; so I had leisure to take in the assembly, and admire or criticise as their appearance suggested. It was a galaxy, if not of beauty, at least of fashion and elegance and notability. On the front benches were ranged the wives and daughters of those demi-gods called hauts fonctionnaires—ministers, senators, and court officers—all in toilettes that vied with each other in eccentricity and splendor. The uniforms were varied and brilliant, representing every service, civil and military, in France and, almost, in Europe. The ostracism of black coats from court balls is unquestionably a wise measure, considered from an effective point of view. If the uniforms are sometimes gaudy, they are always gay; and ugly units are merged in a picturesque whole at once striking and harmonious.

When I had taken in all the leading points of the picture my attention became riveted on a very pretty young woman—young girl, I should have said but for that diamond butterfly in her hair, that proclaims her past the rubicon of maidenhood, and emancipated from its unjeweled simplicity—who was sitting close by the door called the Porte de l'Empereur. She was remarkably pretty. Fair, with brown eyes and alabaster shoulders, and a tout ensemble that struck me as very fascinating. If I had any doubt as to her being married or single, the presence of three gentlemen standing behind her chair, and lavishing unmistakable devotion on her, would have settled the doubt. No unmarried woman in France could properly be the object of such open homage. She must have been quite a bride, judging from her youth—she could not have been more than seventeen—and was very handsomely dressed. A green skirt—one of M. Grandhomme's latest miracles—elaborately beflowered and beflounced, and flung out on one side of her, lay two yards on the ground, to the great and visible vexation of some blue and gold gentlemen, who were constantly passing in and out of the door beside her, and were obliged to perform a skipping stride over the train, which was more considerate than dignified. For so young a married woman, she certainly enjoyed the homage of the worshiping trio very much. But I had not come here to moralize; I had come to be amused and pleased, and I was not in a mood to quarrel with any body, much less with a pretty woman. Only, I bethought unto myself, if I were the husband—

It was weary work waiting, after one had looked up and down, and round and round, and counted the uniforms, and caught one's self twice in the act of counting the lustres; so, without any definite object, but in mere purposeless impulse, I moved from my place, and pushed on in the direction of the beauty in green. With a little elbowing I got close up to her—close enough to hear one of the adorers who was stooping over her, while she protested emphatically with her fan, say,

"I assure you of it, mademoiselle."

Mademoiselle! I started so perceptibly that a gentleman beside me, thinking he had inadvertently trod on my toe, apologized. I reassured him, and this little interchange of words broke the ice between us.

"What a very pretty person that is!" I remarked.

"Very. She is an heiress, too, which considerably enhances her beauty. She is the parti of the season."

"I took her for a married woman," I observed.

"Yes—our young girls are not used to be so émancipées. We are apt to be censorious toward every thing that is not in accordance with the law and the prophets of our own code. But I have been to America, and I've seen their system work. Very little harm comes of it, as far as I could see. The young ladies are allowed immense liberty; they flirt to their hearts' content. You have a specimen there" (looking toward the door). "They have a train of adorers wherever they go, and get engaged a few times before they make up their minds to marry; but when they do marry there is an end of it all. The fastest among them settles down into the model matron, and a man would as soon dream of flying as of flirting with her. Every country has its customs. Their system is ours inverted."

"There's a good deal to be said in favor of theirs," I replied.

Presently there was a move in the direction of the throne. The crowd fell back, and the Emperor, stepping from the platform, walked on toward the group in question. An old pasha, wrapped in a robe like a blanket, and carrying a turban that looked like the coils of a jeweled snake, was singled out for the honor of shaking hands.

WALL CUSHION.

For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XX., Fig. 54.

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF POINT LACE COLLAR.—[See Fig. 2.]

For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Fig. 25.

Fig. 3.—SECTION OF POINT LACE COLLAR.—[See Fig. 4.]

For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 24.

TOILETTE CUSHION WITH JEWEL CASE.

For description see Supplement.

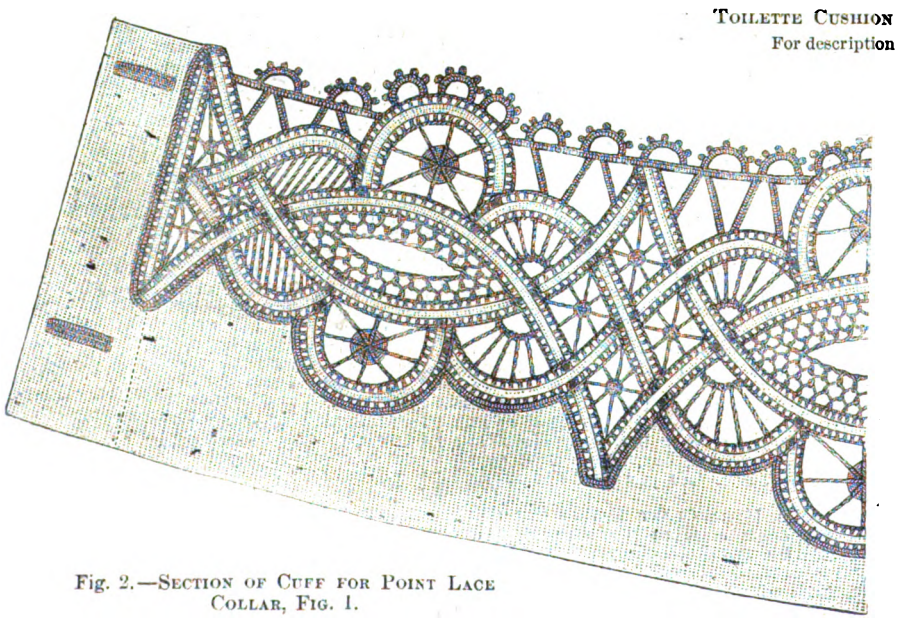

Fig. 2.—SECTION OF CUFF FOR POINT LACE COLLAR, FIG. 1.

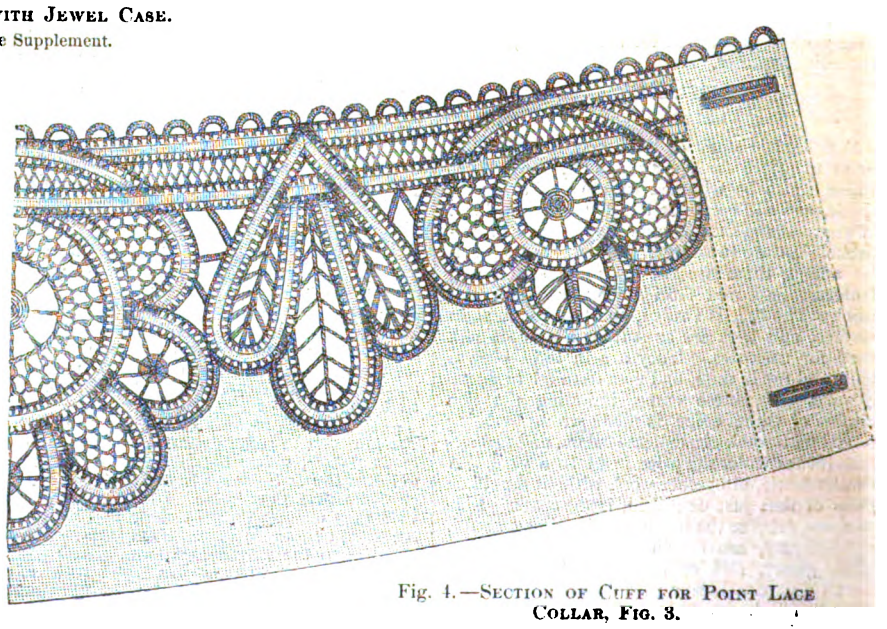

Fig. 4.—SECTION OF CUFF FOR POINT LACE COLLAR, FIG. 3.

Digitized by Google

While the Turk and his host stood talking beside her the pretty heiress improved the opportunity by flirting her fan and throwing expressive glances at the latter. His Majesty, always a willing victim to a woman's glance, was not unobservant of the little by-play. Raising the pasha's audience with a courteous au revoir, he was passing on, when she arrested him with a "Good-evening, monsieur," American-like, ignoring the imperial vocative.

"Good-evening, mademoiselle;" and his Majesty bent before the audacious young lady as reverently as if she had been a sultana, and he her slave.

"I have read your book, monsieur." The "Life of Cæsar" had just appeared, and was the theme of club and salon.

"Indeed! and what do you think of it?" inquired the author.

"Mon Dieu! it is very clever; but there is not the least thing new in it."

The Emperor laughed outright. I heard some one behind me muttering in an under-tone something about truth in the mouths of babes. The music became suddenly tempestuous again, and I missed some bars of the conversation between the author and his critic. When it subsided I heard him asking her her name.

"Hélène ——, monsieur," was the reply.

"How I wish that I were Paris!" exclaimed his Majesty, looking unutterable worship at the namesake of the Trojan princess.

"What, Paris! But you are all France."

There was a murmur of applause and suppressed laughter all round the two speakers.

"Is there any thing that all France could do which would be agreeable to Hélène?" inquired the Emperor, evidently bewitched by the saucy beauty.

"Get her invited to the petits Lundis."

"It is done."

And smiling a last good-by he returned to the platform. The Empress took his arm, and the staff fell into rank and file, the Grand Chamberlain walking backward in front to clear the way, the other officers of state and the dames du palais following behind, and the crowd trooping on in the rear.

There were seats enough and to spare now, so I secured one, and remained where I was till the party, after making the tour of the rooms, should pass round this way again going in to supper. I always find plenty of amusement in observing the people and listening to the different snatches of conversation going on around me in a ball-room; and on this particular occasion I was not less fortunate than usual. The impromptu flirtation of la belle Américaine with the Emperor was the topic of every tongue. One old lady who was sitting next to me seemed particularly affected by it. She spoke so loud that it was clear she did not mean to be confidential; I therefore had no scruple in listening to her discourse.

"If the girl gets into that set, it's all up with his chance," affirmed the dowager. "One of those court flunkies will cut in and take the game out of our hands. I know it as well as if it were all written in black and white. That poor boy will miss his luck, and one of the noblest names of the Faubourg its chance of rehabilitation."

"But are you so sure that without the interference of the dangerous court flunky he would succeed? Those American girls are romantic. They believe in love in marriage, and so forth," interposed the second speaker.

"They are not disposed of so conveniently as French girls. They look for a heart in a husband."

"And who wants to gainsay them? Ernest, of course, knows the customs of the country, and would act accordingly. He means to make the proposal in person, and even, when the thing is all arranged, to speak to the girl herself. The boy is full of heart."

"Then there is the father to talk over. The old gentleman thinks no match in Europe too good for his daughter. He might not be so ready to accept a young man who has twenty thousand dollars of debts for his sole fortune."

"And his name! Do you count for nothing the honor of bearing such a name as Ernest's? Can all the Yankee dollars buy one quartering of M. De Gasconalte's escutcheon?" demanded the dowager, indignantly.

"Certainly not. I was merely supposing the event of the Yankee's not setting so high a price on escutcheons as we civilized Europeans do. The girl is beautiful—very well principled, in spite of her independent ways, that shock our sense of propriety. No man need fear to trust his honor to her keeping. She is highly educated, and will have a dower fit for a princess. The father may think that all this entitles her to something more than a noble name without a penny to keep it up."

"As if a De Gasconalte would look at his bourgeoise daughter if he had a penny to keep it up! Really, milady, you are talking like a child. And, moreover, as to having nothing but his name, look at the old château that has been in the family since the thirteenth century."

"And tumbling to pieces since the seventeenth," replied the matter-of-fact Englishwoman.

"The petite's dot will put the ruin in repair," was the cool rejoinder.

"And those two duels, and various other accidents of a somewhat scabreuse nature, that have slightly damaged Monsieur De Gasconalte's character—will it put that in repair too?"

"My dear madame, if you really take an interest in la petite, and want to settle her respectably—to bring her into our society, in fact—you must not look to such secondary things as money, or treat a young man's few escapades as a serious matter."

"I don't argue the case the least from my own point of view, chère Baronne; I merely suggest the desirability of your looking at it from the father's. I promised that your nephew should meet my young friend; and he shall. I can promise no more. He must make the best of his opportunity, and do the rest for himself. I warn you, however, that he has a great many rivals in the field. Not to speak of a small regiment of noble names with no money, there is one Englishman, and several Americans of good family and fortune, running in the race against him."

"Has the Englishman money?" inquired the Frenchwoman.

"Yes; a very good fortune, and a château that is in good repair."

"And a noble name?" inquired the Baronne, incredulously.

"He is distantly connected with my husband, and bears our name."

This was said with a quiet hauteur, as if the speaker were conscious of having answered every doubt on that score exhaustively.

"Eh, mon Dieu! Ernest must take his chance, then," said the old lady, shrugging her shoulders. "You said Tuesday night, I think?"

"Yes. I promised Hélène to take her to see Nilsson in 'Hamlet.' Monsieur De Gasconalte will pay me a visit in my box. Of course, accidentally. She must suspect nothing, or his chance is lost from the starting."

"Oh, here is the Empress!"

As soon as the imperial party had passed through the Salle du Trône there was a rush to the supper-room. None who have not seen a court mob will believe how closely it resembles a street mob. The polish of mere out-

WATER-PROOF TRAVELING HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 14 and 15.

SHAWL COSTUME.—FRONT AND BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1-7.

TRAVELING HOOD WITH SILK BINDING.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 46 and 47.

WATTEAU WRAPPER.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 8-13.

WRAPPER WITH CASHMERE TRIMMING
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 16-19.

WATTEAU WRAPPER.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 8-13.

Digitized by Google

side breeding is but so much varnish that covers the same kind of flesh and blood, the same selfishness, the same rude forgetfulness of other people's comfort; elbowing, pushing, driving, to one point of interest; sometimes giving vent to its impatience in language not overselect. The varnish, if it be only varnish, soon rubs off, and shows us the same characteristic human nature that scolds at Billingsgate and fights on the boulevards and throws stones in electioneering duels. This mob to-night, in satin skirts and broidered coats, was no better than mobs elsewhere. Perhaps it was more good-humored; a French mob generally is. It laughs and jokes and makes merry over its difficulties, when other mobs quarrel and sulk. So, laughing and pushing, and protesting and pushing in turn, we all drove on toward Champagne and sherbets. Only a certain number were admitted at a time, and they poured out of one door before a fresh batch was allowed to pour in by another—the outcomers passing by the ingoers, separated only by a cordon for the maintenance of order.

"Ce pâté de foie gras est excellent. J'y retourne," cried out a stout old lady coming out of the supper-room to some one going in. And so she did. In the skirmish I came across my friend, from whom I had parted soon after our arrival.

"What a scramble!" she exclaimed, looking very much disgusted at the whole proceeding. "I sha'n't have a bit of my dress together when we get out of it."

I did not contradict her, for, as the dress was tulle, it was only too likely to be as she prognosticated. I was curious to catch another glimpse of my belle Hélène before we left, but she had disappeared, and I could not see whether any ruined Frenchman had superseded the bold young gentleman, whom I mentally wished well to. We had seen as much of the brilliant scene as was interesting except to the dancers; so on issuing from the supper-room we made our way down to the cloak-room.

"Shall we take a box for 'Hamlet' on Tuesday?" I said to my friend as she dropped me at my door.

"Certainly. I am very anxious to see Nilsson in it."

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

By Miss BRADDON,

Author of "Lady Audley's Secret," etc.

CHAPTER I.

COMING HOME.

THE lamps of the Great Northern Terminus at King's Cross had not long been lighted when a cab deposited a young lady and her luggage at the departure platform. It was an October twilight, cold and gray, and the place had a cheerless and dismal aspect to that solitary young traveler, to whom English life and an English atmosphere were strange just now.

She had been seven years abroad, in a school near Paris; rather an expensive seminary, where the number of pupils was limited, the masters and mistresses, learned in divers modern accomplishments, numerous, and the dietary of foreign slops and messes without stint.

Dull and gray as the English sky seemed to her, and dreary as was the aspect of London in October, this girl was glad to return to her native land. She had felt herself very lonely in the French school, forgotten and deserted by her own kindred—a creature to be pitied; and hers was a nature to which pity was a torture. Other girls had gone home to England for their holidays; but vacation after vacation went by, and every occasion brought Clarissa Lovel the same coldly worded letter from her father, telling her that it was not convenient for him to receive her at home, that he had heard with pleasure of her progress, and that experienced people, with whom he had conferred, had agreed with him that any interruption to the regular course of her studies could not fail to be a disadvantage to her in the future.

"They are all going home except me, papa," she wrote piteously on one occasion, "and I feel as if I were different from them somehow. Do let me come home to Arden for this one year. I don't think my school-fellows believe me when I talk of home, and the gardens, and the dear old park. I have seen it in their faces, and you can not think how hard it is to bear. And I want to see you, papa. You must not fancy that, because I speak of these things, I am not anxious for that. I do want to see you very much. By-and-by, when I am grown up, I shall seem a stranger to you."

To this letter, and to many such letters, Mr. Lovel's reply was always the same. It did not suit his convenience that his only daughter should return to England until her education was completed. Perhaps it would have suited him better could she have remained away altogether; but he did not say as much as that; he only let her see very clearly that there was no pleasure to him in the prospect of her return.

And yet she was glad to go back. At the worst it was going home. She told herself again and again, in those meditations upon her future life which were not so happy as a girl's reveries should be—she told herself that her father must come to love her in time. She was ready to love him so much on her part; to be so devoted, faithful, and obedient; to bear so much from him if need were, only to be rewarded with his affection in the end.

So at eighteen years of age Clarissa Lovel's education was finished, and she came home alone from a quiet little suburban village just outside Paris, and having arrived to-night at the Great Northern Station, King's Cross, had still a long journey before her.

Mr. Lovel lived near a small town called Holborough, in the depths of Yorkshire; a dreary little town enough, but boasting several estates of considerable importance in its neighborhood, having picturesque surroundings too, and being within an easy walk of the sea-shore. In days gone by the Lovels had been people of high standing in this northern region, and Clarissa had yet to learn how far that standing was diminished.

She had been seated about five minutes in a comfortable corner of a first-class carriage, with a thick shawl over her knees, and all her little girlish trifles of books and traveling-bags gathered about her, and she had begun to flatter herself with the pleasing fancy that she was to have the compartment to herself for the first stage of the journey, perhaps for the whole of the journey, when a porter flung open the door with a bustling air, and a gentleman came in, with more traveling-rugs, canes, and umbrellas, Russia-leather bags and dispatch-boxes, than Clarissa had ever before beheld a traveler encumbered with. He came into the carriage very quietly, however, in spite of this impedimenta, arranged his belongings in a methodical manner, and without the slightest inconvenience to Miss Lovel, and then seated himself next the door, upon the farther side of the carriage.

Clarissa looked at him rather anxiously, wondering whether they two were to be solitary companions throughout the whole of that long night journey. She had no prudish horror of such a position, only a natural girlish shyness in the presence of a stranger.

The traveler was a man of about six or eight and twenty, tall, broad-shouldered, with long arms, and powerful-looking hands, ungloved, and bronzed a little by sun and wind. There was the same healthy bronze upon his face, Clarissa perceived, when he took off his hat and hung it up above him; rather a handsome face, with a long straight nose, dark blue eyes with thick brown eyebrows, a well-cut mouth and chin, and a thick thatch of crisp dark brown hair waving round a broad, intelligent-looking forehead. The firm, full upper lip was half hidden by a carefully trained mustache, and in his dress and bearing the stranger had altogether a military air: one could fancy him a cavalry soldier. That bare, muscular hand seemed made to grasp the massive hilt of a sabre.

His expression was grave—grave and a little proud, Clarissa thought; and, unused as she was to lonely wanderings in this outer world, she felt somehow that this man was a gentleman, and that she need be troubled by no fear that he would make his presence in any way unpleasant to her, let their journey together last as long as it would.

She sank back into her corner with a feeling of relief. It would have been more agreeable for her to have had the carriage to herself; but if she must needs have a companion, there was nothing obnoxious in this one.

For about an hour they sped on in silence. This evening train was not exactly an express, but it was a tolerably quick train, and the stoppages were not frequent. The dull gray twilight melted into a fair, tranquil night. The moon rose early, and the quiet English landscape seemed very fair to Clarissa Lovel in that serene light. She watched the shadowy fields flitting past—here and there a still pool or a glimpse of running water, beyond the sombre darkness of wooded hills, and above that dark background a calm, starry sky. Who shall say what dim poetic thoughts were in her mind that night as she looked at these things? Life was so new to her, the future such an unknown country—a paradise perhaps, or a drear gloomy waste, across which she must travel with bare, bleeding feet. How should she know? She only knew that she was going home to a father who had never loved her, who had deferred the day of her coming as long as it was possible for him decently to do so.

The traveler in the opposite corner of the carriage glanced at Miss Lovel now and then as she looked out of the window. He could just contrive to see her profile, dimly lighted by the flickering oil lamp; a very perfect profile, he thought; a forehead that was neither too high nor too low, a small aquiline nose, a short upper lip, and the prettiest mouth and chin in the world. It was just a shade too pensive now, the poor little mouth, he thought, pityingly; and he wondered what it was like when it smiled. And then he began to arrange his lines for winning the smile he wanted so much to see from those thoughtful lips. It was, of course, for the gratification of the idlest, most vagabond curiosity that he was eager to settle this question; but then, on such a long, dreary journey, a man may be forgiven for a good deal of idle curiosity.

He wondered who his companion was, and how she came to be traveling alone, so young, so pretty, so much in need of an escort. There was nothing in her costume to hint at poverty, nor does poverty usually travel in first-class carriages. She might have her maid lurking somewhere in the second-class, he said to himself. In any case, she was a lady. He had no shadow of doubt about that.

She was tall, above the ordinary height of women. There was a grace in the long, flowing lines of her figure more striking than the beauty of her face. The long, slim throat, the sloping shoulder, not to be disguised even by the clumsy folds of a thick shawl. These the traveler noted, in a lazy contemplative mood, as he lolled in his corner, meditating an easy opening for a conversation with his fair fellow-voyager.

He let some little time slip by in this way, being a man to whom haste was almost unknown. This idle artistic consideration of Miss Lovel's beauty was a quiet kind of enjoyment for him. She, for her part, seemed absorbed in watching the landscape—a very commonplace English landscape in the gentleman's eyes—and was in no way disturbed by his placid admiration

He had a heap of newspapers and magazines, thrown pell-mell into the empty seat next him; and arousing himself with a faint show of effort presently, he began to turn these over with a careless hand.

The noise of his movements startled Clarissa; she looked across at him, and their eyes met. This was just what he wanted. He had been curious to see her eyes. They were hazel and very beautiful, completing the charm of her face.

"May I offer you some of these things?" he said. "I have a reading-lamp in one of my bags, which I will light for you in a moment. I won't pledge myself for your finding the magazines very amusing, but any thing is better than the blankness of a long, dreary journey."

"Thank you, you are very kind; but I don't care about reading to-night; I could not give you so much trouble."

"Pray don't consider that. It is not a question of a moment's trouble. I'll light the lamp, and then you can do as you like about the magazines."

He stood up, unlocked one of his traveling-bags, the interior of which glittered like a miniature arsenal, and took out a lamp, which he lighted in a rapid, dextrous manner, though without the faintest appearance of haste, and fixed with a brass apparatus of screws and bolts to the arm of Clarissa's seat. Then he brought her a pile of magazines, which she received in her lap, not a little embarrassed by this unexpected attention. He had called her suddenly from strange, vague dreams of the future, and it was not easy to come altogether back to the trivial, commonplace present.

She thanked him graciously for his politeness, but she had not smiled yet.

"Never mind," the traveler said to himself; "that will come in good time."

He had the easiest way of taking all things in life, this gentleman; and having established Clarissa with her lamp and books, sank lazily back into his corner, and gave himself up to a continued contemplation of the fair young face, almost as calmly as if it had been some masterpiece of the painter's art in a picture-gallery.

The magazines were amusing to Miss Lovel. They beguiled her away from those shapeless visions of days to come. She began to read, at first with very little thought of the page before her, but, becoming interested by degrees, read on until her companion grew tired of the silence.

He looked at his watch—the prettiest little toy in gold and enamel, with elaborate monogram and coat of arms—a watch that looked like a woman's gift. They had been nearly three hours on their journey.

"I do not mean to let you read any longer," he said, changing his seat to one opposite Clarissa. "That lamp is very well for an hour or so, but after that time the effect upon one's eyesight is the reverse of beneficial. I hope your book is not very interesting."

"If you will allow me to finish this story," Clarissa pleaded, scarcely lifting her eyes from the page. It was not particularly polite, perhaps, but it gave the stranger an admirable opportunity for remarking the dark thick lashes, tinged with the faintest gleam of gold, and the perfect curve of the full white eyelids.

"Upon my soul, she is the loveliest creature I ever saw," he said to himself; and then asked, persistently, "Is the story a long one?"

"Only about half a dozen pages more. Oh, do please let me finish it!"

"You want to know what becomes of some one, or whom the heroine marries, of course. Well, to that extent I will be a party to the possible injury of your sight."

He still sat opposite to her, watching her in the old lazy way, while she read the last few pages of the magazine story. When she came to the end—a fact of which he seemed immediately aware—he rose and extinguished the little reading-lamp with an air of friendly tyranny.

"Merciless, you see," he said, laughing. "Oh, la jeunesse, what a delicious thing it is! Here have I been tossing and tumbling those unfortunate books about for a couple of hours at a stretch without being able to fix my attention upon a single page; and here are you so profoundly absorbed in some trivial story that I dare say you have scarcely been conscious of the outer world for the last two hours. Oh, youth and freshness, what pleasant things they are while we can keep them!"

"We were not allowed to read fiction at Madame Marot's," Miss Lovel answered, simply. "Any thing in the way of an English story is a treat when one has had nothing to read but Racine and Télémaque for about six years of one's life."

"The Inimical Brothers, and Iphigenia, and so on. Well, I confess there are circumstances under which even Racine might become a bore; and Télémaque has long been a synonym for dreariness and dejection of mind. You have not seen Rachel? No, I suppose not. She was a great creature, and conjured the dry bones into living, breathing flesh. And Madame Marot's establishment, where you were so hardly treated, is a school, I conclude?"

"Yes, it is a school at Belforêt, near Paris. I have been there a long time, and am going home now to keep house for papa."

"Indeed! And is your journey a long one? Are we to be traveling companions for some time to come?"

"I am going rather a long way—to Holborough."

"I am very glad to hear that, for I am going farther myself, to the outer edge of Yorkshire, where I believe I am to do wonderful execution upon the birds. A fellow I know has taken a shooting-box yonder, and writes me most flourishing accounts of the sport. I know Holborough a little, by-the-way. Does your father live in the town?"

"Oh no; papa could never endure to live in a small country town. Our house is a couple of miles away—Arden Court; perhaps you know it?"

"Yes, I have been to Arden Court," the traveler answered, with rather a puzzled air. "And your papa lives at Arden. I—I did not know he had any other daughter," he added, in a lower key, to himself rather than to his companion. "Then I suppose I have the pleasure of speaking to Miss—"

"My name is Lovel. My father is Marmaduke Lovèl, of Arden Court."

The traveler looked at her with a still more puzzled air, as if singularly embarrassed by this simple announcement. He recovered himself quickly, however, with a slight effort.

"I am proud and happy to have made your acquaintance, Miss Lovel," he said; "your father's family is one of the best and oldest in the North Riding."

After this they talked of many things; of Clarissa's girlish experiences at Belforêt; of the traveler's wanderings, which seemed to have extended all over the world.

He had been a good deal in India, in the artillery, and was likely to return thither before long.

"I had rather an alarming touch of sun-stroke a year ago," he said; "and was altogether such a shattered, broken-up creature when I came home on sick leave that my mother tried her hardest to induce me to sell out; but though I would do almost any thing in the world to please her, I could not bring myself to do that. A man without a profession is such a lost wretch. It is rather hard upon her, poor soul; for my elder brother died not very long ago, and she has only my vagabond self left. 'He was the only son of his mother, and she was a widow.'"

"I have no mother," Clarissa said, mournfully; "mine died when I was quite a little thing. I always envy people who can speak of a mother."

"But, on the other hand, I am fatherless, you see," the gentleman said, smiling. But Clarissa's face did not reflect his smile.

"Ah, that is a different thing," she said, softly.

They went on talking for a long while, talking about the widest range of subjects; and their flight across the moonlit country, which grew darker by-and-by as that tender light waned, seemed swifter than Clarissa could have imagined possible had the train been the most desperate thing in the way of an express. She had no vulgar commonplace shyness, mere schoolgirl as she was, and she had, above all, a most delightful unconsciousness of her own beauty; so she was quickly at home with the stranger, listening to him, and talking to him with a perfect ease, which seemed to him a natural attribute of high breeding.

"A Lovel," he said to himself once, in a brief interval of silence; "and so she comes of that unlucky race. It is scarcely strange that she should be beautiful and gifted. I wonder what my mother would say if she knew that my northern journey had brought me for half a dozen hours tête-à-tête with a Lovel? There would be actual terror for her in the notion of such an accident. What a noble look this girl has!—an air that only comes after generations of blue blood untainted by vulgar admixture. The last of such a race is a kind of crystallization, dangerously, fatally brilliant—the concentration of all the forces that have gone before."

At one of their halting-places Miss Lovel's companion insisted upon bringing her a cup of coffee and a sponge-cake, and waited upon her with a most brotherly attention. At Normanton they changed to a branch line, and had to wait an hour and a half in that coldest, dreariest period of the night that comes before daybreak. Here the stranger established Clarissa in a shabby little waiting-room, where he made up the fire with his own hands, and poked it into a blaze with his walking-stick; having done which, he went out into the bleak night, and paced the platform briskly for nearly an hour, smoking a couple of those cigars which would have beguiled his night journey had he been alone.

He had some thoughts of a third cigar, but put it back into his case, and returned to the waiting-room.

"I'll go and have a little more talk with the prettiest woman I ever met in my life," he said to himself. "It is not very likely that we two shall ever see each other again. Let me carry away the memory of her face, at any rate. And she is a Lovel! Will she be as unfortunate as the rest of her race, I wonder? God forbid!"

Clarissa was sitting by the fire in the dingy little waiting-room, with one elbow resting on the arm of her chair, her chin leaning on her hand, and her eyes fixed thoughtfully upon a dull red chasm in the coals. She had taken off her gray felt hat, and she looked older without it, the traveler thought, in spite of her wealth of waving dark brown hair, gathered into a great coil of plaits at the back of the graceful head. Perhaps it was that thoughtful expression which made her look older than she had seemed to him in the railway carriage, the gentleman argued with himself; a very grave, anxious expression for a girl's face. She had, indeed, altogether the aspect of a woman rather than of a girl who had just escaped from boarding-school, and to whom the cares of life must needs be unknown.

She was thinking so deeply that she did not hear the opening of the door, or her fellow-traveler's light footstep as he crossed the room. He was standing on the opposite side of the fire-place, looking down at her, before she was aware of his presence. Then she raised her head with a start, and he saw her blush for the first time.

"You must have been absorbed in some profound meditation, Miss Lovel," he said, lightly.

"I was thinking of the future."

"Meaning your own future. Why, at your age the future ought to be a most radiant vision."

Digitized by Google

"Indeed it is not that. It is all clouds and darkness. I do not see that one must needs be happy because one is young. There has been very little happiness in my life yet a while: only the dreary, monotonous routine of boarding-school."

"But all that is over now, and life is just beginning for you. I wish I were eighteen instead of eight-and-twenty."

"Would you live your life over again?"

The traveler laughed.

"That's putting a home question," he said. "Well, perhaps not exactly the same life, though it has not been a bad one. But I should like the feeling of perfect youth, the sense of having one's full inheritance of life lying at one's banker's, as it were, and being able to draw upon the amount a little recklessly, indifferent as to the waste of a year or two. You see I have come to a period of existence in which a man has to calculate his resources. If I do not find happiness within the next seven years I am never likely to find it at all. At five-and-thirty a man has done with a heart, in a moral and poetic sense, and begins to entertain vague alarms on the subject of fatty degeneration."

Clarissa smiled faintly, as if the stranger's idle talk scarcely beguiled her from her own thoughts.

"You said you had been at Arden," she began, rather abruptly; "then you must know papa."

"No, I have not the honor to know Mr. Lovel," with the same embarrassed air which he had exhibited before in speaking of Arden Court. "But I am acquainted—or I was acquainted, rather, for he and I have not met for some time—with one member of your family, a Mr. Austin Lovel."

"My brother," Clarissa said, quietly, and with a dark shadow upon her face.

"Your brother; yes, I supposed as much."

"Poor Austin! It is very sad. Papa and he are ill friends. There was some desperate quarrel between them a few years ago; I do not even know what about, and Austin was turned out-of-doors, never to come back any more. Papa told me nothing about it, though it was the common talk at Holborough. It was only from a letter of my aunt's that I learned what had happened; and I am never to speak of Austin when I go home, my aunt told me."

"Very hard lines," said the stranger, with a sympathetic air. "He was wild, I suppose, in the usual way. Your brother was in a line regiment when I knew him; but I think I heard afterward that he had sold out, and had dropped away from his old set—had emigrated, I believe, or something of that kind; exactly the thing I should do if I found myself in difficulties; turn backwoodsman, and wed some savage woman, who should rear my dusky race, and whose kindred could put me in the way to make my fortune by cattle-dealing; having done which, I should, of course, discover that fifty years of Europe are worth more than a cycle of Cathay, and should turn my steps homeward with a convenient obliviousness upon the subject of the savage woman."

He spoke lightly, trying to win Clarissa from her sad thoughts, and with the common masculine idea that a little superficial liveliness of this kind can lighten the load of a great sorrow.

"Come, Miss Lovel, I would give the world to see you smile. Do you know that I have been watching for a smile ever since I first saw your face, and have not surprised one yet? Be sure your brother is taking life pleasantly enough in some quarter of the globe. We worthless young fellows always contrive to fall upon our feet."

"If I could believe that he was happy, if I could think that he was leading an honorable life any where, I should not feel our separation so much," the girl said, mournfully; "but to be quite ignorant of his fate, and not to be allowed to mention his name, that is hard to bear. I can not tell you how fond I was of him when we were children. He was seven years older than I, and so clever. He wanted to be a painter, but papa would not hear of that. Yet I think he might have been happier if he had been allowed to have his own way. He had a real genius for art."

"And you, too, are fond of art, I suppose?" hazarded the traveler, more interested in the young lady herself than in this reprobate brother of hers.

"Yes, I am very fond of it. It is the only thing I really care for. Of course, I like music to a certain extent; but I love painting with my whole heart."

"Happy art, to be loved by so fair a votary! And you dabble with brushes and colors, of course?"

"A little."

"A true young lady's answer. If you were a Raffaelle in glacé silk and crinoline you would tell me no more than that. I can only hope that some happy accident will one day give me an opportunity of judging for myself. And now, I think you had better put on your hat. Our train will be in almost immediately."

She obeyed him, and they went out together to the windy platform, where the train rumbled in presently. They took their places in a carriage, the gentleman bundling in his rugs and traveling-bags and dispatch-boxes with very little ceremony; but this time they were not alone. A plethoric gentleman, of the commercial persuasion, was sleeping laboriously in one corner.

The journey to Holborough lasted a little less than an hour. Miss Lovel and her companion did not talk much during that time. She was tired and thoughtful, and he respected her silence. As she drew nearer home the happiness she had felt in her return seemed to melt away somehow, leaving vague anxieties and morbid forebodings in its stead. To go home to a father who would only be bored by her coming. It was not a lively prospect for a girl of eighteen.

The dull cold gray dawn was on the house-tops of Holborough as the train stopped at the little station. The traveler alighted, and assisted Clarissa's descent to the platform.

"Can I see about your luggage, Miss Lovel?" he asked; but looking up at that moment the girl caught sight of a burly gentleman in a white neckcloth, who was staring in every direction but the right one.

"Thank you very much; no, I need not trouble you. My uncle Oliver is here to meet me—that stout gentleman over there."

"Then I can only say good-by. That tiresome engine is snorting with a fiendish impatience to bear me away. Good-by, Miss Lovel, and a thousand thanks for the companionship that has made this journey so pleasant to me."

He lifted his hat and went back to the carriage as the stout gentleman approached Clarissa. He would fain have shaken hands with her, but refrained from that unjustifiable familiarity. And so, in the bleak early autumnal dawn, they parted.

CHAPTER II.

MILL COTTAGE.

"WHO on earth was that man you were talking to, Clary?" asked the Reverend Mathew Oliver, when he had seen his niece's luggage carried off to a fly, and was conducting her to that vehicle. "Is it any one you know?"

"Oh no, uncle; only a gentleman who traveled in the same carriage with me from London. He was very kind."

"You seemed unaccountably familiar with him," said Mr. Oliver, with an aggrieved air; "you ought to be more reserved, my dear, at your age. A young lady traveling alone can not be too careful. Indeed, it was very wrong of your father to allow you to make this long journey alone. Your aunt has been quite distressed about it."

Clarissa sighed faintly, but was not deeply concerned by the idea of her aunt's distress. Distress of mind on account of some outrage of propriety on the part of her relatives was, indeed, almost the normal condition of that lady.

"I traveled very comfortably, I assure you, Uncle Oliver," Clarissa replied. "No one was in the least rude or unpleasant. And I am so glad to come home—I can scarcely tell you how glad—though, as I came nearer and nearer, I began to have all kinds of fanciful anxieties. I hope that all is well—that papa is quite himself."

"Oh yes, my dear; your papa is—himself," answered the parson, in a tone that implied that he did not say very much for Mr. Lovel in admitting that fact. "Your papa is well enough in health, or as well as he will ever acknowledge himself to be. Of course a man who neither hunts nor shoots, and seldom gets out of bed before ten o'clock in the day, can't expect to be remarkably robust. But your father will live to a good old age, child, rely upon it, in spite of every thing."

"Am I going straight home, uncle?"

"Well, yes. Your aunt wished you to breakfast at the Rectory; but there are your trunks, you see, and altogether I think it's better for you to go home at once. You can come and see us as often as you like."

"Thank you, uncle. It was very kind of you to meet me at the station. Yes, I think it will be best for me to go straight home. I'm a little knocked up with the journey. I haven't slept five minutes since I left Madame Marot's at daybreak yesterday."

"You're looking rather pale; but you look remarkably well in spite of that—remarkably well. These six years have changed you from a child into a woman. I hope they gave you a good education yonder—a solid, practical education that will stand by you."

"I think so, uncle. We were almost always at our studies. It was very hard work."

"So much the better. Life is meant to be hard work. You may have occasion to make use of your education some day, Clary."

"Yes," the girl answered, with a sigh; "I know that we are poor."

"I suppose so; but perhaps you hardly know how poor."

"Whenever the time comes I shall be quite ready to work for papa," said Clarissa; yet she could not help wondering how the master of Arden Court could ever bring himself to send out his daughter as a governess; and then she had a vague childish recollection that not tens of pounds, but hundreds, and even thousands, had been wanted to stop the gaps in her father's exchequer.

They drove through Holborough High Street, where there was the faint stir and bustle of early morning—windows opening, a house-maid kneeling on a door-step here and there, an occasional tradesman taking down his shutters. They drove past the fringe of prim little villas on the outskirts of the town, and away along a country road toward Arden; and once more Clarissa saw the things that she had dreamed of so often in her narrow white bed in the bleak dormitory at Belforêt. Every hedge-row and clump of trees from which the withered leaves were drifting in the autumn wind, every white-walled cottage with moss-grown thatch and rustic garden, woke a faint rapture in her breast. It was home! She remembered her old friends, the cottagers, and wondered whether Goody Mason were still alive, and whether Widow Green's fair-haired children would remember her. She had taught them at the Sunday-school; but they, too, must have grown from childhood to womanhood, like herself, and were out at service, most likely, leaving Mrs. Green's cottage lonely.

She thought of these simple things, poor child, having so little else to think about on this her coming home. She was not so foolish as to expect any warm welcome from her father. If he had brought himself just to tolerate her coming, she had sufficient reason to be grateful. It was only a drive of two miles from Holborough to Arden. They stopped at a lodge-gate presently—a little Gothic lodge, which was bright with scarlet geraniums and chrysanthemums, and made splendid by railings of blue and gilded iron-work. Every thing had a bright, new look which surprised Miss Lovel, who was not accustomed to see such perfect order or such fresh paint about her father's domain.

"How nice every thing looks!" she said.

"Yes," answered her uncle, with a sigh; "the place is kept well enough nowadays."

A woman came out to open the gates—a brisk young person who was a stranger to Clarissa—not the feeble old lodge-keeper she remembered in her childhood. The change, slight as it was, gave her a strange, chill feeling.

"I wonder how many people that I knew are dead?" she thought.

They drove into the park, and here, too, even in this autumn season, Clarissa perceived traces of care and order that were strange to her. The carriage road was newly graveled, the chaos of under-wood among the old trees had disappeared, the broad sweeps of grass were smooth and level as a lawn; and there were men at work in the early morning planting rare specimens of the fir tribe in a new inclosure, which filled a space that had been bared twenty years before by Mr. Lovel's depredations upon the timber.

All this bewildered Clarissa; but she was still more puzzled when, instead of approaching the Court, the fly turned sharply into a road leading across a thickly wooded portion of the park, through which there was a public right of way leading to the village of Arden.

"The man is going wrong, uncle!" she exclaimed.

"No, no, my dear; the man is right enough."

"But indeed, Uncle Oliver, he is driving to the village."

"And he has been told to drive to the village."

"Not to the Court?"

"To the Court! Why, of course not. What should we have to do at the Court at half past seven in the morning?"

"But I am going straight home to papa, am I not?"

"Certainly."

And then, after staring at his niece's bewildered countenance for a few moments, Mr. Oliver exclaimed,

"Why, surely, Clary, your father told you—"

"Told me what, uncle?"

"That he had sold Arden."

"Sold Arden! Oh, uncle, uncle!"

She burst into tears. Of all things upon this earth she had loved the grand old mansion where her childhood had been spent. She had so little else to love, poor lonely child, that it was scarcely strange she should attach herself to lifeless things. How fondly she had remembered the old place in all those dreary years of exile, dreaming of it as we dream of some lost friend! And it was gone from her forever! Her father had bartered away that most precious birthright.

"Oh, how could he do it! how could do it!" she cried, piteously.

"Why, my dear Clary, you can't suppose it was a matter of choice with him. 'Needs must when'—I dare say you know the vulgar proverb. Necessity has no law. Come, come, my dear, don't cry; your father won't like to see you with red eyes. It was very wrong of him not to tell you about the sale of Arden—excessively wrong. But that's just like Marmaduke Lovel; always ready to shirk any thing unpleasant, even to the writing of a disagreeable letter."

"Poor dear papa! I don't wonder he found it hard to write about such a thing; but it would have been better for me to have known. It is such a bitter disappointment to come home and find the dear old place gone from us. Has it been sold very long?"

"About two years. A rich manufacturer bought it—something in the cloth way, I believe. He has retired from business, however, and is said to be overwhelmingly rich. He has spent a great deal of money upon the Court already, and means to spend more, I hear."

"Has he spoiled it—modernized it, or any thing of that kind?"

"No; I am glad to say that he—or his architect perhaps—has had the good taste to preserve the medieval character of the place. He has restored the stone-work, renewing all the delicate external tracery where it was lost or decayed, and has treated the interior in the same manner. I have dined with Mr. Granger once or twice since the work was finished, and I must say the place is now one of the finest in Yorkshire—perhaps the finest, in its peculiar way. I doubt if there is so perfect a specimen of Gothic domestic architecture in the county."

"And it is gone from us forever!" said Clarissa, with a profound sigh.

"Well, my dear Clary, it is a blow, certainly; I don't deny that. But there is a bright side to every thing; and really your father could not afford to live in the place. It was going to decay in the most disgraceful manner. He is better out of it; upon my word he is."

Clarissa could not see this. To lose Arden Court seemed to her unmitigated woe. She would rather have lived the dreariest, loneliest life in one corner of the grand old house than have occupied a modern palace. It was as if all the pleasant memories of her childhood had been swept away from her with the loss of her early home. This was indeed beginning the world; and a blank, dismal world it appeared to Clarissa Lovel on this melancholy October morning.

They stopped presently before a low wooden gate, and looking out of the window of the fly, Miss Lovel saw a cottage which she remembered as a dreary, uninhabited place, always to let; a cottage with a weedy garden, and a luxuriant growth of monthly roses and honeysuckle covering it from basement to roof; not a bad sort of place for a person of small means and pretensions, but oh! what a descent from the ancient splendor of Arden Court—that Arden which had belonged to the Lovels ever since the land on which it stood was given to Sir Warren Wyndham Lovel, knight, by his gracious master King Edward IV., in acknowledgment of that warrior's services in the great struggle between Lancaster and York!

There were old-fashioned casement windows on the upper story, and queer little dormers in the roof. Below, roomy bows had been added at a much later date than the building of the cottage. The principal door-way was sheltered by a rustic porch, spacious and picturesque, with a bench on each side of the entrance. The garden was tolerably large, and in decent order; and beyond the garden was a fine old orchard, divided from lawn and flower-beds only by a low hedge, full of bush roses and sweet-brier. It was a very pretty place in summer, not unpicturesque even at this bleak season; but Clarissa was thinking of lost Arden, and she looked at Mill Cottage with mournful, unadmiring eyes. There had been a mill attached to the place once. The old building was there still, indeed, converted into a primitive kind of stable; hence its name of Mill Cottage. The stream still ran noisily a little way behind the house, and made the boundary which divided the orchard from the lands of the lord of Arden. Mill Cottage was on the very edge of Arden Court. Clarissa wondered that her father could have pitched his tent on the borders of his lost heritage.

"I think I would have gone to the other end of the world, had I been in his place," she said to herself.

An elderly woman-servant came out, in answer to the flyman's summons; and, at her call, a rough-looking young man emerged from the wooden gate opening into a rustic-looking stable-yard, where the lower half of the old mill stood, half hidden by ivy and other greenery, and where there were dove-cotes and a dog-kennel.

Mr. Oliver superintended the removal of his niece's trunks, and then stepped back into the fly.

"There's not the slightest use in my stopping to see your father, Clary," he said; "he won't show for a couple of hours at least. Good-by, my dear; make yourself as comfortable as you can. And come and see your aunt as soon as you've recovered from your long journey; and keep up your spirits, my dear.—Martha, be sure you give Miss Lovel a good breakfast.—Drive back to the Rectory, coachman.—Good-by, Clarissa;" and feeling that he had shown his niece every kindness that the occasion required, Mr. Oliver bowled merrily homeward. He was a gentleman who took life easily—a pastor of the Broad-Church—tolerably generous and good to his poor; not given to abnormal services or daily morning prayer; content to do duty at Holborough parish church twice on a Sunday, and twice more in the week; hunting a little every season, in a black coat, for the benefit of his health, as he told his parishioners; and shooting a good deal; fond of a good horse, a good cellar, a good dinner, and well-filled conservatories and glass-houses; altogether a gentleman for whom life was a pleasant journey through a prosperous country. He had, some twenty years before, married Frances Lovel, a very handsome woman—just a little faded at the time of her marriage—without fortune. There were no children at Holborough Rectory, and every thing about the house and gardens bore that aspect of perfect order only possible to a domain in which there are none of those juvenile destroyers.

"Poor girl," Mr. Oliver muttered to himself, as he jogged comfortably homeward, wondering whether his people would have the good sense to cook "those grouse" for breakfast. "Poor Clary, it was very hard upon her; and just like Marmaduke, not to tell her."

PUNCTUALITY.

PUNCTUALITY is proverbially not a feminine virtue, yet most necessary to those who seek for employment. As regards gaining it, the whole fortune of a woman's life may turn on her punctuality or unpunctuality.

Some persons have a most mistaken notion of punctuality, and fancy that it consists in never being later than the time appointed. With this loose idea they are quite content. But to come before the time fixed for an appointment is an equal want of punctuality with coming too late, and is often quite as inconvenient to the other person or persons concerned.

Be punctual both in keeping engagements and in your fulfillment of work. Let the one be scrupulously finished on the day promised, let the other be kept to a minute. Let experience teach that your word is thoroughly to be relied on.

Not a word can be said in excuse for those who are late in keeping engagements, or who promise what they can not perform in the time. They are utterly inexcusable. In them zeal and discretion are alike wanting; either they have undertaken what they can not do, or they are so wanting in energy, and so dilatory, that they will not exert themselves to do it. In either case, much to blame; in the latter, deserving of whatever ill may befall them. You will do well rather to overestimate than underestimate the time you require for work. This is an error you can easily remedy. But err once or twice on the other side, and you will find it hard ever to establish a character for punctuality. And unpunctuality is a fault which, in self-defense, an employer can not overlook.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—Short Cloth Cloak with Double Cape.—See page 216.
For jacket and description see Supplement, No. 2, Fig. 2.

Fig. 2.—Silk and Alpaca Cloak.
For jacket and description see Supplement, No. XI., Fig. 2.

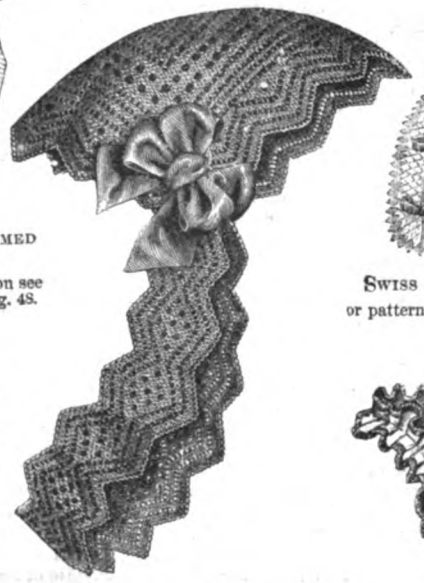
Fig. 3.—Short Cloak with Hanging Sleeves.
For jacket and description see Supplement, No. XII., Fig. 2.

Fig. 4.—Jacket Basque for Young Lady.
For description see Supplement.

BRIDAL AND EVENING DRESSES. Page 1-4.

SWISS MUSLIN BREAKFAST CAP.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 20 and 21.

SWISS MUSLIN BREAKFAST CAP TRIMMED WITH BOWS.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Fig. 48.



KNITTED FANCHON WITH COLORED GROS GRAIN TRIMMING.

Knitted Fanchon.

THIS fanchon, which may be worn as a breakfast cap, is worked with rather coarse tatting cotton, and trimmed at the side with a bow of blue gros grain ribbon. Work, first, the diamond-shaped crown, and then the edging and strings together. Begin the crown with a foundation of 4 st. (stitches), and on this work the 1st round as follows: T. t. o. (throw the thread over) and k. (knit plain) the remaining st. All the rounds of the foundation numbered with an odd number are worked in the same manner, and the t. t. o. are always worked off as a st. 2d round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n. (narrow—that is, k. 2 st. together), t. t. o., 2 k. 4th round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 6th round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 8th round.—Twice alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 10th round.—Twice alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 12th round.—Twice alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k.; then twice alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 14th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 2 k., and twice alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 16th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 1 k., and three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 18th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., and three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k.

SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE CAP.
or pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 50.

SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE FANCHON.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Fig. 51.

20th and 22d rounds.—Like the 18th round, but at the middle of the 20th round work 5 k. instead of 3, and at the middle of the 22d round work 7 k. instead of 3. 24th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., 4 k., three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. Work the following (25th) round in the usual manner, but in this round, as in the following rounds of the work, work 1 k., 1 p. (purl) on the 2 t. t. o. 26th round.—Like the 18th round, but at the middle work 12 k. 28th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; then three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 30th round.—Like the 18th round, but at the middle work 16 k. 32d round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; then three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 34th round.—Like the 18th round, but at the middle work 8 k.; on the st. before the middle hole of the round 1 k., 1 p., then 2 k., on the following st. 1 k., 1 p., then 8 k. 36th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; then three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 38th round.—Like the 18th round, but at the middle st. of the preceding round work 1 k., 1 p. 40th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 7 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; then three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 42d round.—Like the 18th round, but at the middle work 31 st. 44th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 5 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; then three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 46th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 48th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 50th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 52d round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 54th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; then three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 56th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 58th round.—Three times alter-

MIGNARDISE AND CROCHET BREAKFAST CAP.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 49.

LACE AND VELVET CAP.
For pattern and description see Suppl., No. VI., Figs. 22 and 23.

LACE BREAKFAST CAP TRIMMED WITH RUCHES.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIX., Figs. 52 and 53.

PALETOT WITH SOUTACHE EMBROIDERY FOR ELDERLY LADY.
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 26-29.

POPLIN BASQUE-WAIST.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 43-45.

Digitized by Google

nately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 60th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 8 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 62d round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 5 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 64th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k.; on the following 1 st. work 1 k., 1 p.; then 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 66th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 68th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 12 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. 70th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k.; three times alternately t. t. o., n., 1 k. In the 71st, as in every following round designated with odd numbers, t. t. o. first, then n., and knit the remainder of each of these rounds plain. 72d round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 3 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 10 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 74th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 15 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 2 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 15 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k.

Henceforth work the second half of the crown (the 70th round forms the middle line) in the same design as the first half. Work the first 12 st. and last 11 st. of the pattern rows in the same manner as in the 72d and 74th rounds, so that the holes of each pattern row may be brought nearer the middle in the ratio in which they were removed from the middle in the first half of the crown. Having completed the crown, cast off the st. of the last round tightly. For the edging on the front edge of the fanchon make a foundation of 8 st., and going backward and forward work on these as follows: 1st round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k. 2d round.—Sl. (slip), and k. the remaining st. All the rounds numbered with even numbers are worked in the same manner as the 2d round. Work the 3d, 5th, 7th, 9th, and 11th rounds in the same manner as the 1st round, but in each succeeding round increase the number of k. after the last t. t. o. by 1 st. 13th round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k. 15th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., k. the remaining stitches. Work the 17th, 19th, 21st, 23d, and 25th rounds like the 15th round, but diminish the number of k. in each successive pattern row by 1 st. This completes one point of the edging. Repeat the 2d to 25th rounds six times, so that the lace counts seven points. In connection with the st. of the last round cast on six additional st., and on all these st. work the strings as follows: 1st round.—T. t. o., k. the remaining st. of the round. (Work the 3d, 5th, 7th, 9th, 11th, and 13th rounds of the scarf like the 1st round.) 2d round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 4 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 4th round.—Like the 2d round, but between the two middle t. t. o. work 6 k. instead of 4 k. 6th round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 8th round.—Like the 2d round, but between the middle two t. t. o. 10 k. 10th round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 3 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 12th round.—Like the 2d round, but between the two middle t. t. o. 14 k. 14th round.—T. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 15th round.—T. t. o., n.; k. the remaining st.; in the same manner work the 17th, 19th, 21st, 23d, 25th, and 27th rounds. 16th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 12 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 18th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 20th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 8 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 22d round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 24th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 4 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 26th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 2 k., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. 28th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k. Repeat the 1st to 28th rounds ten times. This completes the border. On the first 11 st. of the last round (the remaining st. of the round are gathered on a thread, and left unnoticed for the present) work the lace for the back of the fanchon. 1st round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n., t. t. o., 2 k. 2d round.—Sl., k. the remaining st. In this way work all the rounds numbered with an even number. Work the 3d, 5th, 7th, 9th and 11th rounds in the same manner, but after the last t. t. o. of each round increase the number of k. by 1 st. 13th round.—Three times alternately t. t. o., 1 k., n.; then t. t. o., 2 k., n., 2 t. t. o., n., 2 k. 15th round.—T. t. o., n., n., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., 1 k., t. t. o., n., k. the remaining st. plain. Work the 17th, 19th, 21st, 23d, and 25th rounds like the 15th round, but in each succeeding round diminish the k. at the end of the round by 1 st. The 25th round completes one point of the lace. Repeat the 2d to 25th rounds, and finally knit the st. of the last round together with the foundation st. of the brides. In the same manner join the foundation st. of the narrower edging with the st. of the scarf previously gathered on a thread. Now join the narrower edging with the front edge of the fanchon, and the wider edging with the back edge of the fanchon; gather the st. of the crosswise edges, or ends of the crown, closely, and sew them to the under side of the strings. Sew on the bow as shown by the illustration.

Mignardise and Crochet Breakfast Cap.

See illustration on page 217.

THIS breakfast cap is made of fine mignardise and fine twisted crochet cotton. Through the open-work strips lilac satin ribbon three-tenths of an inch wide is run. Strings and bow of lilac satin ribbon an inch and a quarter wide. The strings are trimmed all around with crochet edging. The crown of the cap, for which Fig. 49, Supplement, gives half of the pattern, consists of separate rows of crochet insertion, which must be overhanded together on the under side of the cap, as is shown by the illustration. The middle row of insertion must run parallel with the middle line of the pattern. For each row of insertion work first on the loops of one lengthwise edge of the insertion as follows: 1st round.—* 1 ltc. (long treble crochet) on the first loop, 1 ch. (chain stitch), 1 tc. (treble crochet) on each of the following 4 loops; after each of these tc. 1 ch., 1 ltc. on the following loop, pass over 6 loops, and repeat from . 2d round.—After each upright st. (stitch) of the preceding round 1 dc. (double crochet); after each dc. 1 ch. 3d round.—2 sc. (single crochet) on each ch. of the preceding round. 4th round.—Always alternately 2 dc., 2 ch.; with the latter pass over 2 st. of the preceding round. 5th round.—2 stc. (short treble crochet) on each 2 dc. of the preceding round; after these 2 ch. 6th round.—2 dc. on each 2 stc. of the preceding round; after these 2 ch. Finally work the 1st and 2d rounds on the other side of the mignardise; in the 1st round always pass over the 6 loops which are opposite to each 6 longest upright st. of the other side of the work; in this way the scallops shown by the illustration are formed. Sew the insertions together as indicated by Fig. 49, letting the edge counting 6 rounds of one insertion come together with the edge counting 3 rounds of the next insertion. On the front edge of the completed crown work a round of single crochet from the middle to it on each side, in doing which catch the ends of thread standing over, and hold in the crown slightly at the middle. On the remainder of the outer edge work alternately 1 stc., 2 ch., and pass over the requisite number of stitches with the latter; through this stc. round run a piece of white elastic tape ten inches and a half long. Through the 5th round on one side of each insertion run the narrow satin ribbon above referred to. For the lace at the front edge of the cap work on the loops of one side of a piece of mignardise as follows: 1st round.— 1 sc. on each of the next 6 loops, after each sc. 1 ch.; pass over 6 loops, and repeat from . 2d round.— 2 sc. on the ch. between the 3d and 4th of the first 6 sc., 6 ch., and repeat from *. 3d round.—Always alternately 1 dc., 1 ch; with the latter pass over 1 st. of the preceding round. 4th round.—Always alternately 1 dc. on each ch., 1 ch. Now work on the loops on the other side of the mignardise; work one round like the 1st round, working each 6 sc. on the loops opposite the 6 loops passed over on the other side of the work. This round forms the scalloped outer edge of the edging. Sew this edging on the front edge of the cap from the middle to it on each side; at the middle of the front the edging must be laid in a few pleats. Trim the cap with a bow of satin ribbon, and sew on the strings. Work the edging for the latter in the same manner as that of the front of the cap, but on the 4th round work an additional open-work dc. round.

SNOW-DROPS.

SNOW-DROPS, beautiful snow-drops white,
Your fair heads nod in the dull gray light
Of the winter dawn, when the sole glad thing
Is the bold thrush tuning his pipe for Spring.

Elfins lurk in your tremulous bells,
When ye cower in the snow on the bare, bleak fells,
Where your green leaves gleam in a waste of white,
As the gold stars glint on a summer night,

With their calm, pure eyes in a sea of blue.
Ye shine, ye shine as a spirit true
Shines out with a holier steadier ray
When the dark night showeth least signs of day.

First flowers! oh, how doth their mention thrill
To the heart that is shrouded in winter still!
As the feeble wail of the new-born boy
In the mother-soul lights the lamp of joy.

Welcome ever the birth of Spring,
With her holy monitors whispering
Great Nature's lesson of simple truth
To the wayward ear and heart of youth!

Welcome, beautiful snow-drops white,
Harbingers of the sunshine bright;
Glad forerunners of lengthening hours,
Welcome, first of our Northern flowers!

A CAT WITH NINE LIVES.

SHE was once our pride, our glory! She became the torment of a peaceful household, a skeleton in our banqueting-hall, with this additional and unpleasant feature, that she wouldn't stay in the closet. But let me not anticipate.

I suppose there never was a family so devoted to cats as ours. It is a hereditary trait. Our maternal grandfather married a maiden lady of uncertain years, whom all her relatives agreed in pronouncing "a dreadful old cat." She had but one passion; it was for her puss. All that was richest and rarest—the breast of the chicken, the top layer of the cream—was reserved by long-established custom for this cherished favorite. The rocking-chair was her throne. Woe betide my grandfather if he attempted to usurp it. With her tail in a puff she flew at him (the cat, not my grandmother), and the vials of wrath were uncorked and emptied on his luckless head (by my grandmother, not the cat). All her property was left to our mother, her only child, with the exception of fifty dollars a year—a life interest—bequeathed to puss. My grandfather had not a stiver. And to us, too, she left the legacy of her prevailing passion. As a family, we are "cat mad."

"Whoe'er she be,
The not impossible she"—

the grimalkin of the moment—white, gray, black, tortoise-shell—rules the household. Never had monarch more obedient subjects. Lovely and cherished in their lives, in death they are not divided. A whole dynasty sleep in the garden, "each in his narrow cell forever laid," with a neat slab of shingle to mark his resting-place, bearing the name of the departed and the appropriate legend, "Rest-quiet-cat in pace." Genuine tears water these graves; and until we grew too big we always did them honor by walking thither in procession as a preliminary to interment. Need I say more, gentle reader? Do you not agree with me that if ever any people deserved well of the cat family, it is ourselves?

Her name was Paregoric in the happy days of youth and innocence. Afterward, when the blight came, it was changed to "Alaric." Truly she was a scourge. The outward animal was fair to look upon; but "handsome is that handsome does." That fur, soft and glossy, with its mottlings of yellow, black, and white; that waving tail; those lovely whiskers, so long, so winsome—had ceased to charm many, many weeks before she ceased to be!

What changed her nature I know not. It was something sudden—in a night, as it were. We went to bed, so to speak, hugging our chains. We awoke to find ourselves under the sway of a Fury—despotic, vindictive, irreconcilable. That Fury's name was Paregoric.

Kate skimmed the cream, as usual, and offered it on bended knee. This tribute our liege lady had been wont to receive graciously, with waving tail and titterating pur. This morning all was changed. With one foot planted in the saucer—a bold, free attitude (somehow it reminded me of the first Napoleon seizing the crown and placing it upon his own head)—she raised the other, and, hissing, clawed straight at Kate's cheek. No glove of velvet interposed—the long red mark attested that. And while Kate was rubbing the wound, clearing her saucer with fierce, resounding laps, she disappeared beneath the book-case. From this retreat nothing could entice her. In vain we prostrated ourselves; in vain adjured, in honeyed tones, "Pussy, pussy, poor pussy," to come forth. In vain Kate, her chief favorite, oblivious of injury, lay flat on the floor, wooing with every customary blandishment, and in literal pursuance of the Bible rule, "turning the other cheek." Nothing appeared except, for one instant, a quick, darting paw; when it disappeared, behold! there was a second scratch to match the first. What was to be done?

We hoped the grateful fragrance of dinner might prevail. So it did; but not precisely according to our meaning. The carving was barely commenced when, lo! a meteor appeared in mid-air—a meteor, or rather, I might say, a comet, for it bore a long tail. It was, in fact, the gentle Paregoric. With one bound she alighted in the middle of the platter. There, poised defiant, she made her selection, and, bone in mouth, executed another vault and regained her retreat. We were too stupefied to move—too wretched to eat. And the only sound which broke the awful stillness was a crunching from the distant book-case.

That dark day was but a prelude to many others. Emboldened by impunity, Paregoric waxed daily more insolent. She scratched, she bit, she made night hideous by caterwaulings, in which a select party of invited friends joined. It was at this time that she gained the name of Alaric. Sex considered, it was, perhaps, hardly appropriate; but then, as we contended, fiends have no sex. From her robber den beneath the book-case she made forays for revenge or plunder. No "Dicken-bend-the-bow" or "Wat of Harden" was ever more terrible. The tactics she employed were simple, like those of other freebooters; sudden sallies, sharp skirmishing, rapid retreat, and a desolated land behind her. One particularly dreadful feature was her using the spines of the family as a ladder or staircase for her vaulting ambition. It was so bad at last that nobody would sit that side the table, and we huddled on the other in a long cowering row. Order, symmetry, all household comfort, lost, our lives a burden, our tyrant equally inexorable and inaccessible, the time came when even gentle Kate revolted; and, first in whispers, then aloud, the resolution of our souls found vent in words. Pussy must be disposed of.

But how? We tried gentle methods. We "enticed" her, not "with handspikes," but with a persuasive broomstick, to leave the premises at once. She defied us. Like love, turned from the door, she entered again by way of the window. We invited her to drive, and, selecting a desirable farm-house at a distance from home, dropped her and drove away. The first time, taken by surprise, she was actually got out of the wagon; but, alas! the road was familiar to her as to ourselves, and when we got home she was there to greet us. At the second and third attempt she resolutely refused to be put out, and by dint of claws and teeth carried the point. Subsequently—grown wary—she disappeared the moment the horse came to the door. It was no use trying to "lose" her. Something more effectual was needed; it came to this: the cat must be killed.

Easy to say, but who was to do it? Kate, with her honorable scars still unhealed? Little Amy, shy and fair as a white kitten herself? Were they to be executioners? or was I, who could not put a cockroach to death without a pang, even when caught flagrante delicto in the sugar basin? Impossible! All our hopes centred in Edward. He was coming home! He was a man! He had a pistol! He would rid us of Alaric the Scourge.

Edward came. He is our only brother, and though I say it as shouldn't, the best boy in the world. His passion for cats equals our own. When we informed him the very first evening that Paregoric—otherwise Alaric—was to be sent to her account by his instrumentality, he became absolutely rigid with horror.

"Kill her!" he cried, "why, girls, what a cruel notion. Such a beauty, too. Poor puss! poor puss!" He stroked her glossy fur as she passed. "See, now, all she wants is gentle treatment," he went on, triumphantly—"gentle treatment, darlings. Try it a while, and you'll be convinced. You must have been rough with the poor thing."

Before long he changed his opinion. When his breakfast had thrice vanished from his plate—when a permanent cold chill had been established down his back, and his hands and face, by dint of repeated scratches, resembled a South Sea Islander's in full tattoo—"the deep damnation of her taking off" became easier of contemplation. He first endured, then embraced the idea. One morning he was seen cleaning his pistol, and soon after breakfast, with white lips, he announced that the hour had come—the hour and the man!

The girls fled up stairs. I shut my door. I was glad, but somehow didn't exactly want to hear the pop. However, by dint of straining my hearing not to hear, I heard; and next moment an agitated pair of boots clattered along the entry, and Edward flung the door open.

"Oh, Mary!"

"What is it?" I cried, for he was deadly pale.

"Dreadful! dreadful!" he gasped. "That poor animal! I have wounded—mangled her, without killing! She has crept away somewhere to die in agony!" And he sank in a chair and gave vent to a series of low groans.

"Where did it happen?"

"Out in the yard. She was chasing chickens, and had killed two. That gave me courage to fire; and when I looked she was just vanishing into the barn. She will die there by inches. I can not bear to think of it."

"What can we do?"

"Oh, I don't know!" flinging himself about. "You might go out and see if you could find her—and—yes, Mary dear, take the ether bottle with you; perhaps it may relieve her sufferings a little. Oh! oh!"

He was so miserable that I made him lie on the sofa, while Kate and I, bearing our palliative, went in search of his victim. High and low did we look—through loft, barn-yard and haymow; pathetically did we cry, "Kitty, kitty!" No answering mew replied. After an hour and a half we came back, shocked, excited, but with a certain sense of relief. The "scourge" was actually disposed of.

Alas! That evening, as we sat, a happy family, enjoying the cup which cheers without inebriating, and a repose of spirit long unknown, a heavy body, sudden and unexpected as an aerolite, descended upon our backs. I say "ours;" I believe it was mine; but each felt it as her own. There she was, a dreadful eidolon—tail waving, eyes emitting a fiery gleam; and in another moment, seizing a scrap of meat and upsetting the water-pitcher, she had vanished anew into her accustomed den. We looked at each other, speechless. Could such things be?

"Bridget," I asked that night, "did you see Master Edward when he shot the cat?"

"Indade, Miss Mary, I did."

"How was it?"

"I was looking out of the pantry windy, miss, and I seen it all. First he shut his eyes—dear young gintleman; it's the tender heart he has; niver's the baste or bird he'd harrm with his goodwill—and thin he pulled the pistil, and it wint bang, it did; but the cat, little she minded it. She was aff like a strake of lightning, scared like by the noise. No harm did she git, by my thinking, and bad scran to her!"

So Edward began by shutting his eyes! Perhaps that did account for it!

He was greatly relieved. "Poor pussy, poor pussy," I heard him saying, "I'll never kill you again—never." For a day or two she shone as a rescued martyr; then a change came, and he was overheard asking the doctor what was the proper poison to give a cat!

The next day Kate reported him mixing a white powder with pussy's breakfast. We asked no questions, but braced our minds for a tragedy.

Some hours passed peacefully by. "All was quiet along the Potomac." Edward came to sit with me. He looked nervous, but as time wore on grew calmer, and proposed to read aloud. I handed him Tennyson's last, and we were in the middle of the "Holy Grail," when a growl by no means holy was heard at the door, and in the middle of the room suddenly appeared—the cat!

Never more alive in her life—alert, strong, vindictive, from the tip of her whiskers to the tip of her tail. No tiger ever made a fiercer appearance. Edward stared as if he saw a ghost; then, sinking back in his chair, ejaculated, faintly, "Mary, that animal defies death."

She had swallowed the whole dose! It seemed to affect her merely as a gentle tonic, and I never knew her spirits and appetite better than they were that morning.

"Bedad," said old Peter, our gardening factotum, when he heard the story, "here's a hape of trouble about a plaguy baste. If Miss Mary says so, I'll kill her meself."

Glad enough was Miss Mary to "say so," and to lift the burden of assassination from the family shoulders. "Jist you ask no questions," he went on; "but lind me some bit of a bag. I'll engage ye've seen the last of her."

Something left the gate that afternoon, swinging from Peter's arm—something long and heavy—that waved and struggled wildly as it went. We averted our eyes, shuddered, and were thankful.

One hour later a terrific cry summoned us to the kitchen—Kate from the garden, Amy flying down stairs, Edward, book in hand, from the study. There stood Peter, pale and shaking, his eyes, big and round with terror, fixed upon an apparition which occupied the middle of the hearth—an apparition with damp, steaming fur and bedraggled tail, which licked itself and gave vent to muttered mews: in short, the apparition of Paregoric, returned, an uneasy ghost, from her watery grave.

"Ah, it's bewitched she is!" Peter was ejaculating. "Niver a hand I'll lay on her agin. She's not lucky, Miss Mary."

Of this we needed no convincing; but, what was still less lucky, the servants from this day stood in awe of her. No more "shooing" her out with a broom at the hands of Bridget! No more offers of aid from Peter! In vain we strove to eliminate the supernatural from the affair, representing that the bag was thin, the claws within sharp, their owner a noted swimmer. Charmed we never so wisely, the Hibernian ear was deaf. Matters became intolerable. Even human sympathy failed. People laughed so that we grew shy of relating our woes. Good Dr. Jones only stood our friend.

"Miss Mary, you are losing flesh," he said; "and Amy, your eyes have a frightened look in them. This won't do. Let me see—suppose I tackle this alarming beast?"

"Oh, doctor! Would you really? But what can you do? Water won't drown, and poison won't kill. What is there left?"

"Common-sense, my dear, the best of the lot. Just give me a basket and bag—a stout one this time, if you please—and I'll engage there shall be no more 'last appearances.'"

With what joyful alacrity did I devote one of my best pillow-cases to the service! Tied therein, she left the house in the doctor's gig; and as we heard the wheels roll away, a general sigh of satisfaction heaved our breasts. Our spectre was laid.

"Let no man call himself happy till he is dead." The very next morning when the doors were opened, there on the steps, damp but undaunted, sat a well-known figure—our bad shilling on our hands again. Bridget gave a scream of dismay, and, rushing between her legs, Paregoric entered and took possession of the premises.

Digitized by Google

"Without wishing to be superstitious," declared Edward, "it must be confessed that this is inexplicable."

A day or two, however, brought the explanation. It was low tide, it appeared, when the doctor, whirling by, flung the basket over the bridge, and it lodged on a mud flat. Some clam-diggers, spying it, waded out in hopes of treasure-trove, and brought it ashore. Their disgust may be imagined when, on the lifting of the lid, the stately Paregoric emerged. But little recked she, as, taking the homeward way, she prepared for us the agreeable surprise I have mentioned.

We succumbed. Useless to fly the country. Well we knew who would inevitably appear as part of the baggage at the journey's end. With the resignation of despair we accepted our fate, as thoroughly "subjective" as ever women were. And at this point, as her wont is, Fate veered suddenly about, and presented us with the other pole of her magnet—our torment left us. One night Paregoric disappeared. Waring's whereabouts are not more uncertain. "Them as isn't wanted in this world isn't wanted in the next," the excellent Mrs. Poyser asserts, so she can't be there; but whether dog, school-boy, or the longing for further worlds to conquer crossed her path we shall never know. She has probably ere this startled some other family with "the challenge of her knock;" and wherever or whoever they are, our sympathy, our prayers, are with them; and may Heaven in good time send sweet deliverance!

LIFE IN DRESDEN.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

AN observer of Dresden in the day-time would be apt to conclude that "all work and no play" is the rule of its inhabitants. For though there is nowhere in its streets any approach to the crash and confusion of Broadway, still business keeps up a steady jog-trot which extends to every nook and corner, and appears to embrace all classes of people; and the arts and trades are divided and subdivided into specialties, which demand many workmen and much skill.

But with the going down of the sun and the lighting of the lamps these toiling grubs become butterflies; in plain words, these sensible Germans give themselves up during the early evening to amusements calculated to recuperate their energies, and which, from the small expense required to procure them, make but little inroad upon the earnings of the hours of labor.

There is the theatre, where the plays of Shakspeare and the operas of Wagner are successfully performed; in saying which it is, of course, implied that all the lesser lights of the drama, whether in speech or music, are excellently illustrated by the actors and singers who form the royal company of the Dresden stage.

There are concert halls almost innumerable, blazing with gas-lights, and offering, besides the attraction of classical and popular music rendered by full orchestras of thoroughly trained performers, the accompanying charm of piping-hot suppers from the adjoining restaurant, and beer—cool and sparkling—from the vaults below. Here whole families take their evening meal, and mothers and daughters sit demurely knitting or crocheting, while fathers and brothers puff industriously at their cigars, and an occasional friend brings an accession of gayety and tobacco-smoke to the cheerful group.

There are various petty theatres, where farces are performed with side-splitting absurdity, and certain "cellars," frequented by men alone, where favorite comic singers produce uproarious mirth; but although the entertainment may be of a low order in some of these resorts, the music is sure to be good and artistically rendered. On Sunday and Monday evenings many of the public halls are open for dancing, and are well patronized by soldiers, petty tradesmen, and servant-girls, the last of whom betray no weariness after the week's drudgery, but spin around like tops, with a grace and precision of which their heavy figures and slouched gait gave no premonition.

With the exception of the masquerades of carnival time, and an occasional ball of unusual gayety, the various public amusements in this part of the world begin early and close early. Just think of a royal opera, honored by the presence of the king, queen, princesses, and ladies and gentlemen of the court, commencing at half past six o'clock, and ending at a few minutes after nine! Indeed, before eleven the streets of Dresden are silent and deserted, excepting by an occasional belated passenger, or messenger on some errand for the sick. One remarkable feature of this city is the safety with which an individual, even a woman, can traverse the streets at night. There are no police to be seen, and there seems to be no occasion for their services, though, doubtless, they are within call if they should be needed. There are no drunkards, no brawlers disturbing the peace by their outcries; nor are the public ways haunted after dark by fallen women, as in many other cities, especially London. It would be putting too much faith in appearances and in the strength of human nature to suppose that vice in its most hideous forms does not exist in this large city; but it is, at any rate, well hidden from eyes that do not wish to see it, and only occasional intimations of social irregularities and the follies which lead to vice are afforded by the "personal" notices in certain columns of one of the daily papers, which columns are appropriately called by the editor, Eselswiese (ass's pasture)!

The prospect of peace rejoices every body, from the king, who has grown old and care-worn under the anxieties of his government and the sorrows of his people, down to the American lady, who now sees a probability of recovering her eleven trunks, full of finery, which have been shut up in Paris since the commencement of the siege. For three days after the arrival of the joyful telegram Dresden was gay with flags and banners and streamers of the German, Prussian, and Saxon colors.

Apropos of the universal interest felt in the war, a good story is told of a little boy of seven years old, who, on one of these occasions of rejoicing, having followed a military procession through the streets, came home late to dinner. As he was about to attack his cold soup his mother reminded him to ask a blessing before commencing to eat, whereupon the little fellow, full of the sights he had just witnessed, laid down his spoon, folded his little hands, and solemnly repeated:

"Lieber Gott! 'Kannst ruhig sein;
Fest steht und treu die Wacht am Rhein!" Amen."

The anticipated departure of the fifteen thousand French prisoners is a cause of rejoicing to their entertainers as well as to themselves. They are as well taken care of as circumstances will admit; but they have no doubt felt the unusual severity of the season, especially as they failed to procure their winter outfit from the spoils of Berlin, according to the original plan of the French campaign. They are to be met with every where in public places, escorted by a few Saxon soldiers, who are well armed, but otherwise apparently friendly. Occasionally there is an escape of prisoners, who, at this distance from their home and friends, probably only go further to fare worse. An amusing incident happened lately at a village between Dresden and Leipsic, where an honest citizen—a nail-smith—came under suspicion of having harbored a runaway French prisoner, through his having remarked that a stranger, naked and destitute and unable to speak a word of German, had recently come to his house in the night and been fed and clothed and properly cared for. This story was repeated until it came to the ears of the police, who immediately made a descent upon the nail-smith's cottage, armed with full tokens of their authority to search the house and arrest both the prisoner and his protector. The good man listened to their demand without any signs of fear, as, with a smile on his lip and a merry twinkle in his eye, he preceded the officers into the next room, and showed them his new-born son lying quietly in bed beside its happy mother!

Among the many societies, literary and scientific, which hold regular or occasional meetings in Dresden, the Psychological Association deserves mention, from the recent discussions on the immortality of the soul held in one of the largest halls of the city, which was filled with an intelligent and attentive audience, many of whom proposed questions and took part in the debate. The principal speaker was a learned doctor of medicine from Vienna, a decided materialist, who strengthened his positions by many striking incidents of his professional experience. He was supported by a portion of the thinkers among his audience and opposed by others; and if the question were not satisfactorily settled, there was at least considerable friction of ideas, and the display of much intellectual activity.

As an offset to this feast of reason may be mentioned the excitement which has existed for some time among the Catholics of Dresden and its vicinity over the reputed miraculous cure of a village girl through an interview vouchsafed her with the Virgin Mary. A church has been erected upon the site of this miracle, and the precise spot where the Virgin stood is marked by a slab of marble, upon which a great variety of articles, principally linen for the sick, is laid, and, after consecration by prayer, sold at an increased price, on account of its curative properties, to the eager worshipers. A brother of the girl has opened a restaurant in the immediate vicinity of his sister's devotional cell; so that, altogether, the family may be said to be prospering both temporally and spiritually.

The Princess Maria, wife of Prince George, and mother of the heir-presumptive to the crown of Saxony (for the Crown Prince has no legitimate children), recently made a pilgrimage to this shrine, and remained for several hours in prayer at the foot of the altar in the little church, leaving on her departure substantial tokens of her faith in the miracle, as also a promise to build a dome upon the church, and taking with her a quantity of the consecrated clothing for the use of the royal children.

Although America may be in despair at the failure of French fashions, Germany, with laudable patriotism, has resolved to be independent of Paris henceforth in this matter, and milliners, tailors, hatters, and shoe-makers are already at work with an enthusiasm worthy of a better cause. It has even been proposed through the public press to establish a distinctive German dress for both sexes; and, beginning at the beginning of the head of creation, the man's hat has already been decreed and fashioned.

Already Dresden boasts of a new magazine of fashion, called Germania, which is adorned with colored illustrations, and filled with wise suggestions concerning the mysteries of the toilette. Indeed, it seems quite probable that this quiet city may hereafter compete successfully with Berlin and Munich in laying down millinery laws for the new German empire, as its inhabitants have long been noted (among their German brethren and sisters) for their love of rich attire, and their high estimation of its importance as a weapon of social success.

Nicolai, in his "Letters about Saxony," published in 1786, speaks of this love of finery of the people of Dresden, which was often in strange contrast to the poverty of their homes and the meagreness of their tables. Man sieht den Leuten auf den Kragen, nicht in den Magen, was a Dresden proverb of that time, which might be translated, "One sees folks' stomachers, but not their stomachs."

Probably this traditional fondness for fine dress is a relic of the splendors of the court of Augustus the Strong and his successors. Certain it is that the present royal family are exceedingly plain in their appearance: the king appears in public in a simple uniform, and the queen wears a good grandmotherly cap, that suits well with the benevolent expression of her features.

E.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

THE beautiful color known as Magenta can be manufactured from a species of moss called "orchilla," and this is now frequently used as a substitute for the much more expensive "cochineal." The orchilla grows in great abundance in some parts of Ecuador, chiefly on bushes and rocks near the sea, and it has become an important article of commerce. A few months ago an agent of a wealthy firm in Ecuador came to this country in search of some locality where this lichen could be found. He discovered that it grows in immense quantities in Lower California. He at once made a contract with the Lower California Company for the right to gather and export it. He then came to New York to obtain a colony of persons to go to Lower California for the purpose of gathering it. Recently between three and four hundred men, women, and children, of various nationalities, sailed from this port in the steamer Ocean Queen, bound for Magdalena Bay. In addition to the wages given for service, one hundred and sixty acres of land are promised to every colonist who remains six months. Orchilla is said to be worth $300 a ton, and that in some regions it is so abundant that four or five persons may gather a ton in one day.

A volcanic eruption is predicted from Mount Rainier, in Washington Territory. Generally during the hottest summer weather the snow on the summit is but partially melted. Now the heat is so great as to melt the snow, there is a constant emission of steam, and even smoke is reported to have been seen by persons living in the vicinity.

We will not believe the reporter who says that the latest innovation is the introduction of cigarettes for ladies at the fashionable dinners of New York. They are said to come in with the coffee, on silver salvers, and to be used with nonchalant ease by fair, jeweled fingers—strictly as a remedy for neuralgia! Doubtless smoking is one of "woman's rights" just as much as it is one of man's; but the woman who practically claims it will not, we fancy, be troubled with claimants for her hand.

The victorious Prussians cover all reflections which are thrown upon their generosity in dealing with their vanquished foe by remembrances of the fatal battle of Jena, which was fought on October 14, 1806. About twenty thousand Prussians were killed in that battle, and more than thirty thousand taken prisoners. The king fled from the field; the Duke of Brunswick received his death wound upon it; all the principal fortresses surrendered to the victorious French, who, on the 25th of October, 1806, entered Berlin, Napoleon I. making his triumphal entry on the following day.

The large proportion of calorific rays in artificial light is what causes fatigue to the eyes. Meunier states that about half of the sun's rays are luminous and half calorific; but the amount of calorific rays in gas is ninety per cent., and in petroleum and paraffine oils ninety-four per cent. This difficulty is largely obviated by glass or mica plates.

Some interesting details concerning the payment of the war indemnity exacted of the city of Paris are given by the Paris correspondent of the London Daily News. This indemnity amounted to 200,000,000 francs, and when conveyed to Versailles, inclosed in two iron chests, was composed one half of drafts upon Berlin, and the other half of notes of the Bank of France. The Prussian receivers wanted to check the amount, notwithstanding that the seals were intact, a fact to which their attention was directed, as a guarantee of the integrity of the contents. In return a sum of 50,000,000 francs in notes was handed over to the French commissioners, to be exchanged—still according to the convention—against 30,000,000 in gold and 20,000,000 in silver. The French commissioner insisted upon the verification of the 50,000,000 returned into his hands. When the Bank of France remitted the first installment of 7,000,000 francs in silver the Prussian agents proceeded to count it; but, perceiving the operation would occupy too much time (at the rate of 1000 a minute a man would need 116 consecutive hours to perform this arithmetical feat), they contented themselves with weighing the coin. The remainder of the 50,000,000 was paid in a few days, the whole sum having been drawn by the Bank of France from its branch at Brest.

The Senate Chamber in the Capitol at Washington is 112 feet long and 82 feet wide. Its height is 36 feet, and the gallery is capable of seating 1000 persons. The proper ventilation of this apartment, where thinking men sit through long sessions, and important national business is transacted, has been deemed a matter worthy of the most serious consideration. Previous to November 1, 1870, it was ventilated in the ordinary method, the heated air from the furnaces entering through registers in the walls and risers in the floor, and the vitiated air escaping by natural processes through ventilators. Last November a new method of combined ventilation and heating was introduced by Mr. H. F. Hayden, chief engineer of the Senate, which has proved so successful that a short time ago Congress made an appropriation of $20,000 for the purpose of introducing like improvements into the Hall of Representatives. A detailed explanation of the heating and ventilating apparatus of the Senate would be too lengthy for this column; but by means of two immense fans the entire air in the Senate Chamber may be changed in thirty minutes—fresh air being forced up through registers and risers, and the vitiated air carried off through pipes in the ceiling, which connect with the external air. Moreover, the fresh air is hydrated by passing it through a mist of water, which not only produces an agreeable result when it is heated, but also sinks mechanical impurities. As the Hall of Representatives is 139 feet long and 93 wide, and the gallery capable of holding 1200 or 1500 persons, its ventilation is an important matter. The new arrangements and necessary changes are to be made during the coming summer, under the charge of Mr. Edwin Clark, architect of the Capitol extension.

The attempt to dispose of the copper-plates for the pictures of Audubon's "Birds of America" at any fancy price was unsuccessful, and they were finally sold simply as old copper. They will, however, be framed and kept as curiosities. The original cost was $100,000, but new methods for producing the same style of work much cheaper render the use of these too costly.

There is sound philosophy, or rather physiology, in the practice of prefacing a meal with soup, especially to those who hurry from work to dinner. When the body is weary the stomach participates in the general fatigue, and can not bear the shock of hastily masticated beef, for example. A light soup strengthens the system to receive and be nourished by more substantial food.

The Chinese apparently think more of the quantity than the quality of the remedies they take in sickness. A Chinese physician ordinarily prescribes thirty or forty pills for a dose, and no smaller draught than a pint. Some years ago, when a treaty was being arranged between England and China, one of the Chinese commissioners was taken sick, and applied to the physician of the British embassy for some medicine. A box of pills was sent him, with the direction to take two for a dose. The commissioner, however, thought this must be a mistake, and took the entire boxful at once—a feat which, unfortunately, he did not long survive.

A German medical journal contains a new theory concerning sleep—that it is the result simply of the deoxygenation of the organism. According to this doctrine, the blood and the tissues possess the property of storing up the oxygen inhaled, and then supplying it in proportion to the requirements of the economy. When this store of oxygen is exhausted, or even becomes too small, it no longer suffices to sustain the vital activity of the brain, nervous system, muscles, etc., and the body falls into that particular state which we call sleep. During the continuance of this sleep fresh quantities of oxygen are being stored up in the blood to act as a supply to the vital powers. Rest produces, though in a less degree, the same effect as sleep in reducing the expenditure of oxygen.

A gay Tennessee belle had gained the reputation of being most emphatically a "girl of the period." She kept her lover in a state of despair, having refused him many times. She was esteemed faithless and frivolous; but the time soon came for her to redeem her character. One day there was a terrible railroad accident, and the rejected lover had both legs crushed off. The apparently heartless girl devoted herself to his consolation, and married him on crutches the first day the doctors allowed him to go out.

An American passenger in the first train that carried exiles back to Paris wrote his impressions as follows:

"You should see the condition of the suburbs of Paris, even so much as we could see from the Northern Railroad. St. Denis is half destroyed. The beautiful villas along the road are utterly wrecked, and look like a London house twenty years in Chancery, with every window broken. Many are burned. Alas for the poor exiles who come back to find their homes, bare walls at best, in many cases but ashes! Near the enceinte the train stopped, and the Prussian officer examined the papers of every passenger. He was a handsome young nobleman, born to command. Power was in every tone of his voice, and every motion of his body. It was a concentration of imperiousness and hauteur. He took my passport, read aloud a line of the German indorsement in a tone of lofty veneration, the name of Count Bernstorff, then glanced at the indorsement of Mr. Washburne, who has won such golden opinions in Paris, and handed it back to me with a proud civility. It was clear enough that I could go where I liked. In a few moments we were at the Gare du Nord. Not a glimmer of gas; not a cab. The place was desolate. I hastened into the streets. They were as dark as those of a country village. The lamps burned dimly; the few shops open were badly lighted. I found an omnibus, and made my way to my accustomed hotel in the Rue de Rivoli. Paris is so brilliant lighted with gas, and now it was all like a funeral. No carriages, little traffic, only lamps and candles. It is going back to the Dark Ages."

An appropriation of $500,000 has been made by Congress for a new building for the State Department at Washington; and it is probable that it will be constructed by the engineer corps of the army, as other public buildings in the capital have been.

It appears that Bismarck is likely to join the great company of authors in due time. He is said to have kept a complete diary of all public events, and his personal relation thereto, for the last thirty years; and he intends to prepare, as soon as the Continental troubles are over, a history of his own times. He is a clear, terse, and forcible writer, and his style is well adapted to such a work.

Ceylon is evidently not designed as a residence for those who are dependent for their enjoyment upon musical instruments. The dampness of the climate is so excessive that although a piano may be taken to pieces and dried in the sun as a preparation for a musical entertainment, the keys may that very evening remain down, so as to give no sound. Stringed instruments almost fall to pieces, as common glue loses all its adhesion in that country.

The want of ability to sleep well is an indication of impaired health which demands prompt attention. As a remedy for this, Dr. Hall recommends that present associations be broken up, whatever may be the sacrifice; that some more active employment be undertaken; or a long journey be taken, on horseback, if possible, and with a good companion. A great specific is to be vigorously employed in the open air a large portion of the time.

Digitized by Google

THE BABY HIPPOPOTAMUS.

THE accompanying illustration is from a photograph of the infant hippopotamus whose advent at the London Zoological Gardens recently caused such a flutter of excitement there as being the first of his race born in England; but, unfortunately, he did not live long to enjoy that distinction. The tropical little strangers who are born in the north never do. The climate is too severe for their tender constitutions, and they find hot-water pipes and blankets but sorry substitutes for burning suns. When the pythoness some years ago was trying to hatch her eggs, she, if we remember rightly, swallowed her blanket, no doubt to show her contempt for such a poor make-shift. The change from their own country must be trying enough to the mature animals; but the little ones can not stand our climate at all, and this last sensation in animal life has been "nipt away" a few days old. The first hippopotamus ever seen alive in Europe since the reign of Gordian III. in Rome, in the third century, was captured on the banks of the Nile, and brought to London in 1850. It was then supposed to be about ten months old, but was already seven feet long and six and a half feet girth in the middle of the body.

We do not think we can do better than quote Mr. Frank Buckland's description of the baby monster, which we take from Land and Water. These are his words:

"Looking through the window of the observatory, I saw the mother lying full length—she is about twelve feet long—with her huge head and enormous mouth flat on the ground; the baby was in a corner, lying upon its side, with its nose close to its mother's nose. Whether by design or accident I know not, but the mother has chosen an excellent place for her child, for the corner in which the little thing is lying is formed by the junction of the hot-water pipes, so that this is about the warmest place in the den. The morning sun also falls upon the spot. The baby is about four feet long, and would be about fifteen inches high when standing up. It is about the size and weight of, and not unlike in general appearance to, a three-score bacon pig; its general color is reddish mahogany; the head is very like the head of a calf; the forehead and fore part of the head appear as if varnished with a black varnish. Imagine a calf's head of India rubber, and you will have a good idea of the face of this sucking Behemoth. Every now and then it lifts up its head and looks stupidly about; it often wags violently its little rudder-like tail, without rising from the straw; it also shakes its ears with the curious jerking motion peculiar to the hippopotamus. I fancy this motion is to throw out any water that may have got into the ears."

The mother is described as being very watchful, opening her great eyes every minute, looking intently "with her left eye at the window from which she is being watched, while her right is steadfastly fixed upon her baby," and cocking her ears at the least sound. But we are sorry to say that all her care was powerless to save her little one. After a few days of languid existence it died from exhaustion on the 24th of February.

Its birth and death were commemorated by Punch in an exquisitely absurd poem, which we lay before our readers. Can any thing more comic be imagined than baby talk addressed to a hippopotamus?

THE BIRTH OF THE HIPPOPOTAMUS.

Sung with great applause by La Mère Hippopotama in the Zoological Gardens, Regent's Park. Little Hippopotamus born February 21. Vide Notice in London Times of the 23d.

Now, Massa, tie de knocker up, put straw down round de Park,
Don't let dere be de slightest noise, partic'lar arter dark;
And wire to de Palace, and tell our gracious Queen
'Tis de prettiest little 'potamus as ebber yet war seen.

(Nurse's Cradle Chorus.)

A pooty ittle tiddy ittle funny little lotamus,
Such a little ducky ob a darling hippopotamus;
Dis mamma an' baby, wot a lubly little lot am us,
Hip pip pip pooray! for de little Hippopotamus.

Now, why ain't Massa Buckland here? it make me berry riled
To tink dat Zoologic man should dus neglect dis child;
What's elefiints, or tigers, or porpoises, or seals,
To dis ere lubly infant when it's taking ob its meals?

Dar! if 't 'ad been de wulgar seal as had been a mamma,
Dere 'd ha' been such a fuss about it made as nebber war;
But 'cos it am de 'potamus, not fishy-tailed and finny,
Dat Mr. Buckland don't rush up to see dis pickaninny.

I don't like de attenshuns ob de genelmum my guards:
Why don't dey come and tell me when de Monkeys leave dere cards?
I'm sure dat de Ourang-outang, who reads de paper through,
Hab sent to know how me and dis poor pickaninny do.

I'm tinking ob de future, ob my little baby—La!
It am de berry image ob de 'potamus papa;
And to tink dey thought me "surly" and "a savage!" 'twas unkind,
Unfeeling! berry much so! me forgib 'em, nebber mind.

Dey printed in de Times dat I might "bite" my pickaninny!
When I wouldn't a hair upon him hurt for twenty guinea.
I'll devour him wid kisses, but I tell you what, my dear,
I'll devour any nigger dat try to come in here.

Dat it am born in London and not Paris I am grateful,
Ob little sucking 'potamus dey'd soon ha' made a plateful,
Much tend'rer den a little squeaking piggy, goodness knows,
And, oh! de little 'potamus's little petty toes!

Den tanks for all inquiries, me charmed to send and tell
To eb'ry body friendly dat we are doing berry well;
And now let Peace and Plenty be in French and German lands;
Come see dis little 'potamus, and shake each oder's hands.

(All singing de Cradle Chorus.)

A pooty ittle tiddy ittle funny little lotamus,
Such a little ducky ob a darling hippopotamus;
Dis mamma an' baby, wot a lubly little lot am us!
Hip hip hip hooray! for de little Hippopotamus.

P.S.

(February 25.)

De nigger which hab wrote out de above amazin' lyric
Hab suddenly been took and throw'd in wiolent hysteric;
De pickaninny 'potamus hab since absquotulated—
Dis note (not like Sir Bobinsou's) must darefore be post-dated.

EDUCATED WOMEN SEEKING EMPLOYMENT.

IF we ask the question, "Where is, for an educated woman, employment to be found?" with a sad feeling of that we really do not know, we are not less despondent when we ask, "What is she able to do?" A woman called (by courtesy rather than truth) educated, is, of course, possessed of a certain amount of learning; more or less, as the case may be. But this has generally been acquired in such a loose, cursory manner that it can be turned to very little account.

A girl's school-education is generally superficial in the extreme. She may nominally learn reading, writing, arithmetic, geography, history, music, French, and perhaps either German or Italian; but the real knowledge of any of these which she gains is very limited. A smattering of all—scarcely a sound rudimentary acquaintance with one. It must be so, for her teachers are as superficial as herself; and, indeed, it not rarely happens that a clever girl could thoroughly puzzle her teacher if they were to change places for ten minutes. It would startle many of the advocates of women's rights if they knew how little (so-called) educated women really knew. It is sad enough to see a girl willing and anxious to work, and not to know where to find employment for her. Sadder still to give her some trifling employment, and to find her incompetent; to have to speak words which, however gently said, are ungracious, to see her cheeks tingling with shame or anger, and to watch her choking down feelings of disappointment; to feel that there is nothing before her but dependence upon the labor of a husband, whose home she probably does not know how to keep in comfort, or else a life of perpetual struggle and misery, or, worst of all, one of sin and disgrace.

What, then, can be done for you, educated young women? A large proportion of you are unconscious of your incompetence; some will perhaps be angry at the mere suggestion of its existence. But listen to the suggestion, and look it steadily in the face, unpleasing as it is. While clever men are making you and your claims the subject of deep thought, do you think too. Think whether there are not personal difficulties within yourselves as well as those which are social. Think whether you can not yourselves do something toward solving one of the great problems of the day.

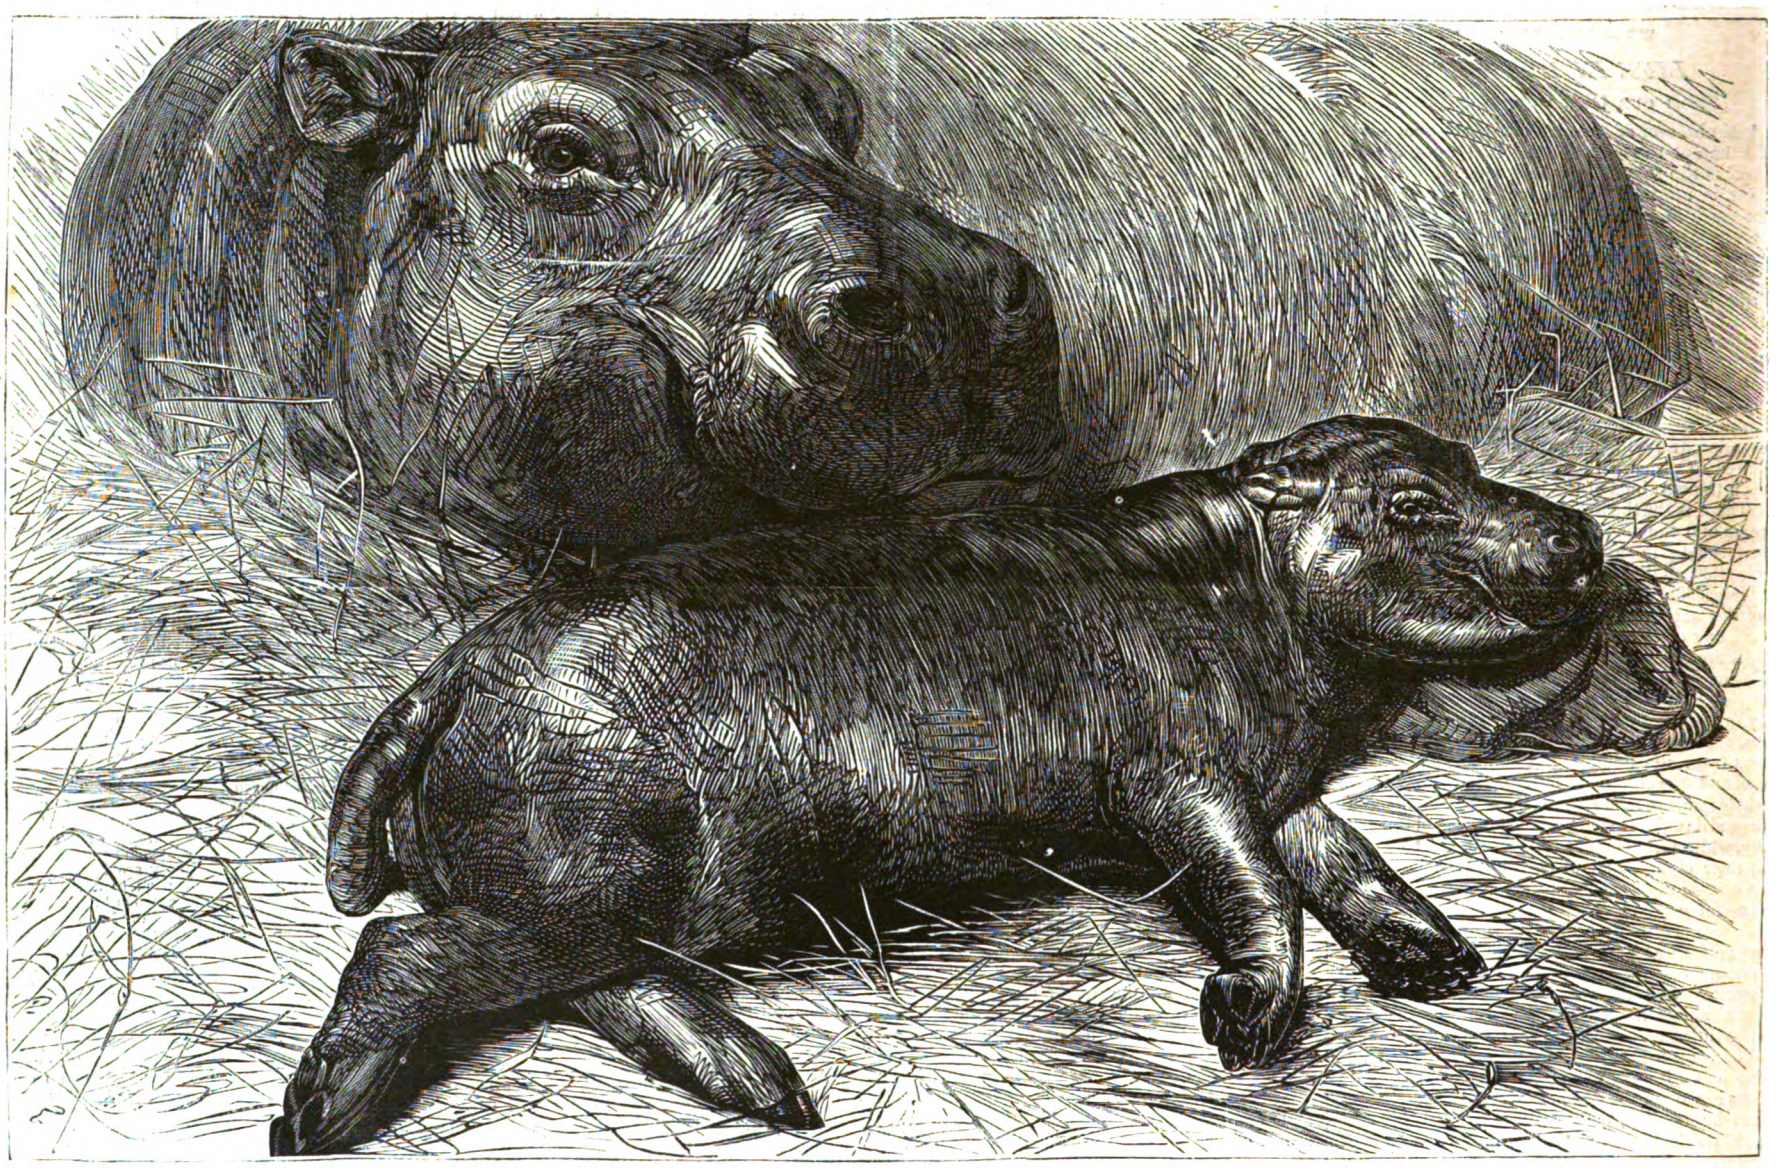
Help can not be given to incompetence. There never yet was, and never will be, a demand for bad work. Work must rise to the level of the employer's requirement, else the worker will not get employment. Or if, from peculiar circumstances, she should get it occasionally, it will be uncertain, and at low pay. Legislation will never induce us to employ bad workers.

Women must set to work to improve themselves. They can not hear too often the old truth that our best education is that which we give ourselves. In the race for work girls will find that in every thing except needle-work they must compete with men. Men will run alongside with them, struggling for the same prizes; and men generally have an advantage in the start. The girl, then, who wishes for a chance of success must educate herself carefully. She must be ready for the first opening. She must be prepared to do well the first work which may be offered to her. She must have nothing for time and experience to teach her that she can possibly teach herself. And she must not expect her untried efforts to secure for her those positions which are the reward of years of trained labor.

ENTERTAINMENT AT THE CAPITAL.

THERE are some houses in Washington affording room for entertainment in the grand style. Of course the diplomats obtain the best of these at once; but there are many others quite equal in elegance, if not always in capacity. Not to speak of Mr. Corcoran's, with its picture-gallery and its immense gardens, nor of the mansion at the Smithsonian, castellated and medieval, nor of any of the private houses, indeed, there are such dwellings as that in which Mrs. Fish dispenses her famous hospitality, always elegant, always on reception days thronged with her own country people, and, since its mistress can speak to them in their own court language, seldom neglected by any one of the whole seventy of the diplomats. There is Mr. Blaine's splendid house, spacious as a palace, the windows full of flowers; there is Fernando Wood's, by which it is the fashion to drive, and admire the delicacy and beauty of the lace curtains; there is Mr. Sumner's, overflowing with specimens of all the arts; there is Mrs. Pomeroy's, sumptuously furnished, the very gas-jets being like pieces of jewelry, and the walls lined with costly paintings, and so conveniently situated that in any stress of guests the dining-rooms of the Arlington House can be thrown together with its own. Mrs. Butler's parlors are some of the handsomest in Washington. They are in the former dwelling of Howell Cobb, now much altered and enlarged, and very richly and chastely furnished. They contain many articles of great beauty, among others some large Sèvres vases covered with exquisite designs, and a portrait of Rachel in Phèdre, taken from the life, where the wonderful beauty and serpentine grace portrayed fire the blood of all those fortunate beings who can recall that demoniac creature. In the dining-rooms beyond hang fruit pieces by Lawson, fish by Walter Brackett, and game by Loring; and the double drawing-rooms above make the house capable of magnificent receiving. Nothing could exceed its appearance on the night of a great party, when fairly lined with flowers—chandeliers, door-ways, pictures, mantel-pieces streaming with them, and the whole repeated, with the blaze of wax-lights and the splendor of guests, in the great mirrors.

Mrs. Chandler's residence is quite noted for its pictures, there being some twenty thousand dollars' worth there, together with a real Rubens, an undoubted head, which Mr. Cass, then our representative at Rome, learned was to be disposed of for some weighty reasons, and concealing the fact till he was authorized by Mr. Chandler to procure it at any price, he distanced the greedy galleries and collectors abroad before they scented the prize.



THE BABY HIPPOPOTAMUS.

Digitized by Google

Trimmings for Under-Skirts, Children's Dresses, etc., Figs. 1–6.

THESE trimmings may be used for children's dresses, under-skirts, aprons, etc., and are made of merino, barège, silk, gros grain, satin, etc. Those of silk or satin ribbon, or alpaca braid, are suitable for fancy work, such as pockets, sewing weights, negligé baskets, key baskets, etc. When the trimmings are made of thin silk or woolen material, the strips of material should be lined with foundation.

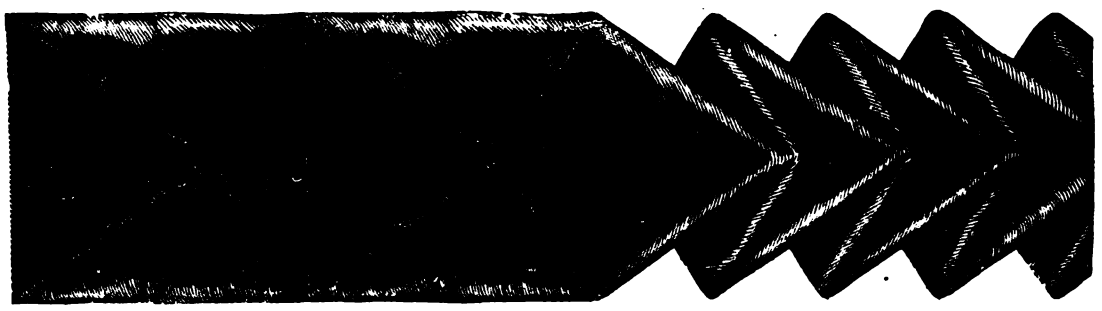


Fig. 1.—TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRTS, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 1.—To make this trimming a straight strip of the material two inches and two-fifths wide is required. Turn down each lengthwise edge on the wrong side two-fifths of an inch, transfer the lines and signs on the illustration to the material, and lay the latter in an outer fold along each dotted line, and in an inner fold along the straight lines between each two dotted lines, fasten × on ●, so that the material along the vertical straight line may also form an inner fold. Fasten the layers of pleats thus formed with a few stitches, which must not show on the right side; and repeat this arrangement of pleats to the end of the strip.

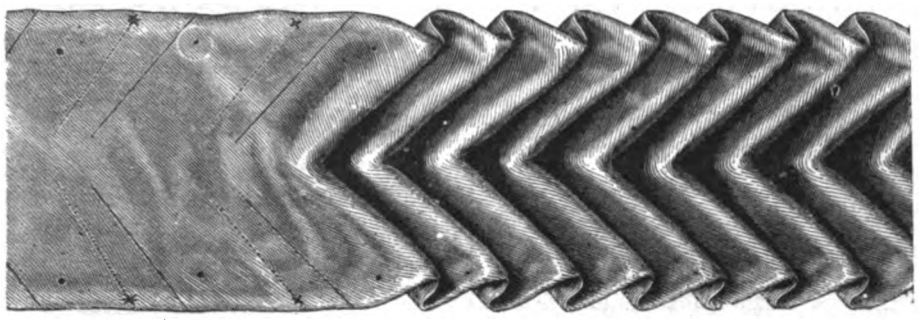

Fig. 2.—TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRTS, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 3.—TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRTS, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 2.—For this trimming take a straight piece of material two inches and four-fifths wide. Fold the lengthwise edges over on the wrong side three-fifths of an inch; transfer the lines and signs on the illustration to the material, lay the latter in an outer fold along each of the first two dotted lines lying opposite each other, bringing × on ●, and fasten the pleats thus formed with a few stitches, which must not show on the outside. Along the straight line the material forms an inner fold.

Fig. 3.—For this trimming take a straight piece of the material two inches and four-fifths wide, fold each lengthwise edge over on the wrong side three-fifths of an inch, and transfer the lines and signs on the illustration to the strip. Then lay the material in an outer fold along each dotted line, first on one side, then on the other, and fasten the pleats, bringing × on ●. The straight lines indicate the inner folds.

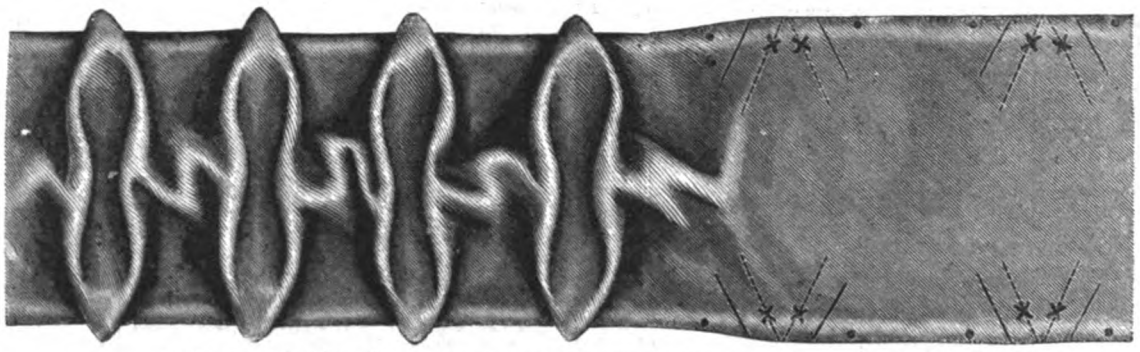

Fig. 4.—TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRTS, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 4.—For this trimming take a straight piece of the material two inches and three-fifths wide, fold each lengthwise edge over on the wrong side two-fifths of an inch, transfer the lines and signs on the illustration to the strip, and pleat the material, laying it in an outer fold along each dotted line and, bringing × on ●, fasten the pleats with a few stitches. Along each straight line an inner fold is formed.

Fig. 5.—For this trimming take a straight piece of the material two inches and two-fifths wide. Fold over each lengthwise edge on the wrong side two-fifths of an inch, and transfer the signs and lines on the illustration to the material. Pleat the strip by laying it in an outer fold along each dotted line, and in an inner fold along the straight lines. In this way regular box-pleats are formed, the upper and under edges of which must be joined at the point indicated with ×, and fastened with a small button at the point indicated with ●, so as to give the pleats the appearance shown by the illustration.

Fig. 6.—Take a straight piece of the material three inches and a fifth wide, and fold the lengthwise edges over on the wrong side four-fifths of an inch. Transfer the lines, signs, and figures on the illustration to the material, taking great care to observe exactly the distance between each 4 and 4 lines, and the course of the latter. Lay the material in an outer fold along the first dotted line, and in an inner fold along the following straight line, and fasten × 1 on ● 1. In this manner form all the pleats, always fastening each × on the ● correspondingly marked. These trimmings are all given in full size in the illustrations, and are tasteful and easily made by inexperienced hands.

AT A LONDON FURRIER'S.

THE first room which we enter is the "bear-room." Literal "bear-garden" as it is—5000 bears are represented in it by their skins. But what a scene this bear-room would be, to be sure, if every skin were to be rehabilitated by its living occupant, and 5000 bears—grizzly, polar, brown, black, and gray—were to spring into sudden vitality! Very soon we find that the value of bear-skins is in the inverse ratio to their size and to the ferocity of the animal in life. Here is the skin of a polar bear that measures 10 feet by 7. When alive, the huge rascal most likely frightened many a peaceful whaler; but now mankind has its revenge upon him. He may think himself lucky if his shaggy white hide sells for a pound, and men will wipe their feet on the skin of him at whom they would have shuddered when alive. Sic transit. Nor does the formidable "grizzly" fare much better in the fur market. His fierceness and his rarity combined make his skin a scarce commodity—there are only 300 grizzlies in the room; but he goes dirt-cheap for all his scarceness, and his pell is chiefly used in the manufacture of artists' brushes, the long hair being pulled out for this purpose. There was a time—it is about twenty-five years ago, so, of course, none of the ladies can remember it—when the brown bear was in high favor with the fair sex. His fur was very fashionable, displayed as a narrow trimming round the edges of shawls. In those palmy days a fine "cinnamon" bear-skin was worth $150. But capricious fashion has altered, and now the best "brown" strives in vain to fetch $17 50.

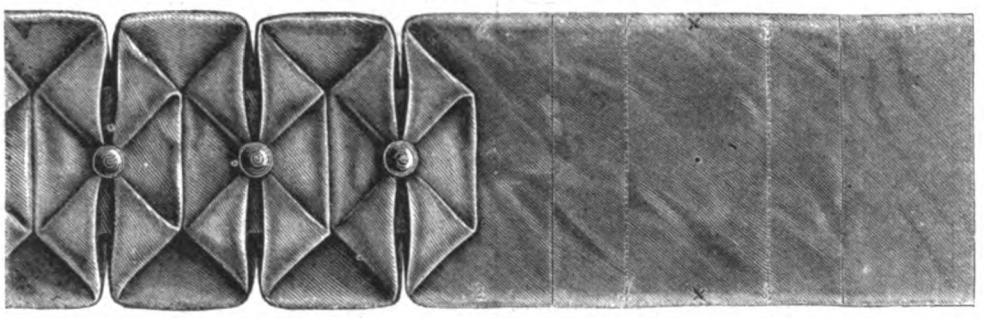

Fig. 5.—TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRTS, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

In the next room is quite a menagerie of foxes—crop fox, red fox, bastard fox, arctic fox, kitt or prairie fox, blue fox. The crop fox is gray, with a tinge of red and silver. A good skin is worth $12; and he is chiefly used for muffs and cloak linings. The red fox is a tawny animal, shading away into a bright yellow on the sides, and with a white belly. The darker and richer the fur the greater the value; but $3 50 will buy the best of the red foxes, which are also mostly made into muffs, the lower qualities being dyed and used for cloak linings. The arctic fox has a beautiful fur, pure snowy white, the best of them preserving that hue right down to the skin—"blowing white to the ground," as it is technically called. The pile is very thick, soft, and close, and it is one of the warmest of furs. The prairie or kitt fox is a shabby little beast, about the size of a hare, with poor, woolly, gray fur, which is used for common cloak linings and the lower classes of chaise wrappers. Here in a corner are some otter-skins, with nice, short, soft fur, carrying a beautiful gloss. The blacker they are the better. Pretty as they are, ladies have not much reason to regard them with favor. They are cheap in comparison with fur-seal, and are too often used to imitate that article in the manufacture of professedly "real seal-skin" cloaks. Thus, madam, your "real seal-skin jackets" may only be "real otter." They are also used by gentlemen for coat-collars and fur great-coats. It will not do to confound between the "otter" and the "sea-otter." If a lady could get a jacket of "sea-otter" in a mistake for fur-seal, she would be a wise woman to hold her tongue (if possible in the nature of things), and not complain of her bargain. The "sea-otter" is the costliest of all fur. A skin that you might put in your hat or carry away in your muff has sold for $250; and although this was a fancy price, from $150 to $200 is nothing out of the way. The value is reckoned by the depth of the black color, studded with silvery hairs, and the richness of the fur. "The next article," as auctioneers say, that calls for attention is the black or silver fox, the aristocrat of vulpine furs. These beautiful skins are comparatively rare, but they rank next in costliness to the sea-otter. They have a fine rich black fur, longish on neck and shoulders, like a lady's ruff, streaked with silver hairs down the back, and becoming quite black underneath. These, at least, are the characteristics of the best skins, which readily fetch $125 each. The highest qualities are bought for the extravagant Russians, among whom the costliest cloaks are lined with them; and in England, France, and the United States the medium qualities are used for trimmings. We have seen a cloak lined with black fox that had cost 4000 rubles. Only the jetty bellies had been used, and about fifteen skins had contributed their quota to the extravagance.

Mink, of which in another show-room we light upon a little collection of over 22,000, is a fur that until recently was much neglected, being used almost solely for imitating marten. But a revolution of fashion has sent it up in the market. The belles who shine at Saratoga and the White Mountains have taken a fancy to this pretty fur for cuffs, collars, and trimmings of various sorts; and their English sisters are beginning to follow their example. So mink has risen from $2 to $7 per skin.

Some of the wolves, which are here in a large variety of colors, are in high repute for rugs, both hearth and carriage. The most sought after for this purpose are the Churchill wolves, so called from an old Hudson Bay post. These skins are all but milk-white, with a sprinkling of blue-black hairs down the back; and the richness and warmth of the fur are quite remarkable. Yet in price they are comparatively moderate. You can buy the finest Churchill wolf-skin for $5; of course there is the cost of dressing in addition. Wolverene (the American glutton) is a softer fur than the wolf, but possesses much the same attributes, and sells at a little over the same price. Wolverenes are the pest of the trappers; true to their character, they gormandize on the bait set for the smaller and more valuable fur-bearing animals, and either pull their limbs out of the traps or walk away with them without inconvenience. The fur of the lynx, which is largely represented in one of the upper show-rooms, is much used for muffs, ladies' cloak linings, etc., and is also dyed to imitate the more costly furs. Prices range from $3 to $1 per skin. It may be interesting to owners of the domestic cat to know that some common cat-skins from the United States fetch as much as $1 50 per skin. They are chiefly used for ladies' victorines, etc., and probably often do service for a nominally higher class fur. The "fishers" come from the more southerly regions of the American lake district, Huron, Superior, and Michigan, while the Mouse River Lake is the commonest. Samson's strength lay in his hair; theirs lie in their tails, which were used on the helmets of the Prussian army until superseded by the ugly spike. Now they are split up, and out of them are made very costly muffs. When we mention that the price of each good fisher skin ranges from $10 to $12, and that the tails are by no means large, it will be obvious that a fisher muff is suited only to the longest purse. Of badgers, raccoons—the old original coon—and skunks—the latter smelling worse than all the scents of Cologne combined, yet made into beautiful caps and muffs—we have not space to speak at length; nor of the opossum and musquash, both of which, like the skunk and raccoon, come chiefly from the United States.

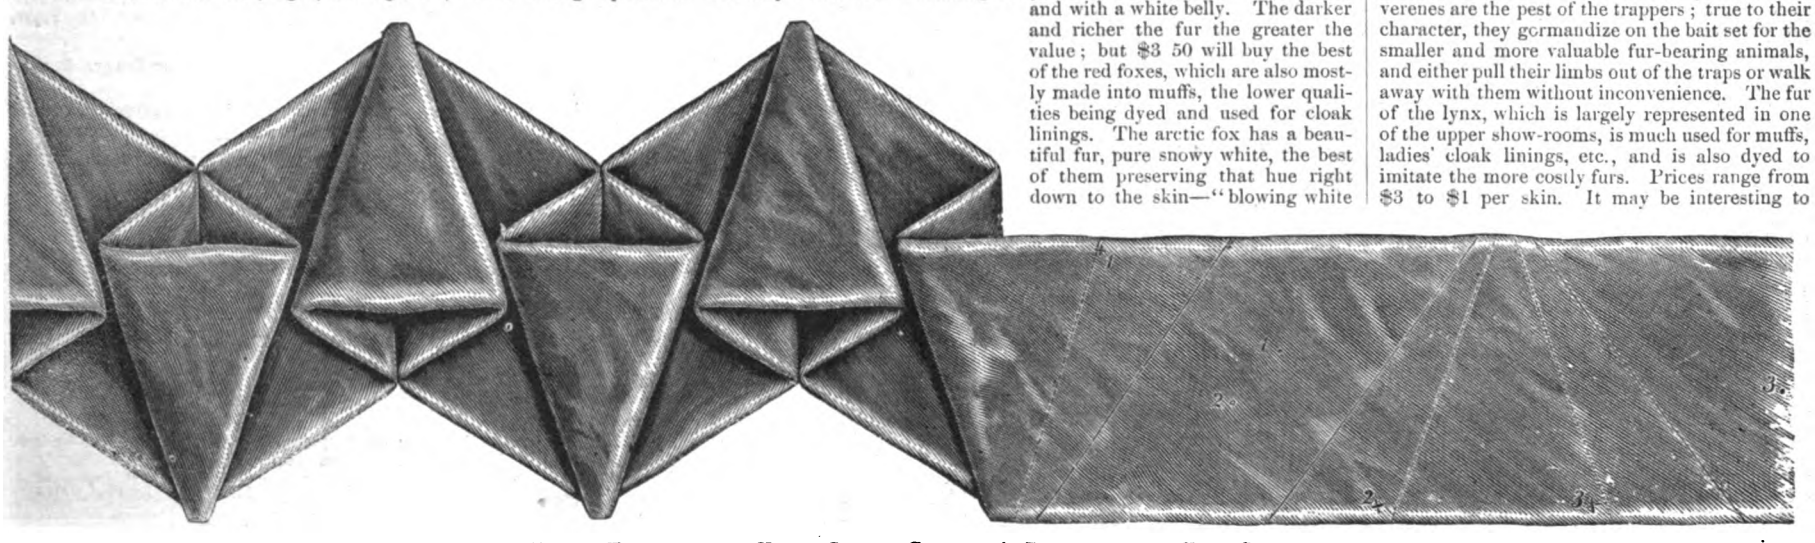

Fig. 6.—TRIMMING FOR UNDER-SKIRTS, CHILDREN'S DRESSES, ETC.—FULL SIZE.

SKIRT TRIMMINGS, FIGS. 1–6.

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

L. A. R.—Your sample is a very poor quality of Japanese poplin. It is not for sale in New York shops, so we do not know the price. Make by Polonaise Suit pattern, and trim with ruffles of the material.

NINA.—Your dress will dye black well, and would probably take purple or maroon, or else a darker shade of gray. Trim with bands of corded silk of the same shade.

CONSIDER.—A complete list of the articles necessary for an infant's outfit will be found among our late advertisements. Furnishing houses make up such an outfit for various prices ranging from $75 to $500. The pretty wrappers, described and illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., are the most useful dresses for young mothers.—We do not send replies by mail.

STUMPED.—Leave your overshoes in the hall, by all means.

A COUNTRY SUBSCRIBER.—Make your gray poplin by the cut paper pattern of suit illustrated in Bazar No. 50, Vol. III., trimming with bias bands of the same and fringe. Make the black silk with demi-train by the Worth Basque House Dress pattern shown in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., and trim with ruffles, lace, and passementerie.—Use the new perfumed benzine for taking out stains.

Y. Y. D.—White Chambery gauze or organdy muslin will make a pretty bridal dress. Make with slight train, upper skirt, and low-necked basque, trimmed with flounces. A black silk suit with a paletot that will do with other dresses is serviceable. Read answer above to "A Country Subscriber."

PERRY.—Make a postilion basque of your over-skirt, and drape your under-skirt short over a black silk skirt. Put velvet and fringe on your gray armure.—Leave cards for all the members of the family for whom your call was designed. If invited to a party with a friend whom you are visiting, you should ask the hostess to call on you while in the place.—We can give no opinion on the handwriting of our correspondents.

AN OLD SUBSCRIBER.—New York Fashions of Bazar No. 11, Vol. IV., will tell you how to make your boys' piqués. Any furnishing house will supply you with a tournure.

T. E. V.—All-white suits are worn in the house by ladies in mourning.

N. E.—We can not give special patterns to please each reader. Make your Marseilles with two skirts and a loose jacket.

FANNIE.—Make your white organdy suit by the description of white suits in another column.

IDA.—French paper with delicate tracery, but not ruled, and a raised monogram or initial in the corner, is fashionable stationery.—See patterns in Supplement of Bazar No. 10, Vol. IV., for little girls' dresses.

A. E.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV.

BETTINE.—We can not commend a teacher.—Any stationer will supply illuminated monograms.—The "Ugly Girl" articles were published in last year's Bazar, but not in book form.—The sleeve with a bow below the elbow shown in a basque in Bazar No. 10, Vol. IV., is pretty for muslins.

CONSTANT READER.—For hints about black alpaca suits read Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV.

MARY.—Your sample is very good gros grain. We can not set a price on it. It will make a pretty suit or house dress, either, trimmed with folds of thick repped ottoman silk and passementerie. You know your own needs best. Read answer above to "A Country Subscriber."

MRS. SKINNER.—We do not give addresses; and to publish your advice would simply be turning this column into an advertising medium.

B. R. K.—Your striped sample is American silk. Make a Worth basque and demi-train. From your description we fear you can not modernize the blue silk. Wear a Swiss muslin over dress with it.

JENNIE.—Get a black silk or crape paletot to wear with your poplin suit.

M. JENNIE H.—Make your poplin traveling suit by Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and trim with narrow ruffles of silk.

NORWOOD.—Read about white suits in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV.

A CONSTANT READER.—Colored monograms and initials are used on note-paper.—Serenading parties are often invited into the house and given refreshments.—We never give opinions on MSS. in this column.

A SUBSCRIBER.—Shorten your black silk skirt, and drape it as an upper skirt over any other skirt.

W. H. H.—Your green sample is Irish poplin, worth about $1 75 a yard. The gray Japanese poplin is probably worth $1 25 a yard. We can not say certainly.

MRS. JANE R. F.—For hints about calicoes consult Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. We shall continue to give patterns and hints for plain garments as hitherto.—A friendly correspondent, Mrs. M. E. R., has just written us to tell of her success in adapting Bazar patterns to flannels, domestics, calicoes, etc. Says "they never fail to come together just right, and look well finished when made according to directions."

FOOTE.—For hints about black grenadine suits read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 10, Vol. IV. A white linen or bishop's lawn polonaise will look well with your buff linen skirts left over from last season.

CONSTANCE.—A tamise cloth suit made by the Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III., and trimmed with folds of the same, is what you want for mourning. Get a crape gipsy bonnet with long veil tied on.

L. E.—Rub lemon-juice on your face at night, and bathe in buttermilk and Indian meal next morning. Wear your veil and gloves during the March winds, and you may prevent freckles, though we do not promise certainly.

No REMEDY IN THE WORLD ever came into such universal use, or has so fully won the confidence of mankind, as AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for the cure of Coughs, Colds, and Consumption.—[Com.]

PHYSICIANS recommend the use of Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer to prevent grayness, and to heal eruptions of the scalp.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.

The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

SARATOGA SPRINGS REMEDIAL INSTITUTE. New improvements in modern and elegant style. Drs. STRONG, its proprietors, are graduates of the Medical Dep't of New York University, and give special attention to LUNG, FEMALE, and CHRONIC Diseases.
Among its special appliances are the Turkish, Sulphur Air, Russian, and Electro-Thermal Baths, Equalizer or Vacuum Treatment, Swedish Movement Cure, Hydropathy, &c.
Indorsed by Bishop Simpson, Prof. Taylor Lewis, LL.D., Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D.D., Robert Carter, Esq., &c.
For description of our appliances, diseases treated, references, &c., send for Circulars to Drs. S. S. & S. E. STRONG, Saratoga Springs, New York.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

46,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

Madame Foy's Corset Skirt Supporter

is superior to all Corsets for Health, Comfort and Style.
Lady Agents wanted in all Northern and Western States.
THE PANAMA SKELETON CORSET
Is not excelled for Summer wear.
ARNOLD & BANNING, 56 Lispenard St., New York; D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago; Agents for the Supporters.
HARMON, BALDWIN & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers, New Haven, Conn.

$10 made from 50c.!

Something urgently needed by every body. Call and examine, or 12 Samples sent (postage paid) for Fifty Cents that retail easily for Ten Dollars.
R. L. WOLCOTT, 181 Chatham Square, N. Y.

FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE

Cleans Kid Gloves and all kinds of Cloths and Clothing; removes Paint, Grease, Tar, &c., instantly, without the least injury to the finest fabric. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE CO., 33 Barclay St., New York; 46 La Salle St., Chicago.

KID GLOVES CLEANED, and returned in a few minutes, at the KID GLOVE DYE WORKS, 392 Bowery, N. Y.
Country orders solicited.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

HOMAI'S PERSIAN WASH

REMOVES MOTH PATCH, TAN, & FRECKLES. Never fails. For sale by all Druggists.
B. F. RACKLEY, Proprietor, Dover, N. H.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

in

CARPETS, viz.,

the very best quality
FIVE-FRAME ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS,
at $1 65 per yard;
formerly $2 00 per yard.

Best quality
ENGLISH TAPESTRY BRUSSELS,
at $1 10 per yard;
last year's price, $1 35.

CHOICE AXMINSTERS... $3 00 per yard
FRENCH MOQUETTES... 3 00 and $3 50 per yard
ROYAL WILTONS..... 2 50 per yard,
last year's price, $3 50.

VELVET CARPETS, "B." QUALITY, ONLY $2 00.

Also,
AUBUSSON, AXMINSTER, AND BERLIN CARPETS
in One Piece, with medallions and borders to match.

Also, a large supply of extra quality superfine
INGRAIN AND THREE-PLY CARPETS in confined styles.

MATS, RUGS, ENGLISH AND AMERICAN OILCLOTHS, &c.

PLEASE CALL AND EXAMINE.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

RICH LACES
of all descriptions.
PARIS EMBROIDERED SETS, COLLARS, AND HANDKERCHIEFS.
A splendid stock of INITIAL HDKFS.,
FOR LADIES and GENTLEMEN,
AT VERY LOW PRICES.
Just received by
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth St.

NEW SILKS,
NEW DRESS GOODS,
MOURNING GOODS,
PARASOLS, UMBRELLAS,
&c., &c., &c.,
AT POPULAR PRICES.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth St.

HOSIERY.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO. have now open their full SPRING and SUMMER supply of Ladies' Real Balbriggan Hose, in Sandal Lace and Embroidered.
Ladies' and Children's Imitation Balbriggan Hose.
Ladies' and Children's Silk and Spun Hose, in Tartans and Fancy Stripes.
English and German Lisle Thread Hose, plain and open work.
Ladies' and Children's Fancy Lisle Thread and Cotton Hose.
Ladies' Silk and Lisle Thread Opera Hose.
Men's Cotton, Lisle Thread.
Real and Imitation Balbriggan.
Plain and Fancy Silk Half Hose, of every description.
UNDERWEAR.
Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Silk Gauze and Gossamer Merino Vests and Drawers; Medicated Scarlet Ditto, &c., &c.,
AT EXCEEDINGLY LOW PRICES.

BROADWAY, CORNER NINETEENTH STREET.

SPRING STYLES
OF
RICHMOND PRINTS.
LADIES about buying their Spring
CALICOES
will find the latest and most tasteful designs in these standard goods.
ASK FOR THE
RICHMOND PRINTS.

AT JACKSON'S,

BROADWAY & WAVERLEY PLACE,
All the Most Desirable Textures
in BLACK DRESS GOODS, including the very Finest Grades of
BLACK SILKS.
Also,
COMPLETE OUTFITS FOR MOURNING,
Ready to Wear.

PERFUMERY.

For the largest assortment and best terms, call upon or address
C. B. WOODWORTH & SON,
Rochester, N. Y.
N. Y. Office, 335 Broadway.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

INITIAL STATIONERY. Very nice. Only 25 cts. a box. UNION BOOK CO., Belfast, Me.

TRIX Perfumes the Breath. Cures Coughs and Colds. By mail, 10 cents.
TRIX CO., Rochester, N. Y.

HUNTING, Trapping, and Fishing. All about it. SENT FREE. Address "HUNTER," Hinsdale, N. H.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by Mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

LOCAL TAXATION: being a Report of the Commission appointed by the Governor of New York, under the Authority of the Legislature, to Revise the Laws for the Assessment and Collection of State and Local Taxes. DAVID A. WELLS, EDWIN DODGE, GEORGE W. CUTLER, Commissioners. Revised and Corrected Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE MUTINEERS OF THE BOUNTY. Some Account of the Mutineers of the Bounty and their Descendants in Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. By LADY BELCHER. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. New Edition.

ABBOTT'S SCIENCE FOR THE YOUNG. Heat: being Part I. of Science for the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. Copiously Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth. (Nearly Ready.)

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

BARNES'S NOTES. New Edition. Notes on the New Testament. By ALBERT BARNES. Revised and Improved. Maps and Illustrations. Notes on the Gospels (3 vols.) and Notes on the Acts (1 vol.) now ready. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

FAIR FRANCE: Impressions of a Traveler. By the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman," "A Brave Lady," "Olive," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

LIGHT AT EVENING TIME: a Book of Support and Comfort for the Aged. Edited by JOHN STANFORD HOLME, D.D. Printed from large type on toned paper, 4to, Cloth, Beveled Edges, $2 50.

ADVENTURES OF A YOUNG NATURALIST. By LUCIEN BIART. Edited and adapted by PARKER GILLMORE. With 117 Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75. (New Edition Ready.)

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY
HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

BRED IN THE BONE; or, Like Father, Like Son. By the Author of "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DE WITT'S MOTHERLESS. Motherless; or, A Parisian Family. For Girls in their Teens. Translated from the French of Madame Guizot De Witt by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. (Nearly Ready.)

FENTON'S QUEST. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," "Dead-Sea Fruit," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents. (Nearly Ready.)

DAISY NICHOL. By Lady HARDY. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

EARL'S DENE. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send either of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

NEW EDITIONS
OF BOOKS
PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE DODGE CLUB. By JAMES DE MILLE. 8vo, Cloth, $1 25; Paper, 75 cents.

JANE EYRE. By CHARLOTTE BRONTÉ. 8vo, Paper, 75 cents.

GRIFFITH GAUNT. By CHARLES READE. 8vo, Paper, 25 cents.

CAPTAIN BRAND. By Lieutenant WISE. 8vo, Cloth. $2 00; Paper, $1 50.

ZION'S SONGSTER. 32mo, Sheep, 50 cents.

ANDREWS'S LATIN-ENGLISH LEXICON. 8vo, Sheep, $6 00.

ALFRED THE GREAT. By JACOB ABBOTT. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20.

STREAKS OF LIGHT. By MRS. MORTIMER. 16mo, Cloth, 75 cents.

POPULAR ACCOUNT OF THE DISCOVERIES AT NINEVEH. By A. H. LAYARD. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

THE INSTITUTES OF ALGEBRA. By Prof. DOOLITTLE. 12mo, Sheep, $1 50.

THE GREEK TESTAMENT. With Notes by Rev. Dr. SPENCER. 12mo, Cloth, $1 75.

PRIMARY OBJECT LESSONS. By Prof. CALKINS. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance. brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

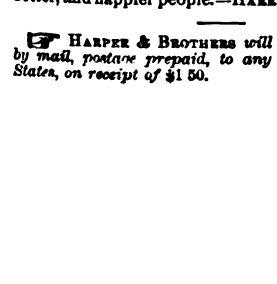
BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.



BLEES'

Noiseless, Link-Motion, Lock-Stitch

SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion.

Call and examine; and, for agencies and circulars, apply at

623 BROADWAY, New York.

FACTS WORTH KNOWING.

During a recent trial or comparison of ordinary Baking Powders in New York with DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER, it was shown conclusively that better results were attained with from one-half to two-thirds the quantity of the latter than with any other in market. The secret of the success lies in the care with which DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER is prepared, and its entire freedom from substances that are injurious to the system.

We challenge comparison at any and all times. The verdict of the consumer is always in our favor. For sale by all Grocers.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have just ready

A NEW EDITION
of

OUR GIRLS.

By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D.

12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

The book not only deserves to be read, however; it will be read because it is full of interest, concerning itself, as it does, with such matters as girls' boots and shoes; how girls should walk; low neck and short sleeves; outrages upon the body; stockings supporters; why are women so small? idleness among girls; sunshine and health; a word about baths; what you should eat; how to manage a cold; fat and thin girls, etc., etc.—N. Y. Evening Post.

Dr. Dio Lewis has written a sensible and lively book. There is not a dull page in it, and scarcely one that does not convey some sound instruction. We wish the book could enter thousands of our homes, fashionable and unfashionable; for we believe it contains suggestions and teaching of precisely the kind that "our girls" every where need.—N. Y. Independent.

This really important book.—Christian Union.

Written in Dr. Lewis's free and lively style, and is full of good ideas, the fruit of long study and experience, told in a sensible, practical way that commends them to every one who reads. The whole book is admirably sensible.—Boston Post.

Full of practical and very sensible advice to young women.—Episcopalian.

There is revolution in his clear-headed enthusiasm.—N. Y. Tribune.

If Americans would listen to George Combe and our countryman Dio Lewis, they would become a wiser, better, and happier people.—HARRIET BEECHER STOWE.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

WATCHES that are WATCHES.

We shall be pleased to send our DESCRIPTIVE PRICE-LIST of Genuine WALTHAM WATCHES, together with an illustrated pamphlet entitled a History of Watchmaking, to all who send us their address. No matter how remote you are from New York, we can sell you a Watch at the same price as if you were here. When you write, mention that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO., 865 Broadway, N. Y.

Use none but

THE BEST!!!

TRADE MARK.

SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION. Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in housekeeping!! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the same that received the highest prizes at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and that is supplied to the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signature of BARON LIEBIG, the inventor, on every jar.

J. MILHAU'S SONS, Company's Agents, 183 Broadway, New York. For sale every where.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle

SEWING MACHINES!

$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,

31 & 33 VESEY STREET,

P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

Every baby must have it. Is THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 522 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 18

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

ILLUSTRATIONS

Of Target Practice, Description, Price-List, &c., of the celebrated

MAYNARD RIFLES AND SHOT-GUNS

sent on request by letter addressed to

MASS. ARMS CO., Chicopee Falls, Mass.

10,000 USE IT. Mailed Free for $1. Copies letters instantly and perfectly. Address for circular "Atwater's Letter Copier," Providence, R. I. Agents wanted. Terms liberal. Sells rapidly.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION.

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

THE BEST STORIES in the Sunbeam. Better premiums to subscribers, and better premiums to Club Agents, than any other paper. On trial 3 months for 10 cts. A $40 Sewing Machine for 75 subscribers. Address SUNBEAM, Holliday's Cove, W. Va.

CURL YOUR HAIR!

A BOTTLE of MAGNETIC CURLIQUE sent Free for 25 cts. It curls straight hair in beautiful curls on the first application, and will remain in curl 10 days. Address R. BYRON & CO., Garrettsville, Ohio.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

READ "Convent Life Unveiled," by Edith O'Gorman. Price $1 50. CT. PUB. CO., Hartford, Ct.

THE

NEWEST and BEST

TEXT-BOOKS

For SCHOOLS and FAMILIES.

Harper's School History of the United States. By DAVID B. SCOTT. With Maps and Illustrations. $1 50.

Teachers who have been unable to find, among the many imperfect works offered them, a School History containing the elements which should rightly compose such a work, will find in this work that accuracy, sense of proportion, and careful generalization which are necessary to a successful text-book on the History of the United States. It contains an unusual number of valuable maps.

Willson's Intermediate Fifth Reader. $1 40.

This book is arranged on the plan of the author's other Reading-Books, and embraces, in brief, the principles of Rhetoric, Criticism, Eloquence, and Oratory, as applied to both prose and poetry. The whole adapted to Elocutionary Instruction.

Willson's Speller and Analyzer. 45 cts.

In addition to containing several times as much matter for Spelling-Lessons as any other book of its size, it imparts thorough elementary instruction in the formation, derivation, and uses of words.

Willson's Readers and Spellers.—Primary Speller, 20 cents.—Larger Speller, 40 cents.—Speller and Analyzer, 45 cents.—Primer, 25 cents.—First Reader, 40 cents.—Second Reader, 60 cents.—Third Reader, 90 cents.—Third Intermediate, 80 cents.—Fourth Reader, $1 35.—Fourth Intermediate, $1 10.—Fifth Reader, $1 80.—Fifth Intermediate, $1 40.

These Readers have now been before the public for about ten years, during which time they have proved satisfactorily that skill in Reading and an elementary knowledge of the Natural Sciences may be acquired at one and the same time, and that, therefore, school time may be greatly economized.

French's Mental Arithmetic. 50 cents.

A practical work, rather than a book of arithmetical puzzles. This book completes the author's Common-School Course.

French's Arithmetics.—First Lessons in Numbers, 40 cents.—Elementary Arithmetic, 50 cents.—Mental Arithmetic, 50 cents.—Common-School Arithmetic, $1 00.—Academic Arithmetic (in press).

The plan for this Series, and for each book embraced in it, was fully matured before any one of the books was completed. As the rules are based upon true philosophical principles, there is a harmony, a fitness, and a real progressiveness in the books that are not found in any other series of Arithmetics published.

Calkins's Object Lessons. $1 50.

To parents and teachers who are endeavoring to train the perceptive faculties of children, this book is of great assistance and value.

March's Parser and Analyzer: an Elementary Work on Grammar. 40 cents.

This book is so made as to train the pupil to see, hear, and think, as well as to remember rightly. The briefest accurate definitions are given, followed by problems which the pupil is to solve, and so work out the meaning and application of the principles and rules. The diagram analysis will be found easy, stimulating, and helpful.

Dalton's Physiology. $1 50.

This book, while containing a sufficiency of matter to satisfy the requirements of the College course, is written in language within the comprehension of the children who compose the higher classes of our Common Schools.

Harper's Writing-Books, with Marginal Drawing-Lessons. $2 00 per dozen.

Six Numbers, comprising the full Common-School Course, now ready.

These books supply a want which has long been seriously felt—the need of some method of teaching Drawing in Common Schools, at a low cost, and without the need of a special teacher.

Harper's School and Family Slate, with accompanying Cards, containing over Two Hundred Lessons in Writing, Printing, Drawing, and Arithmetic. $9 00 per dozen.

This is not a mere toy, but is carefully arranged for use in Primary Schools, and forms an excellent and practical introduction to any series of Writing and Drawing Books.

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to

HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

$5. TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

RICH RARE, & RACY READING. Wit, humor, fun. Sent free. Address BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

$300 A MONTH and expenses to good canvassers. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

THE SERVANTS.

OLD LADY. "They're all alike, my dear. There's our Susan; I've allowed her to go to Church Three Times every Sunday since she has lived with me, and I assure you she doesn't Cook a bit Better than she did the First Day!"

Mr. Jones told his wife, the other day, that if she did not take care he should lose his temper with her. She replied she was glad to hear of it, and only hoped he would never find it again.

THE MAGIC MIRROR—A beautiful face lit up with smiles.

Why is even the best lady skater of necessity very unsteady on her feet?—Because, if her straps are not tight, her skates will be loose, and in either case her heels must be screwed.

NET PROCEEDS—Fish.

A HIDE-OUS FACT.—The Jardin d'Acclimatation, says the Food Journal, is empty, even to the young elephants, which realized fancy prices. The hide of one fetched four thousand francs, which proves the vendors did not hide his light under a bushel.

If the Siamese twins could sing, what would be their favorite ditty?—"We are a band of brothers."

THE VOICES OF AFFECTION.

At early day, or ere the dawn
Has bid the earth rejoice,
Or ere the curtains are withdrawn,
I hear Affection's voice—
My youngest, in his crib awake,
Begins his unknown tongues;
I bid him sleep, for goodness' sake,
He has such potent lungs.

I rise and dress, and yet again
Affection's voice I hear;
For, while we sit at breakfast, Jane
(Who is my partner dear)
Asks, "What for dinner will you try
Of flesh and fowl and fish?"
To which my usual reply
Is, "Any thing you wish!"

And then the girls besiege my ear—
Affection's voice once more!
They ask for fashionable gear,
To spend my hard-won store.
They know that dear papa will give
The little checks they need.
'Tis vain to vow that, as I live,
I can't afford, indeed!

And last, the boys want tips, forsooth,
Ten-dollar bills for choice:
Oh, charming frankness, trust, and truth
Of sweet Affection's voice.
I sigh for peace and rest and "kef,"
And oft the wish will come—
Would to that voice I could be deaf,
Or would that voice were dumb!

IT WAS AS WELL TO KNOW AT ONCE, PERHAPS.

"Can I Wait at Table, my Lady? If I bain't over and above Hungry, I can Wait a bit: but if I am sharp set like, I should raythor peg into the Wittles with the other Folks."

"COME WHERE MY LOVE LIES DREAMING."

THIS IS HER LOVE. (We'd rather not, thank you kindly.)

"ALL MOONSHINE, MY DEAR—ALL MOONSHINE!"

FACETIÆ.

THE PITCH OF A CHILD'S VOICE—Tar. (This attempt will be seen better by warming it at the fire, some of it being written in invisible ink.)

Female pickpockets all wear the convenient Arab shawls. They fold their shawls like the Arabs, and silently steal away.

APPROPRIATE DIET—Parties behind time should be fed on ketch-up.

Smith declares that the only thing on earth capable of moving a certain cross-grained old aunt of his is her rocking-chair.

SPIRITUAL FACT—That wine causes many to take a winding way home.

The cook who curries your lobsters, chickens, etc., etc., etc., to perfection, can hardly fail also to curry—your favor.

MAY BE SHORTLY EXPECTED—"The Clock on the Spree," a German patriotic comic song, uniform with the "Watch on the Rhine."

OH, BLISS!—The gentleman who was transported at the Agricultural Hall last week with the charms of a pretty girl has now received a free pardon.

APT REPLY.—A Frenchwoman in a provincial court of justice in France was accused of throwing vitriol upon another woman, who, the prisoner said, had robbed her of her husband. "I," said the accused, "threw vitriol upon her face, but she has poured it upon my heart."

"Oh, Good-Morning, Jarvis. You've not been Ill again?"
"No, Miss; it's the Missis have been took Indifferent this time!"
"What's the Matter with her?"
"Well, Miss, the Young Medical Gentleman he says to me: 'Why, Jarvis!' he says, 'your Missis 'ave got Broughitis in hevery blessed Limb of 'er Body!"

GRATIFYING ADVERTISEMENT.—The Theatre of War is closed for the present. A Peace is in preparation which we hope will have an unprecedented run.

Why is a bill-sticker like a confectioner?—Because he uses puff-paste.

BOARD OF HEALTH REQUIRED BY THE WORKING CLASSES—The cupboard—well filled.

The man who went three nights running to the theatre has stopped for want of breath.

A CAUTION.—The man who can't resist "just a thimbleful" of brandy will sometimes find the thimble holds enough to sew him up.

We hear of people who have pet dogs that do every thing but speak: it's lucky for them—for both of them, dogs and owners—they don't do that.

CHIPS FROM A GERMAN WORKSHOP—The statues and Sèvres china smashed by the soldiers of William.

POPULAR MODE OF PRUSSIAN TRAVELING—Sedan conveyances.

A THING THAT SHOULD "TAKE" WELL WITH THE PUBLIC—Vaccination.

"SIR, SOME CORD HERE!"—The Western papers style their obituary column of criminals Neck-rology.

A QUESTION FOR PHRENOLOGISTS.—Is it not a necessary consequence that people who are very "long-headed" must be proportionately "narrow-minded?"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 15.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT.—[SEE PAGE 226.]

[Cut Paper Pattern of this entire Suit, to fit any Figure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Bust Measure.]

Digitized by Google

LOVE-SONG.

When the glad spring-time walked over the border,
And the brown honey-bee crept from his cell;
When the sun and the west wind put Nature in order,
And decked her in robes that became her so well—
Then did my torpid heart wake from its slumber,
Then did I first spring to life and to light;
For what were the years passed without thee? They number
Only as one long, dark, flavorless night.

In the flush of the spring-time I saw thee, and, seeing,
Loved with the love that had waited for thee;
A life that I never had known sprang to being—
A life and a love that were heaven to me.
There never before was such warmth in the summer,
There never before were such hues in the fall;
Never such balm in the breath of that Comer
Who shrouds the dead seasons and rules over all.

Love, I have drunk in the charm of your presence
The elixir that grants me perpetual life;
My blood leaps and bounds; I am thrilled by the essence,
And soar over trials and troubles and strife.
We live and we love, and what grief can alarm us?
Darling, my darling, the world is our own;
Life never can rob us, death can not disarm us
Of this, our vast riches—our wealth, love, alone.

The summer is dead! Did you know it, my darling?
Did you know that the winter walked over the earth?
The gold-breasted thrush and the purple-crowned starling
Make glad other lands with their musical mirth.
Ah, no! for the summer of love in your bosom
Makes summer and sunlight to you every where;
I should not have known, but I missed the sweet blossom
That all through the summer you wore in your hair.

POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT.

See illustration on first page.

THIS elegant walking suit, front and back views of which are seen in the illustration, is copied from a model kindly furnished us by one of our most fashionable modistes. The suit consists of a postilion-basque, burnous over-skirt, and six-gored walking skirt. The pretty postilion-basque may be worn in the house or the street. The burnous over-skirt forms a new and extremely graceful drapery to the walking skirt, which is just short enough to clear the ground. The illustration shows the style of trimming, which may, of course, be varied to suit the taste of the wearer. The suit is well adapted to any kind of material.

To take the bust measure, pass a tape rather tightly entirely around the body, under the arms, over the largest part of the shoulder-blades, and two inches above the fullest part of the bust.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

POSTILION-BASQUE.—This pattern is in five pieces—front, back, side piece, sleeve, and cuff. The fronts are cut high in the neck, and fitted with two darts. The basque is closed in front with buttons and button-holes. The back is without a seam, and has side forms. The skirt of the basque in the middle of the back is laid in one large box-pleat and side pleat, one inch wide at the top and two inches wide at the bottom. The perforations show where the pleats should be laid. The coat sleeve is in two pieces—the upper and under sleeve and the cuff, which is lapped on an inch above the bottom part of the sleeve so as to form a heading. The cuff is left open on the outer side. The cuff and basque are trimmed all around the edge with a double row of piping. A bias strip of the material, an inch and a half wide, headed on both edges with narrow lace, is sewed on, with a space of an inch above the piping, around the skirt, up the front, and over the shoulders to a point in the back. Two lines of perforations show where to sew the trimming. Baste up, and try on wrong side out before sewing the seams. All seams are allowed—an outlet of an inch being given for the side and shoulder seams, and a quarter of an inch for all the rest.

Quantity of material, 24 inches wide, 3 yards.
Extra for trimming, 1 yard.
Lace, 7 yards.

BURNOUS OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, side gore, and three straight breadths for the back. The fronts are open to the waist, and are sewed smoothly to the belt. Two pleats, half an inch deep, are laid in the side of the front breadth which joins the side gore, turning upward. The side gores at the top are laid in three large side pleats turning toward the back, in a space of about four inches. The three straight breadths are not sewed to the back, but are trimmed inside and out, the same as the basque. A loop is sewed on the centre of the middle breadth, and a corresponding button is set on the centre of the belt which confines the middle of the breadth, while the loose breadths fall in a burnous drapery on both sides of the back. Two pleats, an inch and a half deep and turning upward, are laid in the centre of the middle breadth, fourteen inches from the top of the skirt. The over-skirt is trimmed around the front, up the side seam to the belt, and around the bottom in the same manner as the basque, the bias strip being three inches wide.

Quantity of material, 24 inches wide, 6½ yards.
Extra for trimming, 2 yards.
Lace, 12 yards.

SIX-GORED WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side breadths, and breadth for the back. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with a ruffle five inches deep, cut on the bias, and laid in side pleats three-quarters of an inch deep, with a space of four inches between the pleats, and a box-pleated trimming formed of a strip of the material eight inches deep, cut the straight way of the goods, which is laid in box-pleats two and a half inches wide, with a space of two inches between. The top of each pleat is then turned down, forming a diamond at the top, and the bottom of the pleating is sewed over the top of the bottom ruffle to conceal the stitches. A bias strip trimmed on both sides with lace, like that on the over-skirt, is sewed across the box-pleating below the points turned down.

Quantity of material, 24 inches wide, 8 yards.
Extra for trimming, 4 yards.
Lace, 8 yards.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 15, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with full-sized patterns and illustrations of a large variety of Spring and Summer Suits for Masters and Misses from three to fifteen years old; Commencement, Confirmation, and First-Communion Dresses; Ladies' and Misses' Spring and Summer Talmas, Paletots, Sacques, and Jackets; Pen-wipers, Needle-books, Work-boxes, Clothes-bags, Tidies, embroidery patterns, etc., etc.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Postilion-Basque Walking Suit, on our first page, are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 239 of this Number.

☞ HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 8 contains the continuation of CHARLES READE'S new story,

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION,

commenced in the Number for April 1.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Baggage.

MY DEAR EDWIN,—I went the other day to the finest hotel in the city to see a friend who was about to sail for Europe; and as I waited in the hall while my card was taken to him I had ample opportunity of contemplating the vast piles of baggage which were heaped upon the floor. There was every kind of trunk and bag; and so preposterously large were some of the former that I heartily sympathized with every porter at every hotel and railroad station in the country in the relentless fury with which they treat the unreasonable and unmanageable masses of leather and iron. There was one offender which was certainly not less than five feet square, and I have no doubt it was ingeniously and remorselessly packed solid. I hope it will be well battered before it arrives. If the merciful man is merciful to his beast, why should he not be equally considerate of his fellow-man who carries trunks for an honest living? And especially why should not woman be merciful, even if she is going to Saratoga or to Switzerland?

When I was shown up to my departing friend I told him what I had seen in the hall, and that I hoped he was not responsible for any of the enormous injustice which I had just been witnessing. He told me that I knew him very little if I did not know that he never carried more than a light portmanteau; and that it was his delight to go up the side of the ship, when he was about to sail, with a neat umbrella in one hand, a light overcoat hanging over his arm, and carrying a bag with a change of linen. "With a light heart and a loose pair of breeches," said he, gayly, "I would circumnavigate the globe." And I know another philosopher of the same school, who goes to sea with a change of raiment, as he calls it, and who has never any thing to "declare" at the most rigorous frontier but a pair of slippers and a cravat. And I know a philosopher of the other school, who asks why a man should not be comfortable if he can afford it, and who therefore, although a bachelor like myself, moves like an army with a huge supply train—a string of baggage wagons, as it were—and who often pays a great deal more passage money for his luggage than for himself. He insists that comfort is the charm of travel, and that he does not go abroad to put himself to inconvenience. "Therefore," he says, "as I have clothes to please my fancy at home, why should I not have the same abroad? If I want a pair of light boots instead of heavy shoes in Rome, why should I not have them at hand as I do in New York? Believe me, my dear Bachelor," he concludes, "the pleasure of travel is plenty of baggage."

I have my own experience, also, my dear Edwin. When I made my preparations for the grand tour I procured a prodigious trunk, and with ludicrous fatuity I bought new clothes. When I reached the happy land beyond the sea I had wretched struggles with that trunk, and I was horribly uncomfortable in those new clothes. It was that time of life with me when the form of a collar or the turn of a trowser is a very momentous affair, and I am afraid that I remember the unhandsome roll of a certain coat collar with much more anguish even now than I do certain peccadilloes which were performed by the wearer of the coat. That garment seems to me, even at this chasteningly remote period, as unnecessarily vulgar and oppressive. It was in Florence, and every body else had a proper coat. But I either felt my country disgraced by mine, or I bitterly sneered at a country that could be guilty of such a garment. Then I found myself in the most ridiculous manner the slave of that trunk. Wherever I went I was obliged to take it with me, and often to pay great sums for its conveyance; and although traveling, or meaning to travel, economically, the instant that trunk appeared, the waiters began to call me "Mee Lor'," and the host insisted upon showing me to my room with two wax-candles, which I knew were going into the bill. And how, I ask you, Edwin—how was a man with such a trunk to undertake to dispute a charge for candles? I think I have told you of my indignant friend who carried off all the candles for which he had been charged at the various hotels. He had a huge trunk, too, and when he reached Venice it was nearly full of candles which had been only lighted but not burned. He showed them to me with savage glee. "They didn't make much out of me!" he exclaimed, with fierce triumph. But when I "hefted" his trunk, as the young people in the street say, and calling his attention to its weight, told him that he was paying a frightful freight upon his candles in the form of charge for extra baggage, he stared at me with a long whistle, perceiving that even a Yankee had been outdone, and then shouted with a laugh, "By jingo! if I ain't myself a candle burned at both ends!"

Perhaps it is merely the disposition to compromise which betrays increasing age; but, my dear Edwin, I am inclined to think that the truth in the matter of baggage lies between the extremes. When Julius Cæsar went to conquer Gaul his army carried little besides their arms and implements of war, and it is supposed that he made the heaviest of these as he went. There was no superfluity of baggage, and there was an immense success. Twenty years ago Sir Charles Napier complained that the British army in India could not move without baggage trains to carry a magnificence as cumbrous and as foolish as that of Xerxes. Yet I do not believe that our recent armies in this country were any the less efficient because of the great humane organizations—the commissions of health and succor—that hovered about the host. And I think, my dear Edwin, that we shall do wisely if upon the journey upon which we are embarked we discriminate in taking baggage rather than reject it altogether.

Thus it seems to me—and I really believe that I am going to begin to preach—that my philosophic friend Mr. Puck, who was ready to go round the world with a light heart and a loose pair of breeches, declining the actual comfort and use which he might have packed into a convenient space, is very much like another friend of ours, Mr. Hilary, who makes the tour of life with no principle but plenty of good-natured impulses. As Mr. Puck was, as I know, sometimes caught in the most ridiculous situations, when a good stout pair of shoes and a warm coat would have been worth the price of many trunks, both to his comfort and his health, so Mr. Hilary is often absurdly, and sometimes painfully, cornered by circumstances. For his good impulses are not inconsistent with great weakness. He is friendly, sociable, genial; he has imagination, and poetic associations with the vine and the flowing bowl, for instance. But what is a light heart and a loose pair of breeches in a snow-storm? The lighter your baggage the worse the exposure. In a gale, clinging to a heavy trunk might hold you from blowing away. So his baggage is not enough for Hilary; and the poor fellow who laughed at the ample wardrobe of his neighbor is left naked to the pitiless storm! If you meet him reeling and plunging home, the wreck of a man drifting and dashing upon a cruel lee shore, it is because he preferred the loose breeches of good impulse to the panoply of principle.

I recall two instances, which would be very familiar to you if I were to mention names, my dear Edwin—two striking instances, of travelers like Mr. Puck, making the journey upon which we are engaged, and not the grand tour. They began early, blithely running up the ship's side, as it were, whistling and smiling, gayly saluting, and welcomed on all sides. If the voyage had been all in soft summer weather—ah! then, indeed! If the ocean were a mill-pond, and if the cave of the winds were a mere grotto of June! While the sun shone, and the air was bland, behold Mr. Puck—who but he! But when the wind blew from the icebergs, when the sleet sheeted the rigging with ice! These young men of whom I speak were early petted and flattered and famous. They were sought in society, and their work in their departments was very precious. They commanded their own prices. They had their own way. The wind was warm and fair. But even a wonder reigns but nine days. No man can hope for a perpetually undisputed sovereignty. Circumstances changed a little. The wind became fluctuating, even threatening storm. The best-natured fellows in the world were these fellow-travelers of ours, dear Edwin, but their baggage was too scanty. Loose breeches are not enough for all occasions. And this was proved surely but sadly. In a thousand nameless but familiar ways they declined in general regard and in their own respect; and when you see them now, forlorn in all that makes life most precious, bankrupt in friendship, in noble aims, in generous faith, if you could put your feeling into the travelers' expression, it would be that in their contempt for troublesome baggage they had sacrificed the great purpose and pleasure of travel.

Yet it is very easy also to be perplexed and ruined by your luggage, and to be a thousandfold worse slave to your trunks and boxes than ever I was. There is our fellow-traveler Vinegar. His whole journey is wasted, and all its delight and profit lost, by constantly attending to his ridiculous heaps of baggage. He is encumbered with the most sombre theology you ever heard of, the handling of which breaks every body's shins, and sets all who have any thing to do with it into the most profuse and profane swearing. Vinegar can never see the lovely landscape because of his abominable baggage, which shuts out the beauty of this world and the splendor of the sky. The charm of things terrestrial and the hope of those that are celestial are forever hidden from that unhappy traveler, the victim of his baggage.

Or it is a huge bundle of prejudices which another painfully carries upon the journey. Every thing offends some prejudice—that is, tumbles against his luggage and over his luggage and into his luggage. He, too, is robbed of all his pleasure because of his baggage. And still another travels the great highway with a whole cargo of theories. And in adjusting them he is as vexed and wearied, and as effectually escapes all the comfort and joy of the journey, as the poor woman who could not look nor speak, so intent was she upon watching and counting her "big trunk, little trunk, bandbox, bundle." These are all slaves of their baggage. They no more discriminate than the airy traveler with no baggage but a smile and a pair of loose breeches. And, my dear Edwin, since it is not always summer nor always winter, nor always wet nor always dry, take only enough to be sure that you are comfortable, knowing that without comfort—of body or mind—there is no pleasure upon the great journey.

Your friend,
AN OLD BACHELOR.

AMERICAN HOLIDAYS.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

ONCE there was a little girl who would have been very happy with her two doll children, Emilius Alvah and Mary Maria, but for the sad thought which underlay all her enjoyment that a time was coming when she could no longer play with dolls. Grown people had no dolls. What there could be to enliven the dreariness of existence when dolls should have gone by the little lady could not imagine; and she found but cold comfort in the determination that she would set herself resolutely to drawing, and find in making pictures such satisfaction as might be left when the real piquancy of life should have passed away.

But the years came and went. Mary Maria disappeared wholly from the eyes of mortals, and no man knoweth her sepulchre to this day. Emilius Alvah, with a badly battered face, and a sadly shattered ankle, and a shocking bad hat, lay on a high shelf in a dark closet; and, strange to say, no one mourned him. His little mother grew to womanhood; and, for the waste she looked to endure, she found life so exceeding bright and sweet and full that she never had a regret, but only a pleasant memory, for Emilius Alvah and Mary Maria.

Just as it is with individuals so it is with nations. Just as it would be for a woman to go back to her dolls for amusement is it for a mature and intellectual nation to go back to the antics of a crude and rollicking period, or to attempt to adopt the antics of a crude and rollicking nation. There was a time when Englishmen entertained themselves and their wives by climbing greased poles and running sack-races. Men and women in Italy may still entertain themselves by putting on grotesque garments, and pelting each other with sugar-plums. But surely the American populace never presented a more melancholy spectacle than in its late attempt to be jolly under equally creditable circumstances.

Yet the attempt was not, necessarily, childish or unworthy. There is a vague idea that Americans are too sedate, that they have not sufficient relaxation, that they ought to appoint more holidays. But what does the idea spring from? Amusement is for health, happiness, effectiveness. Do not the Americans live as long as other people? Are they not the happiest people in the world? Are they really less effective than any other? What do we want of holidays? Probably we have come nearer than any other nation to equalizing work. A greater proportion of persons are actively engaged in business; a smaller proportion are suffering from intense and prolonged overwork. And just in the ratio of the equalization diminishes our need of holidays. The American workman is not a child with a set task, not a slave with an oppressive burden, but a free, intelligent, self-respecting, and self-guiding man. He lays out his own life. He reaps the reward of his labors. His work does not mean simply bread-and-butter, and a dance under the May-pole, but solid beef and pudding, a deaconship in the church, two weeks' summer board in the country, a piano for his daughter, and high-school, and perhaps college, for his son. Set him running a sack-race, indeed! He literally is the populace, at least of New England. The quiet country village, with its one meeting-house and four school-houses, may have a few exceptional tatterdemalions, recognized and tolerated, living from hand to mouth—a little Bohemia, half butt, half burden. But the mass of the people are such as the deacon aforesaid. They do not thank you for holidays. What they want more than the State prescribes they can take for themselves without prescriptions. Sometimes, when they come home from shop or market, they will buy a mask, with which their children will delight and affright themselves for a week; but a wagon load of men and women going about the streets in sober-earnest masks, bowing to right and left, seems to them simply silly. A man striding along the sidewalk in a yellow flannel surplice merely makes a guy of himself, and they gaze upon him with profound soberness. If they have any money to spend in sugar-plums, the sugar-plums are safely wrapped in brown paper bags, and bestowed in their overcoat pockets for the delectation of their own little folks, not for grown-up strangers. Tournament trowsers trimmed with tinsel lace look wonderfully incongruous over stout Yankee leather boots; and our familiarity with circus riders and outriders makes the haberdashery of knighthood show marvelously mean under the broad daylight of the nineteenth century.

Digitized by Google

Whatever amendment is made for our relief from work must be made in accordance with our constitution, national and social. Americans must go forward, and not backward. They can never become children again. They are not to be raised by greased poles. They are to find entertainment in society, not in sports. Relaxation is to work itself more and more thoroughly and beneficently into every day, not concentrate itself into senseless revels on set days. With increase of wisdom, occupation will more nicely adjust itself to capacity and taste, so that a man's business will be fruitful of pleasure. Every day will settle its own bills, and leave no overplus of weariness to be offset by to-morrow's enforced rest or prescribed merry-making. Our holidays will then be still more than they now are holy days—days of great memories and great suggestions, of family reunion, of national congratulation, of profound and manly thanksgiving.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE POSTILION-BASQUE SUIT.

THE Postilion-basque Suit illustrated on our first page is one of the most stylish spring costumes. This design is especially suitable for silks, whether of solid color or in hair-line stripes, and is also adapted to all the soft, flexible pongees, mohairs, and velours, and to the grenadines that will be worn later in the season. The basque is the simplest and prettiest form of the postilion, with a deep double box-pleat in the centre of the back, short slashed sides, and the becoming soft points in front. Basques made with these double-pointed fronts are worn in the house and street alike, but the single long stiff point is worn in the house only. The style of arranging the trimming, as shown in the engraving, is the plan adopted on most corsages—simply bordering the garment and extending up the fronts around the neck. The sleeves of this suit are half-flowing, coat-shaped below the elbow, and widening toward the wrist—a prevalent fashion.

Another important feature of this costume is the burnous over-skirt with two Arab folds at the top, forming very bouffant drapery. This is the favorite novelty of the season in the way of draping, and is a decided change from the pleats and loops so long worn. Though it looks intricate, it is very simple. There are five breadths of narrow summer silk in the back of the model shown. Three widths in the centre are straight, but those at the side are sloped and caught up in pleats to the waist. The top of the back widths is trimmed like the lower edge, and instead of being gathered to a belt in the usual way, is allowed to hang loosely, except where it is caught up in the centre by a loop passed over a button on the belt. The pointed open fronts are fastened to the belt, curving up very high on the hips at the point where the basque is shortest. A different effect is given to this suit by fastening the centre loop of the over-skirt to a button beneath the bow on the back of the postilion, thus doing away with the basque back, and making a pretty variety.

The skirt is of convenient walking length. It is trimmed with a bias gathered ruffle four inches wide when finished. The lower edge of the ruffle has a hem nearly an inch wide, turned up on the right side, and stitched by machine. Above this is a broad box-pleating, with the top of each pleat vandyked and held down by a bias silk band and lace.

The dress from which this design is taken is of grisaille silk, gray with black lines, trimmed with very narrow black edging. There is no wrap required with this costume; but ladies who object to going in the street without an over garment will use a small paletot of the silk, or else a black lace paletot or shawl. Suits of this description, made of summer silk at $2 a yard, and trimmed with French lace that can scarcely be distinguished from real lace, will cost from $90 to $100. We can not give the items exactly, but there are about twenty-five yards of silk for $50; $10 will probably buy the lace; sundries, in the way of linings, buttons, and sewing silk, amount to $5; and $25 or $30 are allowed for the modiste's labor.

When this costume is made of black grenadine the basque lining should be strong black silk, and a skirt of black silk should be worn beneath the suit. Colored grenadines are always made on silk of the same shade, the corsage and sleeves being lined throughout, and are never worn over white, as was formerly the custom.

HOUSE AND CARRIAGE COSTUMES.

Our Paris correspondent, Madame Raymond, editor of the Mode Illustrée, writing since the fall of Paris, advises us of a contemplated revolution in fashions looking to greater simplicity in dress. This is naturally in harmony with the feelings of the people engaged in the late war; but with us, instead of simplicity, the opposite extreme prevails.

The spring and summer opening at a French house in high favor with our jeunesse dorée has just shown us a variety of elegant costumes, made here, but gotten up with all the elaborate luxuriance and style for which Parisian taste is famous, and which gay demoiselles consider so desirable. Each costume was a house and carriage dress combined. The same suit was arranged to serve for dressy occasions at home, for dinner-parties, for visiting, and for any entertainment to which the wearer goes in her carriage; but its long skirt, lying a quarter of a yard on the floor, rendered it utterly unfit for promenading. This skirt, sloped to a point behind, was about four yards wide, and was formed by two and sometimes three side gores, according to the width of the material. The polonaise over dress was almost universal. Each suit had a polonaise with tight-fitting basque back held smooth by whalebones, very bouffant skirt, drapery especially full on the sides, while the plain flat front had the waist and skirt in one piece. The few exceptions to the regular polonaise were basques and over-skirts arranged to have the effect of a polonaise. Many polonaises had simple flat basque backs instead of postilion pleats. These basques were deeply pointed and very stylish. A bow or passementerie ornament was placed at the end of the basque point—not on the waist—and the fullness of the skirt beneath was gathered to a pointed piece shaped like the basque, in order to leave the basque smooth, and have the skirt drapery puff out abundantly around it. In many dresses the added fullness of the polonaise skirt was arranged in the burnous style, and was often much ampler than our model. Sleeves were invariably the half-flowing shape. Not a single loose paletot was shown. The only wraps seen with tight polonaises were small round capes with broad Watteau folds behind. These were more especially for traveling and sea-side costumes.

Flounces, ruches, and flat bands were the self trimmings on silks and woolens; passementerie and fringes are abundantly used; a great deal of white lace, especially Valenciennes, and many embroidered muslin ruffles, trimmed silks and pongees, not of light shades only, but dark brown, gray, and black silks also. Cambric insertions and edgings, thickly needle-worked, trim pale-tinted linen, foulard, and pongee suits. Charming pleatings of white tarlatan or of organdy peep from beneath ruffles of heavy dark silks.

Many shaded suits were shown, but as there can no longer be any novelty in these, lovers of variety are returning to costumes of two contrasting colors. The fancy is to combine one of the very light undecided tints now in vogue with a very dark color. A polonaise of absinthe pongee (gray tinged with green) is worn over a silk skirt of dark plum-color; the delicate écru buff is seen over scabieuse silk, that rich velvet maroon hue seen in dahlias; very light gray is trimmed with invisible green; pale Nile green, the blue tint so becoming to blondes, is associated with darkest prune; faint sky blue is draped over chestnut brown, and pale lilac is contrasted with the greenish bronze called verd-antique.

To describe a few of these. First was a carriage costume of plum-colored gros grain, with facings of brightest Nile green silk. Around the skirt was a broad double box-pleating, headed by a wide ruche, with the pleats caught together in the centre to show a lining of Nile green silk. Polonaise with tight back and full burnous drapery lapped toward the sides, the top faced with green silk, and held on each side by a green bow made of gros grain, doubled, a finger broad, and placed lengthwise, with two loops above and below, and two fringed ends. A ruche and fringe border the polonaise and sleeves. Gathered Valenciennes lace in neck and sleeves. To complete this suit should be a Belgian straw gipsy, with plum-colored gros grain ribbon, and Nile green ostrich tips. Large umbrella of silk of the dress, lined with light green. Enameled jewelry. Long-wristed kid gloves of pale green.

A watering-place costume has a plum-colored silk skirt with three scant flounces of the same, with white embroidered jaconet ruffles showing below the silk flounces. The polonaise, of pale buff, is twilled foulard trimmed with ruffles of the dark plum-colored silk and of white muslin.

A similar suit is of summer velours, thin and light, yet repped, in a pale gray tint. The polonaise is trimmed with white guipure insertion and lace laid over prune-colored satin bands. The skirt has a flat pleating, headed with diagonal pleats, showing the facing of prune satin.

An absinthe green polonaise of silky pongee is finished with fringe that has a deep netted heading in points made in the garment. It is fastened down the front with maroon gros grain bows, and the sleeves and back are similarly ornamented. The back is voluminously draped in the burnous style, and the lower skirt is of maroon silk.

A gray summer serge traveling dress has a polonaise with a broad vest of darkest invisible green silk; cuffs, bows, and facings on postilion, and flounces of the same dark green. A nut brown silk costume has three straight overlapping flounces edged with Valenciennes lace. Worn over this is an écru buff polonaise of silk serge, trimmed with white cambric inserting and edging, caught up by bows of dark brown silk edged with Valenciennes. A costume of glossy lavender chalé is trimmed with many self-pleatings, edged with embroidered Swiss ruffles. A polonaise of thick gray linen, to be worn over silk skirts, is trimmed with thick white embroidery.

A model for black grenadine suits has a pointed flat basque, with broad vest of black gros grain. Two cords edge the vest. Thread lace and a pleating alternately silk and grenadine border the basque. The over-skirt has a short apron front and long back sewed to a pointed piece beneath the basque, and is trimmed like the basque. Deep flounce in the skirt, with bias silk laid between each side-pleat, giving the appearance of alternate pleats of silk and grenadine.

The handsomest dress of all is a French gray silk, with two rows of pleatings around the skirt, each a finger deep, the lower ruffle of a darker gray. Three bias bands are placed at intervals above these. The over-skirt, with short apron front and long back, has around it a wide passementerie of leaves in pale gray cord, and the edge is finished with Valenciennes three inches wide placed over soft, mossy, gray fringe. The basque, with deep pointed back and straight front, is trimmed with two rows of Valenciennes lace, frilled down to the basque point, and headed by passementerie. Similar trimming up the front. A bow and long ends of the silk, doubled and edged with Valenciennes, is fastened on the left side at the waist.

BONNETS AND HATS.

The milliners' parlors arranged for the openings look like a beautiful conservatory. The first choice in bonnets is for fine Belgian straw gipsies, with high rolled coronets, the queen's ruche of tulle for face trimming, thick gros grain ribbon, flowers, feather tips, and lace for garniture. The fairest and most youthful faces adopt these straw bonnets for all occasions, and find them more becoming than was anticipated. The ribbon and flowers are selected with regard to the dresses with which they are to be worn. The new shade of the season is called fisherman's green—a blue-green similar to the Nile shade of last year. We defer a lengthy description on account of our crowded columns.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames PINCHON; SIBLEY; PAGE; and FERRERO.

PERSONAL.

THERE are few remarkable dinner sets of silver or china in this country compared with what may be found in the old families of Europe. One of the finest sets is probably in possession of Mr. WILLIAM B. ASTOR. It was bought by his father, the late JOHN JACOB ASTOR, and used by him during his residence in Paris and Switzerland. All the dishes, plates, fruit stands, etc., are of solid silver. The dessert plates are of Sèvres china, embellished with portraits of the celebrated beauties of the court of LOUIS XIV. By the will of Mr. ASTOR this dinner service is to descend to the oldest son of the oldest son.

—Baron GEROLT, the minister of Prussia, goes home next month, but will leave his two daughters here. The elder will be married to Mr. RANGABE, chargé d'affaires of Greece, on the 17th of April; and the younger, it is said, will enter the convent at Georgetown. Both these young ladies were born in this country, and have always resided here.

—A contemporaneous journal gives this well-deserved praise to the Berlin Bazar: "This great fashion journal of the world claims a circulation of half a million of copies, and is issued in twelve different languages. It is emphatically a friend of all classes, as it consults the interests of all, rich and poor, high and low. It is no longer considered a luxury, but rather a necessity in German households, and represents all the interests of women in the line of beauty and economy of dress, endeavoring always to subject this latter to the demands of comfort and womanly propriety. For sixteen years it has gone on increasing in usefulness and popularity, and has now become, without dispute, the fashion journal of the world, speaking to its patrons in all the languages of civilization, and moulding European taste in the interest of utility and sound common-sense. It has for years been the source whence journals in the same sphere, in nearly all the capitals of the world, have drawn material and suggestions, and it now bids fair to receive the credit that it deserves. Its great effort in future will be to prove that it is far superior to any of its rivals that in Paris have so long attracted the eyes of the world to a great extent on capital borrowed from its pages." We may add, that the readers of Harper's Bazar have all that is contained in its Berlin prototype—which, by-the-way, is less than half its size—together with an endless variety of additional fashion and miscellaneous engravings and choice reading matter.

—That the lectures of JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL at Harvard University on French poetry were able and interesting can not be doubted; yet we see it stated in an exchange that his audiences hardly averaged thirty persons, including women, who were largely in the majority. It simply shows that Boston does not appreciate LOWELL as does New York.

—And this is the way in which M. THIERS lived during his recent stay at Bordeaux: He received and worked from 6.30 A.M. until noon, when he breakfasted; then walked two hours; worked again until a late dinner, and while eating continued to receive his little court; after dinner a little sleep. Any thing but exclusive—very cordial to a certain degree—he multiplied himself by his vivacity and elocution. The magnificent crowning of his political career has given him a new youth. He can not bear tavern beds, so his servant nightly prepares for him in his study a camp-bed, on which he sleeps on a single mattress. M. THIERS is said to favor the project of having the permanent seat of government away from Paris and the power of the mob.

—A gentleman who has lately seen BAEZ on his own stamping-ground says he has no wife, but scores of children; has no salary, but lives in luxury while the soldiers starve; has neither character nor courage, and he can not quell a contemptible insurrection, though his nominal power is almost absolute. In a republic he rules like a royal despot. Yet he is popular, and, practically, there is no respectable opposition to his government.

—It is said that a marriage has been arranged between Mr. VERNON HARCOURT, M.P. ("Historicus"), and Mrs. IVES, eldest daughter of Mr. MOTLEY. Mrs. IVES is the widow of one of the Rhode Island IVESES, and is quite wealthy. It is a saying in "Little Rhody" that the public affairs of that State are pretty much controlled by the two great manufacturing firms of the SPRAGUES and BROWN & IVES, between whom there has for many a year been a lively rivalry.

—During the general illumination in which the Germans indulged on the fall of Paris a barber, a townsman of VON MOLTKE, displayed a transparency on which was this couplet:

"Moltke and I were at Parchim born;
He has the French, and I've the Germans shorn!"

—At the banquet given by Lord WALTER CAMPBELL on the 21st inst., at the Travelers' Club in this city, in honor of his brother's marriage to the Princess LOUISE, he said that the other day he heard from an old acquaintance that soon after the engagement between the Princess and his brother the Princess BEATRICE went to the Queen, and said, "Mother, I am glad that LOUISE is going to marry a subject, because now, I suppose, I can marry an American."

—Mrs. BELLA FRENCH, speaking of her lecture at St. Paul, Minnesota, says, "Several of the first ladies of St. Paul met us at the close of the lecture, kissed us, and bade us God speed in the good work. We also received flattering congratulations from a number of gentlemen, who looked as if they wished to kiss us, but were too bashful!"

—BISMARCK enjoys the reputation of saying more witty things with less effort than any man in Germany. A correspondent, writing of him, says he is as ready as an American, bright as a Frenchman, and stinging as a Spaniard in his conceits and epigrams.

—Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE recently said to a gentleman in Washington that the social duties of the High Commission were becoming the hardest part of the work.

—One of the most interesting schemes devised by American liberality in behalf of the French sufferers from the war is that of the well-known poetess, Mrs. ANNE LYNCH BOTTA, of New York, who is making a collection of autographic letters and sketches by native and foreign artists, which promises to be the most unique of the kind ever seen in this country, and which, it is hoped, may transfer five thousand dollars from the well-filled pockets of some rich man to the empty purses of the starving poor of France. HEALY has sent twenty valuable paintings from the foreign artists in Rome, including two by M. HÉBERT, the president of the French Academy of Art there; and BIERSTADT, CARPENTER, FAGNANI, KENSETT, GIFFORD, ROWSE, WHITTREDGE, and many other distinguished Americans have contributed fine sketches. One of the most interesting gems of the collection is an unpublished morceau by LISZT, in his own handwriting, composed expressly for this purpose, and procured at the solicitation of Miss CECILIA CLEVELAND, the niece of Mr. GREELEY, who, with her mother and sister, is now in Munich. In an accompanying letter to Miss CLEVELAND LISZT declares that he holds autograph albums in abhorrence, and makes it a rule never to contribute to them; but has broken through the rule in this single instance for her sake, and in the aid of so good a cause. Several hundred distinguished persons are represented in this rare collection, which will be raffled if not previously disposed of privately.

—No two men in the government service at Washington perform a greater amount of daily labor than Mr. J. H. SAVILLE, chief clerk of the Treasury Department. Mr. S. is thirty years of age; came to Washington ten years ago; was appointed by Mr. CHASE messenger in his office, and has since, by sheer force of ability, worked himself to his present high position. As chief clerk he examines all letters addressed to the department, sits in judgment upon important monetary transactions, examines contracts involving millions, decides important matters in dispute, and is, in short, the working officer of the Treasury.

—King LOUIS, of Bavaria, who in the first years of his reign was regarded with the general contempt of his subjects, is now exceedingly popular. He showed pluck, spirit, and ability during the war, and has consequently worked himself up to the favor of his people.

—Miss EVANS, who is engaged on a new novel for Blackwood, is a most laborious and painstaking writer, bestowing as much pains upon a single book as ordinary authors do upon six. Her handwriting illustrates this. It is bold, round, as easy to read as print, and scarcely an erasure is to be met with in the manuscript of a whole volume. This is owing to the fact that she carefully sketches beforehand what she intends to write, and then copies it elaborately. The printers keep her manuscript clean, and after the proofs have been corrected it is returned to her. She has the MSS. of all her books bound in red morocco, and they form one of the most interesting features of her library. She sold "Adam Bede" to Blackwood for $1500; but its success prompted her publishers to present her $7500 besides. For "Felix Holt" she received the large sum of $30,000.

—The Prussian government lately gave £5555 sterling to a Berlin cook for his secret of making pease-pudding sausages that will not turn sour. 75,000 of the delicacies, which are strengthened with bacon and flavored with onions, were made daily for the Prussian army. Each sausage weighed a pound, and was a day's ration for one man. The lucky cook's name is GRÜNBERG—but he can not be very green; with his heap of money he might now change his name to GÜLDENBERG.

—Mrs. MARY GAINES, an eccentric, who has been unfortunate in two marriages, recently took a third husband, without legs, for the reason, as she alleged, that he could not run away from her.

Digitized by Google

Tassels for Trimming Tidies, Covers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—TASSEL OF GREEN WOOLEN REPS AND CROCHET. To make this tassel, first prepare a hollow tube two inches and a fifth long, to do which wind a strip of card-board several times around a lead-pencil, and fasten the outer crosswise edge with mucilage. Then wind cotton batting around this tube in such a manner that the circumference of the upper end is smaller than that of the under end. Cover the head smoothly with the woolen reps, and over this stretch threads of dark green silk, which must cross each other as shown by the illustration. To the upper end of the head fasten a loop of green silk cord and a brass ring covered with single crochet of green silk twist. For the under part of the tassel cut a straight piece of the reps eleven inches and three-fifths long and four inches wide, join the crosswise edges, and turn down the under lengthwise edge on the right side an inch and a fifth. Two-fifths of an inch from the under edge ornament the part with two rows of diagonal half-polka stitch worked with green silk twist. Gather the upper edge and sew it on the head as shown by the illustration. Before doing this, however, pass another ring, covered with single crochet of green silk, over the head of the tassel. About two-fifths of an inch from the under edge of the tassel fasten a brass ring five inches in circumference, covered with green silk, to the inside of the tassel, in such a manner that the tassel forms gathers as shown by the illustration. Finally, fasten three silk cords to the inside of the tassel, and finish the ends with three covered wooden balls.

Fig. 1.—WOOLEN REPS AND CROCHET TASSEL FOR TIDIES, COVERS, ETC.

Fig. 2.—TASSEL OF GRAY CASHMERE AND CROCHET. For the head of this tassel two wooden rings, of the shape shown by the illustration, are required. Cover these rings on the outside, first with shirting, and then with cotton batting; cover these smoothly with gray cashmere, and ornament them with long stitches of gray silk twist in the manner shown by the illustration. Slip the larger ring over a card-board tube an inch and a fifth long, which is covered with gray cashmere; fasten it with a few stitches, and above the upper edge set on a brass ring covered with single crochet of gray silk twist. Sew on the smaller wooden ring, fasten it to the first with a few stitches, set on a brass ring as before above the upper edge of the second ring, and sew on a small cord loop. For the crochet cover of the tassel work 60 sc. (single crochet) on a brass ring two inches and a half in circumference, and on these a round as follows: Alternately 1 dc. (double crochet), 2 ch. (chain stitch), with the latter always pass over 2 st. (stitch) of the preceding round. Work one more round alternately 2 sc. on the 2 ch. of the preceding round, 2 ch. To each 2 ch. of the last round fasten two threads of gray silk twist, each four inches and two-fifths long, so that these form strands two inches long, and then knot each five of these strands together in the manner shown by the illustration. Slip this ring with the crochet covering over the head of the tassel, and sew it on the under wooden ring. For the under part of the tassel cut a straight piece of gray cashmere eight inches long and three inches wide, join the crosswise edges, and embroider it, as shown by the illustration, with gray silk soutache and point Russe worked with gray silk twist. At the under edge work button-hole stitch with gray silk twist over the soutache scallops. Arrange the upper edge in four box-pleats, and sew it to the card-board tube so that a gray silk tassel comes between each two pleats.

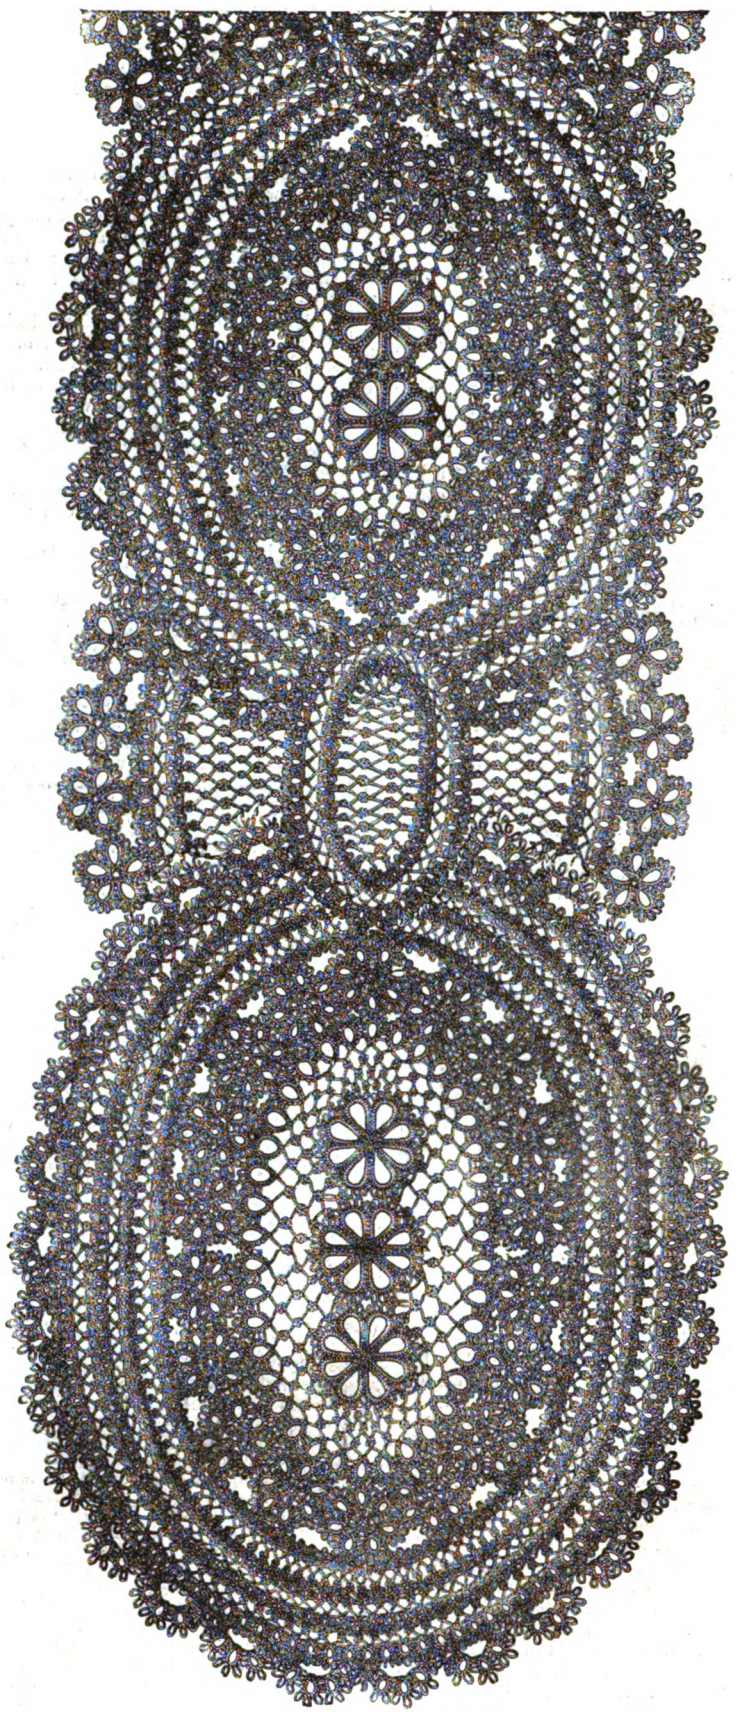

Fig. 1.—SECTION OF TATTED BARBE. FULL SIZE.

TATTED ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

Tatted Barbe, Figs. 1–4.

THIS barbe, of which Fig. 1 shows one end in full size, is worked with fine tatting cotton. It consists of medallions of various sizes, which are joined in the manner shown by Fig. 1. For the large medallion at each end of the barbe work, first, the three middle rosettes (Fig. 3 shows one enlarged) as follows: A ring of 14 ds. (double stitches), eight times alternately 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., then 1 p., 14 ds. In this way work seven more rings in close succession, but in working each of these rings fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring, instead of forming the first p.; and in working the last ring, instead of forming the last p., fasten to the first p. of the first ring. Finally, work little wheels in the middle of the rosettes, as shown by Fig. 3. The three rosettes are joined with the middle p. of two rings of each side, either in the working, or by sewing them together with fine thread. On each side of the tatted strip thus formed fill out the empty spaces between each two rosettes with three small rings, each of which counts 6 ds.; between the 3d and 4th ds. fasten each ring to a p. of the rosettes at the proper point; leave an interval of thread of the requisite length between each two rings (see Fig. 1). Surround the tatted strip with two rounds of small rings; each ring of the first round counts 6 ds., and is fastened to the rosettes between the 3d and 4th ds.; between each two rings leave an interval of thread two-fifths of an inch long. At the ends of the tatted strip the rings must come closer together than at the sides (see Fig. 1). The rings of the second round must also count 6 ds., and between the 3d and 4th ds. must be fastened to the middle of the threads connecting the rings of the preceding round; at the end of this round fasten the thread and cut it off. 3d round.—* One ring of 3 ds., eight times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., then 1 p., 3 ds.; turn this ring downward, and, after one-fifth of an inch interval, work one ring of 3 ds., fasten to the connecting thread between two rings of the preceding round, 3 ds.; turn the work, and, after one-fifth of an inch interval, repeat from *, but now, instead of forming the first p. of the larger ring, fasten to the last p. of the larger ring previously worked. After completing this round, fasten the beginning and end of the thread together and cut it off. Surround the medallion with a row of rosettes; Fig. 2 shows one of these rosettes enlarged. For each rosette work a ring of 1 ds., 1 p., six times alternately 2 ds., 1 p., then 1 ds. After completing the ring, * fasten the working thread to the nearest p., and, after one-seventh of an inch interval, work one ring of 2 ds.; nine times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., and, after one-seventh of an inch interval, repeat yet six times from *. Finally, fasten the thread and cut it off. These rosettes must be joined with the medallion and each other, as shown by Fig. 1. Work the large medallions between the end medallions in a similar manner, but work only two rosettes for the middle strip, and surround this with one round of small tatted rings instead of two. Besides this the large rings of the following round (3d round of the end medallion) must count 7 p. instead of 9 p. Having worked the requisite number of medallions (the original measures thirty-seven inches, and counts two large medallions for the ends and six smaller ones, worked in the manner above described), join each two medallions at the ends with a small medallion, so that the barbe when completed counts eight large medallions and seven of the small medallions last mentioned. Work the latter as follows, beginning with the middle row of rings facing each other: 1 ring of 3 ds., 1 short p., 3 ds.; turn the ring, and, * after one-fifth of an inch interval, work a similar ring; turn the ring, and repeat from * until the row counts 22 rings in all—that is, 11 rings turned upward, and 11 rings turned downward. All around this row work a round of small rings as follows: Fasten the working thread to the p. of the first ring, * after one-fifth of an inch interval work one ring of 2 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., fasten to the p. of the following ring after one-fifth of an inch interval, and repeat from *; at the end of the strip, however, work a few additional rings, to prevent the medallion from stretching; in doing this fasten to the connecting threads of the middle ring. In connection with this round

Fig. 2.—CASHMERE AND CROCHET TASSEL FOR TIDIES, COVERS, ETC.

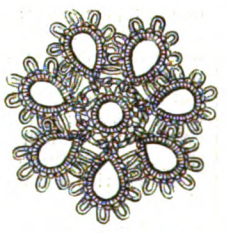

Fig. 2.—TATTED ROSETTE FOR BARBE. REDUCED SIZE.

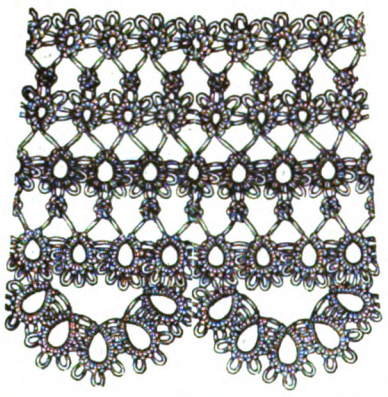

Fig. 4.—TATTED EDGING FOR BARBE. REDUCED SIZE.

Fig. 3.—TATTED ROSETTE FOR BARBE. REDUCED SIZE.

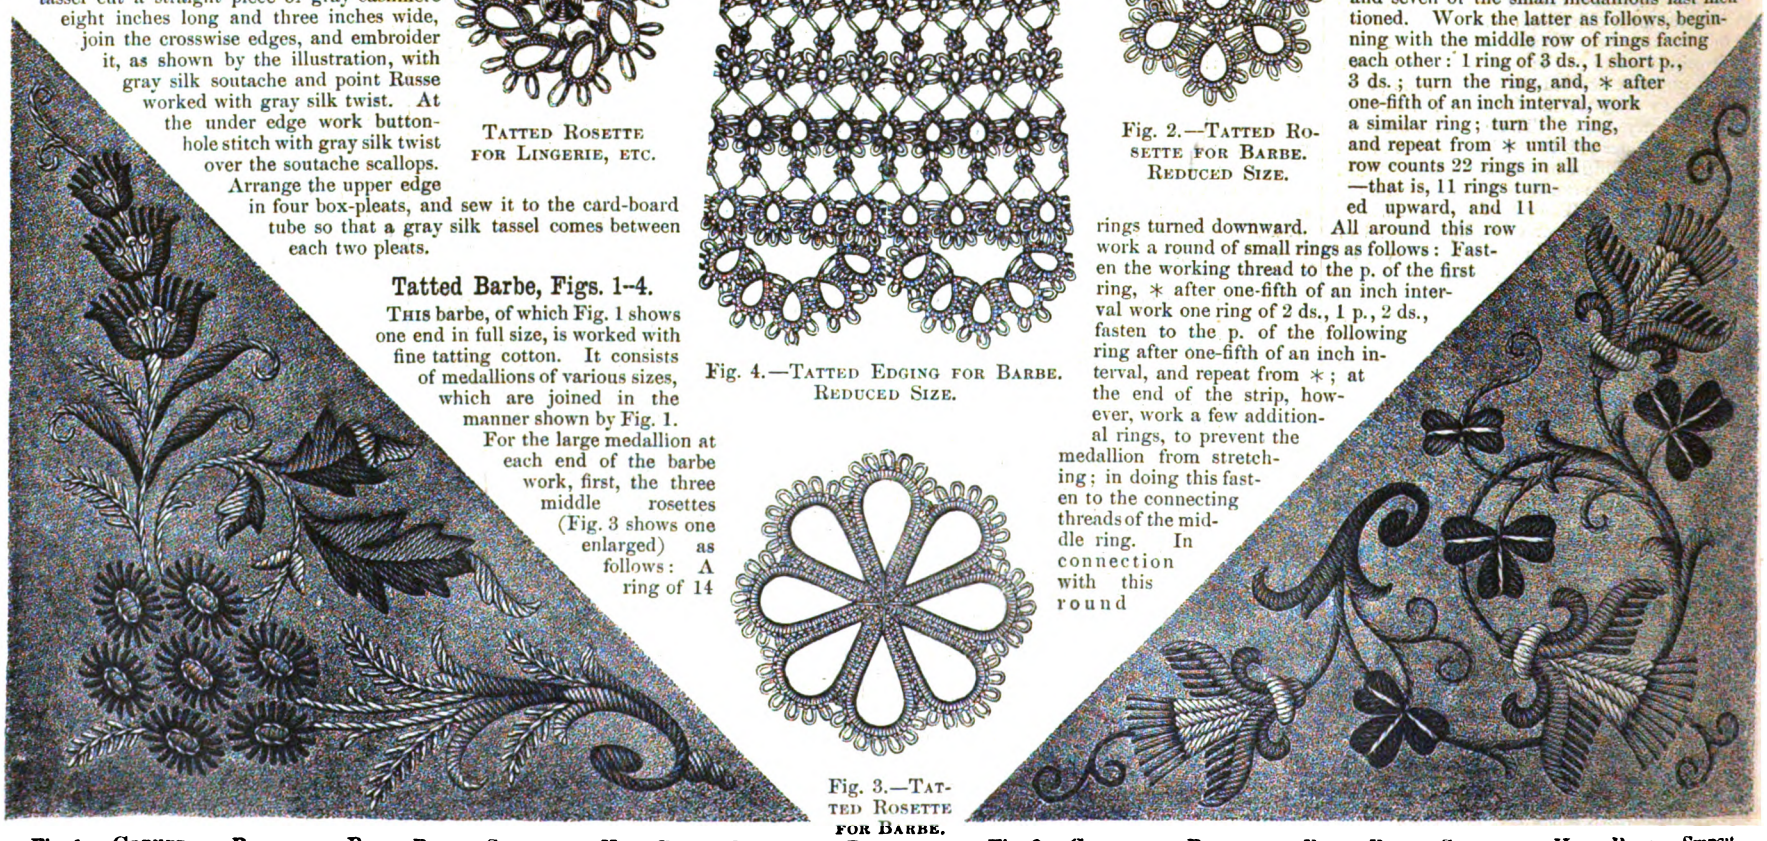

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF BORDER IN POINT RUSSE, SATIN, AND HALF-POLKA STITCH FOR ALBUMS, CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC.

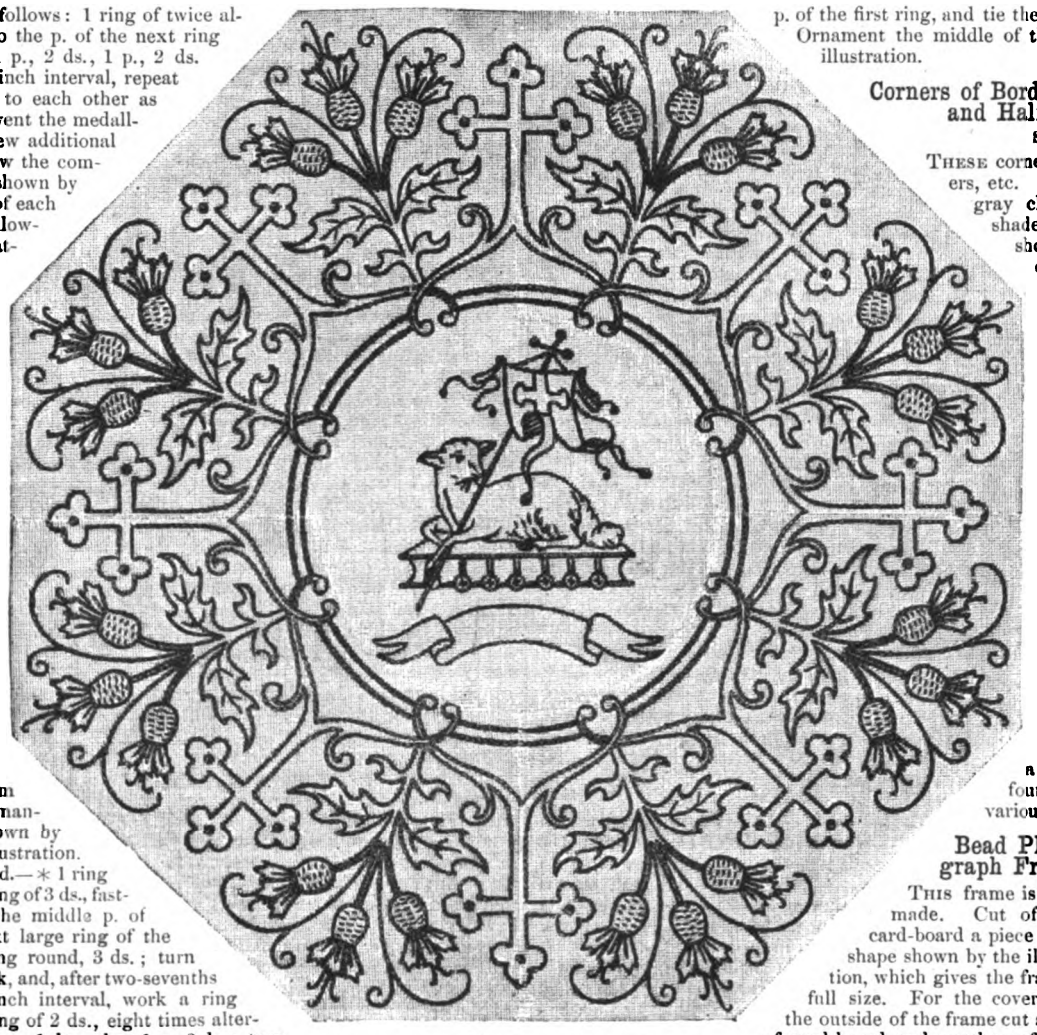
Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER IN POINT RUSSE, SATIN, AND HALF-POLKA STITCH FOR ALBUMS, CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC.

Digitized by Google



EMBROIDERY DESIGN FOR COVERS, ETC.

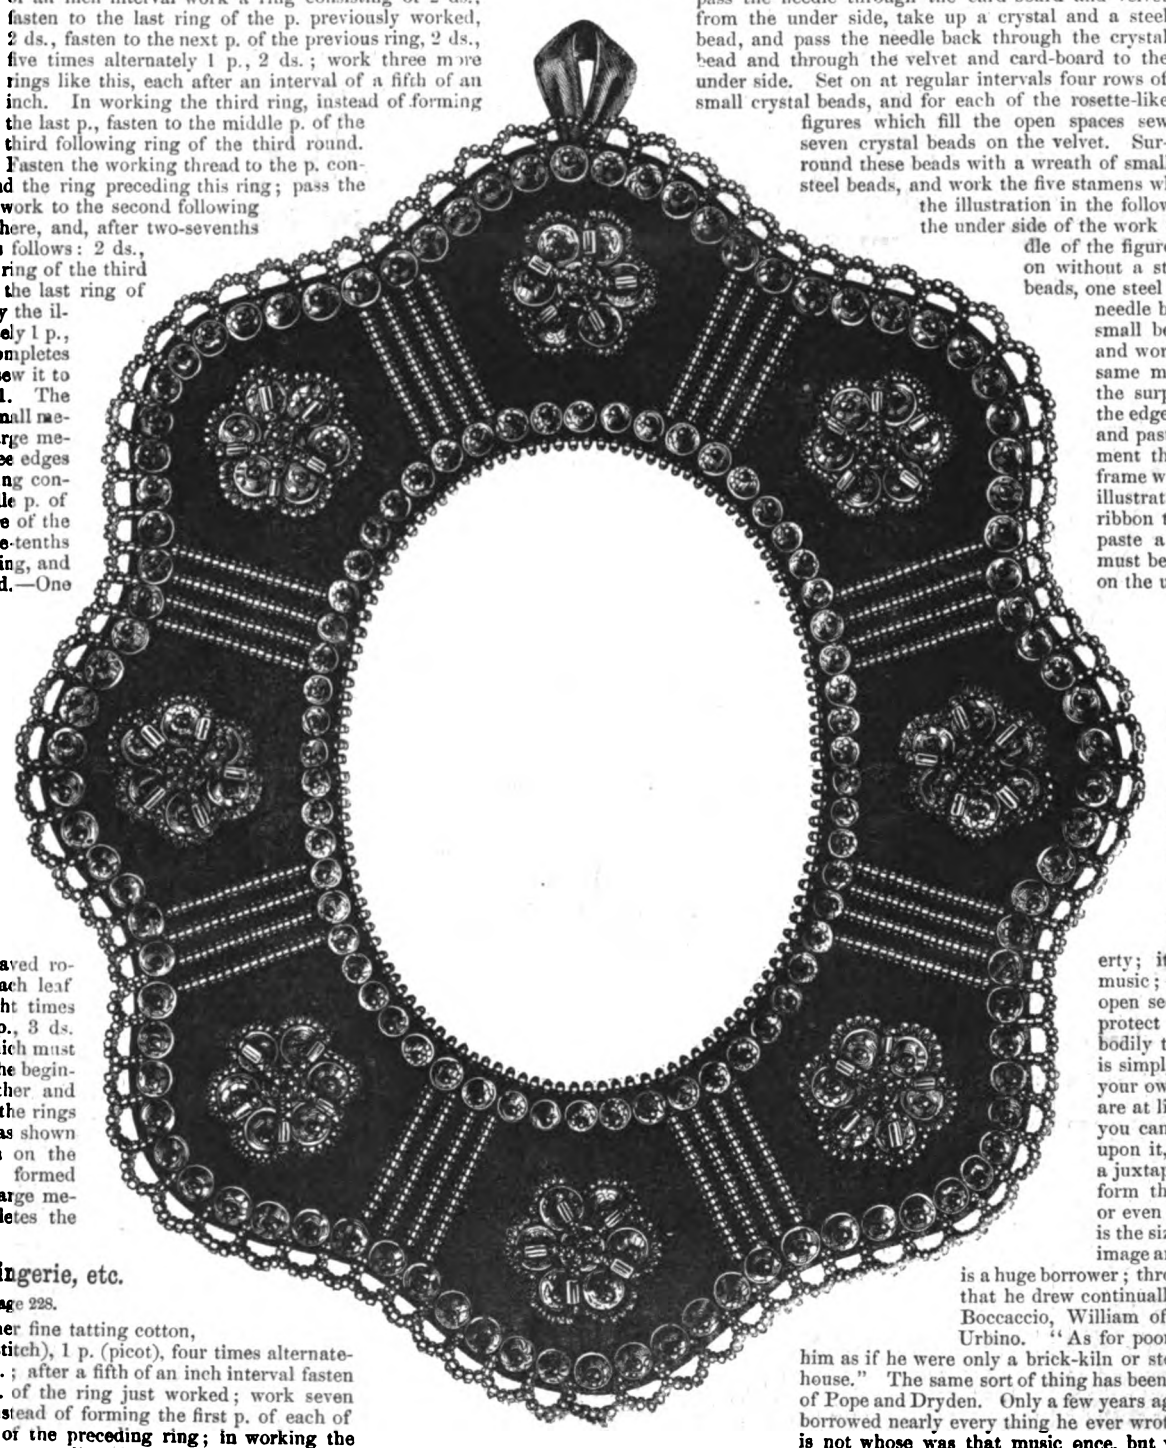
work a round of rings facing each other as follows: 1 ring of twice alternately 2 ds., 1 p.; then 2 ds.; fasten to the p. of the next ring of the preceding round, and work 2 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., 1 p., 2 ds. Turn the work, and, after one-fifth of an inch interval, repeat from *, fastening the rings of each row to each other as shown by the illustration. In order to prevent the medallion from stretching at the ends, work a few additional rings there in this round (see Fig. 1). Sew the completed medallions together at the ends as shown by the illustration. On the free outer edges of each of the eight larger medallions work the following edging, observing Figs. 1 and 4; the latter illustration shows a section of the edging enlarged. The first round of the edging consists of two rows of rings facing each other; first work * one of the larger rings (see upper straight edge of Fig. 4), consisting of 2 ds., 1 p., four times alternately 1 ds., 1 p.; then 2 ds. Turn the ring downward, and, after a fifth of an inch interval, work 1 ring consisting of 3 ds., 1 p., 3 ds. Again turn the ring just worked, and repeat from *. In working the larger rings, instead of forming the first p. of each ring, fasten to the last p. of the preceding ring. At the end of the round fasten the thread and cut it off. The second round also consists of two rows of rings facing each other; work first * 1 ring consisting of 2 ds., 1 p., 1 ds., 1 p., 1 ds.; fasten to the p. of a small ring of the preceding round, 1 ds., 1 p., 1 ds., 1 p., 2 ds.; turn the work, and, after two-sevenths of an inch interval, work a ring consisting of 2 ds., six times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; then 1 p., 2 ds.; turn the work, and, after two-sevenths of an inch interval, repeat from , fastening the rings to each other in the manner shown by the illustration. 3d round.— 1 ring consisting of 3 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the next large ring of the preceding round, 3 ds.; turn the work, and, after two-sevenths of an inch interval, work a ring consisting of 2 ds., eight times alternately 1 p., 1 ds.; then 1 p., 2 ds.; turn the work, and, after two-sevenths of an inch interval, repeat from *. Fasten the large rings of this round to each other in the manner shown by Fig. 4. 4th round.—Hold the lace so that the 3d round is turned upward, fasten the working thread to the p. joining the first two large rings of the preceding round, and, after two-sevenths of an inch interval, work 1 ring consisting of 2 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the first of the two rings just mentioned, 2 ds., six times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; * after a fifth of an inch interval work a ring consisting of 2 ds., fasten to the last ring of the p. previously worked, 2 ds., fasten to the next p. of the previous ring, 2 ds., five times alternately 1 p., 2 ds.; work three more rings like this, each after an interval of a fifth of an inch. In working the third ring, instead of forming the last p., fasten to the middle p. of the third following ring of the third round. Fasten the working thread to the p. connecting the ring last mentioned and the ring preceding this ring; pass the thread along the under side of the work to the second following p. connecting two rings, fasten it there, and, after two-sevenths of an inch interval, work a ring as follows: 2 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the next ring of the third round, 2 ds., 1 p., 2 ds., fasten to the last ring of the preceding scallop, as shown by the illustration, 2 ds., four times alternately 1 p., 2 ds., and repeat from *. This completes the edging. After completing it, sew it to the medallion as shown by Fig. 1. The ends of the edging must meet the small medallions, by means of which the large medallions are joined. On the still free edges of these small medallions work a ring consisting of 2 ds., fasten to the middle p. of the next free ring of the outer edge of the small medallions, 2 ds.; after three-tenths of an inch interval work a similar ring, and continue in this manner. 2d round.—One ring consisting of 3 ds., fasten to the connecting threads between two rings of the preceding round, 3 ds.; after two-fifths of an inch interval work a similar ring, and continue in this manner. Repeat these two rounds twice, always fastening the rings to the connecting threads between two rings of the preceding round, and besides this widen each successive round on each side by one ring. The seventh round consists of two rows of rings facing each other, which must be worked like the rings facing each other on the outer edge of the small medallions. With this round is joined a round of five-leaved rosettes, as is shown by Fig. 1. Each leaf of these rosettes counts 3 ds., eight times alternately 1 p., 1 ds.; then 1 p., 3 ds. After completing the five leaves, which must be worked in close succession, tie the beginning and end of the thread together and cut them off. Sew the rosettes to the rings of the seventh round and together, as shown by the illustration, or join them on the working. The tatted part thus formed must meet the side edges of the large medallion (see Fig. 1). This completes the barbe.

Fig. 1.—MEDALLION IN SATIN AND HALF-POLKA STITCH.

Tatted Rosette for Lingerie, etc.

See illustration on page 228.

FOR this rosette work, with rather fine tatting cotton, a ring consisting of 6 ds. (double stitch), 1 p. (picot), four times alternately 3 ds., 1 p., then 5 ds., 1 p., 5 ds.; after a fifth of an inch interval fasten the working thread to the last p. of the ring just worked; work seven rings more in this manner, but instead of forming the first p. of each of these rings, fasten to the fifth p. of the preceding ring; in working the last ring, instead of forming the p. preceding the last, fasten to the first p. of the first ring, and tie the beginning and end of the thread together. Ornament the middle of the rosette with a wheel, as shown by the illustration.



BEAD PHOTOGRAPH FRAME.

Corners of Borders in Point Russe, Satin Stitch, and Half-polka Stitch, Figs. 1 and 2.

See Illustrations on page 228.

THESE corners are suitable for albums, cushions, covers, etc. They are worked on a foundation of light gray cloth, partly with plain and partly with shaded silk twist. The illustration distinctly shows the manner of executing the embroidery and the shading. Velvet, satin, gros grain, or leather may also be used as a foundation.

Embroidery Design for Covers, etc.

THE symbols on this cover render it especially suited to ecclesiastical purposes. The foundation is of fine white linen. The embroidery is worked with red or white cotton in satin stitch, back stitch, chain stitch, and diagonal half-polka stitch. If desired, a tatted, crochet, or point lace rosette may be substituted for the central figures. Cambric, piqué, or Swiss muslin may also be used for the foundation, and the embroidery executed with black silk.

Medallions embroidered in Satin and Half-polka Stitch, Figs. 1 and 2.

THESE medallions are suitable for ornamenting porte-monnaies, note-books, cigar-cases, etc. They may be worked on a satin, gros grain, velvet, leather, or cloth foundation with shaded silk twist, or twist of various colors.

Bead Photograph Frame.

THIS frame is easily made. Cut of thick card-board a piece of the shape shown by the illustration, which gives the frame in full size. For the covering of the outside of the frame cut a piece of card-board and another of black velvet, allowing two-fifths of an inch extra material on the outer edge of the velvet piece, and four-fifths of an inch on the inner edge. Paste the velvet on the card-board, letting it project two-fifths of an inch beyond the outer and four-fifths of an inch beyond the inner edge, and ornament with the beads as shown by the illustration; for the present do not work the round of small beads on the inner edge of the frame, nor the scallops on the outer edge. In order to sew on the large crystal (frost) beads, pass the needle through the card-board and velvet from the under side, take up a crystal and a steel bead, and pass the needle back through the crystal bead and through the velvet and card-board to the under side. Set on at regular intervals four rows of small crystal beads, and for each of the rosette-like figures which fill the open spaces sew seven crystal beads on the velvet. Surround these beads with a wreath of small steel beads, and work the five stamens which rest on the figures as shown by the illustration in the following manner: Pass the needle from the under side of the work through the crystal bead in the middle of the figure (this bead must have been brought on without a steel bead), take up three small steel beads, one steel bugle, one small steel bead, pass the needle back through the bugle and the three small beads to the under side of the work, and work the remaining four stamens in the same manner. Cut short diagonal slits in the surplus edges of the velvet, turn down the edges on the under side of the pasteboard, and paste them down with mucilage. Ornament the inner and the outer edge of the frame with small steel beads, as shown by the illustration, and fasten a loop of gros grain ribbon to the upper edge of the frame; and paste a second piece of pasteboard, which must be smoothly covered with moiré paper, on the under side of the frame.

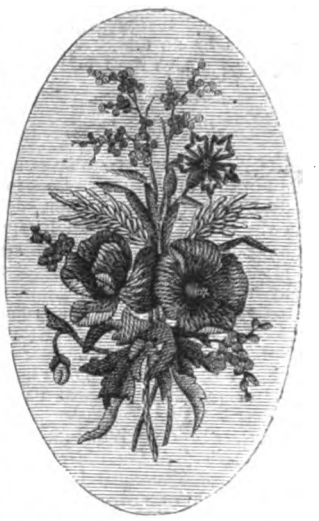


Fig. 2.—MEDALLION IN SATIN AND HALF-POLKA STITCH.

ASSIMILATION.

ASSIMILATION is not robbery; neither is quotation. Original men do not rob; they assimilate. It is the little men who rob, and call their robbery assimilation. But they are incapable of assimilating; they can only steal, and strut about in borrowed plumes, which never did and never can belong to them. When a musical phrase or progression has been once discovered it can not be rediscovered, neither can it be patented; it is henceforth public property; it is there for you, if you can write music; you may use it if you can; it is an open secret—it needs no protection—it can protect itself. You must not transfer it bodily to your pages, context and all; that is simply copying other people's writing into your own; but in almost any other way you are at liberty to mould what you find, and if you can succeed in putting your imprimatur upon it, it will be yours. A chord, a note, a juxtaposition will often be enough to transform the whole emotional intent of a bar, or even a phrase. The question is not what is the size or the weight of the coin, but whose image and superscription is upon it. Chaucer is a huge borrower; through Lydgate and Caxton we are told that he drew continually upon Guido di Colonna, Petrarch, Boccaccio, William of Lorris, John of Meun, Lollius of Urbino. "As for poor Glover," says Emerson, "he uses him as if he were only a brick-kiln or stone-quarry out of which to build his house." The same sort of thing has been said of Shakspeare; the same is true of Pope and Dryden. Only a few years ago we were informed that Handel had borrowed nearly every thing he ever wrote; but we all feel that the question is not whose was that music once, but whose is it now and for evermore? The transforming touch of originality is the one sufficient excuse for all so-called robbery. If I have not this originality I am a thief; if I have, then what I take belongs to me by a kind of divine right. God says to every man: "Here is the world. Take whatever belongs to you. Whatever else you may take will never be yours."

Digitized by Google

LOVE'S COLORS.

NOT violets I gave my love,
That in their life are sweet and rare,
And deep in color, as the heart
Whose every thought of her is prayer;
For violets grow pale and dry,
And lose the semblance of her eye.

No lily's buds I gave my love,
Though she is white and pure as they;
For they are cold to smell and touch,
And blossom but a single day;
And pressed by love, in love's own page,
They yellow into early age.

But cyclamen I chose to give,
Whose pale white blossoms at the tips
(All else is driven snow) are pink,
And mind me of her perfect lips;
Still till this flower is kept and old
Its worth to love is yet untold.

Old, kept, and kissed, it does not lose
As other flowers the hues they wear;
Love is triumphant, and this bloom
Will never whiten from despair;
Rather it deepens as it lies,
This flower that purples when it dies.

So shall my love, as years roll by,
Take kingly colors for its own;
Sole master of her vanquished heart,
Am I not master of a throne?
Crushed by no foot, nor cast away,
My purple love shall rule the day.

THOROUGHNESS.

THIS is a virtue hard to be attained by many. For one of the great errors in the ordinary education of woman is its want of thoroughness; and the careless, superficial habits of her early training are the bane of many a woman's life. It is so hard for a person brought up superficially to do any thing thoroughly. Yet, if work is to be done so as to give satisfaction, it must be done thoroughly.

Nothing must be slurred over; nothing left to chance; nothing be taken on supposition. Your whole energy must be thrown into your work, whatever it may be. All your thoughts must be concentrated on it. Your labor must be given to it unsparingly. You must grudge neither time nor fatigue. You must let nothing connected with it (no matter how small) escape your notice.

Never let any work leave your hand of which you can not, in all truth and honor, say to your own heart that it is as well done as your powers could do it; that you have given your best, your very best. Depend on it, no work which is not thorough will ever give satisfaction.

No woman will ever keep regular employment of whom it can not be said that thoroughness is one of the characteristics of her work.

It is worldly wisdom, as well as religious duty, that the wise king teaches when he says, "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might."

AN EASTER-EGG.

FOUR pairs of noisy boots clattered down the entry. Three sets of impatient fingers fumbled at once for the door-knob, while another, missing its clutch, thumped violently on the panel. A quartet of voices, raised to concert pitch, accompanied these movements with a chorus of "Bully! splendid! Oh, Nora, Nora, Nora!"

A second more and the door flew open, and in poured an eager little crowd, startling the quiet of the nursery with their whoops and shouts. But Nora was used to it, and only smiled as they flocked around her.

"Oh, Nora, what d'you think?"

This was Reggy, the eldest. Jack, his next junior, vented his feelings in a series of hops, each topped off with the word "Cricky!" as a sort of exclamation point. Jonquil, a solemn girl of six, with excited, red cheeks, stood in the middle of the room, too breathless for more than an occasional "Oh!" While small May, the baby, who had climbed the precipitous back of the sewing-chair, and wound a pair of fat arms round her nurse's neck, nearly strangled her with a series of well-meant but uncomfortable squeezes.

"What is it, children? That is enough, Miss May, dear; come and sit on my lap instead. Master Jack, don't tangle my thread, please; it's all wound round your legs. Bring your little chair, Jonquil; that's right. Now tell me all about it."

It was wonderful to see the effect of her voice and manner—both full of that happy mixture of firmness and good humor which children are so quick to recognize. Jack suspended his skips; "Miss May" descended from the chair-back. Nora was confessedly "a treasure." "The Lord knew how much I could bear," little Mrs. Allen was wont to say, piously; "so when he sent a fourth obstreperous baby to reinforce the other three, he sent Nora at the same time. And how I should manage without her I can't tell. She has such influence over the children. Why, they are as good as gold with her, and they never think of minding a word I say." Which eulogy Mrs. Allen was accustomed to deliver with clasped hands, and without a shade of self-blame! And it was a fact—the small fry of the nursery were completely under Nora's dominion.

She was a pretty girl, this "treasure," and that goes so far with children. Pretty and sad. In spite of the ripe bloom of Devonshire on cheek and lip, and the round, almost childish contour, there was something in the wistful, earnest face which spoke a deeper experience than a child's. The little elves under her charge divined this. "Would you be happy if I loved you very hard indeed?" May was once heard to ask; but though Nora laughed and kissed her, she shook her head slightly as in response to some inward thought, and made no reply. But all this was between herself and the children. No one else in the house interested himself in the nurse's possible sorrows, or even cared to speculate as to whether or not she had any.

"I'll tell you," began Jonquil, as the unruly group subsided into order. "You see to-morrow is egg-day."

"Oh, Jonquil," interposed scandalized Reggy, "not egg-day. You mean Easter-egg day. They always put Easter first."

"Do they?" said Jonquil. "Well, Nora, it's Easter-egg day; and mamma says we may boil some eggs. We did 'em once before, but not last year, because that cook was real cross, and said she'd not have us about. But the new Ann is very kind, you know, and mamma says she guesses it won't put her out. Put her out where, Nora?"

"Out of temper, your mother meant. Well, so you are to have some Easter-eggs?"

"Yes, six apiece. That makes twenty-two, or else twenty-six, I can't 'member which. And we may boil them in a tin saucepan. And they're to be all colors—all sorts of colors—that we can get pieces of, you know."

"Pieces?"

"To rub off"—"To tie up"—"To wap wound," began a chorus of explanation; but Reggy overbore the others. "Pieces of calico which don't wash, Nora, and come off on the shells when they're boiled. Jonquil has got some already, but we want a great many more. Show all you've got in your pocket, John."

Jonquil produced a small collection of shreds and patches from that receptacle. "Ain't they nice?" she said. "Mamma gave us a pink one and a purple one and all that green, and Aunt Emma found this one in her trunk, and she says the little red spots always comed off in the tub. And mamma said if you'd look in the piece-bag you'd find lots more just as good—no, just as bad, she said. There's my blue frock, which is most white now, and some of May's plaid. And, Norry dear," coaxingly—

"Well, darling?"

"Don't you think perhaps there are some teenty-weenty bits in your box. Once I saw inside, you know, when you showed us the crooked sixpence. And I think I 'member some bits all rolled up. Won't you look and see, and let us see?"

"Yes, dear, and welcome. Would you like to come and look now?"

"Oh yes—now—how jolly! Nora is going to open her box," cried the little ones in chorus, as they capered down the long gallery. In the quiet country place such an event as a box-opening was not of every-day occurrence.

Nora's room was a pleasant one, bright, sunny, and neatly furnished. "Quite too good for a servant," Mrs. Allen would say; "but then May sleeps with her, you know; and really she is a very superior sort of girl—so different from the common Irish one gets." The box, not a large one, which held Nora's little treasures, was in a corner. She turned the key, the children standing by and peering over the lid with a comical mixture of awe and pleasure in their faces. There was nothing exciting on the top, only Nora's Sunday dress and shawl, with the aspect of which they were quite familiar. Laying these aside,

"There's not much here for you, Miss Jonquil," she said; "all the pieces I've got are in this little roll, and the prettiest are fast colors, I'm afraid. Our English prints mostly are. They don't run like the American ones."

"Won't this blue one run?" inquired Jonquil.

"No; but here's a pink which will, perhaps; and I don't know but this purple does." Nora turned over her scraps meditatively.

"Oh!" screamed May, "dat's a pitty one! Oh, Norry, dive me some like dat!"

It was an extremely odd and very pretty calico, with large green clover leaves sprinkled over a white surface. Nora held it fast, as if reluctant.

"Don't it run?" persisted Jonquil.

"Yes, it did run badly." Slowly: "I'll give you a little bit, Miss May, but I don't want to part with much of it. It's a dress I used to think a deal of."

"What made you? Is there a story about it?" asked Jack, ravenous for stories, and with the delightful directness of his age.

"No, Master Jack, no story; only I used to wear that gown in England when I was a lass and happy and at home. I kept a bit just to remember those times by—the times and the people."

"What became of the people?" persisted Jack.

"Some of them are dead, and some lost."

"Lost? How? When?" cried three eager voices in a breath.

"Lost in a great land, where there's no finding or following a person," responded Nora, bitterly. "But never mind that, dears. We'll not talk any more about people. And, May and Jonquil, you shall each have a bit of my clover calico, since you like it so much, and the boys shall have the purple and the pink. We'll go back to the nursery and get a pair of scissors."

But the children demurred. They wanted to see all the things in the box first. So Nora patiently gratified them. The crooked sixpence was displayed, a shell pincushion, some bits of mineral, a small box of dark wood neatly turned and polished, a silhouette of somebody. The show lasted half an hour; then the audience adjourned en masse; and in the excitement of sewing eggs up in cotton rags the conversation and the box seemed alike forgotten.

The eggs "came out beautiful," according to the cook. Purple, crimson, streaked, and pied, they were arranged in their nests of green moss, and formed the principal event of the festival to the children. Pre-eminent among the rest shone the "clover calico," which had "run" to admiration, each distinct leaf being printed on the snowy shell as if painted by an artist.

While this was going on within the house a young man, a stranger, was hard at work without in a distant part of the grounds. He was a new hand, sent over by the village carpenter to make some alterations in the stables. All day Saturday and Monday he hammered and planed busily and alone. It was not till Tuesday that the children found him out—the discoverer being Jonquil, who was a born explorer, with a strong taste for new acquaintances.

In half an hour she had made friends, and possessed herself of the main facts in the stranger's history. His name was James. He was English. He was going to stay a good while in Barnet. He didn't know if he shouldn't stay always. He liked little girls. Would he lend her one of his little gimlets, then, and let her bore? Yes, he would. This blissful indulgence opened her heart. She became generous in her turn. Did he like eggs?—eggs with calico on the outside?

James wasn't sure. He never saw any.

"Didn't you? Why, how funny! Don't you ever go to church?" (Church and eggs were now inseparably connected in Jonquil's mind.) "I'll run in and get mine to show you—mine and May's too. And," generously, "I'll give you one. Any one you like—except my green. That's the prettiest of all, you see. So I must keep it."

Off she ran. In a few minutes a great noise became audible, drawing nearer. Jonquil had imparted her discovery, and the quartet, in full cry, were all bearing down upon the stable. Each of the little girls carried a basket, in which reposed the nest full of precious eggs.

He was a nice young fellow, this James; there was no doubt about it. How he managed to rescue his plane from Reggy, and to prevent Jack from hammering his fingers as well as the nails, was a mystery; but he did it, and without any loss of his rapid popularity, or the use of a sharp word. Baby May was a case of love at first sight. In five minutes she had her arms clasped round one of his legs. "Zoo shall have two of my eggs," she said. Nothing would serve but that he should stop work at once and choose. Jonquil kept a couple covered carefully in her hand.

"The pink is a nice one," she remarked, suggestively.

Of course the pink was chosen, and a sedate lilac specimen from May's basket, after which happy settlement Jonquil revealed her hidden treasures. "You see I was afraid you'd want them," she exclaimed, "so I kept them hid. Ain't they pretty?"

James didn't answer for a minute. He was looking strangely hard at the eggs.

"They make me think—" he began; then recovering himself—"Yes, they are pretty, miss. I never saw exactly that pattern but once before, and that was far from here."

"It's English!" vouchsafed Jack. "Nora had it once for a gown; but all the people she used to know got lost, so now she doesn't wear it any more."

"Nora!" The tone was startling.

"She our nursey," lisped May. "She's from England, you know. We love her lots, me and Jonquil do; but she says she can't be happy 'cause all her folks is lost."

The young carpenter sat down suddenly. He was very pale.

"What's the matter?" said Jonquil. "Are you tired of hammering? I'd never get tired, I know. Oh, Reggy, he's going to sleep! How queer he looks!"

May began to cry.

"Run for Nora!" screamed Reggy. "She'll give him something. Tell her to hurry."

Off flew Jack. In five minutes he was back, panting and out of breath, with Nora at his heels.

"What is it, dears?" she cried. "One of you sick? Oh, my God!"

James had risen to his feet. The dull paleness of his cheeks changed to a deep, burning flush. His eyes blazed. "Nora!" he said, in a deep, rapturous tone.

Next moment they were clasped in each other's arms.

Poor Mrs. Allen! Her utter bewilderment, ten minutes later, when the spectators of this wonderful tableau rushed in pell-mell with the news, was indescribable. "He ran," and "she ran," and "they both jumped;" "and Nora said a swear word, mamma!" and "he kissed!" "she kissed!" "they kissed." Good gracious! What did it all mean? How was her staid, perfectly conducted Nora involved in this distracted narrative about carpenters and kissing?

"Who kissed?" cried Mrs. Allen.

"Why, Nora!"

Explanation followed a little later. Even Mrs. Allen, in the midst of her terror at the idea of losing Nora, could not resist giving true womanly sympathy to the simple little story. The two lovers had missed each other in the strange new world which ingulfed them on landing from the emigrant ship. James came first to find work and make a home, and wandering out to the West missed the letters which told of the death of Nora's old mother, and her intention of immediately following him. No clew to his whereabouts could she find on arriving; no answer to the anxious inquiries sent home by him. For three years they had watched and waited, their only hope to save money enough to return to England, and there take up the end of the broken thread which united them. A few weeks more, and James would have sailed. Only chance and the prattle of a little child had brought them together.

It was some little time yet before he was ready to claim his bride, and meanwhile good Nora diligently occupied herself with training a successor. She and James have a little home now, half-way between the Allens' place and the village, and no greater treat can be given to any of the Allen children than permission to go to Nora's cottage to drink tea or spend the day.

"And no one should be more welcome," James declares to his wife; "for it was their blessed fingers that brought us together. I was clean discouraged, Nora, and hope was leaving me when they, pretty dears, fetched those eggs, and I saw the pattern of the very gown you wore when I courted you. And then they began to talk of Nora. Ah, my lass, that's a minute I sha'n't forget. And poor as we may be, we'll never be too poor as long as we live, I hope, to keep Easter with an Easter-egg, if it's only in memory of the good day that gave us to each other again."

APPLES FOR ALL OF US.

BY BARRY GRAY.

"APPLES," I said to my wife, as, at the close of our mid-day meal, I drew the fruit basket, filled with "apples and oranges, two for a penny," as the nursery song hath it—which, however, in a monetary point of view, is not in these high-priced times correct—toward my side of the table. "Apples," I repeated, taking one in my hand, and viewing it with favor, "are a royal fruit. They are the only one of Northern birth that will keep for any length of time. The peach, the plum, and most varieties of the pear perish with the season that produces them; but the apple lasts beyond its harvest-time. It gladdens our winter evenings with its presence, and in the spring gains a fresh flavor from the perfume of the blossoms that cover the tree that bore it."

"That," said my wife, smiling at me across the table, "seems to me to be more poetical than true."

"If wine, my dear," I replied, "feels, as is asserted, in the spring, the sap coursing through the veins of the vine that produced it, and responds thereto, why may not the apple inhale the fragrance shed from its parent tree?"

"Why not, indeed?" was all my wife could answer.

"The apple," I said, resuming again my discourse, "may very confidently assert itself to be the most ancient of fruits. Like the poet Sprague's 'Curiosity,'

'It reigned in Eden.'

The old Greeks and Romans made free use of it in their mythology. It was an apple—a golden one—whereon was inscribed, 'To the fairest,' which, as you are aware, was thrown by the goddess of discord into an assembly of the gods, which gave rise to the contention between Juno, Minerva, and Venus, and which Paris awarded to the last-named goddess. The fruit which Hercules—who might have been better employed—stole were apples; though there are writers who insist upon it that they were lemons. These, undoubtedly, are the same worthies who would have mankind believe that the apples of the Hesperides were oranges. For my part, I have no faith in their assertions, and would as soon believe that the original apple was the pomme de terre, as the French have it, as that these classical apples were either oranges or lemons. Solon, who in his day knew something of jurisprudence, once issued a decree making it compulsory on a bridegroom, at his nuptial feast, to partake of nothing save a single apple; though why this was thus history fails to inform us."

"That it had something to do," my wife said, "with the story of the temptation, you may be certain."

"It is not unlikely," I said. "Even in England, within a hundred years or two, a custom existed among lovers to send on New-Year's Day, as an appropriate gift to their lady-loves, apples stuck full of cloves. This meant something, whatever it was, of course."

"Of course it did," my wife replied; "and I would interpret it in this way—the apple, a sweet one, necessarily, was typical of the sweetness of the lady, and the cloves clinging to it of the warmth and ardor of the lover."

"I think, my dear," I replied, "that you have hit it; if not, let some one give a better interpretation if one can. Another olden custom was for a bride to carry a love-apple in her bosom, which, after many days, was eaten by the bridegroom. It was supposed that this would enable him to keep his conjugal vow unbroken through life. It is a pity that this charm is not employed at the present day, since we might reasonably hope that there would be less suits for divorce if it were."

"Let us hope so," said my wife, thoughtfully.

"There was still another custom which prevailed," I said, "at one time in Wales wherein apples played a prominent part. There existed what were called 'apple-lakings,' gotten up by the fruit dealers, who, when they could not find a market for their apples, proclaimed a dance, at which the revelers received for their entrance money apples in return; and 'these apples,' says our authority, Dr. Doran, 'were used for sauce at many a consequent wedding-dinner.' The best of these apples, so it appears, 'were kept for accompaniment to the roast goose eaten on St. Crispin's Day.' This saint was the patron of shoe-makers; and though our friend Saxe, in his poem entitled 'Saint Jonathan,' makes no allusion to him, he was doubtless as excellent a saint as any therein mentioned. Whether St. Crispin's Day falls upon the 29th of September, which is Michaelmas, and the properest time of all the year for eating a goose, I do not know. But that roast goose ought to be eaten at Michaelmas every one must confess, however one may question the orthodoxy of it on St. Crispin's Day. And here let me ask you, my dear, what would roasted goose be without apple sauce? Why merely vanity and vexation of spirit."

Digitized by Google

"And sage-and-onion stuffing," said my wife.

"Well, yes," I replied; "and I'm not certain but what the sage-and-onion stuffing is the best part of the goose."

"You've forgotten the apple sauce," my wife said.

"True," I answered, "together with the apple sauce. In my boyhood, when I was at boarding-school, apple sauce was one of the prominent dishes on the table. It was made by the Shakers at New Lebanon, and sold by them by the barrel. It was commonly called, I remember, apple-butter, because it very often was spread on our bread instead of butter."

"And it was much healthier," said my wife.

"Hem!" I replied, stepping out of the slough of apple sauce upon firmer ground. "Let me recall to your mind another olden custom which was very pretty—now, however, 'more honored in the breach than the observance.' I mean the ceremony of saluting the apple-trees at Christmas. This, it was thought, if properly performed, would insure a full crop of fruit the following season. In my opinion, a protection from the frost, a proper pruning of the branches, and the tilling and enriching of the soil around the trees would be much more effectual in producing the desired result. Before one can gather apples, though, with any degree of satisfaction, one must have a tree of one's own to gather from. And if one has planted the tree one's self the satisfaction is still more complete. Beautifully hath Bryant told the story of 'The Planting of the Apple-tree.' 'Come,' he says,

"'let us plant the apple-tree.
Cleave the tough greensward with the spade;
Wide let its hollow bed be made;
There gently lay the roots, and there
Sift the dark mould with kindly care,
And press it o'er them tenderly,
As round the sleeping infant's feet
We softly fold the cradle sheet—
So plant we the apple-tree.'

"Some one—I think it is Leigh Hunt—has said that every one should plant a tree, to the end that he might leave something behind him after death to remind posterity that he had lived.

"And perhaps no better tree could be planted than the apple-tree. Not only would it supply the bees with honey drawn from its blossoms in the spring-time, be a nesting-place wherein the robins might build and rear their young, and furnish with its thick foliage a shade from the sultry rays of the sun in summer for the cattle at noon, but it would yield a feast with its ripened fruit in the autumn to the children who played beneath its branches. Thus happily doth our poet express it:

"'What plant we in the apple-tree?
Fruits that shall swell in sunny June,
And redden in the August noon,
And drop when gentle airs come by
That fan the blue September sky;
While children come, with cries of glee,
And seek them where the fragrant grass
Betrays their bed to those who pass,
At the foot of the apple-tree.'

"What pleasanter walks, too, my dear, can you recall than those we used to take, ever so long ago, when we both were young, and there were no cares, no gray hairs, no wrinkles, no any thing, in fact, to remind us of decay and the end of time, in the old orchard at Hillside, when the trees,

'Studded with apples, a beautiful show,' bent over us as side by side we went in still September afternoons, with our shadows lengthening and going before us down its more than classic aisles?"

My wife looked at me with a sad, sweet smile, and said: "Can I ever forget them? Was not that orchard our happiest trysting ground? But that was many, many years ago, and since those days we have gathered numerous harvests; nor have all the apples we gathered been sweet and savory—some sour and crabbed ones have fallen to our lot—but their cores proved sound, and no worms ever touched their hearts."

"Speaking of hearts, my dear," I said, "reminds me of that simile of Jeremy Taylor in his sermon on the 'Marriage Ring,' where he says 'that the celibate, like the fly in the heart of an apple, dwells in a perpetual sweetness, but sits alone, and is confined, and dies in singularity:' which, after all, would not, by its severity of expression, drive many bachelors into matrimony. Matrimony, though, has been known to drive men to something worse than celibacy. It has made them take as kindly to strong drinks as, in my boyhood, without any provocation, I took kindly to sweet cider sucked through a straw. Did you ever, my dear, suck cider through a straw?"

My wife said she never did.

"Then," I continued, "you have missed one of the greatest luxuries of life. Cider drawn from a barrel, and drank from a glass, is doubtless very good. Cider quaffed from a quart pot, filled from the vat into which it runs from the press, is better still. But the primitive way of lying, stomach down, on a barrel, under the shadow of an apple-tree, with a straw in your mouth, and the straw reaching through the bung into the centre of the cask, is the best of all ways. I hope, my dear, to live long enough to see you yet perform that little feat."

"I hope not," said my wife.

"Talk of your nectar, the drink of the gods!" I continued. "Why, those fine old divinities, who died ages ago, probably of delirium tremens, brought on by a too free use of their famous nectar, would doubtless have been living and enjoying immortality to-day if their drink had only been cider sucked through a straw. I would rather be a boy, idling away the autumn days around a cider press, quaffing ad libitum the sweet juices as they exude from the fragrant apples, than be great Jupiter himself, seated on my throne, surrounded by all the favored goddesses of antiquity acting as my cup-bearers, and keeping my royal goblet overflowing with the nectar that the poets have so wantonly extolled."

"My dear," said my wife, thoughtfully reaching across the table for the tall flask that stood at my elbow, "it is a pity that you ever gave up that favorite drink of your boyhood for these less healthful and more costly wines."

"It is so," I replied; "and when my orchard—which I am going to plant one of these days—gets into good bearing condition, I will build an old-fashioned cider press in the midst of it, and hire a blind old horse who will go round and round at a steady gait to work it, and then I will make cider, and teach you to suck it through a straw."

"Thank you," said my wife.

"And in the winter-time we'll have mulled cider, rich with eggs and spices, and at Christmas a wassail-bowl, with roasted apples floating therein. And in the cellar we will have bins of apples of all varieties; and so plentiful shall they be that the children of the neighborhood shall come every day for a stock of apples to take to school with them, and thus be rendered happy till they come again."

"I am afraid," said my wife, "that you will never plant this orchard or gather these apples until we go to Utopia to live. There the seeds which you drop into the ground to-night will be trees to-morrow, and the day after they will blossom, and the day after that the ripe fruit will bend their branches to the earth. But here it will take years to perfect an orchard; and even if we should live to see it reach its prime, this quiet village would have become a part of the great city, and newsboys and boot-blacks and balloon-runners — for balloons will be running then, just as the steam-cars are now—will make raids upon your orchard and carry off the fruit even before its gets ripe."

"Well," I replied, "this may be so. I know that boys used, when I was one, to look on orchards as rather loose property; and the fruit thereof, like the nuts of the woods and the birds of the air, as belonging to whoever was bold and quick enough to win them. I remember a primitive way the boys had of securing their apples and nuts when they had no bags or baskets provided for the purpose. It consisted simply in tying the legs of their trowsers close around the ankles, and filling in with apples or nuts as the case might be. The loosest-trowsered lads secured the most, of course. This mode of carrying off their plunder had its inconveniences; and when, if chased by dogs, they were compelled to run, the apples, and especially the hickory-nuts, were very aggravating to the legs. They were, however, a good protection from the bite of a dog; and though his teeth might meet among the apples, the nuts he found rather hard to crack."

"If you expect me to believe such a story as that," said my wife, rebukingly, "you are mistaken. Why, such an inside lining to a boy's trowsers would have worn holes into them in five minutes; and then where, I would like to know, would your apples and nuts have gone to? Besides, he could no more have walked, thus accoutred, than could Richard Cœur de Lion when clad in steel armor."

"Well," I replied, "it is so long since I was a boy that perhaps I am laboring under a wrong impression. But I know I was immensely partial to apples when I was a lad, and our cellar was never without a bin of them. My old aunt Sally used to say of apples—regarding them simply in a medicinal point of view—that a barrel of them in a house was better than a drug store next door. To which wise saying I always heartily agreed. But my nooning is over; and though I have much more to gossip with you about apples over the mahogany, I must defer it until another day, winding up my noonday chat with a further quotation from our favorite poet, brought to mind by what I have said concerning my childhood's days.

"'The fruitage of this apple-tree
Winds and our flag of stripe and star
Shall bear to coasts that lie afar,
Where men shall wonder at the view,
And ask in what fair groves they grew;
And sojourners beyond the sea
Shall think of childhood's careless day,
And long, long hours of summer play
In the shade of the apple-tree.'"

"How truthfully," said my wife, gently, as I paused, "the poet speaks! How vividly, in a single line, he places before us once more, the almost forgotten days of our youth! It is the 'word fitly spoken, which is like apples of gold in pictures of silver.'"

THE COQUETTE.

CAN you paint a rainbow, catch a cloud ere it falls to earth, sift the perfume of a flower, or net the sunbeams as they tremble through the trees? If you can not do any of these things, then neither can you detail the actions of the coquette, and demonstrate exactly what she has done, and where her criminality lies. Innocent-seeming words, which, taken in their apparent sense, might be said between two children, but in their double or esoteric meaning, coupled with those looks, that inflection of the voice, that tender air, have quite another and a deeper and a dearer significance; little fits of pretended temper at some make-believe slight, in which the sole important element was the interest assumed to have been awakened in that fair breast, as if it made the slightest difference to her whether she was slighted or no; little fits of pretended jealousy, teaching the same lesson with still greater distinctness; a manner at all times meaning a singling out and specially honoring—and here you have the catalogue raisonné of the coquette's stock in trade, and the list of her principal tricks. Naturally the man whom she has taken in hand imagines himself favored. His vanity keeps him from seeing that he is duped; maybe his genuine love for her by this time makes him believe in her. Only when he comes to the decisive question does he find his pearl of great price resolve itself into a ball of sea-foam which melts in his hand as he grasps it. She looks into his face and declares piteously she never meant any thing. When he calls this and that suggestive tenderness to her recollection, she professes the most enchanting oblivion and regret. She had no idea, she says, that actions so utterly innocent and unconscious in themselves could have been taken so wrongly, and she thinks it very unkind of him to put such an interpretation on them. When the coquette has succeeded in making him feel ashamed of himself for taking her at her unspoken word, and believing in her dumb and eloquent protestations of affection, she has achieved the grand total of her triumph. She has nothing more to play for now; she threw once for that poor foolish heart, and got it; now she has thrown for his discomfiture and her own absolute innocence, and she has got that too. Henceforth she has no cause for fear, and she takes care to let herself feel none for repentance.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

A STRANGER in Washington—especially if he be one not absorbed in politics, but with some taste for rare and curious plants—may spend a few hours most pleasantly in visiting the National Botanical Garden, which is located very near the Capitol. A caution not to pluck the flowers, poetically expressed in language borrowed from Walter Savage Landor, meets your eye at the entrance. When within, however, you are rather surprised at the scarcity of blossoms among so many plants. This is explained by remembering that it is not a floral garden, and by the fact that numerous bouquets are cut every day for members of Congress, who have this perquisite, and thus the plants are constantly shorn of their glory. Here are specimens of vegetation from almost every part of the world, those from the tropical regions being arranged in the warmest division of the garden. Heat is diffused by means of hot-water pipes. Numerous species of palm spread their broad leaves above, and other trees of like luxuriant foliage from kindred climes. We noticed a huge cluster of bananas, green at present, but the gardener assured us that they easily ripened. Among hundreds of curious plants one scarcely knows which are most unique. No visitor, however, could pass without examination the Stag Horn and the Elk Horn ferns, whose singularly shaped leaves are accurately described by their names. Another odd specimen is the Euphorbia splendens, from the Isle of France, which consists of numberless crooked, twisted, serpent-like branches, brown, and covered with sharp thorns. From some of these thorns bright green leaves were just shooting out, and out of the extremities of the dry branches clusters of small, delicate red and salmon-colored blossoms had sprung. But we had no design to attempt to describe the plants in the Botanical Garden in our small space—only to recommend a visit to them. Each member of Congress is every year entitled to a box of slips or cuttings from this garden to transfer to his own garden or conservatory.

The thinking portion of Boston—chiefly parents, clergymen, and physicians—have become aroused to the necessity of taking some measures to prevent the "slaughter of innocents" incident to the great pressure attendant on the present school system. Physicians declare that the modern system of forcing young brains lays the foundation for a long series of nervous and mental disorders.

San Domingo City is famous for its dogs and birds. Every family has two or three birds, and every other family has two or three dogs. The birds are beautiful, the dogs ugly, but the natives value the latter as much as the former. Mocking-birds and parrots seem to be favorites, and call at the passers-by with a sudden familiarity that is startling. The dogs in general are horrible-looking but inoffensive pets, though some are ferocious enough to alarm strangers.

On the shores of the Adriatic a beautiful custom prevails. About sunset the women and children go down to the water and sing a melody. Then they listen a while for the answering strain from husbands, sons, and brothers, far off on the water. They continue to sing and listen till the well-known voices borne on the tide tell that the loved ones are almost home.

Dumas is said never to have corrected any thing he wrote, but sent his manuscript to the printers without looking it over. There were no erasures in his copy. He once remarked that if he began to alter and correct he always ended by throwing the paper into the fire and commencing anew.

About a year ago an association was formed in California for the purpose of making practical experiments in growing tea. Plants were imported from Japan, but only a small proportion of them survived the voyage. A large quantity of tea-seed, however, was imported, and germinated rapidly. The young plants are thrifty and promising, and though some time must elapse before a crop can be produced, plants raised from seed will be more likely to thrive on this continent. Thus far the experiment is regarded as very successful.

When the gold mines of California, Australia, and other far-distant climes are exhausted, there are resources nearer home which may supply the precious substance. Some time ago a nugget of gold, weighing over nine ounces, was found on the banks of the Potomac, about ten miles from Washington. Recently four specimens of gold quartz, found in the same region, have been deposited in the cabinet of the General Land-office. The rock formations in the vicinity of the Great Falls of the Potomac are identical with the most celebrated auriferous deposits of other countries; and it is believed that an extended exploration of the quartz veins of that region would develop a goodly quantity of the precious metal.

The mental discipline of Napoleon I. was remarkable, nor was he unconscious of his superiority to others in this respect. "Different affairs," he said, "are arranged in my head as in drawers. When I wish to interrupt one train of thought I close the drawer which contains that subject, and open that which contains another. They do not mix together, and do not fatigue me or inconvenience me. I have never been kept awake by an involuntary preoccupation of the mind. If I wish repose I shut up all the drawers, and I am asleep. I have always slept when I wanted rest, and almost at will."

One of the greatest curiosities of the South is Silver Spring, in Florida. In a fertile section it bubbles up in a basin nearly one hundred feet deep, and about an acre in extent, from which flows a deep stream extending to the Ocklawaha River. It is said that fifty boats may lie at anchor in the spring itself. The clearness of the water is wonderful, so that eighty feet below the surface substances can be distinguished.

The dress of the prominent personages at any wedding is the interesting point to outsiders, and, of course, in the case of a royal marriage every body is eager to know the appearance of the bride, bridegroom, and attendants. On the occasion of the marriage of the Marquis of Lorne and the Princess Louise the bride wore a dress of white satin, with white velvet train, a Honiton lace veil, and a wreath of orange flowers. Eight bride-maids carried the train. They were all daughters of dukes and earls, and dressed in white silk, with white necklaces, and wreaths of roses. They wore no veils. The Marquis and his groomsmen were dressed in the uniform of the Volunteer Argyleshire Rifle Artillery—green cloth trimmed with silver. Queen Victoria was robed in a dress of black satin, and wore a coronet of diamonds, and a long veil of the richest lace. The Duke of Argyle, father of the bridegroom, was dressed in full Highland costume, of the richest material, and with gold ornaments. The Duchess of Argyle was robed in cloth of silver. The Princess of Wales wore a blue satin robe, with a train of blue velvet, while the Princess Christian—Princess Helena Augusta, sister of the bride—wore pink satin trimmed with white lace. The royal children were in Scotch costume. The marriage ceremony was performed according to the rite of the Protestant Episcopal Church. After the congratulations were over, the royal party returned to Windsor Castle, where breakfast was served, two immense wedding-cakes forming a conspicuous part of the entertainment. The bride then exchanged her wedding for a beautiful traveling costume of the Campbell plaid, and the bridal party took carriages for Claremont, where they are to spend the honey-moon.

The National University of Washington was incorporated under a general act passed during the last session of Congress, and is now about to be organized. This proposed institution will be on an extensive scale, embracing six branches or colleges. The management is to be controlled by a board of regents, composed of two members from each State, and five from the District of Columbia. Members of Congress have the privilege of nominating six students from each Congressional district, who will be entitled to a full course of studies, receiving diplomas when the course is satisfactorily completed.

The New Orleans ice factory is very large, employing hundreds of workmen, and manufacturing daily sixteen tons of ice. It supplies not only that city, but others along the Mississippi with ice. There are six separate ice-making machines in operation, each costing $25,000 in gold. The water is pumped up from the Mississippi, purified, and frozen into blocks about two feet long, a foot wide, and three inches thick. At first there was a great deal of prejudice against "this new kind of ice;" but that gradually wore away as the weather grew warmer, and the "real kind of ice" grew scarcer and higher, until now, with very few exceptions, every one in New Orleans uses it.

The picture-loving citizens of New York will soon be favored with another opportunity of inspecting and purchasing some rare and genre paintings from the studio of the late William S. Mount, N.A. Many of these have never before been exhibited, and are admirable types of his finished and faithful rendering of nature.

Strasburg Cathedral has, on the whole, escaped wonderfully from serious injury. Although it was struck by shells more than a thousand times, the stone-work is but little damaged. Unfortunately, many of the fine fourteenth-century stained glass windows are much broken from splinters of shells, and the roof is full of holes from the same cause; no shells penetrated it; those that entered came through the wall and burst inside, and one pierced the organ right through the centre. There also appears to be some danger that the cross may eventually fall, as it is out of the perpendicular. The inhabitants of Strasburg affirm that the German fire was especially directed against the cross for many hours together. Many of the pinnacles and columns have been destroyed; but the destruction is smaller than was generally anticipated. The Germans, in the official account of the siege of Strasburg, especially claim credit for the small amount of damage done to the Cathedral. They say that the few shots fired at the tower were specially notified to the commander beforehand, he having established an observatory on the top, where he had a full view of the German works and telegraphic communications with his own batteries.

One of the latest achievements of science is feeling a patient's pulse by telegraph. An invalid being in Washington, desired to consult his own physician in New York. The beats of the pulse were transmitted by a doctor with one hand on the patient's wrist and the other on the telegraph key.

Digitized by Google

THE PILLOW-LACE MAKER.

THE sight of hand-made lace is apt to excite the same sort of feelings in the mind of a reflective person as those which were expressed by Goldsmith when he wrote,

"Here the pale artist plies the sickly trade,
While there the courtier glitters in brocade."

We can not avoid a painful remembrance of the enormous diversity of condition that generally exists between the wearer and the worker. The wearer of such delicate and expensive fabrics is generally endowed with a superfluity of this world's goods, while the worker is for the most part a poor toiling creature, whose constant and continuous labor barely yields a subsistence. Some day we shall, perhaps, learn how to correct the glaring inequalities of conditions now existing; meanwhile let us glance for a moment at the lace manufacture. Until about three centuries ago lace was made by the needle on a piece of fine woven material, the threads of which were drawn aside to form holes, or meshes, held in position by a few stitches. Barbara Uttmann, of Annaberg, first devised a method of twisting threads round pins so as to form a knotted or netted fabric; this was the real origin of pillow-lace, the making of which gradually extended to various European countries. The implements used by hand-lace makers are few in number and inartificial in character. They consist of a pillow, or cushion, a series of bobbins, or small cylindrical pieces of wood, round which the thread or silk employed is wound, and pins, which are stuck into the cushion, and around which the threads are twisted. The pattern of the lace is determined by the disposition of the pins, and this is regulated by holes pierced in a piece of parchment, which is laid upon the cushion. The process of lace-making is accomplished by the twisting together of the threads upon the bobbins, and their being woven among and around the pins.

The finest pillow lace is made on the Continent. The names of Brussels, Mechlin, Valenciennes, and Alençon at once call to mind the chief seats of the manufacture. In France alone, before the outbreak of the war, more than 200,000 women were engaged in pillow-lace making, and their average earnings were about a penny an hour. A good deal of lace is also made in the Erzeberg, a mountainous district of Saxony, bordering on Austria. These people form a sort of race apart; the men do the cooking and washing, and attend to the gardens, while the women and children make the lace. By working from morning till night they can earn about sixpence a day; they live chiefly on potatoes and salt, but they are described as a cleanly, cheerful, and contented people. In England lace-makers abound chiefly in Buckinghamshire, Bedfordshire, the part of Devonshire around Honiton, and near Coggeshall, in Essex. A flourishing manufacture has also sprung up during the last forty years in Limerick. Concerning machine-made lace we will not speak here. The quantity annually produced is prodigious, and the head-quarters of the trade still centre at Nottingham. Honiton lace formed part of the Princess Louise's bridal dress.

THE PILLOW-LACE MAKER.

Digitized by Google

Some years ago an officer of Engineers at Munich contrived an ingenious plan for making lace without either human labor or machinery. Having made a paste of the plant on which a certain species of caterpillar is accustomed to feed, he spread it thinly over a stone of the required size. He then, with a camel's-hair pencil dipped in oil, drew the pattern which he wished left open. The stone was then fixed in a sloping position, and a number of caterpillars placed at the bottom. They ate and spun their way up to the top, carefully avoiding every place touched by the oil. The lace thus made is extremely light, a piece measuring 26½ inches by 17 inches weighing only 1.51 grains.

FLOUNDER-SPEARING.

TO some of our readers the mode of catching flounders may appear novel that is represented in this spirited drawing of flounder-spearing on the coast of Scotland. It requires a sharp eye and a steady hand to capture the fish by this mode. Nature, as in all cases, has wonderfully well adapted these fishes for their habits. They are destitute of an air-bladder, and they accordingly generally remain at the bottom of the sea, from which they seldom rise far; while the flattened shape of their body, the arrangement of the fins, and the placing of the eyes above allow them to make progress along the bottom and in shallows. In her flattening process Nature appears to have disregarded symmetry, and the visages of these creatures are, consequently, grotesque, and sometimes hideous. The color of their upper surface usually corresponds closely with that of the ground on which they lie, and thus they escape the observation of their marine enemies, and are unnoticed by the small fish on which they prey. As the boat is slowly propelled by the man at the stern the little fellow leaning over its side utilizes the time by practicing another slower mode of fishing—i. e., by a line and baited hook dragging along the bottom. The execution is most vigorous and manly; the action and poise of the old fisherman delivering the thrust are well expressed.

FLOUNDER-SPEARING.

THE BOY WHO LIVED IN A GLASS HOUSE.

THERE was once a boy who went and lived in a glass house. He did this because he considered himself so beautiful and so good that people would always like to look at him.

But when, after he had resided in the glass house for a long while, he found people did not come to look at him as much as he had expected, he spent some time in thinking what was the reason, and what he should do; and at last resolved to go and throw stones at other folks, in order to make them admire him in his glass house.

One day, for instance, he sallied forth, and looked over a garden wall, and saw in the garden some little girls and boys playing at battledoor and shuttlecock.

"How very untidy your back hair is!" he said to one of the young ladies. "I should be ashamed of it, if I were you." And with that he walked away, after having thrown a stone over into the garden, repeating, "I should be ashamed of it, if I were you."

"Should you, though?" said the young lady's brother, springing up, jumping over the wall, and following him to the glass house that he lived in.

When the little boy—who was, we may as well mention at once, known as Censorious Simon—had got to the glass house he sat down, looking very contented with himself, for the people to look at. But he had not observed that the young lady's brother had followed close behind him, and, in fact, that he was now looking in upon him.

Digitized by Google

"There you are, with your boot-lace all down," says the brother. "I should be ashamed of it, if I were you."

And, so saying, he threw a stone at the glass house. Of course one of the panes was cracked, and Censorious Simon, who had not noticed his boot-lace was down, had to mend the pane with putty, or something, as well as he could. This vexed him very much, because the part where the mend was made interrupted people's view of his perfections.

The very next day, as he was going along, he overheard a little boy, who was on his way to school, repeating his lesson to himself, and saying, m a n man, e r s ers, manners; m a t mat, e r er, matter. So he took a pencil and a piece of paper out of his pocket, and wrote, "What makes you spell so bad?" And he signed this "Censorious Simon, Glass House"—for he was very proud—and, wrapping the paper round a stone, flung it at the little boy. The following day whack came a stone, wrapped up in a piece of paper, clean through a pane of glass, and inside was written, "What makes you write bad for badly?" Censorious Simon was very vexed with the world, and said to himself, "My mistake was only an accident, of course." But there was now another flaw in his glass house, and if people came to admire him there would now be two spots to hinder their view of his beauty. This he did not at all like; but he mended the place as well as he was able, and sat down as before to be looked at.

Another time Censorious Simon came across some boys "hishing" two dogs at each other, and said, "I should be ashamed of myself, if I were you, to be so cruel."

"Oh!" said the boys, "we know you, and where you live; so you'd better be off."

So Censorious Simon thought to himself—"They are rude to me; but that is because I am a great moralist; and they hate me. At all events, it is plain that I am now a public character, and that my talents and my residence are beginning to attract attention." So he threw a stone at the cruel boys, and went his way.

"I like to throw a stone," said he to himself; "it brings things home to people's minds. Besides, the Jews used to throw stones at people till they died, when people did wrong; so it is Scriptural."

If there was one thing upon which, next to his morality, Simon prided himself it was his skill in science, and he was just now paying considerable attention to entomology. The very next day after he had rebuked the boys for setting the dogs on to fight each other he was closely absorbed in doing some specimens; but just as he was driving in a pin through the head of a live butterfly he happened to glance up, and saw that the two boys who had made the dogs fight were looking at him. "They will think a great deal of my scientific attainments," thought he. But just at that very moment the boys withdrew to a safe distance, and sent each a big stone whizzing through his glass house, shouting:

"Who tortured the butterfly? I should be ashamed of myself, if I were you, to be so cruel." Here were two more holes at once in the glass house, so that just that part of it began to look quite ugly, and the view was seriously obstructed.

One day Censorious Simon was invited out to a party, and soon discovered that people were afraid of him, he was such a great moralist. So he went up to a young lady who seemed rather dull, and said, in a loud voice,

"Well, what makes you look so melancholy?"

And the young lady made answer:

"Oh, Sir!"—she called him "Sir" because she had heard he was a moralist—"oh, Sir, I am going back to boarding-school next Monday, and it makes me dull to think of parting with my papa and mamma so soon."

"Oh, pooh!" says Simon, "you shouldn't feel dull; I never do." Now there were no stones about just there, of course, but still he did not like to break his rule. So at supper-time, when they had damson tart, he took up one of the kernels (in the shell, you know), and, watching his opportunity, called out across the table to the young lady:

"Don't fret; I never do;" at the same time filliping the damson-stone at her shoulder, and laughing. Nobody interfered, because he was such a severe moralist; but the young lady had a cousin at the party, who was very fond of her, and rather sly. This cousin walked up to Censorious Simon's glass house the very next day, and looked softly in; and what should he see there but Simon blubbering away like any thing, because so many holes had been made in his glass house already. Feeling very vindictive because the damson-stone had made a little red mark on his cousin's shoulder, this cousin took up a whole handful of stones, and flung them at Simon's house, crying out,

"Don't feel dull; I never do."

This was a pretty piece of business, and Censorious Simon now had to put in bits of brown paper, and all that, to keep the wind out.

It often happens in life that things come to a pitch, as people say, quite suddenly. A storm gathers quietly, and, when nobody is expecting such a thing, you find a burst-up and an overthrow. All but very conceited persons bear this in mind, and, as sailors say, look out for squalls. But Censorious Simon, as we have heard, was very conceited indeed. One day he found that a board, like a cobbler's board, had been put up on his house in the night, and the inscription upon the board ran thus: "CENSORIOUS SIMON: Other People's Business Minded for them: Fault Found on the Shortest Notice."

When he found out this board, and saw some folks in the distance laughing at him as he read the words, it happened to him, as it sometimes happens to you and me—he had a sudden thought, coming up from he knew not where, that he was not quite as wise and quite as good as he had hitherto supposed himself to be. In fact, a very ugly word got into his head, and he heard a Mysterious Voice in his inside, which kept on saying to him, "You are a humbug;" and when he was on the point of saying to the Voice, "No, I am a great moralist," the Voice put him down like winking, by saying, "You dare not deny it." In spite of that, this misguided person must needs sally out that very day, and lecture several boys and girls whom he met upon the duty of always telling the truth. And at every one of them he threw the usual stone, because he liked it, and because he thought it made him a more public character, and because he considered it Scriptural.

Now the boys and girls who knew Censorious Simon had long had a suspicion in their minds that he was that ugly word—what the Voice in his inside said, you know—and they had, of course, sense enough to see that a person who was that ugly word had no right to lecture other people about telling the truth, seeing that he was himself only a fib in breeches. In some way or other the storm which had been threatening came suddenly to a height. Nobody can tell how these things happen; nobody can say how a great revolution breaks out all in an hour, with hundreds and thousands of people all maddened together, and all driving at one end. But such things do happen; and thus, by some means or other, all the boys and girls of the nation, as you may say, suddenly gathered in a body, and, surrounding Censorious Simon's glass house, pelted it with stones till there was not a sound pane of glass left in it! And this was the origin of the saying which we have all heard, "Those who live in glass houses should not throw stones."

FAMILY BREAKFASTS AND DINNERS.

BREAKFAST.

Cuban Coffee, Liver Hash, Miroton of Potatoes, Brown Bread, Breakfast Rolls.

CUBAN COFFEE.—Put three pints of rich, sweet milk in a coffee-pot, and let it boil. When boiling put in a tea-cupful of ground coffee, and boil five minutes. Strain, and serve.

LIVER HASH.—Boil a calf's liver till it will crumble. Drain it, and cut it in small pieces. Strain the water in which it was boiled, and thicken it with a piece of butter rolled in flour. Pepper and salt and a few herbs must be added, and the mixture boiled up. Put the liver on a deep dish with the finely grated crumbs of a stale loaf—about half as much bread as liver. Set the dish in the oven five minutes, pour on the gravy, and serve hot.

BREAKFAST ROLLS.—To one pound of flour allow one ounce of butter, one egg, a tea-spoonful of baking-powder, and sweet milk enough to make a soft dough. Rub the butter and flour well together, add the egg, beaten till light, a pinch of salt, and the milk, till a soft dough is mixed. Let it stand two hours to rise. When light, knead very little, form into rolls, and bake in a quick oven.

MIROTON OF POTATOES.—To eight large mealy potatoes allow one medium-sized onion, the yolks of two hard-boiled eggs, a quarter of a pound of butter, two raw eggs, a dessert-spoonful of catchup, a tea-spoonful of salt, half a tea-spoonful of pepper, and a handful of grated bread crumbs. Boil the potatoes, peel, and mash them with part of the butter, salt, and pepper. Fry the onions and hard yolks of egg, in slices, till tender and brown, drain off all the fat, and stir the onions and eggs into the mashed potatoes till well mixed. Beat the raw eggs till frothy, and stir them into the mixture; add the catchup. Butter a mould well, sprinkle over it the bread crumbs, finely sifted; pour on this the mixture of potatoes and other ingredients; bake for half an hour. Turn from the mould on a dish, and brown in the oven a few minutes. Serve hot.

BROWN BREAD.—To two quarts of corn meal allow a tea-cupful of boiling water, one quart of Graham flour, four table-spoonfuls of strong hop yeast, one table-spoonful of salt, one tea-cupful of molasses, and one quart of lukewarm water. Scald one quart of the corn meal with the boiling water; add the lukewarm water, and then stir in gradually the other quart of meal and the Graham flour; add the other ingredients, the yeast last, and set to rise. When light, knead, form in loaves, and bake in a quick oven.

DINNER.

Carrot Soup, Broiled Cod, Baked Fowls, Rissoles of Veal, Boiled Beets, Stewed Macaroni, Cabbage and Celery Sauce, Pickled Cherries, Apple Fritters.

CARROT SOUP.—The day before this soup is required boil three pounds of good soup beef in a gallon of water until reduced one-half. Strain. When cold, skim off all fat. The next day add a table-spoonful of salt, and replace on the fire. Scrape young carrots, and cut them into small dice. Put these in the soup with Cayenne pepper, a table-spoonful each of burned sugar and sharp vinegar and grated carrot. Boil till the carrots are tender, and serve.

BROILED COD.—Wash and clean a cod, and split it lengthwise. Cut it into squares, about six inches each way, and broil each over a clear fire. Put these on a hot dish, and dress with salt, pepper, and thin slices of butter.

BAKED FOWLS.—Fowls to be tender should be killed two days before they are cooked. When plucked, singed, and drawn, rub clean outside, and wash inside with cold water. Cut off the heads, and skewer the skin of the neck down the back. Cut off the claws, dip the legs in boiling water, and scrape them; turn the pinions under; run a skewer through them; skewer also the legs firmly to the sides of the fowls, running each skewer through the body to the leg and pinion on the other side, one skewer securing both pinions, and another both legs. Place the liver and gizzard under the pinions. Tie the legs firmly to the sides. When prepared, singe, and wipe clean. Dressing made of grated bread crumbs, sweet herbs, pepper and salt, and one well-beaten egg should be put inside of each fowl. Butter the skin slightly, and dredge on a little flour; bake in a slow oven until a fork thrust in the breast will not draw blood. Then butter the outside again, dredge on more flour, quicken the oven, and brown. Serve with rich made gravy.

RISSOLES OF VEAL.—To one pound of cold veal, finely minced, allow half a tea-cupful of grated bread crumbs, a tea-spoonful of powdered sweet herbs, a tea-spoonful of grated lemon peel, a pinch of Cayenne pepper, and two well-beaten raw eggs. Mix all the ingredients well together, adding the eggs last. Flour the hands, and form the mixture into balls about the size of a hen's egg. Put lard in a frying-pan till, when boiling, there is sufficient to cover the balls. Fry them till a delicate brown, and serve with slices of lemon placed round the dish.

BOILED BEETS.—Wash the beets thoroughly, but be careful not to prick or break the skin, as it will make them white in boiling. Put them in boiling water, and boil until tender. Skin quickly, cut in slices, and dress with butter, pepper, and salt.

STEWED MACARONI.—Break the macaroni in pieces an inch long, throw them into boiling water. Boil half an hour, and drain. Put in a stew-pan a pint of cream, an ounce of butter, one well-beaten egg, pepper, and salt. Stir over a clear fire till it thickens, but do not boil. Add the macaroni, boil five minutes, toss in a wine-glassful of Madeira, and serve hot.

CABBAGE AND CELERY SALAD (a Southern dish).—Shred cabbage very fine, and cut celery into small dice. Mix well together, and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Put one gill of vinegar in a sauce-pan, and stir in a well-beaten egg. Stir over a hot fire till as thick as cream, add a salt-spoonful of mixed mustard, a table-spoonful of olive-oil, and a tea-spoonful of sugar. Beat well together, and when cold pour on the cabbage and celery.

PICKLED CHERRIES.—To every pound of cherries allow half a pound of loaf-sugar, half a pint of cider-vinegar, half an ounce each of powdered cinnamon, mixed whole cloves and allspice, and a few blades of mace. Put the cherries in a jar. Boil the other ingredients five minutes in the vinegar, and when boiling pour the liquor over the fruit. Cover closely for a week before eating.

APPLE FRITTERS.—Make a smooth batter of half a pound of flour, three eggs, and half a pint of sweet milk; salt to taste. Cut a dozen large, juicy apples into slices, after peeling and coring them. Throw the slices in the batter. Have ready a pan of equal parts of lard and butter, boiling hot. Take the batter up in a ladle, allowing a slice of apple to each fritter. Fry brown, drain a moment, and serve with powdered sugar and nutmeg.

LETTING ALONE.

ONE of the greatest arts in life—and the proper conduct of life is an art, besides being many other things—is to know how to let alone. The masterly inactivity of which we have heard so much of late is quite as important an element in the right conduct of affairs as masterly action; and just as "speech is silvern, but silence is golden," and "the least said, the soonest mended," are words of weight, so "better let well alone," and ill too sometimes, is also an axiom demanding our most respectful attention. To let alone with judgment and without cowardice requires an amount of self-control not always on hand, nor able to answer to the call. For most people, not hopelessly indolent, it is so much easier to rush into the heart of a fray than to keep on the edge, and wait till the crowd has dispersed and the thing has cleared itself one way or the other, that really to let alone is, nine times out of ten, the sign of more grace and wisdom than the most generous interference would be.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER III.

FATHER AND DAUGHTER.

WHILE Mr. Oliver went back to the Rectory, cheered by the prospect of possible grouse, Clarissa entered her new home, so utterly strange to her in its insignificance. The servant, Martha, who was a stranger to her, but who had a comfortable, friendly face, she thought, led her into a room at the back of the cottage, with a broad window opening on to a lawn, beyond which Clarissa saw the blue mill-stream. It was not a bad room at all: countrified-looking and old-fashioned, with a low ceiling and wainscoted walls. Miss Lovel recognized the ponderous old furniture from the breakfast-room at Arden—high-backed mahogany chairs of the early Georgian era, with broad cushioned seats covered with faded needle-work; a curious old oval dining-table, capable of accommodating about six; and some slim Chippendale coffee-tables; and chiffoniers, upon which there were a few chipped treasures of old Battersea and Bow china. The walls were half lined with her father's books—rare old books in handsome bindings. His easy-chair, a most luxurious one, stood in a sheltered corner of the hearth, with a crimson silk banner-screen hanging from the mantel-piece beside it, and a tiny table close at hand, on which there were a noble silver-mounted meerschaum and a curious old china jar for tobacco. The oval table was neatly laid for breakfast, and a handsome brown setter lay basking in the light of the fire. Altogether, the apartment had a very comfortable and home-like look.

"The tea's made, miss," said the comfortable-looking servant; "and I've a savory omelet ready to set on the table. Perhaps you'd like to step up stairs and take off your things before you have your breakfast? Your papa begged you wouldn't wait for him. He won't be down for two hours to come."

"He's quite well, I hope?"

"As well as he ever is, miss. He's a bit of an invalid at the best of times."

Remembering what Mr. Oliver had said, Clarissa was not much disturbed by this intelligence. She was stooping to caress the brown setter, who had been sniffing at her dress, and seemed anxious to inaugurate a friendship with her.

"This is a favorite of papa's, I suppose?" she said.

"Oh Lord, yes, miss. Our master do make a tremenjous fuss about Ponto. I think he's fonder of that beast than any human creature. Eliza shall show you your room, miss, while I bring in the tea-pot and such like. There's only me and Eliza, who is but a bit of a girl; and John Thomas, the groom, that brought your boxes in just now. It's a change for your pa from the Court, and all the servants he had there; but he do bear it like a true Christian, if ever there was one."

Clarissa Lovel might have wondered a little to hear this—Christianity not being the dominant note in her father's character; but it was only like her father to refrain from complaint in the hearing of such a person as honest Martha. A rosy-faced girl of about fifteen conducted Miss Lovel to a pleasant bedroom with three small windows—one curiously placed in an angle of the room, and from which, above a sweep of golden-tinted woodland, Clarissa could see the Gothic chimneys of Arden Court. She stood at this window for nearly ten minutes, gazing out across those autumnal woods, and wondering how ever her father had nerved himself for the sacrifice.

She turned away from the little casement at last with a heavy sigh, and began to take off her things. She bathed her face and head in cold water, brushed out her long, dark hair, and changed her thick merino traveling dress for a fresher costume. While she was doing these things her thoughts went back to her companion of last night's journey; and, with a sudden flush of shame, she remembered his embarrassed look when she had spoken of her father as the owner of Arden Court. He had been to Arden, he had told her, yet had not seen her father. She had not been particularly surprised by this, supposing that he had gone to the Court as an ordinary sight-seer. Her father had never opened the place to the public, but he had seldom refused any tourist's request to explore it.

But now she understood that curious puzzled look of the stranger's, and felt bitterly ashamed of her error. Had he thought her some bare-faced impostor, she wondered? She was disturbed in these reflections by the trim rosy-cheeked house-maid, who came to tell her that breakfast had been on the table nearly a quarter of an hour. But in the comfortable parlor down stairs all the time she was trying to do some poor justice to Martha's omelet her thoughts dwelt persistently upon the unknown of the railway carriage, and upon the unlucky mistake which she had made as to her father's position.

"He could never guess the truth," she said to herself. "He could never imagine that I was going home, and yet did not know that my birth-place had been sold."

He was so complete a stranger to her—she did not even know his name—so it could surely matter very little whether he thought well or ill of her. And yet she could not refrain from torturing herself with all manner of annoying suppositions as to what he might think. Miss Lovel's character was by no means faultless, and pride was one of the strongest ingredients in it. A generous and somewhat lofty nature, perhaps, but unschooled and unchastened as yet.

After a very feeble attempt at breakfast, Clarissa went out into the garden, closely attended by Ponto, who seemed to have taken a wonderful fancy to her. She was very glad to be loved by something on her return home, even a dog. She went out through the broad window, and explored garden and orchard, and wandered up and down by the grassy bank of the stream. She was fain to own that the place was pretty; and she fancied how well she might have loved it if she had been born here, and had never been familiar with the broad terraces and verdant slopes of Arden Court. She walked in the garden till the village church clock struck ten, and then went hastily in, half afraid lest her father should have come down to the parlor in her absence, and should be offended at not finding her ready to receive him.

She need not have feared this. Mr. Lovel was rarely offended by any thing that did not cause him physical discomfort.

"How do you do, my dear?" he said, as she came into the room, in very much the same tone he might have employed had they seen each other every day for the last twelve months. "Be sure you never do that again, if you have the faintest regard for me."

"Do what, papa?"

"Leave that window open when you go out. I found the room a perfect ice-house just now. It was very neglectful of Martha to allow it. You'd better use the door at the end of the passage in future when you go into the garden. It's only a little more trouble, and I can't stand open windows at this time of year."

"I will be sure to do so, papa," Clarissa answered, meekly.

She went up to her father and kissed him, the warmth and spontaneity of their greeting a little diminished by this reproof about the window; but Clarissa had not expected a very affectionate reception, and was hardly disappointed. She had only a blank, hopeless kind of feeling—a settled conviction that there was no love for her here, and that there had never been any.

"My dear father," she began, tenderly, "my uncle told me about the sale of Arden. I was so shocked by the news—so sorry—for your sake."

"And for your own sake too, I suppose," her father answered, bitterly. "The less this subject is spoken of between us in future the better we shall get on together, Clarissa."

"I will keep silence, papa."

"Be sure you do so," Mr. Lovel said, sternly. And then, with a sudden passion and inconsistency that startled his daughter, he went on: "Yes, I have sold Arden—every acre. Not a rood of the land that has belonged to my race from generation to generation since Edward IV. was king is left to me. And I have planted myself here—here at the very gates of my lost home—so that I may drain the bitter cup of humiliation to the dregs. The fools who call themselves my friends think that because I can endure to live here I am indifferent to all I have lost; that I am an eccentric bookworm—an easy-going philosophical recluse, content to dawdle away the remnant of my days among old books. It pleases me to let them think so. Why, there is never a day that yonder trader's carriage, passing my windows, does not seem to drive over my body; not a sound of a woodman's axe or a carpenter's hammer in the place that was mine that does not go straight home to my heart!"

Digitized by Google

"Oh papa, papa!"

"Hush, girl! I can accept pity from no one—from you least of all."

"Not from me, papa—your own child?"

"Not from you, because your mother's reckless extravagance was the beginning of my ruin. I might have been a different man but for her. My marriage was fatal, and in the end, as you see, has wrecked me."

"But even if my mother was to blame, papa—as she may have been—I can not pretend to deny the truth of what you say, being so completely ignorant of our past history—you can not be so cruel as to hold me guilty?"

"You are too like her, Clarissa," Mr. Lovel answered, in a strange tone. "But I do not want to speak of these things. It is your fault; you had no right to talk of Arden. That subject always raises a devil in me."

He paced the room backward and forward for a few minutes in an agitated way, as if trying to stifle some passion raging inwardly.

He was a man of about fifty, tall and slim, with a distinguished air, and a face that must once have been very handsome, but perhaps, at its best, a little effeminate. The face was careworn now, and the delicate features had a pinched and drawn look, the thin lips a half-cynical, half-peevish expression. It was not a pleasant countenance, in spite of its look of high birth; nor was there any likeness between Marmaduke Lovel and his daughter. His eyes were light blue, large, and bright, but with a cold look in them—a coldness which, on very slight provocation, intensified into cruelty; his hair pale auburn, crisp, and curling closely round a high but somewhat narrow forehead.

He came back to the breakfast-table presently, and seated himself in his easy-chair. He sipped a cup of coffee, and trifled listlessly with a morsel of dried salmon.

"I have no appetite this morning," he said at last, pushing his plate away with an impatient gesture; "nor is that kind of talk calculated to improve the flavor of a man's breakfast. How tall you have grown, Clarissa, a perfect woman; remarkably handsome, too! Of course you know that, and there is no fear of your being made vain by any thing I may say to you. All young women learn their value soon enough. You ought to make a good match, a brilliant match, if there were any chance for a girl in such a hole as this. Marriage is your only hope, remember, Clarissa. Your future lies between that and the drudgery of a governess's life. You have received an expensive education—an education that will serve you in either case; and that is all the fortune I can give you."

"I hope I may marry well, papa, for your sake; but—"

"Never mind me. You have only yourself to think about."

"But I never could marry any one I did not esteem, if the match were ever such a brilliant one."

"Of course not. All school-girls talk like that, and in due course discover how very little esteem has to do with matrimony. If you mean that you would like to marry some penniless wretch of a curate, or some insolvent ensign in the line, for love, I can only say that the day of your marriage will witness our final parting. I should not make any outrageous fuss or useless opposition, rely upon it. I should only wish you good-by."

Clarissa smiled faintly at this speech. She expected so little from her father that his hardest words did not wound her very deeply, nor did they extinguish that latent hope, "He will love me some day."

"I hope I may never be so imprudent as to lose you forever, like that, papa. I must shut my heart resolutely against curates."

"If bad reading is an abomination to you, you have only to open your ears. I have some confidence in you, Clary," Mr. Lovel went on, with a smile that was almost affectionate. "You look like a sensible girl; a little impulsive, I dare say; but knowledge of the world—which is an uncommonly hard world for you and me—will tone that down in good time. You are accomplished, I hope. Madame Marot wrote me a most flourishing account of your attainments; but one never knows how much to believe of a school-mistress's analysis."

"I worked very hard, papa; all the harder because I was so anxious to come home; and I fancied I might shorten my exile a little by being very industrious."

"Humph! You give yourself a good character. You sing and play, I suppose?"

"Yes, papa. But I am fonder of art than of music."

"Ah! art is very well as a profession; but amateur art—French plum-box art—is worse than worthless. However, I am glad you can amuse yourself somehow; and I dare say, if you have to turn governess by-and-by, that sort of thing will be useful. You have the usual smattering of languages, of course?"

"Yes, papa. We read German and Italian on alternate days at Madame Marot's."

"I promessi Sposi, and so on, no doubt. There is a noble Tasso in the book-case yonder, and a fine old Petrarch, with which you may keep up your Italian. You might read a little to me of an evening sometimes. I should not mind it much."

"And I should like it very much, papa," Clarissa answered, eagerly.

She was anxious for any thing that could bring her father and herself together—that might lessen the gulf between them, if by ever so little.

And in this manner Miss Lovel's life began in her new home. No warmth of welcome, no word of fatherly affection, attended this meeting between a father and daughter who had not met for six years. Mr. Lovel went back to his books as calmly as if there had been no ardent, impetuous girl of eighteen under his roof, leaving Clarissa to find occupation and amusement as best she might. He was not a profound student; a literary trifler rather, caring for only a limited number of books, and reading those again and again. Burton's "Anatomy of Melancholy," Southey's "Doctor," Montaigne, and Swift, he read continually. He was a collector of rare editions of the classics, and would dawdle over a Greek play, edited by some learned German, for a week at a time, losing himself in the profundity of elaborate foot-notes. He was an ardent admirer of the lighter Roman poets, and believed the Horatian philosophy the only true creed by which a man should shape his existence. But it must not be supposed that books brought repose to the mind and heart of Marmaduke Lovel. He was a disappointed man, a discontented man, a man given to brooding over the failure of his life, inclined to cherish vengeful feelings against his fellow-men on account of that failure. Books to him were very much what they might have been to some fiery-tempered, ambitious soldier of fortune buried alive in a prison, without hope of release—some slight alleviation of his anguish, some occasional respite from his dull, perpetual pain; nothing more.

Clarissa's first day at Mill Cottage was a very fair sample of the rest of her life. She found that she must manage to spend existence almost entirely by herself—that she must expect the smallest amount of companionship from her father.

"This is the room in which I generally sit," her father said to her that first morning after breakfast; "my books are here, you see, and the aspect suits me. The drawing-room will be almost entirely at your disposal. We have occasional callers, of course; I have not been able to make these impervious country people comprehend that I don't want society. They sometimes pester me with invitations to dinner, which no doubt they consider an amazing kindness to a man in my position; invitations which I make a point of declining. It will be different with you, of course; and if any eligible people—Lady Laura Armstrong or Mrs. Renthorpe—should like to take you up, I shall not object to your seeing a little society. You will never find a rich husband at Mill Cottage."

"Please do not speak of husbands, papa. I don't want to be married, and I shouldn't care to go into society without you."

"Nonsense, child; you will have to do what is best for your future welfare. Remember that my death will leave you utterly unprovided for—absolutely penniless."

"I hope you may live till I am almost an old woman, papa."

"Not much chance of that; and even if I did, I should not care to have you on my hands all that time. A good marriage is the natural prospect of a good-looking young woman, and I shall be much disappointed if you do not marry well, Clarissa."

The pale, cold blue eyes looked at her with so severe a glance, as Mr. Lovel said this, that the girl felt she must expect little mercy from her father if her career in life did not realize his hopes.

"In short," he continued, "I look to you to redeem our fallen fortunes. I don't want the name of Lovel to die out in poverty and obscurity. I look to you to prevent that, Clarissa."

"Papa," said Clarissa, almost trembling as she spoke, "it is not to me that you should look for that. What can a girl do to restore a name that has fallen into obscurity? Even if I were to marry a rich man, as you say, it would only be to take another name, and lose my own identity in that of my husband. It is only a son who can redeem his father's name. There is some one else to whom you must look—"

"What!" cried her father, vehemently; "have you not been forbidden to mention that name in my hearing? Unlucky girl, you seem to have been born on purpose to outrage and pain me."

"Forgive me, papa; it shall be the last time. But oh, is there no hope that you will ever pardon—"

"Pardon!" echoed Mr. Lovel, with a bitter laugh; "it is no question of pardon. I have erased that person's image from my mind. So far as I am concerned, there is no such man in the world. Pardon! You must induce me to reinstate him in my memory again before you ask me to pardon."

"And that can never be, papa?"

"Never!"

The tone of that one word annihilated hope in Clarissa's mind. She had pushed the question to its utmost limit, at all hazards of offending her father. What was it that her brother Austin had done to bring upon himself this bitter sentence of condemnation? She remembered him in his early manhood, handsome, accomplished, brilliant; the delight and admiration of every one who knew him, except her father. Recalling those days, she remembered that between her father and Austin there had never been any show of affection. The talents and brilliant attributes that had won admiration from others seemed to have no charm in the father's eye. Clarissa could remember many a sneering speech of Mr. Lovel's, in which he had made light of his son's cleverness, denouncing his varied accomplishments as trivial and effeminate, and asking if any Englishman ever attained an honorable distinction by playing the piano or modeling in clay.

"I would rather have my son the dullest plodder that ever toiled at the bar, or droned bald platitudes from a pulpit, than the most brilliant drawing-room idler whose amateur art and amateur music ever made him the fashion of a single season, to leave him forgotten in the next. I utterly despise an accomplished man."

Austin Lovel had let such speeches as this go by him with a languid indifference that testified at once to his easy temper and his comfortable disregard of his father's opinion. He was fond of his little sister Clary, in rather a careless way, and would suffer her companionship, juvenile as she was at that time, with perfect good-nature, allowing her to spoil his drawing-paper with her untutored efforts, and even to explore the sacred mysteries of his color-box. In return for this indulgence the girl loved him with intense devotion, and believed in him as the most brilliant of mankind.

Clarissa Lovel recalled those departed days now with painful tenderness. How kind and gracious Austin had been to her! How happy they had been together! sometimes wandering for a whole day in the park and woods of Arden, he with his sketching apparatus, she with a volume of Sir Walter Scott, to read aloud to him while he sketched, or to read him to sleep with very often. And then what delight it had been to sit by his side while he lay at full length upon the mossy turf, or half buried in fern—to sit by him, supremely happy, reading or drawing, and looking up from her occupation every now and then to glance at the sleeper's handsome face in loving admiration.

Those days had been the happiest of her life. When Austin left Arden he seemed always to carry away the brightness of her existence with him; for without him her life was very lonely—a singularly joyless life for one so young. Then, in an evil hour, as she thought, there came their final parting. How well she remembered her brother loitering on the broad terrace in front of Arden Court, in the dewy summer morning, waiting to bid her good-by! How passionately she had clung to him in that farewell embrace, unable to tear herself away until her father's stern voice summoned her to the carriage that was to take her on the first stage of her journey!

"Won't you come to the station with us, Austin?" she pleaded.

"No, Clary," her brother answered, with a glance at her father. "He does not want me."

And so they had parted; never to meet any more upon this earth, perhaps, Clarissa said to herself, in her dismal reveries to-day. "That stranger in the railway carriage spoke of his having emigrated. He will live and die far away, perhaps on the other side of the earth, and I shall never see his bright face again. Oh, Austin, Austin! is this the end of all our summer days in Arden woods long ago?"

CHAPTER IV.

CLARISSA IS "TAKEN UP."

For some time there was neither change nor stir in Clarissa Lovel's new life. It was not altogether an unpleasant kind of existence, perhaps, and Miss Lovel was inclined to make the best of it. She was very much her own mistress, free to spend the long hours of her monotonous days according to her own pleasure. Her father exacted very little from her, and received her dutiful attentions with an air of endurance which was not particularly encouraging. But Clarissa was not easily disheartened. She wanted to win her father's affection; and again and again, after every new discouragement, she told herself that there was no reason why she should not ultimately succeed in making herself as dear to him as an only daughter should be. It was only a question of time and patience. There was no reason that he should not love her, no possible ground for his coldness. It was his nature to be cold, perhaps; but those cold natures have often proved capable of a single strong attachment. What happiness it would be to win this victory of love!

"We stand almost alone in the world," she said to herself. "We have need to be very dear to each other."

So, though the time went by, and she made no perceptible progress toward this happy result, Clarissa did not despair. Her father tolerated her, and even this was something; it seemed a great deal when she remembered her childhood at Arden, in which she had never known what it was to be in her father's society for an hour at a time, and when, but for chance meetings in corridors and on staircases, she would very often have lived for weeks under the same roof with him without seeing his face or hearing his voice.

Now it was all different; she was a woman now, and Mill Cottage was scarcely large enough to accommodate two separate existences, even had Mr. Lovel been minded to keep himself aloof from his daughter. This being so, he tolerated her, treating her with a kind of cold politeness, which might have been tolerably natural in some guardian burdened with the charge of a ward he did not care for. They rarely met until dinner-time, Clarissa taking her breakfast about three hours before her father left his room. But at seven they dined together, and spent the long winter evenings in each other's company, Clarissa being sometimes permitted to read aloud in German or Italian, while her father lay back in his easy-chair, smoking his meerschaum, and taking the amber mouth-piece from his lips now and then to correct an accent or murmur a criticism on the text. Sometimes, too, Mr. Lovel would graciously expound a page or two of a Greek play, or dilate on the subtilty of some learned foot-note, for his daughter's benefit, but rather with the air of one gentleman at his club inviting the sympathy of another than with the tone of a father instructing his child.

Sometimes, but very rarely, they had company. Mr. Oliver and his wife would dine with them occasionally, or the vicar of Arden, a grave bachelor of five-and-thirty, would drop in to spend an hour or two of an evening. But besides these they saw scarcely any one. The small professional men of Holborough Mr. Lovel held in supreme contempt—a contempt of which those gentlemen themselves were thoroughly aware. The county people whom he had been accustomed to receive at Arden Court he shrank from with a secret sense of shame in these days of his fallen fortunes. He had therefore made for himself a kind of hermit life at Mill Cottage; and his acquaintance had come, little by little, to accept this as his established manner of existence. They still called upon the recluse occasionally, and sent him cards for their state dinners, averse from any neglect of a man who had once occupied a great position among them; but they were no longer surprised when Mr. Lovel pleaded his feeble health as a reason for declining their hospitality. A very dull life for a girl, perhaps; but for Clarissa it was not altogether an unhappy life. She was at an age when a girl can make an existence for herself out of bright young fancies and vague, deep thoughts. There was that in her life just now which fades and perishes with the passing of years; a subtile, indescribable charm; a sense of things beyond the common things of daily life. If there had been a closer bond of union between her father and herself, if there had not been that dark cloud upon her brother's life, she might have made herself entirely happy; she might almost have forgotten that Arden was sold, and a vulgar mercantile stranger lord of those green slopes and broad, ancient terraces she loved so well.

As it was, the loneliness of her existence troubled her very little. She had none of that eager longing for "society" or "fashion" wherewith young ladies who live in towns are apt to inoculate one another. She had no desire to shine, no consciousness of her own beauty; for the French girls at Madame Marot's had been careful not to tell her that her pale patrician face was beautiful. She wished for nothing but to win her father's love, and to bring about some kind of reconciliation between him and Austin. So the autumn deepened into winter, and the winter brightened into early spring, without bringing any change to her life. She had her color-box and her easel, her books and piano, for her best companions; and if she did not make any obvious progress toward gaining her father's affection, she contrived, at any rate, to avoid rendering her presence in any way obnoxious to him.

Two or three times in the course of the winter Mrs. Oliver gave a little musical party, at which Clarissa met the small gentry of Holborough, who pronounced her a very lovely girl, and pitied her because of her father's ruined fortunes. To her inexperience these modest assemblies seemed the perfection of gayety; and she would fain have accepted the invitations that followed them from the wives of Holborough bankers and lawyers and medical men to whom she had been introduced. Against this degradation, however, Mr. Lovel resolutely opposed himself.

"No, Clarissa," he said, sternly; "you must enter society under such auspices as I should wish, or you must be content to remain at home. I can't have a daughter of mine hawked about in that petty Holborough set. Lady Laura will be at the Castle by-and-by, I dare say. If she chooses to take you up she can do so. Pretty girls are always at par in a country house, and at the Castle you would meet people worth knowing."

Clarissa sighed. Those cordial Holborough gentry had been so kind to her, and this exclusiveness of her father's chilled her somehow. It seemed to add a new bitterness to their poverty—to that poverty, by-the-way, of which she had scarcely felt the sharp edges yet a while. Things went very smoothly at Mill Cottage. Her father lived luxuriously after his quiet fashion. One of the best wine-merchants at the West End of London supplied his claret; Fortnum and Mason furnished the condiments and foreign rarities which were essential for his breakfast-table. There seemed never any lack of money, or only when Clarissa ventured to hint at the scantiness of her school wardrobe, on which occasion Mr. Lovel looked very grave, and put her off with two or three pounds to spend at the Holborough draper's.

"I should want so many new clothes if I went to the Castle, papa," she said, rather sadly, one day when her father was talking of Lady Laura Armstrong; but Mr. Lovel only shrugged his shoulders.

"A young woman is always well dressed in a white muslin gown," he said, carelessly. "I dare say a few pounds would get you all you want."

The Castle was a noble old place at Hale, a village about six miles from Holborough. It had been the family seat of the Earl of Roxham ever since the reign of Edward VI.; but, on the Roxham race dying out, some fifty years before this, had become the property of a certain Mr. Armstrong, a civilian who had made a great fortune in the East in an age when great fortunes were commonly made by East Indian traders. His only son had been captain in a crack regiment, and had sold out of the army after his father's death in order to marry Lady Laura Challoner, second daughter of the Earl of Calderwood, a nobleman of ancient lineage and decayed fortunes, and to begin life as a country gentleman under her wise governance. The Armstrongs were said to be a very happy couple; and if the master of Hale Castle was apt to seem something of a cipher in his own house, the house was an eminently agreeable one, and Lady Laura popular with all classes. Her husband adored her, and had surrendered his judgment to her guidance with a most supreme faith in her infallibility. Happily she exercised her power with that subtile tact which is the finest gift of woman; and his worst enemies could scarcely call Frederick Armstrong a hen-pecked husband.

Digitized by Google

The spring and early summer brought no change to Clarissa's life. She had been at home for the greater part of a year, and in all that time one day had resembled another almost as closely as in the scholastic monotony of existence at Madame Marot's. And yet the girl had shaped no complaint about the dullness of this tranquil routine even in her inmost unspoken thoughts. She was happy, after a quiet fashion. She had a vague sense that there was a broader, grander kind of life possible to womanhood—a life as different from her own as the wide waste of sea which she looked across sometimes from the downs beyond Holborough was different from the placid mill-stream that bounded her father's orchard. But she had no sick, fretful yearning for that wider life. To win her father's affection, to see her brother restored to his abandoned home—these were her girlish dreams and simple, unselfish hopes.

In all the months Clarissa Lovel had spent at Mill Cottage she had never crossed the boundary of that lost domain she loved so well. There was a rustic bridge across the mill-stream, and a wooden gate opening into Arden woods. Clarissa very often stood by this gate, leaning with folded arms upon the topmost bar, and looking into the shadowy labyrinth of beech and pine, with sad, dreamy eyes, but she never went through beyond the barrier. Honest Martha asked her more than once why she never walked in the wood, which was so much pleasanter than the dusty high-road, or even Arden common, an undulating expanse of heathy waste beyond the village, where Clarissa would roam for hours on the fine spring days, with a sketch-book under her arm. The friendly peasant woman could not understand that obstinate avoidance of a beloved scene—that sentiment which made her lost home seem to Clarissa a thing to shrink from as she might have shrunk from beholding the face of the beloved dead.

It was bright midsummer weather, a glorious, prolific season, with the thermometer ranging between seventy and eighty, when Lady Laura Armstrong did at last make her appearance at Mill Cottage. The simple, old-fashioned garden was all aglow with roses; the house half hidden beneath the luxuriance of foliage and flowers—a great magnolia on one side climbing up to the dormer-windows, on the other, pale monthly roses, and odorous golden and crimson tinted honeysuckle. Lady Laura was in raptures with the place. She found Clarissa sitting in a natural arbor made by a group of old hawthorns and a wild plum-tree, and placed herself at once upon a footing of perfect friendliness and familiarity with the girl. Mr. Lovel was out—a rare occurrence. He had gone for a stroll through the village with Ponto.

"And why are you not with him?" asked Lady Laura, who, like most of these clever, managing women, had a knack of asking questions. "You must be a better companion than Ponto."

"Papa does not think so. He likes walking alone. He likes to be quite free to dream about his books, I fancy, and it bores him rather to have to talk."

"Not a very lively companion for you, I fear. Why, child, how dismal your life must be!"

"Oh no; not dismal. It is very quiet, of course; but I like a quiet life."

"But you go to a good many parties, I suppose, in Holborough and the neighborhood? I know the Holborough people are fond of giving parties, and are quite famous for croquet."

"No, Lady Laura; papa won't let me visit any one at Holborough, except my uncle and aunt, the Olivers."

"Yes; I know the Olivers very well indeed. Remarkably pleasant people."

"And I don't even know how to play croquet."

"Why, my poor benighted child, in what a state of barbarism this father of yours is bringing you up! How are you ever to marry and take your place in the world? And with your advantages, too! What can the man be dreaming about? I shall talk to him very seriously. We are quite old friends, you know, my dear, and I can venture to say what I like to him. You must come to me immediately. I shall have a houseful of people in a week or two, and you shall have a peep at the gay world. Poor little prison flower—no wonder you look thoughtful and pale! And now show me your garden, please, Miss Lovel. We can stroll about till your father comes home. I mean to talk to him at once."

Energy was one of the qualities of her own character for which Laura Armstrong especially valued herself. She was always doing something or other which she was not actually called upon by her own duty or by the desire of other people to do, and she was always eager to do it "at once." She had come to Mill Cottage intending to show some kindness to Clarissa Lovel, whose father and her own father, the Earl of Calderwood, had been firm friends in the days when the master of Arden entertained the county; and Clarissa's manner and appearance having impressed her most favorably, she was eager to do her immediate service—to have her at the Castle, and show her to the world, and get her a rich husband if possible.

In honest truth this Lady Laura Armstrong was a kindly disposed, sympathetic woman, anxious to make the best of the opportunities which Providence had given her with so lavish a hand, and to do her duty toward her less fortunate neighbors. The office of Lady Bountiful, the position of patroness, suited her humor. Her active, frivolous nature, which spurned repose, and yet never rose above trifles, found an agreeable occupation in the exercise of this kind of benign influence upon other people's lives. Whether she would have put herself seriously out of the way for the benefit of any of these people to whom she was so unfailingly beneficent was a question which circumstances had never yet put to the test. Her benevolence had so far been of a light, airy kind, which did not heavily tax her bodily or mental powers, or even the ample resources of her purse.

She was a handsome woman, after a fair, florid, rather redundant style of beauty, and was profoundly skilled in all those arts of costume and decoration by which such beauty is improved. A woman of middle height, with a fine figure, a wealth of fair hair, and an aquiline nose of the true patrician type, her admirers said. The mouth was rather large, but redeemed by a set of flashing teeth and a winning smile; the chin inclined to be of that order called "double;" and indeed a tendency to increasing stoutness was one of the few cares which shadowed Lady Laura's path. She was five-and-thirty, and had only just begun to tell herself that she was no longer a girl. She got on admirably with Clarissa, as she informed her husband afterward when she described the visit. The girl was fascinated at once by that frank, cordial manner, and was quite ready to accept Lady Laura for

"But you will let her come to me?"

"That is the best, my dear Lady Laura. Yes, of course she may come to you whenever you may please to be troubled with her."

"Then I please to be troubled with her immediately. I should like to carry her away with me this afternoon if it were possible; but I suppose that can't be—there will be a trunk to be packed, and so on. When will you come to me, Miss Lovel? Do you know, I am strongly tempted to call you Clarissa?"

"I should like it so much better," the girl answered, blushing.

"What! may I? Then I'm sure I will. It's such a pretty name, reminding one of that old novel of Richardson's, which every body quotes and no one ever seems to have read. When will you come, Clarissa?"

"Give her a week," said her father; "she'll want a new white muslin gown, I dare say: young women always do when they are going visiting."

"Now pray don't let her trouble herself about any thing of that kind; my maid shall see to all that sort of thing. We will make her look her best, depend upon it. I mean this visit to be a great event in her life, Mr. Lovel, if possible."

"Don't let there be any fuss or trouble about her. Every one knows that I am poor, and that she will be penniless when I am gone. Let her her friend, ready to be patronized by her, even, with no sense of humiliation, no lurking desire to revolt against the kind of sovereignty with which her new friend took possession of her.

"SHE STOOD AT THIS WINDOW FOR NEARLY TEN MINUTES."

Mr. Lovel came strolling in by-and-by with his favorite tan setter, looking as cool as if there were no such thing as blazing midsummer sunshine, and found the two ladies sauntering up and down the grassy walk by the mill-stream, under the shadow of gnarled old pear and quince trees. He was charmed to see his dear Lady Laura. Clarissa had never known him so enthusiastic or so agreeable. It was quite a new manner which he put on—the manner of a man who is still interested in life. Lady Laura began almost at once with her reproaches. How could he be so cruel to this dear child? How could he be so absurd as to bury her alive in this way?

"She visits no one, I hear," cried the lady—"positively no one."

"Humph! she has been complaining, has she?" said Mr. Lovel, with a sharp glance at his daughter.

"Complaining! Oh no, papa! I have told Lady Laura that I do not care about gayety, and that you do not allow me to visit."

"Aut Cæsar aut nullus—the best or nothing. I don't want Clarissa to be gadding about to all the tea-drinkings in Holborough; and if I let her go to one house, I must let her go to all."

wear her white muslin gown, and give her a corner to sit in. People may take her for one of your children's governesses if they choose; but if she is to see society, I am glad for her to see the best."

"People shall not take her for one of my governesses; they shall take her for nothing less than Miss Lovel of Arden. Yes, of Arden, my dear Sir; don't frown, I entreat you. The glory of an old house like that clings to those who bear the old name, even though lands and house are gone—Miss Lovel of Arden. By-the-way, how do you get on with your neighbor, Mr. Granger?"

"I do not get on with him at all. He used to call upon me now and then, but I suppose he fancied or saw somehow or other—though I am sure I was laboriously civil to him—that I did not care much for his visits; at any rate, he dropped them. But he is still rather obtrusively polite in sending me game and hot-house fruit and flowers at odd times, in return for which favors I can send him nothing but a note of thanks—'Mr. Lovel presents his compliments to Mr. Granger, and begs to acknowledge, with best thanks,' etc.—the usual formula."

"I am so sorry you have not permitted him to know you," replied Lady Laura. "We saw a good deal of him last year—such a charming man! what one may really call a typical man—the sort of person the French describe as solid—carré par le base—a perfect block of granite; and then, so enormously rich!"

Lady Laura glanced at Clarissa, as if she were inspired with some sudden idea. She was subject to a sudden influx of ideas, and always fancied her ideas inspirations. She looked at Clarissa, and repeated, with a meditatve air, "So enormously rich!"

"There is a grown-up daughter, too," said Mr. Lovel; "rather a stiff-looking young person. I suppose she is solid too."

"She is not so charming as her father," replied Lady Laura, with whom that favorite adjective served for every thing in the way of praise. To her the Pyramids and Niagara, a tropical thunder-storm, a mazourka by Chopin, and a Parisian bonnet were all alike charming. "I suppose solidity isn't so nice in a girl," she went on, laughing; "but certainly Sophia Granger is not such a favorite with me as her father is. I suppose she will make a brilliant marriage, however, sooner or later, unattractive as she may be, for she'll have a superb fortune—unless, indeed, her father should take it into his head to marry again."

"Scarcely likely that, I should think, after seventeen years of widowhood. Why, Granger must be at least fifty."

"My dear Mr. Lovel, I hope you are not going to call that a great age."

"My dear Lady Laura, am I likely to do so, when my own fiftieth birthday is an event of the past? But I shouldn't suppose Granger to be a marrying man," he added, meditatively. "Such an idea has never occurred to me in conjunction with him." And here he glanced ever so slightly at his daughter. "That sort of granite man must take a great deal of thawing."

"There are suns that will melt the deepest snows," answered the lady, laughing. "Seriously, I am sorry you will not suffer him to know you. But I must run away this instant; my unfortunate ponies will be wondering what has become of me. You see this dear girl and I have got on so well together that I have been quite unconscious of time; and I had ever so many more calls to make, but those must be put off to another day. Let me see; this is Tuesday. I shall send a carriage for you this day week, Clarissa, soon after breakfast, so that I may have you with me at luncheon. Good-by."

Lady Laura kissed her new protégée at parting. She was really fond of every thing young and bright and pretty; and having come to Mr. Lovel's house intending to perform a social duty, was delighted to find that the duty was so easy and pleasant to her. She was always pleased with new acquaintances, and was apt to give her friendship on the smallest provocation. On the other hand, there came a time when she grew just a little weary of these dear sweet friends, and began to find them less charming than of old. But she was never uncivil to them; they always remained on her list, and received stray gleams from the sunlight of her patronage.

"Well?" said Mr. Lovel, interrogatively, when the mistress of Hale Castle had driven off, in the lightest and daintiest of phaetons, with a model groom and a pair of chestnut cobs, which seemed perfection, even in Yorkshire, where every man is a connoisseur in horseflesh—"well, child, I told you that you might go into society if Lady Laura Armstrong took you up, but I scarcely expected her to be as cordial as she has been to-day. Nothing could have been better than the result of her visit. She seemed quite taken with you, Clary."

It was almost the first time her father had ever called her Clary. It was only a small endearment, but she blushed and sparkled into smiles at the welcome sound. He saw the smile and blush, but only thought she was delighted with the idea of this visit to the Castle. He had no notion that the placid state of indifference which he maintained toward her was otherwise than agreeable to her feelings. He was perfectly civil to her, and he never interfered with her pursuits or inclinations. What more could she want from a father?

Perhaps she assumed a new value in his eyes from the time of that visit of Lady Laura's. He was certainly kinder to her than usual, the girl thought, as they sat on the lawn in the balmy June evening sipping their after-dinner coffee, while the moon rose fair and pale above the woods of Arden Court. He contemplated her with a meditative air now and then when she was not looking his way. He had always known that she was beautiful, but her beauty had acquired a new emphasis from Lady Laura Armstrong's praises. A woman of the world of that class was not likely to be deceived, or to mistake the kind of beauty likely to influence mankind. And in the dim recesses of his mind there grew up a new hope—very vague and shadowy; he despised himself for dwelling upon it so weakly—a hope that made him kinder to his daughter than he had ever been yet; a hope which rendered her precious to him all at once. Not that he loved her any better than of old; it was only that he saw how, if fortune favored him, this girl might render him the greatest service that could be done for him by any human creature.

She might marry Daniel Granger, and win back the heritage he had lost. It was a foolish thought, of course; Mr. Lovel was quite aware of the supremity of folly involved in it. This Granger might be the last man in the world to fall in love with a girl younger than his daughter; he might be as impervious to beauty as the granite to which Laura Armstrong had likened him. It was a foolish fancy, a vain hope; but it served to brighten the meditations of Marmaduke Lovel—who had really very few pleasant subjects to think about—with a faint rosy glow.

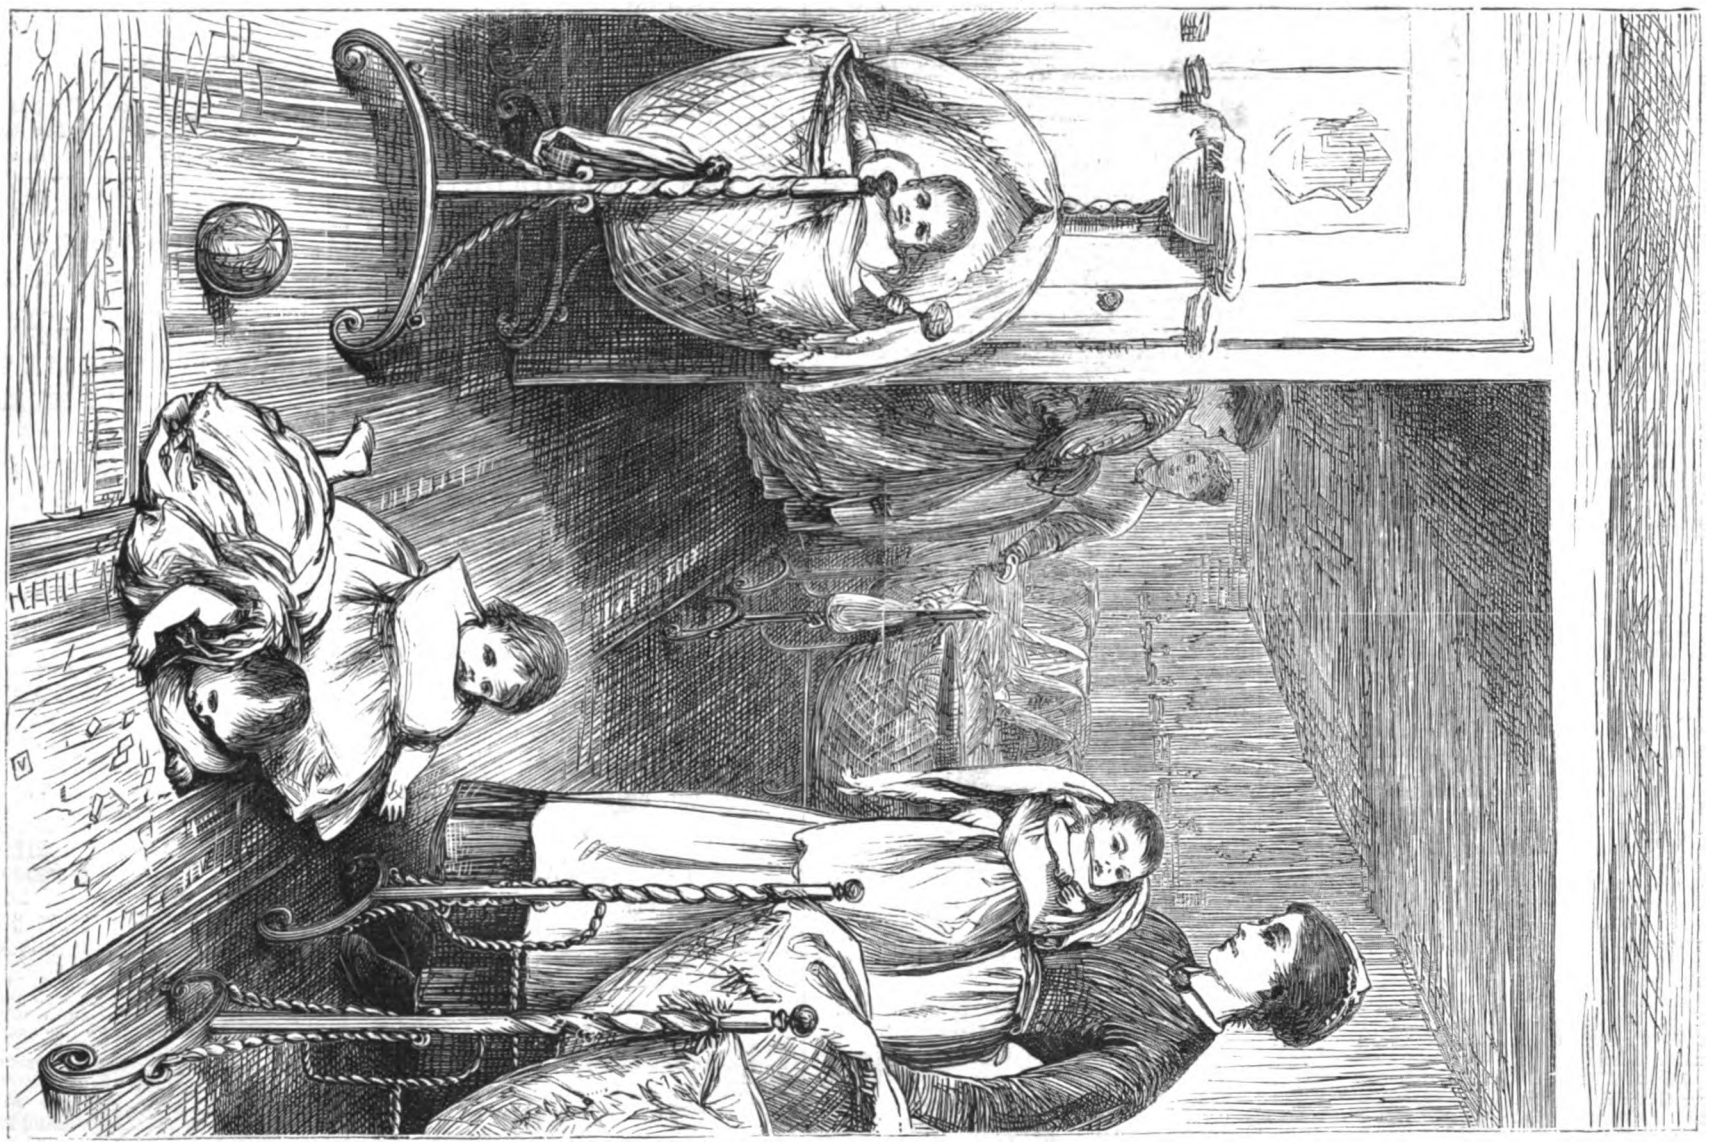
"It is the idlest dream," he said to himself. "When did good luck ever come my way? But oh, to hold Arden Court again—by any tie—to die knowing that my race would inherit the old gray walls!"

Digitized by Google

THE LONDON CRÈCHE.

THE Crèche, as its name implies, is an institution of foreign growth, and it has recently been transplanted from Belgium to the East End of London by Mrs. Hilton—whose labors, in connection with the Friends' Mission Institute, among the poor of that district, are well known in England. In the course of her mission work she was struck by the painful scenes which she witnessed among the young children. Numbers of poor women are obliged to go out to work, leaving their infants either in charge of children scarcely older than themselves, or stupefied by some noxious soothing mixture, and it is to protect them from this neglect and misery that the Crèche has been established. Two unoccupied rooms at the Friends' Mission Institute, 16 Stepney Causeway, have been fitted up for the purpose. The lower one is used as a play-room for the elder children, from two to five years of age. Here are little chairs, toys, and swings, and one part of the room is railed in like a pound, and fitted with mattresses for the children to lie down upon when tired. The upper room is the nursery for the very young children, and contains thirty cradles, the gifts of different ladies, whose names are written over their cots. The whole institution is modeled on the Belgian system. Every thing is scrupulously clean and neat, and the place will be under medical inspection, to insure proper sanitary arrangements. The children are received from ten in the morning, and must be called for at seven in the evening, being carefully fed, nursed, and cared for in the mean time; and all this is done for a charge of one penny. In such an institution great care must, of course, be taken to guard against its being turned into a foundling hospital, and for this purpose a strict system of visitation is to be arranged.

THE PLAY-ROOM.



THE NURSERY.

THE LONDON CRÈCHE, OR BABY'S HOME.

CHINESE SIMPLICITY.

WHATEVER may be the sins of omission or commission of the great functionaries of China, inordinate luxury is certainly not among the number. There is no ostentation of wealth any where to be seen. Their dress is of the plainest silk or gauze in summer; and it is only in winter that money can be expended on their persons, when some of the high officers wear costly furs. A Buddhist chaplet of beads of agate or jade, and often of less expensive material, a ring of jade on the thumb of the right hand as an evidence of their training to pull the bow (the traditional arm of both Chinese and Tartars), and sometimes a button of coral at the top of the official cap, marking their rank, and a pearl in the front, complete the most costly toilette of prince or grandee. The Chinese and the Japanese are the only Easterns, so far as civilized peoples are in question, who seem to set no value on precious stones or jewelry of any kind. Pearls are in certain request, probably for the wives and daughters, but the men never wear any kind of trinket. Simplicity of taste marks all their personal equipment; and the ladies, if they go into extravagance, seem to confine it to embroidery of the most elaborate and beautiful kind.

Digitized by Google

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

RECONSTRUCTION.—Your samples will make a very stylish suit. Use the cut paper pattern of the Polonaise-Casaque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Put folds of the same and fringe on the polonaise. Ruffles of the same on the skirt.

MARIA.—Get a tea-rose or a cuir-colored silk for the afternoon wedding, and make by the Worth Basque Dress illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV.

J. E. S.—Your inquiries about point lace braid have been answered recently.

MISS A.—Four or six ruffles a finger deep alternately box-pleated and ruffled, the lower edge bound or hemmed, the upper covered by the flounce above it, form a stylish trimming for black silk suits.

M. R.—Grenadines and all thin goods that do not wash have the corsages lined; but wash goods are not lined. Bazar No. 12, Vol. IV., will furnish you with the pattern. Full French waists or blouse-waists are what you in Kentucky call infant waists. Sew the seams of your thin basques with the machine, holding a rather loose tension.

A. B.—There are several books, we believe, on the raising of bees; but your letter is so vague that we do not know what would best serve your purpose.

MRS. F. H. S.—Very few over-skirts require lining. They are made bouffant by draping instead of by stiff lining. Wide, flat-pleated flounces may be either straight or bias, and are stitched flatly an inch from the top and bottom.

HANNIBAL.—Instead of white-edged black velvet ribbon use plain black. The pattern of the Apron-Polonaise Suit, illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., is what you want for your checked gray silk.

MRS. E. B. W.—We do not separate patterns. What shall we send you?

M. E. S.—Your sample is evidently all pure silk of very fair quality. Its want of lustre is probably what made you doubt that it was genuine silk.

A. L. W.—We have no patterns but those advertised in the present paper.

T. D. J.—Do not quilt your silk sacque for spring. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV.

A MOTHER.—Make the Victoria lawn dress for your daughter of twelve with a French waist, coat-sleeves, and upper skirt. The lower skirt is an inch or two above her shoe tops. Trim with ruffles and tucks.

C. H.—Use pattern of the Worth Basque House Dress for your white silk to be worn in mourning. Put flounces of white crape edged with tiny black lace or black velvet.

F. R. A.—Your sample is striped mohair.

MARY A.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., and select one of the patterns of polonaise suits. Get a gray or brown poplin, or serge, or pongee, and trim with folds and pleatings of a darker shade.—We are glad to have been of assistance to you.

M. E. B.—Have your crape shawl dyed a fine black, and make a paletot, and, if possible, an upper skirt to wear over black silk dresses, or with white ones.

AGNES.—Cambric, piqué, buff linen, and Victoria lawn are all suitable materials for making gored wrappers. They should be shortened for school dresses in the way described in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV., and will then be neat suits for the house or street.

MRS. E. C. A.—Black glacé silk is not pretty for a girl of thirteen unless she is in mourning. As you have worn mourning so long, you can wear lustreless black silk, and wear your laces, velvets, and fringes with it.

E. C. E.—The double mantle of black cashmere described in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., would be suitable for you.

MRS. LE S.—Covers for holding the Bazar until bound will be furnished from this office for 75 cents.

ALICE.—We can not give fashion plates or designs for embroidery at the request of every subscriber. You will find hints for mourning attire in a late Number of the Bazar.

JULIA.—Two large capes of white merino, or of piqué braided and embroidered, are the infants' cloaks now worn and for summer. Gray felt skirts are the best Balmorals. See New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., for dress lengths. Wear your Paisley shawl doubled, then folded scarf fashion, and carelessly thrown around the shoulders.

MRS. TRIBULATION.—Over-skirts are not too dressy for ladies of any age, nor are they too warm for any climate. The wrapper you suggest, with a sash, would be suitable for house dresses, also the belted sacque and short skirt for lawn dresses. If you use a blouse-waist you should add an over-skirt. The black belt and bow will answer. Remove the satin piping from your black silk, and put ottoman silk piping, or else narrow guipure or fringe. An over-skirt would give style to the dress when worn in the house. You can not find a cooler over dress than your linen will be if made with a single skirt and belted polonaise, as it does not require a dress waist beneath. Bias folds are much used on wash goods. If cut perfectly on the bias they wash well. Remove the waist of your black silk dress in midsummer, and wear with a single skirt, both in the house and street. Long white skirts are worn beneath trained skirts. Only one trained petticoat is necessary. We think the New York Fashions of Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV., will give you assistance.

AN INQUIRER.—It is necessary to send postage when ordering a single Number of the Bazar.

MRS. S. W.—Use the cut paper pattern of the Worth Basque illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., for your black silk, and make a plain demi-train. The same pattern will answer for your gray silk. Use lace and passementerie to trim the first—ruffles of a darker gray the second. Satin piping is out of style. The black lustre is probably all right. Tight basques do not need belts. Get a piqué walking coat with cape, and braid it, for the baby. Old ladies here wear black silk polonaises with short skirts trimmed with folds and gimp.

MISS S. S. M'C.—Use narrow overlapping ruffles on your black alpaca. The pattern sent you is illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV., with pretty ruffles.

DOLLY VARDEN.—Side-laced boots are very fashionable again, and divide favor with buttoned boots. Velvet or a gold chain is seen about the neck of most ladies. Read about the black China crape sacque in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 9, Vol. IV. The Marie Antoinette slippers and half-high buskin, called the Oxford tie, will be fashionable in the summer. Loop your piqué skirts to make an over-skirt over colored dresses, especially black silk.—Thanks for your appreciation and sympathy.—We reserve the right of putting irrelevant questions in the waste-basket.

THE Inebriate's Hope! C. C. BEERS, M.D., 12 E. Twelfth St., New York, permanently cures the worst cases of Intemperance. Call or send stamp for Evidence. Is harmless.—[Com.]

A. A. HAYES, M.D., State Assayer of Massachusetts, pronounces Hall's Sicilian Hair Renewer an efficient preparation for cleansing the skin of the head, promoting the growth, and restoring the original color of the hair when it has become gray.—[Com.]

HONESTY is the best policy in medicine as well as in other things. AYER'S SARSAPARILLA is a genuine preparation of that unequaled spring medicine and blood purifier, decidedly superior to the poor imitations heretofore in the market. Trial proves it.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,
And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

SWISS CARVED GOODS.
The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.
Organs & Melodeons.
The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.
46,000
Now in Use.
No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.
☞ Send for Price-Lists.
Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

SARATOGA SPRINGS REMEDIAL INSTITUTE. New improvements in modern and elegant style. Drs. STRONG, its proprietors, are graduates of the Medical Dep't of New York University, and give special attention to LUNG, FEMALE, and CHRONIC Diseases.
Among its special appliances are the Turkish, Sulphur Air, Russian, and Electro-Thermal Baths, Equalizer or Vacuum Treatment, Swedish Movement Cure, Hydropathy, &c.
Indorsed by Bishop Simpson, Prof. Taylor Lewis, LL.D., Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D.D., Robert Carter, Esq., &c.
For description of our appliances, diseases treated, references, &c., send for Circulars to Drs. S. S. & S. E. STRONG, Saratoga Springs, New York.

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK,
have just ready
A NEW EDITION
of
OUR GIRLS.
By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D.
12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

The book not only deserves to be read, however; it will be read because it is full of interest, concerning itself, as it does, with such matters as girls' boots and shoes; how girls should walk; low neck and short sleeves; outrages upon the body; stockings supporters; why are women so small? idleness among girls; sunshine and health; a word about baths; what you should eat; how to manage a cold; fat and thin girls, etc., etc.—N. Y. Evening Post.
Dr. Dio Lewis has written a sensible and lively book. There is not a dull page in it, and scarcely one that does not convey some sound instruction. We wish the book could enter thousands of our homes, fashionable and unfashionable; for we believe it contains suggestions and teaching of precisely the kind that "our girls" every where need.—N. Y. Independent.
☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send the above work by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of $1 50.

SELLING BY THOUSANDS.
MISS LOUISA M. ALCOTT'S
THREE PROVERB STORIES.
Uniform in size with "Moods."
"Not a new book, and yet a book ever new, because of its brightness and freshness, is this gathering into a little volume, with Hoppin illustrations."—Boston Transcript.
Price 75 cts. at any bookstore or by mail.
LORING, Publisher, Boston.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

SILK DEPARTMENT,
Rotunda.
A. T. STEWART & CO. have just received large additional supplies of Low and Medium Priced
LYONS AND ZURICH SILKS, which for quality and value surpass any yet offered, viz.:
All the best grades and newest styles of SPRING FANCY SILKS, $1 50 to $3 per yard.
RICH PLAIN SILKS, in the most novel colorings, forming a beautiful collection, $2 to $2 50, $3 to $3 50 per yard.
BLACK SILKS of reputed makers, including "Ponson's" and "A. T. Stewart's" Family Silks, at lower prices than heretofore offered.
An entirely new article for carriage and promenade costumes, identified as the "CATELAN" and "BREDA" SILK, will be exhibited in this country for the first time; price $2 50 per yard.
Fifty different Colorings of PONGEE SILKS.
A Line of
PONGEE FOULARD SILKS, 3-4 wide, at $1, $1 25, and $1 50 per yard.
BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

RICH LACES AND EMBROIDERIES, purchased since the capitulation,
AT AN ENORMOUS SACRIFICE, which we are offering at a small advance on the cost.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth St.

"FRINGED FRENCH SUITINGS."
THE LATEST NOVELTY
(not to be found in any other house).
Also, a large assortment of Plain and Fancy Dress Goods,
BAPTISTE CLOTHS, FRENCH, ENGLISH, AND DOMESTIC PRINTS, PERCALES, PIQUES, &c.,
AT VERY LOW PRICES.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth St.

CLOTHS AND CASSIMERES.
BLACK AND COLORED CLOTHS,
DOESKINS AND CASSIMERES,
SCOTCH CHEVIOT SUITINGS,
OVERCOATINGS,
FANCY CASSIMERES,
in new styles and colorings,
FOR GENTLEMEN AND YOUTHS,
AT RETAIL.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway, corner Nineteenth St.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "A"
FOR $75.

2	Flannel Bands	@ $0 37½	$0 75
2	Barrow Coats	@ 2 00	4 00
2	Flannel Skirts	@ 3 00	6 00
2	Cambric "	@ 1 75	3 50
2	" " tucked	@ 2 25	4 50
6	Linen Shirts	@ 1 25	7 50
4	Night Dresses	@ 2 50	10 00
2	Day "	@ 5 00	10 00
4	Slips	@ 3 00	12 00
1	Robe		8 00
1	Basket, furnished		5 00
6	Pairs Socks	@ 0 62½	3 75
			$75 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Complete directions for Self-Measurement sent by mail, if desired.
LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT,
LORD & TAYLOR,
895, 897, 899, & 901 Broadway, cor. of Twentieth Street,
255, 257, 259, & 261 Grand St., cor. of Chrystie St., N. Y.

SPRING STYLES
OF
RICHMOND PRINTS.
LADIES about buying their Spring
CALICOES
will find the latest and most tasteful designs in these standard goods.
ASK FOR THE
RICHMOND PRINTS.

RICH RARE, & RACY READING. Wit, humor, fun. Sent free. Address BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

HARPER & BROTHERS'
SPECIAL TRADE SALE,
1871.
FROM MARCH 16 TO APRIL 25.
FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, March, 1871.
We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following terms, for Cash, from the 16th of March to the 25th of April, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of	$ 100	at one time,	25	per cent.	discount;
"	$ 500	"	30	"	"
"	$1000	"	33⅓	"	"
"	$2000	"	35	"	"

And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.
We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Spring.
The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.
HARPER & BROTHERS.

Waltham Watches.
We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise.
HOWARD & CO.,
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
No. 865 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

E. P. Ryder's
THE Only Perfect
DOLLAR ENGINE,
That will go, and carry revolving Toys, Machinery, &c. &c. With Silver Plated Fly Wheel, Piston, Cylinder taking steam at both ends, steam Chest, Boiler and Lamp. All complete by mail, post paid, on receipt of $1.30, by Colby Bro's & Co.,
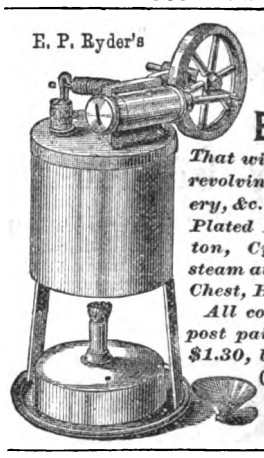
508 Broadway,
NEW YORK.



GETTING UP CLUBS.
Great Saving to Consumers.
Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.
THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

Novelty Carriage.
Cradle and Carriage combined.
Also, Patent Swings, Hobbies, Propellers, and Toys. Send stamp for Circular to LEWIS P. TIBBALS,
478 Broadway, N. Y.

PERFUMERY.
For the largest assortment and best terms, call upon or address
C. B. WOODWORTH & SON,
Rochester, N. Y.
N. Y. Office, 335 Broadway.

BLEES
NOISELESS,
LOCK-STITCH
SEWING MACHINE
Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.
MANUFACTURED BY
BLEES
Sewing Machine Co.,
623 Broadway, N. Y.

FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE
Cleans Kid Gloves and all kinds of Cloths and Clothing; removes Paint, Grease, Tar, &c., instantly, without the least injury to the finest fabric. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE CO., 33 Barclay St., New York; 46 La Salle St., Chicago.

$300 A MONTH and expenses to good canvassers. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

Digitized by Google

THE CELEBRATED

BRAND

BLACK ALPACAS!

This brand of Alpaca is acknowledged (by the leading fashion authorities) to be the standard Alpaca now sold in the United States.

They are greatly improved in lustre and shade of black for Spring and Summer wear. Being finished alike on both sides, and made of the very finest material, they far surpass all other Black Alpacas sold in this country.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Buffalo precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES

Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO.,
294 Bowery, N. Y.

THE

Strawberry Garden.

How it was Planted; What it Cost; What came of it.

By CHARLES BARNARD.

Price 38 cts. at any bookstore or by mail.
LORING, Publisher, Boston.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

THE BEST

TRY IT. SOLD BY GROCERS.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No.	22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	"	24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	"	30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	"	38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	"	40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	"	42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	"	46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	"	48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	"	50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	"	1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	"	5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	"	11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	"	13
POSTILLION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	"	15

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

HOMAI'S PERSIAN WASH

REMOVES MOTH PATCH, TAN, & FRECKLES. Never fails. For sale by all Druggists.
B. F. RACKLEY, Proprietor, Dover, N. H.

AGENTS WANTED.

The Great Work of the Age,

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S

"LIFE OF

Jesus, The Christ,"

Upon which the author has been actively engaged for some years past, will be ready in about three months. Meantime the publishers offer another good book, authenticated by another great name—a book which has been and is now selling with great rapidity wherever it is offered. All successful Canvassers for this book will have preference of territory for the "Beecher Book." The book combines

"500 Volumes in One,"

with a brilliant Introduction,

By WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT,

under whose critical supervision it was compiled.

Over 800 pages, beautifully printed, choicely illustrated, handsomely bound. A library of 500 volumes in one book, whose contents will never grow old or stale. It will be read and re-read with pleasure by young and old as long as its leaves hold together.

"A perfect surprise. Scarcely any thing at all a favorite, or at all worthy of a place here, is neglected. It is a book for every household."—N. Y. Mail.

"A singularly handsome volume."—Phila. Inquirer.

"No similar collection in the English language, in copiousness and felicity of selection and arrangement, can compare with it."—N. Y. Times.

Terms liberal. Selling very rapidly: the trouble has been to get this book made fast enough. Teachers, Clergymen, active Men, intelligent Women can have good pay with light work by taking an agency. Exclusive territory given. Send for circular, terms, &c., to
J. B. FORD & CO., 27 Park Place, N. Y.

LEA & PERRINS'

WORCESTERSHIRE

SAUCE.

PRONOUNCED BY CONNOISSEURS TO BE THE ONLY

GOOD Sauce,

and applicable to EVERY VARIETY OF DISH.

Extract of a letter from a Medical Gentleman at Madras to his Brother at Worcester, May, 1851:

"Tell Lea & Perrins that their Sauce is highly esteemed in India, and, in my opinion, the most wholesome Sauce that is made."

At the Breakfast, Luncheon, Dinner, and Supper Table, it imparts the most exquisite relish and zest to Soups, Fish, Hot or Cold Joints, Fowl, Game, &c.

The universal demand and excellence has led to many imitations of LEA & PERRINS' SAUCE.

JOHN DUNCAN'S SONS,
1 Union Square and 30 South William Street,
Special Agents for the United States.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle

SEWING MACHINES!

$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

BOOK AGENTS WANTED.

The subscriber is desirous of securing the services of many more competent Agents, of both sexes. He knows well how to anticipate the feelings of that class of benefactors known as Book Agents, and can confidently assure such persons that the books he is now selling through that channel are works that an Agent may feel a pleasure in offering to the public. Another advantage that his Agents possess is that his books are all published by Messrs. HARPER & BROTHERS, a house without a rival in the character and variety of their publications, and in their facilities to produce them. Intelligent, energetic, and persevering Agents are realizing liberal salaries from the commissions paid. Those desiring to engage in this vocation, and meaning business, are requested to make application to
AVERY BILL, Care Harper & Brothers,
331 Pearl St., New York.

Every baby must have it. Is THOROUGHLY WATER-PROOF, protects clothing, retains linen diaper, avoids pins, permits circulation of air. Recommended by physicians and all mothers whose children have worn them. Made in 4 sizes—1, smallest; 4 largest—exclusively by EUREKA DIAPER CO., 539 Broadway, N. Y. Sample mailed on receipt of $1. Sold also by Stewart, Claflin, Lord & Taylor, Arnold & Constable and first-class Infants' Clothing, Fancy and Dry Goods Stores. Ask for EUREKA DIAPER; see they bear stamp of EUREKA PATENT DIAPER CO. Take no other. Agents wanted.

ILLUSTRATIONS

Of Target Practice, Description, Price-List, &c., of the celebrated

MAYNARD RIFLES AND SHOT-GUNS

sent on request by letter addressed to MASS. ARMS CO., Chicopee Falls, Mass.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

TRIX

Perfumes the Breath. Cures Coughs and Colds. By mail, 10 cents.
TRIX CO., Rochester, N. Y.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

WHISKERS, MUSTACHE, or HAIR warranted to grow on man or boy in 21 days, or money refunded. Sent free for 50 cents. Address
E. H. COLVIN, Hadleys' Station, Illinois.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price

THE MUTINEERS OF THE BOUNTY. Some Account of the Mutineers of the Bounty and their Descendants in Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. By LADY BELCHER. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HEAT: being Part I. of Science for the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. Copiously Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. (Just Ready.)

DE WITT'S MOTHERLESS. Motherless; or, A Parisian Family. For Girls in their Teens. Translated from the French of Madame Guizot De Witt by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. (Yearly Ready.)

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. New Edition.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. New Edition. Revised, with Maps and Illustrations. Now ready: Gospels, 2 vols.; Acts, 1 vol.; Romans, 1 vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

LOCAL TAXATION: being a Report of the Commission appointed by the Governor of New York, under the Authority of the Legislature, to Revise the Laws for the Assessment and Collection of State and Local Taxes. DAVID A. WELLS, EDWIN DODGE, GEORGE W. CUYLER, Commissioners. Revised and Corrected Edition. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

SHAKESPEARE'S COMEDY OF THE MERCHANT OF VENICE. Edited, with Notes, by W. J. ROLFE, A.M., formerly Head Master of the High School, Cambridge, Mass. Engravings. 16mo, Flexible Cloth, 90 cents.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

BRED IN THE BONE; or, Like Father, Like Son. By the Author of "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FENTON'S QUEST. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," "Dead-Sea Fruit," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAISY NICHOL. By Lady HARDY. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

EARL'S DENE. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

NEW EDITIONS

OF BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

PRIDEAUX'S CONNECTION OF THE OLD AND NEW TESTAMENTS. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $4 00.

LAYARD'S FRESH DISCOVERIES AT NINEVEH. 8vo, Cloth, $4 00.

MOWRY'S ARIZONA AND SONORA. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

FOWLER'S ENGLISH LANGUAGE IN ITS ELEMENTS AND FORMS. 8vo, Cloth, $2 50.

THE SILVER CORD. A Novel. By SHIRLEY BROOKS. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

MARY QUEEN OF SCOTS. By J. S. C. ABBOTT. Illustrated. 16mo, Cloth, $1 20.

UPHAM'S MENTAL PHILOSOPHY. Abridged. 1 vol., Sheep, $1 50.

HOOKER'S CHILD'S BOOK OF NATURE. 3 Parts, complete in One Volume, $2 00; Separate, 90 cents each.

ROLLIN'S ANCIENT HISTORY. 2 vols., 8vo, Cloth, $4 50; 1 vol., $4 00.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE.

The great design of Harper's is to give correct information and rational amusement to the great masses of the people. There is no monthly Magazine an intelligent reading family can less afford to be without. Many Magazines are accumulated. Harper's is edited. There is not a Magazine that is printed which shows more intelligent pains expended on its articles and mechanical execution. There is not a cheaper Magazine published. There is not, confessedly, a more popular Magazine in the world.—New England Homestead.

HARPER'S WEEKLY.

JOURNAL OF CIVILIZATION

Harper's Weekly deserves its primacy in this class of publications, alike for the value of its reading-matter and the excellence of its illustrations. The spirited and telling pictorial satires of NAST are a power in society, and are dictated in aid of a sound public opinion, and against public wrongs and follies. The editorials on public affairs are models of discussion, weighty and temperate, supporting high principles in an elevated tone and a chastened literary style.—Examiner and Chronicle.

HARPER'S BAZAR

Free from all political and sectarian discussion, devoted to fashion, pleasure, and instruction, it is just the agreeable, companionable, and interesting domestic paper which every mother and wife and sweetheart will require every son, husband, and lover to bring home with him every Saturday evening.—Philadelphia Ledger.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

CURL YOUR HAIR!

A BOTTLE of MAGNETIC CURLIQUE sent Free for 25 cts. It curls straight hair in beautiful curls on the first application, and will remain in curl 10 days. Address R. BYRON & CO., Garrettsville, Ohio.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

For 50c ☞ FIFTY-TWO German Bristol Cards, with your name neatly printed and sent by mail prepaid. Address SMITH & MILLS, Argus Office, ATLANTA, Illinois.

READ "Convent Life Unveiled," by Edith O'Gorman. Price $1 50. CT. PUB. CO., Hartford, Ct.

AGENTS!—Every Book Agent, and ALL who see this, WRITE ME and be wise. Address F. S. FULLER, Publisher, Springfield, Mass. ☞ It will Pay.

HUNTING, Trapping, and Fishing. All about it. SENT FREE. Address "HUNTER," Hinsdale, N. H.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

WHO was the only man who was never spanked in his childhood?—Adam, because he was born grown up.

THE END OF A CANDLE—To give light.

Though you may speak of the water of a diamond, you should say the Emerald ile.

A LADY-KILLER—Lucretia Borgia.

Why is a swallow like a chimney?—Because both have a crooked flue.

VERY GOOD OF THEM.—Most young ladies try to make their waste as small as possible.

Why is a doctor better taken care of than his patients?—Because when he goes to bed he's sure to have somebody to wrap him up.

A SAUCY LETTER—An X-pert.

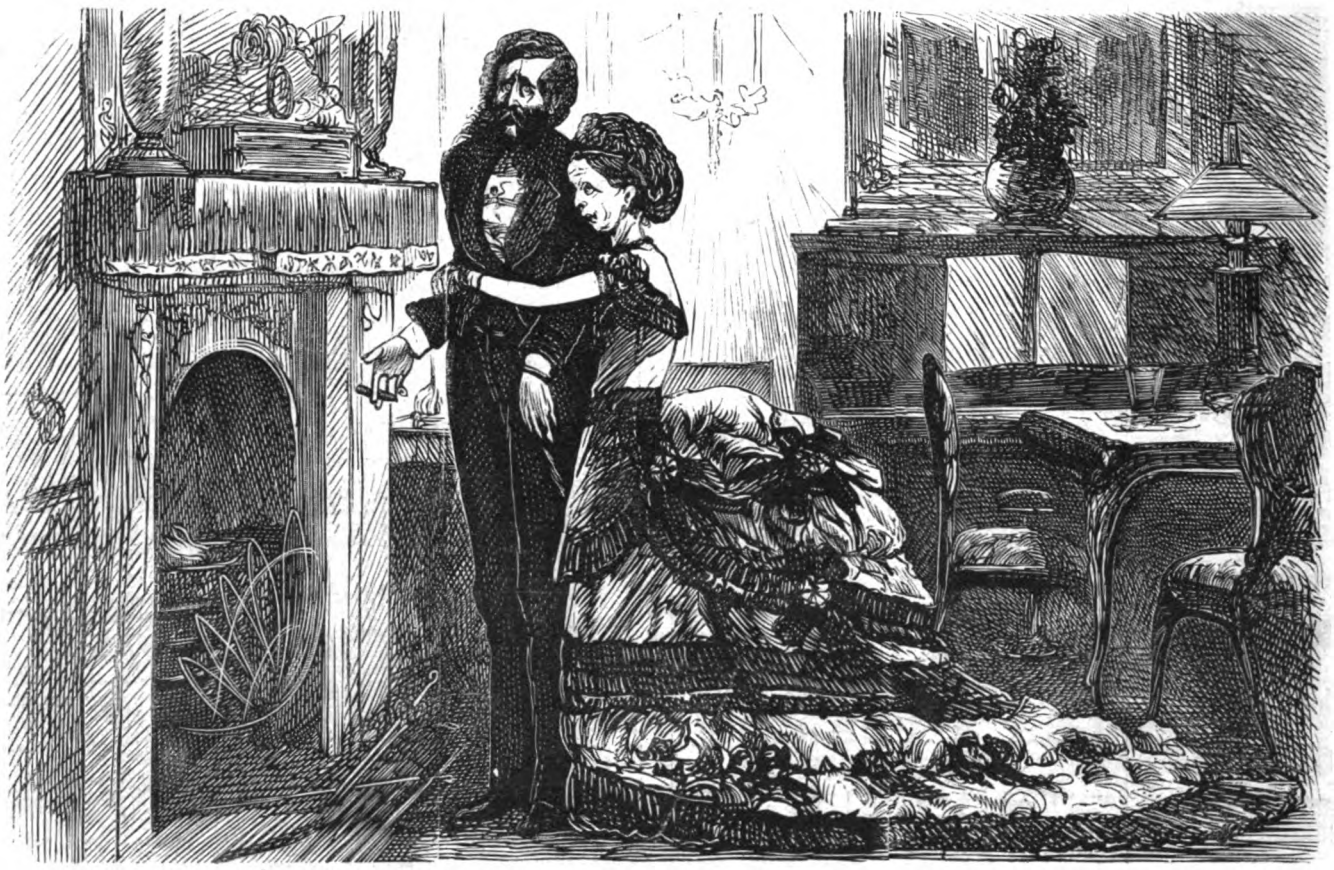
The English proverb says, "It is a wise child that knows its own father." The French equivalent is, "Je ne sais Pa."

HOW TO MAKE A THIN BABY FAT—Throw it from a third-story window, and it's sure to come down plump.

Why was Eve Low-Church before the fall, and High-Church after?—Before, she was Eve-angelical, and after, she took to vestments.

THE RIGHT HAND (IN MARRIAGE)—The left.

What evidence is there that there was beer in the ark?—The kangaroo was seen to go in with hops, and Bruin soon followed.



BEHIND THE SCENES.

(THE BACHELOR FRIENDS OF BENEDICK HAVE JUST TAKEN THEIR DEPARTURE.)

BENEDICK (who has married Money, and still smarts under some of the Consequences). "Oh, I say, Mary Ann, I wish to Goodness you wouldn't Pet me in Public. I don't so much Mind it—when we're Alone; but before a Lot of Fellows, hang it all, you know!"

MARY ANN (who is up in Mr. Anthony Trollope). "And why not, my Phœbus? Should not a Woman Glory in her love!"

BENEDICK. "Oh, Bother!"

THE DOG STOPPED.

"Stranger, I want to leave my dog in this 'ere office till the boat starts. I'm afraid somebody will steal him."

"You can't do it," said the clerk. "Take him out."

"Well, stranger, that is cruel; but you're both dispositioned alike, and he's kinder company for you."

"Take him out!" roared the clerk.

"Well, stranger, I don't think you're honest, and you want watching. Here, Dragon," he said to the dog, "sit down here, and watch that fellow sharp!" and, turning on his heel, said to the clerk, "Put him out, stranger, if he is troublesome!"

The dog laid there till the boat started, watching and growling at every movement of the clerk, who gave him the better part of the office.

If a young lady wished a young gent to kiss her, what papers would she mention?—No Spectators, no Observers, and as many Times as you like.

CHARADE.—My first is a kind of butter. My second is a kind of liquor (lick-er). My whole is part of a gun. Answer—Ram-rod.

When is a ship like a scarf-pin?—When it's on the bosom of a heavy swell.

RULING OFFICIAL PASSION.—A policeman, fond of reading, told a friend that, for amusement when off duty, he often took up a book.

STOPPED ON THE WAY.—A mistress who had sent her servant-maid to chapel had reason to fear that, instead of going all the way there, she had stopped with the chap.

FLO. "Now, Minnie, can't you remember what a Crotchet is?"

MINNIE. "No; but I suppose it is something Disagreeable, for Mamma said Aunt had one in her Head when she thought me too young to go to the Theatre."

INDISPUTABLE FACTS.

GIRLS WITH—Blue eyes never languish,
Black eyes never stare;
Pretty feet and ankles
Short thingamies won't wear.
White teeth never laugh, or White hands never play
With tiny ears or hair, which
Will get in the way.
Waists are never nipp'd in,
Busts may not be shown,
Noses never dipp'd in Water of Cologne.
Sweet tones seldom talk loud,
Powder's never used;
Fact is, pretty girls now
Are very much abused.

Which of the nine Muses is meant here?

One hundred and one by fifty divide,
And if a cipher be rightly applied,
And your calculation agrees with mine,
The answer will be one taken from nine.

Answer—CLIO.

CONTENTS OF A GAME-BAG.—A correspondent, whom we should judge must have done some hunting, sends us the following as the contents of his game-bag: The lowest—Base-ball. The most noisy—Racket. The most quiet—Whist. The game that will cheer-up most—Cricket. The most hearty—Bluff. The toper's favorite—Draughts. The thieves'—Crib-bage. An honest game—Fa(i)ro. Should be played by game birds—Crow-quet. A musical game—Ving tun. An ice game for barbers—Curling. A long game—Everlasting. Game for quadrupeds—All fours. A good dinner game—(8)quails. *Pawn*broker's game—Chess, and three-ball game. A *cue*rious game—Billiards. A capital game for a fight—Draw-poker. A poor game for the girls—Old maids. The shoe-maker's game—Foot-ball. For dancing Scotchmen—Hop Scotch. A masquerading game—Dominoes. Not good to find game—Eu-chre. Soldier's game—(S)quadrille. Game for the New York press—Boston. The fisherman's game—Lansque*net*. The broker's—Speculation. The lawyer's—Keno. The young lady's—Matrimony. The comic actor's—Muggin(s). The game they could not play in Switzerland—Bag-a-Tell(e). Game afoot—Lo*to*. Game of humbug—Backgammon. Likely to keep up the game—Props.

POLLY. "Hush, Ma; we are Playing at Church. Willie and me are you and Pa, and Baby is Preaching, and Willie's gone to sleep really, and snores beautifully, just like Pa."

HOW TO MANAGE IT.

THIS IS ONE WAY; AND THIS IS THE OTHER.

The Result is the same in either Case, and the Ladies carry the point, of course.

'TIS AN ILL WIND THAT BLOWS NOBODY GOOD.

"Mend your Rumbereller, Miss?"

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 16.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Commencement, Confirmation, and First-Communion Dresses.

Fig. 1.—WHITE ALPACA DRESS WITH HIGH BASQUE-WAIST. The long plain skirt is trimmed, in the manner shown by the illustration, with six folds of the material, each an inch and a fifth wide. The basque-waist is trimmed with folds four-fifths of an inch wide, embroidered in dots with white silk, and a box-pleated ruffle two inches and a half wide. Cut the basque-waist from No. IV. of the Supplement to Harper's Bazar, No. 10, Vol. IV. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 17 of the present Supplement, letting them reach only to the beginning of the cuff. The trimming consists of a ruffle made of a piece of the material four inches wide and twenty-four inches long, which is slightly sloped toward the ends, and joined with the bottom of the sleeve. Cover the seam joining the ruffle and sleeve with an embroidered fold.

Fig. 2.—POULT DE SOIE DRESS WITH HIGH WAIST. The front breadths of the long skirt are gored, and the back breadths are straight and gathered at the top. For the waist, cut of the material and lining from Figs. 14 and 15, Supplement, each two pieces, allowing an inch and three-quarters extra material on the front edges of Fig. 14; cut the back from Fig. 16, and the sleeves from Fig. 17, observing the contour of the under part of the sleeve. Baste the material on the lining, hem down the extra material on the front edge of the right front, and work the button-holes. At the front edge of the right front let the extra material form a fly, and run the lining and material together at the outer edge. Furnish the left front with buttons, sew up the darts, and join the waist according to the corresponding figures. Furnish the waist with short thin whalebones, and cord the upper and under edges. Sew up the sleeves from 27 to 28 and 29 to 30; form a narrow hem on the under edges in such a manner as to simulate a binding, and that the stitches may not show on the right side. Pleat the sleeve, bringing the two × 's on ● and 28 on 28. Fasten these pleats on the inside with a few stitches, and sew on a jet agrafe, as shown by the illustration. Pleat the upper edge of the sleeve, bringing × on ●, and sew it into the armholes, bringing 30 on 30 of the front. Belt of the material of the dress.

Fig. 3.—GROS GRAIN DRESS WITH CASHMERE SACQUE. The skirt of the dress is made plain. The plain high-necked waist and the coat sleeves are trimmed with folds of the material of the dress. The black cashmere sacque is lined with lustring, and trimmed with folds of black corded silk an inch and three-quarters wide, and passementerie buttons and agrafes. For the sacque, cut of the material, foundation interlining, and lustring lining from Figs. 18–20, Supplement, each two pieces, and the sleeves from Fig. 21. Baste the material on the lining, and then join the parts in such a manner that the edges of the seams shall come on the inside and be covered with the lining. At the outer edges of the sacque fell the material to the lining and cord the neck. Trim the sacque with folds as above described. The second fold must cover the seam made by sewing on the under fold, and the seam made by sewing on the upper fold is covered with a piping of gros grain. Sew up the

Fig. 1.—ALPACA DRESS WITH HIGH BASQUE-WAIST. For pattern see description.

Fig. 2.—POULT DE SOIE DRESS WITH HIGH WAIST. For pattern see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 14–17.

Fig. 3.—GROS GRAIN DRESS WITH CASHMERE SACQUE. For pattern see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 18–21.

Fig. 4.—CASHMERE DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST. For pattern see description.

Fig. 5.—SWISS MUSLIN DRESS WITH BLOUSE-WAIST.

COMMENCEMENT, CONFIRMATION, AND FIRST-COMMUNION DRESSES.

Digitized by Google

sleeves from 39 to 40, run the material together at the outer edges, trim them, and sew them into the corded armholes, bringing 40 on 40 of the front. Finish the sacque with buttons and cord loops.

Fig. 4.—CASHMERE DRESS WITH BASQUE-WAIST. The bottom of the skirt is trimmed with a flounce twelve inches wide; the seam made by sewing this on is covered with one box-pleated ruffle which is turned upward, and another which is turned downward; the seam made by sewing on the ruffles is covered with a fold of the material. The waist, which has a heart-shaped neck, and the sleeves are trimmed in a similar manner. Cut the basque-waist from Figs. 44–46 of No. XI., Supplement, but of the requisite size, and as shown by the illustration. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 54 of No. XIII., Supplement. Cap of white Swiss muslin. Veil of white tulle.

Fig. 5.—SWISS MUSLIN DRESS WITH BLOUSE-WAIST. The skirt is trimmed with six tucks of the material, each an inch and a quarter wide. The square-necked waist and the sleeves are also trimmed with folds. Chemisette of tucked Swiss muslin and lace. Bows of white gros grain ribbon. Cap of tulle and lace. Mechlin veil.

"HONORS."

See Illustration on page 252.

THERE are honors and honors, as our Gallic friends would say. Some are won on the tented field; others are achieved by the pen, which is, after all, indeed, mightier than the sword, since it generally guides the brute force of the latter; and others, again, by the brush, the chisel, or the silvery notes of the voice, as is the case with the fair débutante in our pretty picture, who seems in danger of being buried beneath the floral tributes which her cavalier is so eagerly gathering up. The fair singer has evidently taken her audience by storm. We can imagine the triumph of the moment, and how much it means to the young girl who, perhaps, but a few moments ago, trembled on the verge of the trial which was to decide her fortunes in the profession of her choice. The die is cast, and she has come off conqueror.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 22, 1871.

☞ Our next Number will contain an illustration, accompanied by a Cut Paper Pattern, of a stylish Lady's Short Sacque Walking Suit.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 255 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with numerous full-sized patterns and illustrations of Ladies' and Children's Spring and Summer Sacques, Talmas, Jackets, Basquines, Mantelets, Water-proof Cloaks, etc.; Ladies' and Misses' Spring and Summer Suits; Infants' Robes, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

☞ HARPER'S WEEKLY for April 15 contains the continuation of CHARLES READE'S new story,

A TERRIBLE TEMPTATION,

commenced in the Number for April 1.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of High Heels.

MY DEAR HELEN,—As we observe our fellow-travelers, and meditate their manners upon the great road, we have plenty of opportunity to see exactly how they are dressed. Indeed, dress is one of the profoundest of studies, if, as we are assured in "Sartor Resartus, or the Tailor sewed over," all appearance is but clothes. And I confess, my dear Helen, that I like to see every thing, even what seems to be the slightest and most unimportant fact, as you watch it steadily, gradually stretch itself out into infinite proportions and relations. A child throws a pebble into the air, and lo! the aerial undulations endlessly circling through space. Or a simple word is spoken, and whole lives and characters are affected to the furthest generation. Suppose Queen Elizabeth had said yes to the Duke of Anjou. Suppose Washington had said no to the invitation of the Continental Congress to the chief command. Or suppose that bright-eyed lady whose old portrait hangs in your father's dining-room had said no to your father's great-grandfather, would you and I be fellow-passengers upon the great journey, dear Helen?

As an old traveler, therefore, I find nothing too small to be regarded, and I have learned how large a part the picturesque details of costume play in the memory of travel. How much of Italy I saw, and still see, as I turn backward, in the dress of the Roman women beyond the Tiber! How much of Oriental life, of the Asian mystery, as Disraeli loftily calls it, I saw in the Eastern women! And how much of suggestion lies every where in every detail of the most familiar dress! The French, who used to be the chief authority upon that subject, said that a gentleman was determined by his gloves and boots. Perhaps a French gentleman is—or, more truly, a stroller upon the Paris boulevards. But there are a great many gentlemen who never wear gloves, and whose boots are far from beautiful. You see that the saying does not mean gentleman at all, except in a very limited and conventional sense. It is akin to the aphorism that an actress can go mad safely only in white satin. But a man who is well gloved and well booted is a pleasant object, if his mind is not apparently concentrated upon his hands and feet.

And what, my dear young lady, do you suppose to be the significance of the observation? Is it not the wisdom of caring for the extremities—of finishing conscientiously and symmetrically? There are statues upon cathedral pinnacles, beyond the ordinary reach of the eye, as finely wrought as if they were to stand in drawing-rooms; and there are ornaments carved upon temples, where they can be seen only at the risk of life, which are as exquisite as the most obvious and accessible decorations. This is the care of the extremities. The artists worked in deference to the great idea of beauty. They wrought for faith, not only for sight. And I distinctly remember that when I saw one of the carefully booted and gloved gentlemen upon the boulevard in Paris I thought of the Milan cathedral. It was one of the aerial undulations of the pebble tossed carelessly into the air.

And I was instructed in the same general way, by spiritual suggestion, when I saw you tripping along to church yesterday, my fair young friend. What do you suppose to be the most famous shoe in the world? Not the sandal of Empedocles, but the glass slipper of Cinderella. Do you suppose it had a heel? Do you suppose that when the Prince asked, "Who is this beautiful lady," Cinderella came hobbling in, as I saw you—forgive me, dear Miss Helen—hobbling to church? The fairy godmother, indeed, had high heels. I know that, for I have seen them in the picture. And witches have them; that I know because I have seen them in their portraits when they were riding upon broomsticks. But I have never fancied fairy godmothers and witches walking very steadily and gracefully. They hobble; and you, dear Helen, and all your young companions who wear high heels—you hobble also; you hobble horribly. And to hobble is to step uncertainly; so that, yesterday, if I had walked rapidly against you I really think that you would probably have fallen. Besides, you were forced to bend forward; you could not stand straight. Do you believe the Prince would have been so enraptured with the beautiful Cinderella if she could not hold herself upright, nor step firmly and securely? When Virgil makes the stately woman say incedo regina—I walk a queen—do you suppose that she hobbled and bent forward? And when Byron sang long ago of Lady Horton, who has only lately died, "She walks in beauty," did the poet or does any reader imagine such insecure and appealing figures as you and your friends present, my dear young lady?

To wear high heels, then, sweet traveler, is to hobble, to be insecure, and to be unable to stand erect. I know how pretty they look in the shop windows. They are delicately made and dextrously curved, and sharpen to such a point, and they are so red and bright! But what a price to pay for delicacy, and pretty curves, and high color! And then it is the fashion. Yes, it is the fashion, as patches and paint and powder have been the fashion. But were they not prodigiously foolish fashions? In Grand Cairo it is the fashion to hide all of the face but the eyes. You could submit to such a fashion, I know, dear Helen, and still dazzle like Apollo peering through cloud rifts. But how with Julia, whose beauty is her teeth? How about Lucilla, with her cheeks of shell? Will you submit to every fashion? I tremble to imagine your answer. I tremble to think that if patches should return—and why should they not?—you and your lovely companions would all surrender to the abominable suggestion of cutaneous disorder, which that fashion irresistibly suggests.

I am too old a traveler not to concede the great truth that fashion often vindicates itself. When I was younger I remember what fun we found in the pictures of the hooped women of Queen Anne's time; and what queer little toilette pincushions, seemingly representing a draped hogshead surmounted by a woman's shoulders and head, stood upon the dressing-tables. But when the draped hogsheads came into the drawing-room we did not laugh. It all seemed very proper; and I think that we should all laugh more heartily at your mother, my dear Helen, if she should appear in her bridal bonnet of thirty years ago, than we ever did at the pictures of the hooped ladies of Queen Anne. Every fashion gradually reconciles us to itself; but is it not always within certain limits? Would a fashion of making a hump upon one shoulder ever vindicate itself? or one of painting one cheek green and the other blue? Then there are limits; and when the fashion comes too near the verge, why not correct it? You, dear Helen, and your friends, dress as certain often very tasteless, and often very disreputable, persons ordain. If fashion required you to stoop insecurely forward when you walk, why not refuse? If you must wear heels, why have them so high that you can not stand erect? Certainly I would not have you make yourself ridiculous, and pain your friends, by deliberately rejecting the fashion. But I would only reasonably conform to it. That is the golden rule of manners—reasonable conformity.

Yet, as I watched you hobbling upon your high heels, dear young woman, I thought of many another who was doing the same, and even more absurdly. Indeed, when I had comfortably seated myself at Saint Rainbow's, and began to listen to the sermon of the young clergyman who had exchanged with the rector, I was irresistibly reminded of you and your heels. He began, as it were, walking naturally in what he was saying, upon the soles of his feet. But gradually he became more rhetorical. It was as if he were putting on flounce and ruffle and fringe, festooning his thought with the most grotesque and extravagant words, until he seemed to clap on a pair of the highest and reddest heeled shoes, and then his ideas began to waver and stagger and plunge; he could not hold his purpose erect, and the natural, simple, upright gait of his exhortation ended in a ridiculous hobble. If that young man would only refuse to let his rhetoric wear such high heels he would be a very effective preacher. And what are the red heels that Mrs. Palaver wears upon her shoes compared with those of her conversation? She comes to your house, and falls into the most vehement protestations of friendship and interest, as if she were the dearest of friends, although she has never given any sign whatever of real affection or sympathy, and, as you know, criticises you elsewhere in a very different strain. And this extravagance, this enthusiasm of the tongue, this profuse expense of superlatives, is merely a hobbling upon high heels. The little woman loses the uprightness of truth, and staggers and plunges in painful insecurity. Why will she not move calmly erect? Why will she not be honest?

So, dear Helen, I see, and you will see when the good day comes, how candidates for office, in their painful eagerness to conform to every popular wish and expectation, and to follow the utmost fashion of opinion, desert the simple uprightness of sincere conviction, and stoop and hobble to please the fashion. When a politician out-Herods Herod, as the saying is—that is to say, when he is more radical than radicalism, or more conservative than conservatism—he is as far from admirable as Venus would be hobbling upon red heels, instead of treading firmly and fully upon her feet. So a rhymester who exaggerates the mannerisms of a great poet loses his balance, and, instead of walking like a man, hobbles upon red heels, that he may be in the fashion. If he begins early his gait is wholly spoiled, and his movement is as graceless from the excess as his foot would be deformed by the pressure of an iron shoe. I could mention to you many and many a young man and young woman, Helen, who, caring less for grace than for the fashion of high heels, in literature, have pushed the fashion to so wild and foolish an excess that they limp instead of walk, and could no more run as the immortals do than they could fly.

When I saw you, therefore, tripping painfully and unhandsomely along, my dear young lady, I saw very many more persons than your own sweet self, and many other heels than those upon your trim little boots. And, indeed, how thin and unsatisfactory life would be if it were not so full of correspondences and suggestions! If a sign of "hot spiced rum" meant only an intoxicating drink in a cellar, a stroll through the city might be very saddening, but it would not be much else. And if, in the loitering figure covered with an advertisement as with a garment, which you see upon Broadway, you did not see all the other people in the city whose actions and lives are but a motley which they wear for advertisement, that figure would be little worth. Nor is it only the red heels upon which you and your friends hobble that I see when I watch you on the bright spring mornings fluttering to church; but as your sweet young faces turn toward me, smiling, I bare my head as I enter, and think that at the holy door I have seen the angelic choir.

Your fellow-traveler,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

A GOOD WORD FOR GOSSIP.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

SCANDAL, slander, gossip, tittle-tattle—hard names all. And rough usage dealers in such wares receive at the hands of the theorists. But are the little imps quite as black as they are painted?

Humanity, as it lies under our observation, exists in three layers. The first is the superficially polite and smiling one. The neighbors call on you, and you return their calls. You meet them in the street and at church. All is civility, kindness, and good-fellowship. That is layer number one.

Then you fail in business, your lover jilts you, you quarrel with your wife, your son is rusticated at college, and the whole world turns glad and malignant, and the air is darkened with the cloud of bad, false, harsh rumors. No wonder you failed in business! You have been living extravagantly these five years, with purple and fine linen and sumptuous fare, wine and equipage, endless entertainment, and a houseful of servants—for to such dimensions swells your modest ménage under the magnifying-glass of your excited neighbors. Your jilting lover has ever been a reluctant wooer; your wife you have abused since the first year of your marriage; and the trouble with your son is that he made himself vile and you restrained him not, and now he has killed a man, and is hiding from the authorities with a price set upon his head. This is layer number two; and you are ready to rent a lodge in some vast wilderness, where you may be free from the sight of a malicious, evil-speaking people, that rejoices in its neighbor's misfortunes.

But give your auger another twist, and you will have penetrated quite through this bed of mire, and come into another stratum, clean and wholesome, and purer and finer far than any thing you have yet found. When a trouble comes whose source can be never so faintly traced back to your own misdoing, your friends, it must be confessed, are a little hard on you. No wonder your wife left you; you have always been mean and tyrannical. No wonder your son has come to grief; you always gave him his own head. The gladness at your trouble was not pure malice, but somewhat an intellectual appreciation of the inexorableness of law. There is a sort of poetic justice in the succession of cause and consequence which never fails to give pleasure except to the persons who illustrate it. But let your son be brought home to you beaten by a burglar to the point of danger, if not death, be yourself stricken with illness, or let your property be endangered by a fire in the vicinity, and every hand is stretched out to help you. The very persons who would be the first to look askance upon your unwarranted expenditure will be instant, in season and out of season, for your solace and relief. They will run to fetch the doctor for you at any hour of the day or night. They will watch day after day by your sick-bed, will strain their ingenuity to invent some appetizing dish for your dulled taste, will count no service too severe, no drudgery too menial, to divest you of care, and enable you to give your whole thought and attention to the recovery of your health. When your house is threatened, they will exert every faculty to save it. They will put forth precisely as much effort to rescue your furniture from the flames as if it were their own; and when, after all, your house is stripped and not burned, they will come back next day, and replace your goods as heartily and as thoroughly as they snatched them off. Nor can you help a certain clutching at the throat, an unsteadiness about the mouth, a mist in the eyes, a pressure at the heart, when you think of this wonderful brotherhood of humanity—this unspoken, all-helpful sympathy. This is layer number three, and however deep down you go you will find nothing deeper to neutralize it.

We often freight words with a heavier meaning than they were meant to bear. We give to expressed disapprobation a disproportionate weight. We are always trying to repress gossip, and never to fortify society against it. We write stories showing how lovely woman was brought to her grave by careless rumor, but we never show how foolish it was in the lovely woman to make a grave matter of careless rumor. We are always training the tongue, but we never train the ear.

> "If you would always be discreet,
> Five things observe with care—
> Of whom you speak, to whom you speak,
> And how, and when, and where,"

says Sir Mentor, and fancies he has settled the whole matter; but, if it is all the same to you, Sir Mentor, we would a great deal rather not be discreet than pay such a price for discretion. Conversation would be a very lively and piquant exercise, picketed around with these five points of Calvinism! A far better way is to estimate gossip at its real worth. A great deal that passes for scandal is but an intellectual exercise, petty for want of something larger, but sufficiently innocent. Malice, willful falsehood, carelessness of truth, design to injure, are unmitigatedly bad, and ought to banish their proprietors from society; but curiosity—a fondness for story-telling and story-hearing—may be only one form of mental activity, and entirely consistent with great good-will. Let us give in to it with what grace we may—when we have guarded ourselves against it as far as we can. You do not in the least care how many handkerchiefs your neighbor has; but if it gratifies her to know how many you have, let her count them on the clothes-line if she likes. And if she thinks there are more than an economical person ought to have, and expresses her opinion in the vicinity, what harm is done? You need not fling it at her next time you see her, and make her uncomfortable. It is not necessary that every body should approve us in every respect before we can be on good terms with them. People may condemn half the traits of our character and yet find enough in the other half to insure friendly feeling and friendly demeanor.

And half a loaf is so much better than sour bread!

Digitized by Google

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

BONNETS.

BONNETS at the spring openings await comment. The milliners' parlors blossom like conservatories with every fresh lovely tint known to nature, and some that are added by art. What most attracts the observer is the difference in trimming from the style of last season. Now every thing is massed around the crown, and the front or head piece of pretty straw is frequently left bare, or perhaps softened by a narrow row of lace. The standing trimming around the crown makes the back of the bonnet quite as high as the front, instead of permitting it to recede, as was the style lately. The high rolled coronet is untrimmed on the outside, but is faced with silk and surmounted by a full ruche of tulle or lace, while a silk pleating, showing only the ends of the pleats, passes through the centre of the ruche. Deep capes, soft, without stiff lining, of doubled silk in box-pleats, fall over chatelaine braids. These bonnets are very becoming to young ladies.

A model especially attractive is of English split straw, with trimming of thick gros grain ribbon, in the stylish scarabee green, an ivy wreath, tiny white flowers, and scarlet buds. A shaded bonnet of cuir-colored straw, piped on the edge with darker brown, had a full pleated ruche of India silk, dark brown, with lighter centre around the crown; brown aigrette on the side; dark ostrich feather, and ribbon of two shades, drooping behind: $25. A sewed chip bonnet of purest white had a deep navy blue ribbon, forming a band around the crown, and holding erect a blue velvet pleating; large white rose with frost-browned leaves on the side; ruche of black lace in front: price $15. A Charlotte Corday cap with soft crown, high behind, and a coronet front, is of black dotted Brussels net. An ivy wreath with scarlet berries makes the face trimming, a scarlet Frou Frou gauze scarf entwines the crown; a pompon is on the left side; a lace fall and ribbon loops behind. Lovely bonnets of royal pink, or of mauve gauze, are draped all over with tulle of the same shade, and ornamented with ostrich tips. These are for full dress, and cost $35.

ROUND HATS.

A scarf of gauze, or of gros grain, is used for trimming round hats. One scarf end, wide and sloped bias, is pendent behind, instead of two, as was lately worn. A standard hat for city wear has a broad flat-topped crown with rolled brim, faced with black gros grain. A black Frou Frou gauze scarf two fingers wide, laid in many folds around the crown, is fringed, and pendent behind. A cluster of thick puffs of blue or rose silk is on the left side. Price $20. For the sea-side and country resorts are broad-brimmed Maud Muller hats, the brim having three pipings of black velvet; dark blue or brown scarfs around the crown, with blackberries, white flowers, and green-leaved sprays intermingled.

A Frenchy little hat, dented at the sides à la Watteau, is suitable for summer visiting in the country. A white organdy pleating, edged with Valenciennes, is laid under the brim. A wreath of blue daisies is around the crown. A Marie Stuart coiffure of organdy and lace, with rows of narrow black velvet ribbon above the lace, is laid on the crown, the point in front, and long scarfs of the same hang at the side. Blue gros grain ribbon bow on top of the crown, with ends behind. An elastic under the chatelaine for fastening.

GIRLS' WHITE DRESSES.

The furnishing houses are making many white dresses for young girls to wear at their confirmations, or when taking their first communion, or for commencement dresses. These are of muslin, either Swiss or nansook—organdy is too frail—and should be of creamy white, instead of that ugly bluish tinge seen in many white fabrics. To be in good taste, these dresses should be very simply made; but, alas! there are no more simple white muslins. Their fresh youthfulness is destroyed by overloading them with rich laces and elaborate embroidery that a dowager might envy. They would be far more appropriate if trimmed with the light airy puffs and ruffles of the material, or else pretty pleatings and groups of tucks. A lovely dress for a girl of twelve years, a pupil at the Convent of the Sacred Heart, is of Swiss muslin, with full, high-necked corsage fastened behind. The yoke and coat sleeves are puffs of Swiss, laundried to represent the marquise puffs, separated by Valenciennes insertion. The lower skirt has four narrow ruffles, gathered, overlapping, and edged with Valenciennes half an inch wide. The upper skirt is trimmed with puffs, insertion, and ruffles, and has bretelles of lace. A white sash, gloves, and either white or black kid boots, should be worn on such occasions. Tulle veils are often worn by communicants; but the most appropriate veil is of white organdy, fastened in the centre of the front, allowed to fall low on each side and behind, and held by a slender wreath of white flowers. Coronet wreaths, very high on top of the head, are not becoming to children. A delicate garland of the same size all around the head is far prettier. For cool seasons, before flannels have been removed, white alpaca dresses may be made exceedingly pretty for young girls. A charming model has two skirts, and a basque that fastens behind. The trimming is narrow bias gathered ruffles, the hem on the lower edge piped with a fold of the same. Three or four overlapping folds head the ruffles.

A commencement dress for a graduate will serve as a stylish model for many. It was of Swiss muslin—a demi-train with three flounces, each six inches wide, edged top and bottom with narrowest Valenciennes, and held in inch-wide box-pleats. The over-skirt, with very short rounded apron front, was originally as long as the train behind, but was shortened in a dressy way by a cluster of pleats in each of the three back seams; and a large Swiss bow, edged with lace, concealed these pleats. One ruffle, four inches wide, trimmed the over-skirt and basque. The basque, without lining, but worn over a richly trimmed corset cover, is deeply pointed back and front, short on the hips, with pointed neck, cut open very low, and the whole affair surrounded by a ruffle. Half-flowing sleeves with two ruffles, and a bow on the elbow. The pattern of the Postilion-Basque, illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. III., will answer for this. The garment should not be tight enough to strain the seams. The seams should be stitched by machine, trimmed very small, and overseamed.

The latest novelty is bretelles with a postilion-basque, made of Swiss muslin embroidery and Valenciennes, to wear with Swiss upper skirts over colored silk dresses for evening. The bretelles are wide on the shoulders, sloping narrower toward the waist, are crossed in front like a fichu, and are finished behind with a pretty square postilion-basque. A set of these, with a train and over-skirt, was made lately to wear over a rose-colored silk. The six gores of the upper skirt were arranged in a pretty design in Valenciennes and needle-work, with a medallion in the centre. Separate revers were added at the side to fasten back beneath the postilion. The price of the over dress alone was $350. The lace was of finest Valenciennes. Many ladies use the patent Valenciennes, that can scarcely be told from the real, and costs but a trifle in comparison. Laundresses iron Valenciennes laces smoothly on the right side, then turn them, lay them on a thickly folded blanket, and raise the figures by "punching" each figure separately with the smooth, round end of the fluting scissors. When the thick figures are raised the lace looks as well as when new; but the work is so tedious that from $10 to $20 is charged for doing up elaborately trimmed dresses.

Victoria and bishop's lawn costumes, to be worn in the house or street, will be made similar to the suit just described, but with shorter skirt. Loose paletots will not be so much worn as the tighter-fitting basques. Pretty little talma capes are shown with dotted Swiss muslin suits, made of the muslin, finished by an embroidered ruffle. Embroidered Swiss flounces trim lavender silk skirts; and a Swiss polonaise, also trimmed with embroidery, completes a suit for the watering-places. The hat and parasol should be of silk, covered with Swiss.

CORSETS.

Now that waspish waists are no longer admired, the plump, supple figures that fashion dictates require easy-fitting corsets, shaped to adapt themselves readily to the figure, and give the necessary support. To secure an accurate, and withal a stylish fit, the corset must have great fullness for the bust and hips, and ample length, both back and front, to fall in with the natural taper of the waist. The improved glove-fitting corsets possess these requisites, and are now preferred by most ladies to any other kind. They are filled with very flexible bones, and are moulded over steam, to show the beautiful roundness of the bust and hips. Their price has been the objection hitherto, but they are now made of substantial coutil, and sold at $1 50, in as good shape as the qualities that cost much more. There are ten qualities of these corsets. Handsome ones of fine coutil, with many thin, light bones, and prettily embroidered on the bone-cases, are $5. Ladies who are fond of wearing scarlet woolen corsets in winter will be pleased with the new pale rose-colored corsets, made of cotton coutil, for summer wear. Misses' corsets, in sizes ranging from sixteen to twenty-four inches, are made of white coutil, with the gores and graceful curved seams of the glove-fitting principle. The new ventilating corsets have the centre gore, that passes around the waist to stay the body and permit the strain, made of coutil, while the upper and lower gores are of open-worked material. A luxury for midsummer is the gossamer perfumed corset, made of perforated canvas, with the few elastic bones shielded by light corded goods. These corsets are put through an elaborate fumigating process, and those made a year ago retain their faint, pleasant odor. Price $2.

TOURNURES.

Spring costumes are so bouffant that some support must be given to hold them in place. Many ladies use crinoline skirts, with thickly pleated flounces down the back widths, and sometimes one or two narrow flounces extending around the bottom. New bustles are filled with an elastic sponge that is exceedingly light. These are of graceful shape, and afford a comfortable support to the skirts. La Victorieuse is the name given to a tournure with a few hoops below that are arranged to remain back of the wearer, and prevent the dress skirts from touching the heels.

GLOVES.

Long-wristed kid gloves without ornamental stitching are the first choice with ladies of taste and fashion. Those fastened by two or three buttons are worn with street toilettes; still longer gloves are for full dress. The spring tints for day wear are mode colors, tan, and wood shades. Fastened by two buttons, they cost $2 50 a pair. This is a reduction from the rates charged three months ago, yet it seems to many people too much money to give for a pair of gloves; but they are durable and prettily shaped, and it is not economy to buy low-priced gloves, made of poor material, badly sewed, and so illy proportioned that they make the best-shaped hands look deformed. White kid gloves for evening wear are fastened by four buttons, and cost $3 50. These require to be a size smaller than colored gloves; while black gloves, unless made of very elastic kid, should be a size larger.

HANDKERCHIEFS.

New handkerchiefs for dressy occasions have a two-inch hem, with a band of Valenciennes insertion inside the hem, and a medallion of Valenciennes in each corner. Large initial letters are needle-worked on muslin, and sold to be transferred to handkerchief corners, for marking them in an ornamental way.

NECK-TIES.

Neck-ties for spring are of soft twilled India silk, cut bias, and hemmed on the edges. The delicate fisherman's green and faintest sky blue are worn by blondes, pale rose and Frou Frou buff by brunettes. Striped silk ties, half-inch stripes of a color alternating with white, are new this season. Straight ties have knotted fringe at the ends, and are raveled on the sides also. The sailor knot is almost universally worn, bows being the unfashionable exception. Some pretty ties, to be worn with shaded suits, are of bias silk, of the lightest shade in the costume, bound with silk of the darkest shade. Any becoming color of silk, edged with narrow Valenciennes edging, makes a pretty tie to wear with black silk dresses. A pale blue, or else a blue-green tie, is worn by blondes with the plum-colored suits so fashionable this season, while brunettes wear pink, creamy buff, or tea-rose shades.

For information received thanks are due Mesdames PAGE; and FERRERO; and Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; and THOMSON, LANGDON, & Co.

PERSONAL.

MR. SAMPSON LOW, Jun., of the eminent London publishing firm of LOW, SON, & MARSTON, died on the 5th of March, at the house of his father, in Mecklenburg Square, at the age of forty-eight. Mr. Low was greatly respected by all who have had dealings with the publishing house of which he was long an active member. His book on the "Charities of London," which has run through many editions, has merits above those of a mere compilation. It was followed by a "Hand-book" to the Charities, from the same hand. Mr. Low was a benevolent and energetic man. He greatly contributed to the successful establishment of the metropolitan fire-escape system, which was, up to recent times, wholly supported by public subscriptions. He lived to see the recognition of the principle that the rescue of human life is as worthy of the attention of municipal authorities as the protection of property; but it was only after years of labor that that useful institution was brought to the high state of efficiency in which it was finally handed over, nearly four years since, to the Board of Works. The same mail that brings notice of the foregoing gives intelligence of the death of Mr. BLACKETT, the head of the well-known publishing firm, HURST & BLACKETT. Mr. BLACKETT, along with the late Mr. HURST, succeeded Mr. COLBURN rather more than eighteen years ago. As a man of business he was remarkable for intelligence and integrity; to authors he was liberal even to munificence; and his courtesy and kindness attracted the regard of all who came in contact with him.

—EMILE DE GIRARDIN proposes an immediate resumption of journalism in Paris. The name of his new journal will be L'Etoile.

—VERDI goes to Egypt, at the request of the Viceroy, to be present at and supervise the performance of ten of his operas. The best singers of Europe are to assist in the representations. The Viceroy "greases the wheels" of VERDI'S journey (with Verdi-gris, probably) to the tune of many thousands of shekels of gold. The eminent Egyptian don't know much of music, but the art tickles him.

—If it be possible for Mr. ALEXANDER T. STEWART to indulge in guffaw, it is open to conjecture that he did so the other day, when hearing that one of the cash-boys in his great dry-goodsery was asked by a lady, "Little boy, can you tell me whose store this is?"

—It is announced as one of those events that are to be reckoned among the epochs of 1871, that Miss NILSSON will, within the next four or five weeks, appear in opera at the Academy of Music.

—Chicago is a great city. Eighteen years ago it was a respectable village of forty thousand inhabitants. To-day its census foots up three hundred thousand souls. During these years it has raised the whole city out of the wet prairie from six to ten feet, and made basements possible; tunneled Lake Michigan, and brought pure water from the middle thereof; laid out a twenty-five mile drive through parks and boulevards all around the town; built double railways under a navigable river, the first instance of the kind on record; and accomplished various such little feats, quite as remarkable, and decidedly more useful, than the cleansing of the Augean stables and slaying of the Nemean lion, for which Hercules got such credit in ante-Chicagoan days. Good-natured Chicagoans kindly call New York the Chicago of the East. Certainly its great ladies' furnishing establishments of MAYHON, DALY, & Co., and FIELD, LEITER, & Co., rival our own STEWART'S. There are displayed acres of millinery goods, hundreds of styles of bonnets and hats, and a whole conservatory of artificial flowers, so that the ladies of the West have no difficulty in satisfying every caprice of fashion without having recourse to the East, except for Harper's Bazar.

—Recently there shuffled off this mortal coil, at Como, Signor PHILIP TAGLIONI, at the fully ripe age of ninety-three. He was the father of PAUL TAGLIONI, the ballet-master of Berlin.

—According to a Berlin correspondent, LOUISA MÜHLBACH, the novelist, is so inharmonious with her husband that they are about to separate on terms of the profoundest mutual satisfaction.

—The Rev. WILLIAM MORLEY PUNSHON, now on a tour to the Pacific coast to examine into the state of the Methodist work in British Columbia, has been nominated to succeed Mr. ARTHUR as President of the Wesleyan College at Belfast, Ireland.

—ALEXANDRE DUMAS was a man of notable pluck. He is said never to have read any thing he had written, declaring, if he had done so, he should have been certain to cast the MS. into the fire.

—BAYARD TAYLOR, having finished "Faust" and closed up his lecturing season, has within ten days past sent to market fresh cucumbers, so large that they fairly cucumbered the ground—grown, too, this season, at his country place at Kennett Square, Pennsylvania, without artificial heat, except such as may have been provoked by reading the Tribune.

—Ex-Judge GEORGE C. BARRETT, of the Common Pleas, an able lawyer and most industrious and cultured gentleman, is one of the best amateur actors in the country. Recently he has appeared at the private theatricals at the Union League theatre, the performances having added nearly a thousand dollars to the French relief fund.

—Marshal CANROBERT, the old rival of LOUIS NAPOLEON for the French Presidency, has made advances to President THIERS, which are said to have been well received.

—How very French are the Frenchmen! When ALEXANDRE DUMAS, père, died, he owed to his publishers, LÉVY BROTHERS, $100,000. This large sum his son offered to pay; but those flinty-hearted LÉVY BROTHERS declined, on the ground that they had made enough to warrant them to refuse to yield to the gushing impulse of that son, who, by that amiable maneuver, is half a million francs the richer.

—Hon. S. S. COX gracefully recognizes the propriety and utility of the competitive system by announcing to Mr. A. J. MATHEWSON, one of the trustees of the Ninth Ward School Board, that, being entitled to the appointment of a cadet at the United States Military Academy at West Point, and a naval cadet at the Naval Academy at Annapolis, Maryland, he has determined to bestow those appointments on the two lads from the public schools in his Congressional district who, in open examination, shall prove themselves best qualified for the places.

—Captain LOUIS LIVINGSTON, a gallant young American of good stock, has had the fortune to be promoted from the rank of Lieutenant to that of Captain in the King of Würtemberg's Cavalry Guard, "for personal courage, and important service in the presence of the enemy." He also had "honorable mention" in the "Orders of the Day" for gallantry at Woerth, Sedan, Champagney, Chatillon, and before Paris. He received the medal, so rarely accorded, for personal daring on the field of battle, and was decorated by the Emperor himself with the Iron Cross, the highest reward a German officer could obtain, for his conduct at Marigny and Villefort. He has also received swords and decorations of honor from the Grand Dukes of Baden and Oldenburg.

—Baron FREDERICK VON LOGAN, a German poet of the seventeenth century, is the author of the poem in which occur the oft-quoted lines:

> "Though the mills of God grind slowly, yet they grind exceeding small;
> Though with patience he stands waiting, with exactness grinds he all."

It may be found in LONGFELLOW'S "Retribution."

—M. MICHELET and his wife are thus described by one who has lately seen them: "The accomplished historian is an old white-haired man, about seventy-six years of age; has a markedly intellectual face, large hollow eyes, deeply sunken, but bright and penetrating; a small, somewhat bent figure, but with a great deal of dignity of bearing. He impresses one at once with a sense of great intellectual power and force. His conversation is serious and earnest, but at times he is sarcastic, and above all things 'fin,' that untranslatable word, and especially French gift. His voice is as the voice of many who have spoken much in public, somewhat slow and strongly accentuated, and at first it is unpleasant; but as he warms with his subject this passes away, and his tone is more even and natural. His wife, who looks young enough to be his daughter, is a fair, thoughtful-looking, pretty woman with a grand, dome-like forehead and regular features. She is eloquent and clever, and, under all the disadvantage of bad spirits and delicate health, must be, I should think, one of the most complete women I have ever had the good fortune of seeing. Great cultivation and great natural gifts have united to form a true woman—what praise can be loftier?"

—A gentleman who has peered into the drawers of the Literary Bureau at Boston, where engagements are made for lecturers, takes occasion to describe briefly the different styles of chirography of certain prominent literary folk. For instance, saith he, WENDELL PHILLIPS writes a peculiar hand. The words are connected frequently in couplets; lines short, leaving a broad margin; letters small and well-formed, and quite easily read. EDWARD E. HALE'S style is unique and attractive, neat and perfectly clear. An elegant and characteristic note was one from GEORGE WILLIAM CURTIS, written on nice unruled note-paper, in a style suggesting the culture and refinement of the writer. JAMES PARTON'S writing is open and perpendicular, in the style peculiar to literary men. A few lines from T. W. HIGGINSON show the finest and most delicate touches, indicative of the man's sensitive nature. JOHN S. C. ABBOTT traces letters as small, clear, and precise as a school-girl. The caligraphy of E. P. WHIPPLE is as clear and sharp as his critical mind. JOHN G. SAXE writes in a graceful and flowing style. Josh Billings writes a common business hand, fair and legible. The expression is less common; he thus addresses the Bureau, "My dear and sportive Gazelles." We extract this remembrance, "If you see the villains Twain and Nasby (the cannibal and the howling saint), remember me to them with a kiss of sympathy, and advise with them to retire from the lecturing field, and labor to become respectable." ANNA DICKINSON'S writing is odd and pretty, and is traced upon the best and heaviest note-paper, stamped with a rich, plain initial. Grace Greenwood's chirography is very peculiar. It is a running hand, with long, horizontal lines, and, singularly too, is very legible. OLIVE LOGAN writes upon the smallest note-paper, in a rapid running hand, tolerably plain. SUSAN B. ANTHONY'S writing is free and bold, legible, but devoid of grace. Gail Hamilton's hand is pleasant to see—round, full, and even—every line could well head school writing-books, so well-formed and destitute of flourish is every letter.

Digitized by Google

Tapestry Stitches for Slippers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—This tapestry stitch forms alternate foundation figures, which are worked diagonally over eight lengthwise and eight crosswise threads of the canvas with corn-colored filling silk. For each foundation figure work three long stitches, and catch these together at the middle with a cross stitch, as shown by the illustration; for this cross stitch work, first, the horizontal and then the vertical stitch, each over four threads of the canvas. Fill out the empty space between the foundation figures with cross stitch worked with maroon zephyr worsted. The foundation figures may be worked last, as the silk often becomes roughened by being drawn through the filling; in this case the spaces for the foundation figures must be left open, which is readily done by studying the illustration.

Fig. 2.—This tapestry stitch forms alternate foundation figures, which are worked with light green zephyr worsted, and repeated at regular intervals; between the figures the foundation is filled out with cross stitch worked with dark green worsted. The figures are worked with a double thread, and consist of four long stitches, which are interwoven in the manner shown by the illustration. If preferred, the figures may be worked first and then the filling, or the reverse.

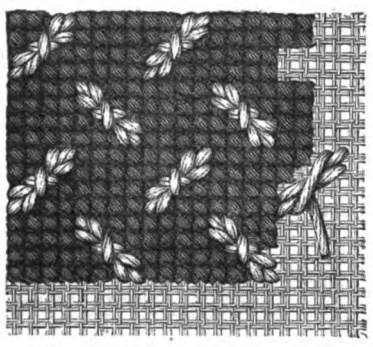

Fig. 1.—TAPESTRY STITCH FOR SLIPPERS, ETC.

Tatted and Crochet Rosette for Lingerie, etc.

To make this rosette work, first, the tatted ring in the middle with fine tatting cotton. This ring consists of 1 ds. (double stitch), nine times alternately 1 p. (picot), 2 ds., then 1 p., 1 ds. Close the stitches in a ring, fasten the beginning and end of the thread together, and cut it off. On the p. of the ring work with fine crochet cotton as follows: 1st round.—Two leaflets divided by 6 ch. (chain stitch) on each p.; each leaflet consists of 3 stc. (short treble crochet), which are not worked off separately, but as 1 st. After each second following leaflet 1 p., consisting of 5 ch. and 1 sc. (single crochet) in the first of these. At the end of the round fasten to the first leaflet with 1 sl. (slip stitch), and, going backward, work 2 sl. on the first 2 st. of the p. previously worked. 2d round.—1 sc. on the p. just referred to, then always alternately 8 ch., 2 sc. divided by 5 ch. on the following p. This completes the rosette.

EMBROIDERED CLOTHES-BAG.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. X., Fig. 43.

Embroidered Clothes-Bag.

THE under part of this clothes-bag is of gray linen drilling, embroidered with red worsted braid. To the inside of this sew a netted bag worked with red double zephyr worsted. Red worsted cord and tassels complete the bag. For the under part of the bag cut of gray drilling from Fig. 43, Supplement, five parts. Join all these parts from * to *, then embroider in the design given by the pattern, and bind the outer edge with red worsted braid two-fifths of an inch wide. Begin the netted bag at the under edge with a foundation of 90 st. (stitches), which must be worked with the double zephyr over a mesh four-fifths of an inch in diameter. Close this foundation in a ring, and on it work 55 rounds without changing the number of stitches. In connection with the last round work six netted points; work the first round of the first point on the first 15 st. of the 55th round. At the end of this and every following round of the point narrow 1 st. by working 2 st. together with 1 st. Having formed a point in this manner, the last round of which counts but 2 st., work the latter together with one knot (but without forming a new st.), and cut off the thread. In this manner work each of the points on 15 st. of the 55th round. Then turn six inches and a half of the upper pointed edge of the bag over to the right side, and pass two red worsted cords through two rounds of the netting near the top of the bag; pass the cords through the double layer of netting, and finish the ends with tassels. Finish each point with a red worsted ball. Through the foundation st. of the under edge of the bag pass a covered steel band twenty-six inches and a half long, and join the ends of the band, letting them overlap each other two-fifths of an inch. Finally, sew the netted bag into the drilling part, bringing the steel band half an inch below * of every seam. Join the opposite corners of the drilling tabs by means of red worsted cords finished with tassels. Trim the bottom of the bag with a red worsted ball and two worsted tassels (see illustration). Cover the heads of the tassels with a netted part of red wool, and finish the upper and under edges of the heads with a ring of crocheted loops of red worsted.

TATTED AND CROCHET ROSETTE FOR LINGERIE, ETC.

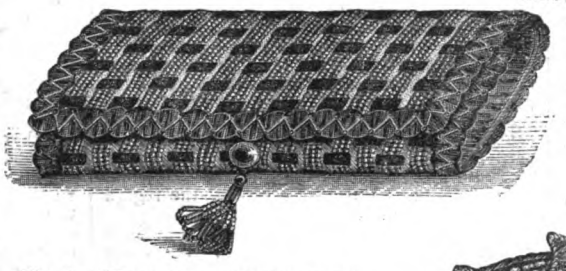

Fig. 1.—WORK-BAG TRIMMED WITH VELVET AND BEADS.—CLOSED.

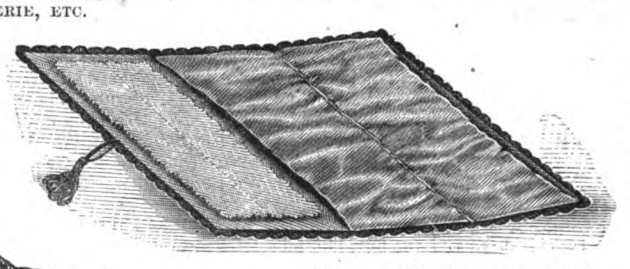

Fig. 2.—WORK-BAG TRIMMED WITH VELVET AND BEADS. OPEN.

Work-Bag trimmed with Velvet and Beads, Figs. 1-3.

THIS work-bag, which is designed to hold small articles of needle-work, is trimmed with steel beads, black velvet ribbon half an inch wide, a ruche of black satin ribbon, steel bugles, and small steel beads. Take a piece of silver perforated board eight inches and four-fifths long and five inches and three-fifths wide, and ornament it with the velvet ribbon and steel beads. To do this cut vertical slits two-fifths of an inch long in the perforated board two-fifths of an inch from one crosswise edge of the piece, repeating these slits at intervals of two-fifths of an inch. Make a similar row of slits at a distance of one-tenth of an inch from the first row. Cut the slits very carefully, so that the perforated board may not come apart. Run the velvet ribbon through the slits in the manner shown by Fig. 3, which shows a full-sized section of the ornamented perforated board. Between the velvet ribbon ornament the foundation with steel beads. Having trimmed the foundation, line it with thin card-board and gray silk. Sew on two pockets of gray silk as shown by the illustration. These pockets are made of a piece of silk nine inches and three-fifths long and six inches and two-fifths wide. Each lengthwise edge of this piece is furnished with a narrow hem and an elastic tape six inches and four-fifths long. Sew this piece on the perforated board along the middle and the crosswise edges (see Fig. 2, which shows the bag open). On the still free part of the perforated board sew a piece of pinked flannel designed to hold needles. Trim the outer edge of the bag with the satin ruche, which must be ornamented with steel beads, as shown by Fig. 1. Furnish the bag with a metal button and an elastic loop for closing it. Finish the loop with a small bead tassel.

EMBROIDERED NEEDLE-BOOK.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XXIII., Fig. 91.

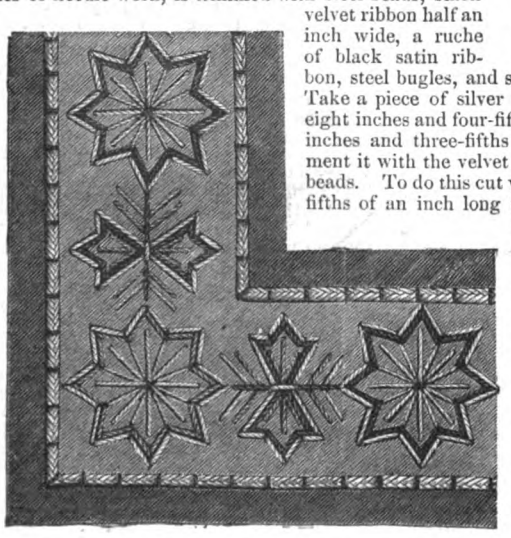

Fig. 1.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC.

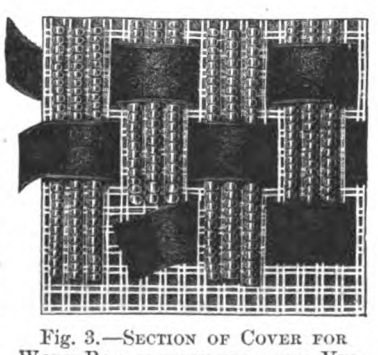

Fig. 3.—SECTION OF COVER FOR WORK-BAG ORNAMENTED WITH VELVET AND BEADS.—FULL SIZE.

Embroidered Needle-Book.

To make this needle-book four round pieces of card-board, each two inches and four-fifths in diameter, are required. Cover three of these parts smoothly on one side with green cashmere. Furnish the fourth part on one side with a cushion stuffed with cotton, and cover the cushion smoothly with green cashmere, which must previously have been ornamented with satin stitch embroidery worked with green saddler's silk or silk twist, and simulating thorns. (For the present take no notice of the button-hole stitches and the points on the outer edge.) Then join this part with one of the other parts in such a manner as to let the uncovered sides come on the inside, and the parts come exactly on each other. In the same manner join the two other pieces of card-board, and surround the outer edge with green silk cord. Surround the outer edge of the part with the cushion with fine bonnet wire, which must be bent in loops two-fifths of an inch long, at irregular intervals, in order to form the projecting points. Work over these loops with green saddler's silk, giving the ends a slightly pointed shape, and then work button-hole stitches on the outer edge of the cushion and the points in order to cover the wire. Sew a brass ring, an inch and a fifth in circumference, which is closely covered with single crochet worked with green saddler's silk, on the cushion two-fifths of an inch from the outer edge. Having thus far completed the outside of the cushion, cut three round pieces of white flannel each two inches and two-fifths in diameter, button-hole stitch the outer edge of each part, which must come far apart, and be worked with green silk, and place these parts between the two outside parts of the cushion. Then punch a hole through the outer and inner parts of the needle-book with an eyelet piercer, passing the latter through the ring; through the hole thus formed run a piece of green silk, and sew the ends together close to the outer edge of the needle-book; these ends must project three inches and a quarter beyond the outer edge, and be furnished with a wire of the same length, and closely wound with green saddler's silk, so as to form the stem shown by the illustration. In doing this sew in at the same time two leaves, which must be cut of thin card-board and green cloth from Fig. 91, Supplement. Work the veins on the upper layer of cloth in diagonal half-polka stitch with green saddler's silk according to the pattern and illustration, and join the cloth parts over the card-board insertion with button-hole stitches. Finally, fasten the leaves to the needle-book with a few stitches, as shown by the illustration.

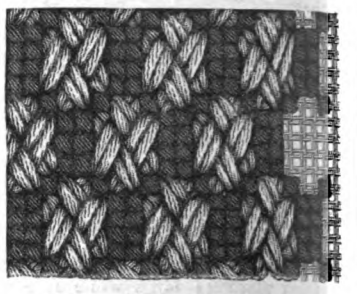

Fig. 2.—TAPESTRY STITCH FOR SLIPPERS, ETC.

Corners of Borders for Cushions, Covers, etc., Figs. 1 and 2.

Fig. 1.—The foundation of this border is of dark gray cashmere; a light gray cashmere piece is set on the foundation. Cover the seam made by doing this with gilt soutache. Work the point Russe embroidery with three shades of violet silk.

Fig. 2.—For this border set a piece of light brown cloth on a foundation of dark brown cloth, and cover the seam made by doing this with gilt soutache. The small foundation figures are worked with orange-colored saddler's silk, the dots with blue silk, and the button-hole stitches along the soutache with brown saddler's silk. The scalloped lines of the design are worked with red and black saddler's silk in diagonal half-polka stitch.

PRIVILEGED PERSONS.

WE all number among our acquaintances certain privileged persons—people who make their own laws without regard to the received canons of society, and who claim exemption from some of the moral and most of the conventional obligations that are considered binding on others. The privileged person may be male or female, but is more often the latter, sundry restraining influences keeping men in check which are inoperative with women. Women, indeed, when they choose to fall out of the ranks and follow an independent path of their own, care very little for any influences at all, the restraining power which will keep them in line being yet an unknown quantity. As a woman, then, we will first deal with the privileged person.

One embodiment of the privileged person is she whose forte lies in saying unpleasant things with praiseworthy coolness. She aims at a reputation for smartness or for honesty, according to the character of her intellect, and she uses what she gets without stint or sparing. If she is clever, she is noted for her sarcastic speeches and epigrammatic brilliancy; and her mots are bandied about

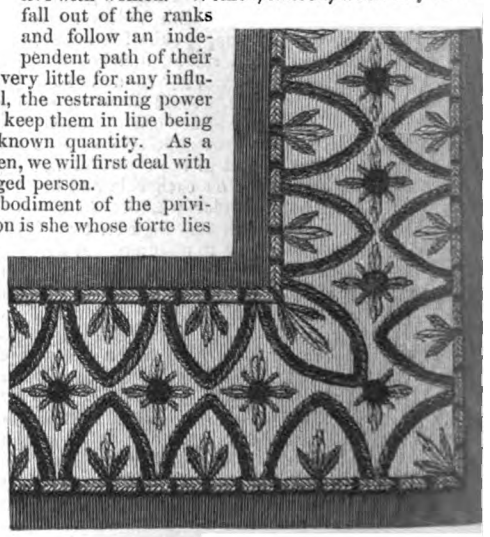

Fig. 2.—CORNER OF BORDER FOR CUSHIONS, COVERS, ETC.

Digitized by Google

from one to the other of her friends, with an uneasy sense, however, in the laughter they excite; for every one feels that he who laughs to-day may have cause to wince to-morrow, and that dancing on one's own grave is by no means an exhilarating exercise. No one is safe with her—not even her nearest and dearest; and she does not care how deeply she wounds when she is about it. But her victims rarely retaliate, which is the oddest part of the business. They resign themselves meekly enough to the scalpel, and comfort themselves with the reflection that it is only pretty Fanny's way, and that she is known to all the world as a privileged person, who may say what she likes. It falls hard, though, on the uninitiated and sensitive when they are first introduced to a privileged person with a talent for saying smart things, and no pity to speak of. Perhaps they have learned their manners too well to retort in kind, if even they are able, and so feel themselves constrained to bear the unexpected smart as the Spartan boy bore his fox. One sees them at times endure their humiliation before folk with a courageous kind of stoicism which would do honor to a better cause. Perhaps they are too much taken aback to be able to marshal their wits for a serviceable counter-thrust; all they can do is to look confused and feel angry. But sometimes, if seldom, the privileged person with a talent for sarcastic sayings meets with her match, and gets paid off in her own coin, which greatly offends her, while it rejoices those of her friends who have suffered many things at her hands before. If she is rude in a more sledge-hammer kind of way—rude through what it pleases her to call honesty and the privilege of speaking her mind—her attacks are easier to meet, as being more openly made and less dependent on quickness or subtilty of intellect to parry. Sometimes, indeed, by their very coarseness they defeat themselves. When a woman of this kind says in a loud voice, as her final argument in a discussion, "Then you must be a fool," as we have known a woman tell her hostess, she has blunted her own weapon and armed her opponent. All her privileges can not change the essential constitution of things; and rudeness being the boomerang of the drawing-room, which returns on the head of the thrower, the privileged person who prides herself on her honesty, and who is not too squeamish as to its use, finds herself discomfited by the very silence and forbearance of her victim. In either case, however, whether using the rapier or the sledge-hammer, the person privileged in speech is partly a nuisance and partly a stirrer-up of society. People gather round to hear her when she has grappled with a victim worthy of her steel, and is using it with effect. Yet, unless her social status is such that she can command a following by reason of the flunkeyism inherent in human nature, she is sure to find herself dropped before her appointed end has come. People get afraid of her ill nature for themselves, and tired of hearing the same things repeated of others; for even a clever woman has her intellectual limits, and is forced after a time to double back on herself and reopen the old workings. It is all very well, people think, to read sharp satires on society in the abstract, and to fit the cap as one likes. Even if it fits one's self one can bear the fool's crown with some small degree of equanimity, in the hope that others will not discover the fact; but when it comes to a hand-to-hand attack, with by-standers to witness, and one's self reduced to an ignominious silence, it is another matter altogether; and however sparkling the gifts of one's privileged friend, one would rather not put one's self in the way of their exercise. So she is gradually shunned till she is finally abandoned—what was once the clever impertinence of a pretty person, or the frank insolence of a cherubic hoyden, having turned by time into the acrid humor of a grim female, who keeps no terms with any one, and with whom, therefore, no terms can be kept. The pretty person given to smart sayings with a sting in them, and the hoyden who allows herself the use of the weapon of honesty, would do well to ponder on the inevitable end, when the only real patent of their privileges has run out, and they have no longer youth and beauty to plead in condonation for their bad breeding.

JACKET WITH BRETELLES.—BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 86-90.

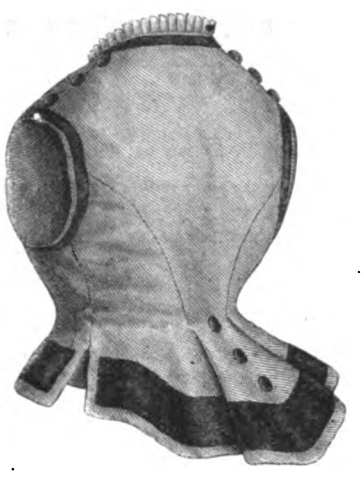
JACKET WITH BRETELLES.—FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXII., Figs. 86-90.

Another exercise of peculiar privilege is to be found in the matter of flirting. Some women are able to flirt with impunity to an extent which would simply destroy any one else. They flirt with the most delicious frankness, yet for all practical purposes keep their place in society undisturbed, and their repute intact. They have the art of making the best of two worlds, the secret of which is all their own, yet which causes the weak to stumble and the rash to fall. They ride on two horses at once, with a skill as consummate as their daring; but the feeble sisters who follow after them slip down between, and come to grief and public disaster as their reward. It is in vain to try to analyze the terms on which this kind of privilege is founded. Say that one pretty person takes the tone of universal relationship—that she has an illimitable fund of sisterliness always at command for a host of "dear boys" of her own age, or, when a little older, and drawing near to the borders of mature sirenhood, that she is a kind of œcumenical aunt to a large congregation of well-looking nephews—she may steer safely through the shallows of this dangerous coast, and land at last on the terra firma of respected old age; but let another try it, and she goes to the bottom like a stone. And yet the first has pushed her privileges as far as they will go, while the second has only played with hers; but the one comes triumphantly into port with all colors flying, and the other makes shipwreck, and is lost. And why the one escapes and the other goes down is a mystery given to no one to fathom. But so it is; and every student of society is aware of this strange elasticity of privilege with certain pretty friends, and must have more than once wondered at Mrs. Grundy's leniency to the flagrant sinner on the right side of the square, coupled with her severity to the lesser naughtiness on the left. The flirting form of privilege is the most partial in its limitations of all, and things which one fair patentee may do with impunity, retaining her garlands, will cause another to be chastised with scorpions; and no one knows why or how the difference is made.

Another self-granted privilege is the license some give themselves in the way of taking liberties, and the boldness with which they force your barriers. Indeed, there is no barrier that can stand against these resolute invaders. You are not at home, say, to all the world, but the privileged person is sure you will see him or her, and forthwith mounts your stairs with a cheerful conscience, carrying his welcome with him—so he says. Admitted into your penetralia, the privileges of this bold sect increase, being of the same order as the traditional ell on the grant of the inch. They drop in at all times, and are never troubled with modest doubts. They elect themselves your "casuals," for whom you are supposed to have always a place at your table, and you are obliged to invite them into the dining-room when the servant sounds the gong, and the roast mutton makes itself evident. They hear you are giving an evening, and they tell you they will come, uninvited, taking it for granted that you intended to ask them, and would have been sorry if you had forgotten. They tack themselves on to your party at a fête, and air their privileges in public, when the man whom of all others you would like best for a son-in-law is hovering about, kept at bay by the privileged person's familiar manner toward yourself and your daughter. Your friend would laugh at you if you hinted to him that he might by chance be misinterpreted. He argues that every one knows him and his ways, and acts as if he held a talisman by which the truth could be read through the thickest veil of appearances. It would be well sometimes if he had this talisman, for his familiarity is a bewildering kind of thing to strangers on their first introduction to a house where he has privileges; and it takes time and some misapprehension before it is rightly understood. You do not know how to catalogue this man who is so wonderfully at ease with your new friends. You know that he is not a relation, and yet he acts as one bound by the closest ties; the girls are no longer children, but his manner toward them would be a little too familiar if they were half a dozen years younger than they are; and you come at last to the conclusion that the father owes him money, and that he is therefore master of the situation, and beyond the reach of rebuke. All things considered, this kind of privilege is dangerous, and to be carefully avoided by parents and guardians. Indeed, every form of this patent is dangerous, the chances being that, sooner or later, familiarity will degenerate into contempt, and a bitter rupture take the place of the former excessive intimacy.

CASHMERE JACKET WITH VELVET TRIMMING.—FRONT.
For description see Supplement.

VELVET PALETOT WITH GUIPURE TRIMMING.
For description see Supplement.



CASHMERE JACKET WITH VELVET TRIMMING.—BACK.
For description see Supplement.

CASHMERE SLEEVELESS JACKET. BACK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 65 and 66.

CASHMERE SLEEVELESS JACKET. FRONT.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Figs. 65 and 66.

CASHMERE JACKET.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Figs. 61-64.

The neglect of all ordinary social observances is another reading of the patent of privilege which certain people grant themselves. These are the people who never return your calls, who do not think themselves obliged to answer your invitations, who do not keep their appointments, and who forget their promises. It is useless to reproach them, to expect from them the grace of punctuality, the politeness of a reply, or the faintest stirrings of a social conscience in any thing. They are privileged to the observance of a general neglect, and you must make your account with them as they are. If they are good-natured they will spend much time and energy in framing apologies that may or may not tell. If women, and graceful, and liking to be liked without taking much trouble about it, they will profess a thousand sorrows and shames the next time they see you, and play the pretty hypocrite with more or less success. You must not mind what they do, they say pleadingly; no one does; they are such notoriously bad callers no one ever expects them to pay visits like other people; or they are so lazy about writing, please don't mind if they don't

BLACK VELVET TALMA.
For description see Supplement.

CASHMERE TALMA.
For description see Supplement.

Digitized by Google

answer your letters, or even your invitations; they don't mean to be rude, only they don't like writing; or they are so dreadfully busy they can not do half they ought, and are obliged sometimes to break their engagements, and so on. And you, probably for the twentieth time, accept excuses which mean nothing but "I am a privileged person," and go on again as before, hoping for better things against all the lessons of past experience. How can you do otherwise with that charming face looking so sweetly into yours, and the coquettish little hypocrisies played off for your benefit? If that charming face were old or ugly, things would be different; but so long as women possess la beauté du diable, men can do nothing but treat them as angels.

And so we come round to the root of the matter once more. The privileged person, whose patent society has indorsed, must be young, pretty, charming, and a woman. Failing these conditions, she is a mere adventuress, whose discomfiture is not far off; with these, her patent will last just as long as they do. And when they have gone, she will degenerate into a "horror," at whom the bold will laugh, the timid tremble, and whose company the wise will avoid as too unpleasant to be borne.

THE LITTLE WHITE LIE.

I WAS in trouble, beyond any doubt—
I was in trouble—and how to get out?
"Tell a little white lie," said the Devil to me.
"Tell a lie! oh, how dreadful! But what would it be
If I should? though I never shall tell one," said I.
"Don't be frightened," said he; "we won't call it a lie—
A few words in their way quite as good as the truth,
And, for this one occasion, far better, forsooth."

But my little white lie, when I'd told it, grew black!
Then, oh! how could I hide it, or how get it back?
For it never would do to be caught in a lie,
For 'twas known that a very good woman was I.
I must manage in some way to keep it from sight:
"Tell one more," said the Devil; "'twill make it all right."

But my two grew to three, and my three were soon four,
And my four lies gave rise to a dozen or more;
Till I felt in my soul such a sense of disgrace
I had scarcely one friend I dared look in the face;
And at night to my room I went creeping up stairs—
God is Truth! could I sleep without saying my prayers?

By my fears and my conscience thus followed about,
I was really half glad when the lie was found out;
For it was—it is always the way with a lie—
And all said that a very bad woman was I.
Good or bad, I have learned in one thing to be wise,
And shall shun in the future all little white lies.

THE LOVELS OF ARDEN.

BY MISS BRADDON,

AUTHOR OF "LADY AUDLEY'S SECRET," ETC.

CHAPTER V.

AT HALE CASTLE.

MR. LOVEL gave his daughter twenty pounds, a stretch of liberality which did not a little astonish her. She was very grateful for this unexpected kindness; and her father was fain to submit to be kissed and praised for his goodness more than was entirely agreeable to him. But he had been kinder to her ever since Lady Laura's visit, and her heart was very light under that genial influence. She thought he was beginning to love her, and that belief made her unspeakably happy.

Nor was there any thing but unqualified pleasure for her in the possession of twenty pounds, the largest sum she had ever had at her disposal. Although the solitude of her life and the troubles that overshadowed it had made her thoughtful beyond her years, she was still young enough to be able to put aside all thought and to live in the present. It was very pleasant to go into Holborough, with those four crisp new five-pound notes in her purse, to ask her aunt's advice about her purchases. Mrs. Oliver was enraptured to hear of the visit to the Castle, but naturally a little despondent about the circumstances under which the visit was to be paid. That Clarissa should go to Lady Laura's without a maid was eminently distressing to her aunt.

"I really think you ought to take Peters," Mrs. Oliver said, meditatively. "She is a most reliable person; and, of course, nobody need know that she is not your own maid. I can fully rely upon her discretion for not breathing a word upon the subject to any of the castle servants."

Peters was a prim middle-aged spinster, with a small waist and a painfully erect figure, who combined the office of parlor-maid at the Rectory with that of personal attendant upon the rector's wife—a person whom Clarissa had always regarded with a kind of awe—a lynx-eyed woman, who could see at a glance the merest hint of a stray hair-pin in a massive coil of plaits, or the minutest edge of a muslin petticoat visible below the hem of a dress.

"Oh no, aunt; please don't think of such a thing!" the girl cried, eagerly. "I could not go with a borrowed servant, and I don't want a maid at all; I am used to do every thing for myself. Besides, Lady Laura did not ask me to bring a maid."

"She would take that for granted. She would never expect Mr. Lovel's daughter to travel without a maid."

"But papa told her how poor he was."

"Very unnecessary, and very bad taste on his part, I think. But, of course, she would not suppose him to be too poor to maintain a proper establishment in a small way. People of that kind only understand poverty in the broadest sense."

Mrs. Oliver consented to forego the idea of sending Peters to the Castle with a regretful sigh; and then the two ladies went out shopping—Clarissa in high spirits, her aunt depressed by a conviction that she would not make her first entrance into society with the surroundings that befitted a Lovel of Arden Court.

There seemed so many things indispensable for this all-important visit. The twenty pounds were nearly gone by the time Miss Lovel's shopping was finished. A white muslin dress for ordinary occasions, some white gauzy fabric for a more important toilette, a golden brown silk walking or dinner dress, a white areophane bonnet, a gray straw hat and feather, gloves, boots, slippers, and a heap of small details. Considerable management and discretion were required to make the twenty pounds go far enough; but Mrs. Oliver finished her list triumphantly, leaving one bright golden sovereign in Clarissa's purse. She gave the girl two more sovereigns at parting with her.

"You will want as much as that for the servants when you are coming away, Clary," she said, imperatively, as Clarissa protested against this gift. "I don't suppose you will be called upon to spend a shilling for any thing else during your visit, unless there should happen to be a charity sermon while you are at Hale. In that case, pray don't put less than half a crown in the plate. Those things are noticed so much. And now, good-by, my dear. I don't suppose I shall see you again between this and Tuesday. Miss Mallow will come to you to try on the day after to-morrow at one o'clock, remember; be sure you are at home. She will have hard work to get your things ready in time; but I shall look in upon her once or twice to keep her up to the mark. Pray do your best to secure Lady Laura's friendship. Such an acquaintance as that is all-important to a girl in your position."

Tuesday came very quickly, as it seemed to Clarissa, who grew a little nervous about this visit among strangers in a great, strange house, as it came nearer. She had seen the outside of the Castle very often: a vast feudal pile of building it seemed, seen across the bright river that flowed beneath its outward wall—a little darksome and gloomy at the best, Clarissa had thought, and something too grand to make a pleasant habitation. She had never seen the inner quadrangle, in all its splendor of modern restoration—sparkling freestone, fresh from the mason's chisel; Gothic windows, glowing with rare stained glass; and the broad, fertile gardens, with their terraces and banks of flowers, crowded together to make a feast of color, sloping down to the setting sun.

It was still the same bright midsummer weather—a blue sky without a cloud, a look upon earth and heaven as if there would never be rain again, or any thing but this glow and glory of summer. At eleven o'clock the carriage came from the Castle; Clarissa's trunks and traveling-bag were accommodated somehow; and the girl bade her father good-by.

"I dare say I shall be asked to dinner while you are there," he said, as they were parting, "and I may possibly come; I shall be curious to see how you get on."

"Oh, pray do come, papa; I'm sure it will do you good."

And then she kissed him affectionately, emboldened by that softer manner which he had shown toward her lately; and the carriage drove off. A beautiful drive past fertile fields, far stretching toward that bright river, which wound its sinuous way through all this part of the country; past woods that shut in both sides of the road with a solemn gloom even at midday—woods athwart which one caught here and there a distant glimpse of some noble old mansion lying remote within the green girdle of a park.

It was something less than an hour's drive from Arden to Hale: the village church clock and a great clock in the Castle stables were both striking twelve as the carriage drove under a massive stone arch, above which the portcullis still hung grimly. It was something like going into a prison, Clarissa thought; but she had scarcely time for the reflection, when the carriage swept round a curve in the smooth gravel road, and she saw the sunny western front of the Castle, glorious in all its brightness of summer flowers, and with a tall fountain leaping and sparkling up toward the blue sky.

She gave a little cry of rapture at sight of so much brightness and beauty, coming upon her all at once with a glad surprise. There were no human creatures visible; only the glory of fountain and flowers. It might have been the palace of the Sleeping Beauty, deep in the heart of the woodlands, for any evidence to the contrary perceptible to Clarissa in this drowsy noontide; but presently, as the carriage drove up to the hall door, a dog barked, and then a sumptuous lackey appeared, and anon another, who, between them, took Miss Lovel's traveling-bag and parasol, prior to escorting her to some apartment, leaving the heavier luggage to meaner hands.

"The saloon, or my lady's own room, miss?" one of the grandiose creatures demanded, languidly.

"I would rather see Lady Laura alone at first, if you please."

The man bowed, and conducted her up a broad staircase lined with darksome pictures of battles by land and sea, along a crimson-carpeted corridor where there were many doors, to one particular portal at the southern end. He opened this with a lofty air, and announced "Miss Lovel."

It was a very large room—all the rooms in this newly restored part of the Castle were large and lofty (a great deal of the so-called "restoration" had, indeed, been building, and many of these splendid rooms were new, newer even than the wealth of Frederick Armstrong)—a large room, exquisitely furnished with chairs and tables and cabinets of satin and sandal wood, with oval medallions of pale blue Wedgwood let into the panelled doors of the cabinet, and a narrow beading of lustreless gold here and there; a room with pale blue silken hangings, and a carpet of white wood-anemones scattered on a turquoise-colored ground. There were no pictures; art was represented only by a few choice bronzes and a pair of matchless Venetian mirrors.

Lady Laura was busy at a writing-table, filling in the blanks in some notes of invitation. She was always busy. On one table there were an easel and the appliances of illumination—a rare old parchment Missal lying open, and my lady's copy of a florid initial close beside it. On a small reading-desk there was an open Tasso with a couple of Italian dictionaries near at hand. Lady Laura had a taste for languages, and was fond of reviving her acquaintance with foreign classics. She was really the most indefatigable of women. It was a pity, perhaps, that her numerous accomplishments and her multifarious duties toward society at large left her so very little leisure to bestow upon her own children; but then they had their foreign governesses and maids—there was one poor English drudge, by-the-way, who seemed like a stranger in a far land—gifted in many tongues, and began to imbibe knowledge from their cradles. To their young imaginations the nursery wing of Hale Castle must have seemed remarkably like the Tower of Babel.

The lady of the Castle laid down her pen and received Clarissa with warm affection. She really liked the girl. It was only a light, airy kind of liking, perhaps, in unison with her character; but, so far as it went, it was perfectly sincere.

"My dear child, I am so glad to have you here," she said, placing Miss Lovel beside her on a low sofa. "You will find me dreadfully busy sometimes, I dare say; but you must not think me neglectful if I can not be very much with you down stairs. You are to come in and out of this room whenever you please. It is not open to the world at large, you know, and I am supposed to be quite inaccessible here; but it is open to my favorites, and I mean you to be one of them, Clarissa."

"You are very good, dear Lady Laura."

"No, I am not good; I dare say I am the most selfish creature in Christendom; but when I like people I like them with all my heart. And now tell me what you think of Hale."

"It is lovely—it is like fairy-land."

"Yes, it is pretty, isn't it, this new side? It has all been done in my time—it has all been my doing, indeed, I may venture to say; for Fred would have gone on living contentedly in the old rooms till his dying day. You can't imagine the trouble I took. I read no end of books upon the domestic architecture of the Middle Ages, went all over England hunting for model houses, and led the poor architect a fine life. But I think, between us, we succeeded in carrying out a very fine idea at last. The crenelated roof, with its machicolations, is considered a great success. There was a time when one was obliged to get a license from the sovereign to build that kind of thing; but it is all changed now. The sovereign is not afraid of rebellion, and the machicolations are only for ornament. You have not seen the old hall yet. That is splendid—a real original bit of the Castle, you know, which has never been tampered with, as old as Edward III., with a raised platform at the upper end, where the lord of the Castle used to sit while his vassals ate below him; and with a stone hearth in the centre, where they used to make their wood fires, all the smoke going through an opening in the roof—rather pleasant for my lord and his vassals, I should think! Take off your hat, Clarissa; or perhaps you would rather go to your room at once. Yes, you shall, dear; and I'll finish my letters, and we can meet at luncheon."

Lady Laura rang a bell twice, which particular summons produced a very smart-looking maid, into whose charge my lady confided Clarissa, with a pretty little wave of her hand, and "à bientôt, dear child."

The maid conducted Miss Lovel to a charming chintz-curtained bedroom on the second-floor, looking westward over those gorgeous flower banks; a bedroom with a bright-looking brass bedstead, and the daintiest chintz-patterned carpet, and nothing medieval about it except the stone-framed Gothic window.

"I will send a person to unpack your trunks, miss," the maid said, when she had listened with a deferential air to Clarissa's praise of the room. "I am very glad you like your rooms; my lady was most anxious you should be pleased. I'll send Fosset, miss; she is a very handy young person, and will be always at your service to render you any assistance you may require."

"Thank you—I am not likely to trouble her often; there is so very little assistance I ever want. Sometimes, when I am putting on an evening dress, I may ask for a little help, perhaps—that is all."

"She will be quite at your service, miss. I hope you will not scruple to ring for her," the chief of the maids replied, and then made a dignified exit.

The maid of inferior degree, Fosset, speedily appeared; a pale-complexioned, meek-looking young woman, who set about unpacking Clarissa's trunks with great skill and quickness, and arranged their contents in the capacious maple wardrobe, while their owner washed her hands and face and brushed the dust of her brief journey out of her dark brown hair. A clamorous bell rang out the summons to the mid-day meal presently, and Clarissa went down to the hall, where a watchful footman took her in charge.

"Luncheon is served in the octagon room, miss," he said, and straightway led her away to an apartment in an angle of the castle; a room with a heavily carved oak ceiling, and four mullioned windows overlooking the river; a room hung with gilt and brown stamped leather, and furnished in the most approved medieval style. There was an octagon table, bright with fruits and flowers, and a good many ladies seated round it, with only here and there a gentleman.

There was one of these gentlemen standing near Lady Laura's chair as Clarissa went into the room, tall and stout, with a very fair, good-natured countenance, light blue eyes, and large light whiskers, whom, by reason of some careless remarks of her father's, she guessed at once to be Mr. Armstrong—a gentleman of whom people were apt to say, after the shortest acquaintance, that there was not much in him, but that he was the best fellow in the world; an excellent kind of person to be intrusted with the disposal of a large fortune; a man by whom his neighbors could profit without a too painful sense of obligation, and who was never so happy as when a crowd of people were enjoying life at his expense. Friends who meant to say something very generous of Frederick Armstrong were wont to observe that he was not such a fool as he looked. Nor, in the ordinary attributes of a country gentleman, was the master of Hale Castle behind his compeers. He rode like Assheton Smith, never missed his bird in the open, and had a manly scorn of battues; was great in agriculture, and as good a judge of a horse as any man in Yorkshire. His literary attainments were perhaps limited to a comprehensive knowledge of the science of farriery, a profound study of "Ruff's Guide," and a familiar acquaintance with Bell's Life and two or three weekly newspapers devoted to the agricultural interest. But as he had the happiness to live among a race who rather cultivated the divine gift of ignorance, his shortcomings awakened no scorn. When he was known to have made a bad book for the Leger or the Great Ebor, his friends openly expressed their contempt for his mental powers; but no one despised him because an expensive university training had made him nothing more than a first-rate oarsman, a fair billiard-player, and a distinguished thrower of the hammer. He was just what a country gentleman should be in the popular idea—handsome, broad-shouldered, long-limbed, with the fist and biceps of a gladiator, and a brain totally unburdened by the scholiast's dryasdust rubbish; sharp and keen enough where the things that interested him were in question, and never caring to look beyond them.

To this gentleman Lady Laura introduced Clarissa.

"Fred, this is Miss Lovel—Clarissa Lovel—and you and she are to like each other very much, if you please. This is my husband, Clarissa, who cares more for the cultivation of short-horns—whatever kind of creatures those brutes may be—and ugly little shaggy black Highland cattle, than for my society, a great deal; so you will see very little of him, I dare say, while you are at the Castle. In London he is obliged to be shut up with me now and then; though, as he attends nearly all the race-meetings, I don't see very much of him even there; but here he escapes me altogether."

"Upon my word, Laura—upon my word, you know, Miss Lovel, there's not a word of truth in it," exclaimed the gentleman with the light whiskers. "My wife's always illuminating old Missals, or reading Italian, or practicing the harmonium, or writing out lists of things for her Dorcas meeting, or something of that sort; and a fellow only feels himself in the way if he's hanging about her. She's the busiest woman in the world. I don't believe the prime minister gets through more work or receives more letters than she does. And she answers 'em all, too, by Jove; she's like the great Duke of Wellington."

"Do you happen to take a lively interest in steam-plows and threshing-machines, and that kind of thing, Clarissa?" asked Lady Laura.

"I'm afraid not. I never even saw a steam-plow; and I believe if I were to see one I should think it a most unpicturesque object."

"I'm sorry to hear that. Fred would have been so delighted with you if you'd shown agricultural proclivities. We had a young lady from Westmoreland here last year who knew an immense deal about farming. She was especially great upon pigs, I believe, and quite fascinated Fred by tramping about the home farm with him in thick boots. I was almost jealous. But now let me introduce you to some of my friends, Clarissa."

Hereupon Miss Lovel had to bow and simper in response to the polite bows and simpers of half a dozen ladies. Mrs. Weldon Dacre and three Misses Dacre, Rose, Grace, and Amy, tall and bony damsels, with pale reddish hair, and paler eyebrows and eyelashes, and altogether more "style" than beauty; Mrs. Wilmot, a handsome widow, whom Frederick Armstrong and his masculine friends were wont to call "a dasher;" Miss Fermor, a rather pretty girl, with a piquant nose and sparkling hazel eyes; and Miss Barbara Fermor, tall and slim and dark, with a romantic air. The gentlemen were a couple of officers—Major Mason, stout, dark, hook-nosed, and close-shaven; Captain Westleigh, fair, auburn-mustached and whiskered—and a meek-looking gentleman, of that inoffensive curate race against which Clarissa had been warned by her father.

She found herself very quickly at home among these people. The Misses Fermor were especially gifted in the art of making themselves delightful to strangers; they had, indeed, undergone such training in a perpetual career of country-house visiting that it would have gone hard with them had they not acquired this grace. The three tall pale Dacres, Rose, Grace, and Amy, were more conventional and less ready to swear alliance with the stranger; but they were not disagreeable girls, and improved considerably after a few days' acquaintance, showing themselves willing to take the bass in piano-forte duets, sing a decent second, exhibit their sketch-books and photographic collections in a friendly manner, and communicate new stitches and patterns in point de Russe or point d'Alençon.

Digitized by Google

After luncheon Miss Lovel went off with Captain Westleigh and Miss Fermor—Lizzie, the elder and livelier of the two sisters—to take her first lesson in croquet. The croquet ground was a raised plateau to the left of the Italian garden, bounded on one side by a grassy slope and the reedy bank of the river, and on the other by a plantation of young firs—a perfect croquet ground, smooth as an ancient bowling-green, and unbroken by invading shrub or flower bed. There were some light iron seats on the outskirts of the ground here and there, and that was all.

Clarissa received her lesson, and (having been lucky enough to send her ball through the hoop now and then) was pronounced to have a natural genius for croquet. It was a pleasant, idle afternoon, passed amidst so bright and fair a scene that the beauty of her surroundings alone was enough to give Clarissa's life a new zest—a day which the mind recalls in the stormier periods of after-life, wondering at its gracious peace, its utter freedom from care or thought. Too soon came the time when there could be no more of such girlish happiness for Clarissa, such perfect respite from thought of to-morrow or regret for yesterday.

By-and-by came dressing for dinner, and then an assemblage of visitors in the drawing-room—county people from neighboring parks and halls and courts—mingling pleasantly with the Castle guests, and then dinner in the great dining-room; a splendid chamber, with a music-gallery at one end, and with the earliest crystal chandeliers ever used in England, and given by Queen Elizabeth to the lord of Hale for its chief decorations. At eight o'clock these crystal chandeliers glittered with the light of many wax-candles, though there was still the soft glow of sunset in the gardens beyond the great Gothic windows.

That first visit to a great country house was like a new page in life to Clarissa. She had not wearied of her quiet existence at Mill Cottage, her books, her art, her freedom from the monotonous tasks and dull restraints of school; but she felt that if life could always be like this it would be something very sweet and joyous. Captain Westleigh had contrived to take her in to dinner.

"I was determined to do it," he told her, confidentially, as they sat down; "so I made a rush across to you when I saw Lady Laura's eye upon you, with a malicious intention of billeting you upon young Halkin, the great cloth-manufacturer's son. I know Lady Laura so well. She will be trying to plant all those rich manufacturing fellows upon you; she has quite a mania for that sort of people."

The Captain made himself very pleasant all through that long ceremonial of dinner. If the brilliant things which he said were not quite the newest in the world, they were at least new to Clarissa, who rewarded his efforts to please her by seeming very much amused, and flattered and stimulated him to new flights by her appreciation. He told her all about the people round her, making her feel less like a stranger in a foreign country; and that pageant dinner, long as it was, did not seem at all too long to be pleasant.

After dinner there was a little music and singing at one end of the drawing-room, to which people listened or not, as they pleased; a friendly whist-table established at the other end, at which four elderly, gray-whiskered, and bald-headed country gentlemen played gravely for an hour or so; and a good deal of desultory strolling out through the open windows to the terrace for the contemplation of the moonlit gardens, with perhaps a spice of flirtation. Lady Laura was never quite happy unless she saw something like flirtation going on among her younger visitors. She was pleased to see Captain Westleigh's attention to Clarissa, though she would rather that James Halkin had occupied the ground. But, alas! Mr. Halkin, stiff and solemn as a policeman on duty, was standing by the chair of the very palest and least beautiful of the Misses Dacre, mildly discussing a collection of photographs of Alpine scenery. They had both been over the same country, and were quite enthusiastic when they came to peaks and mountain gorges that they remembered.

"I was there with another fellow, and he nearly slipped just on that edge there. It was as near as a"—Mr. Halkin was going to say "a toucher," but it occurred to him that that vague expression was scarcely permissible in conversation with a lady—"the nearest thing you ever saw in your life, in fact. If it hadn't been for his alpenstock it would have been all over with him; and the guides told us there'd been a fellow killed there the year before. We stopped at Rigot's—I think the dearest hotel I was ever at; but they gave us some very fair still Champagne—very fair indeed."

Lady Laura took occasion to warn Clarissa against the Captain when they separated for the night in the corridor upon which my lady's rooms opened.

"Very nice, isn't he, dear? Come into my dressing-room for a few minutes' talk;" and my lady led Clarissa into another charming chamber, all blue silk and satin-wood, like the morning-room. "Yes, he is very nice, and he really seemed quite épris. Poor Herbert Westleigh! I've known him for years. He belongs to one of the oldest families in Somersetshire, and is a capital fellow, as my husband says; but a person not to be thought of by you, Clarissa. There are a crowd of brothers, and I doubt if Herbert has a hundred a year beyond his pay. Did you notice that Mr. Halkin, a rather sandy-haired young man with a long nose? That young fellow will come into thirty thousand a year by-and-by."

"Yes, Lady Laura, I did notice him a little when he was talking to one of the Misses Dacre. He seemed very stupid."

"Stupid, my dear Clarissa! Why, I have been told that young man made a good deal of character at Oxford. But I dare say you are taken by Herbert Westleigh's rattling way. Now remember, my dear, I have warned you."

"There is no occasion for any warning, Lady Laura. Believe me, I am in no danger. I thought Captain Westleigh was very kind, and I liked him because he told me all about the other people; that is all."

"Very well, dear. You will see a good many people here; there is an advantage in that—one influence neutralizes another. But I should really like you to take some notice of that Mr. Halkin. He will be a good deal here, I dare say. His family live at Selbrook Hall, only four miles off. The father and mother are the plainest, homeliest people, but very sensible; live in a quiet, unpretending style, and can't spend a quarter of their income. When I speak of thirty thousand a year I don't reckon the accumulations that young man will inherit. He is the only son. There is a sister; but she is lame, and a confirmed invalid—not likely to live many years, I think."

Clarissa smiled at Lady Laura's earnestness.

"One would think you were in league with papa, dear Lady Laura. He says I am bound to marry a rich man."

"Of course; it is a solemn duty when a girl is handsome and not rich. Look at me; what would my life have been without Fred, Clarissa? There were five of us, child; five daughters to be married, only think of that; and there are still three unmarried. One of my sisters is coming here to-morrow. I do so hope you will get on with her; but she is rather peculiar. I am glad to say she is engaged at last—quite an old affair, and I think an attachment on both sides for some time past; but it has only lately come to a definite engagement. The gentleman's prospects were so uncertain; but that is all over now. The death of an elder brother quite alters his position, and he will have a very fine estate by-and-by. He is coming here, too, in a few days, and I'm sure I hope the marriage will take place soon. But I must not keep you here chattering, at the risk of spoiling your fresh looks."

And with a gracious good-night Lady Laura dismissed her new protégée.

Yes, it was a pleasant life, certainly—a life that drifted smoothly onward with the tide, and to all seeming unshadowed by one sorrowful thought or care. And yet, no doubt, with but a few youthful exceptions, every guest at Hale Castle had his or her particular burden to carry, and black Care sat behind the gentlemen as they rode to small country meetings or primitive cattle-fairs. To Clarissa Lovel the state of existence was so new that it was scarcely strange she should be deluded by the brightness and glitter of it, and believe that these people could have known no sorrow.

She found herself looking forward with unwonted interest to the arrival of Lady Laura's sister, Lady Geraldine Challoner. To a girl who has never had a lover—to whom the whole science of love is yet a profound, inscrutable mystery—there is apt to be something especially interesting in the idea of an engagement. To her the thought of betrothal is wonderfully solemn. A love-match too, and an attachment of long standing—there were the materials for a romance in these brief hints of Lady Laura's. And then, again, her sister described this Lady Geraldine as a peculiar person, with whom it was rather doubtful whether Clarissa would be able to get on. All this made her so much the more anxious to see the expected guest; and in the morning's drive and the afternoon's croquet she thought more of Lady Geraldine than of the landscape or the game.

Croquet was over—Clarissa had taken part in a regular game this afternoon—and the players were strolling about the gardens in couples in an idle half hour before the first dinner-bell, when Miss Lovel met Lady Laura with another lady. They were sauntering slowly along one of the sunny gravel-walks—there was every charm in this Italian garden except shade—and stopped on seeing Clarissa.

"Now, Geraldine, I shall be able to introduce you to my favorite, Clarissa Lovel," said Lady Laura; "Captain Westleigh you know of old."

The Captain and Lady Geraldine shook hands, declaring that they were quite old friends—had known each other for ages, and so on; and Clarissa had a few moments' pause in which to observe the young lady.

She was tall and slim, her sister's junior by perhaps five years, but not more; very fair, with bright auburn hair—that golden-tinted hair of which there seems to be so much more nowadays than was to be seen twenty years ago. She was handsome—very handsome—Clarissa decided at once; but it seemed to her rather a cold, hard style of beauty; the straight nose, the mouth, and chin, chiseled with a clearness and distinctness that were almost sharpness; the large, luminous blue eyes, which did not seem to possess much capacity for tenderness.

Lady Laura was very proud of this sister, and perhaps just a little afraid of her; but, of course, that latter fact was not obvious to strangers; she was only a shade less volatile and talkative in Geraldine's presence. Geraldine was the beauty of the Challoner family, and her career had been a failure hitherto; so that there was much rejoicing, in a quiet way, now that Lady Geraldine's destiny was apparently decided, and in an advantageous manner.

She was sufficiently gracious to Clarissa, but displayed none of that warmth which distinguished Lady Laura's manner to her new friend; and when the sisters had turned aside into another path, and were out of hearing, Geraldine asked rather sharply why "that girl" was here.

"My dear Geraldine, she is perfectly charming. I have taken the greatest fancy to her."

"My dear Laura, when will you leave off those absurd fancies for strangers?"

"Clarissa Lovel is not a stranger; you must remember how intimate papa used to be with her father."

"I only remember that Mr. Lovel was a very selfish person, and that he has lost his estate and gone down in the world. Why should you trouble yourself about his daughter? You can only do the girl harm by bringing her here. She will have to go out as a governess, I dare say, and will be writing to you whenever she is out of a situation to ask some favor or other, and boring you to death. I can not think how you can be so inconsiderate as to entangle yourself with that kind of acquaintance."

"I don't mean Clarissa to be a governess; I mean her to make a good marriage."

"Oh, of course, it is very easy to say that," exclaimed Lady Geraldine, scornfully; "but you have not been so fortunate as a match-maker hitherto. Look at Emily and Louisa."

"Emily and Louisa were so intractable and difficult to please that I could do nothing for them, and now I look upon them as confirmed old maids. But it is a different thing with Clarissa. She is very sensible, and I do not think she would stand in her own light if I could bring about what I wish. And then she is so lovely. Emily and Louisa were good-looking enough half a dozen years ago, but this girl is simply perfect. Come, Geraldine, you can afford to praise her. Is she not lovely?"

"Yes, I suppose she is handsome," the other answered, icily.

"You suppose she is handsome! It is really too bad of you to be prejudiced against a girl I wanted you to like. As if this poor little Clarissa could do any body any harm! But never mind, she must do without your liking. And now tell me all about George Fairfax. I was so glad to hear your news, dear—so thoroughly rejoiced."

"There is no occasion for such profound gladness. I could have gone on existing very well as Geraldine Challoner."

"Of course; but I had much rather see you well married, and your own mistress; and this is such a good match."

"Yes; from a worldly point of view, I suppose, the affair is unexceptionable," Geraldine Challoner answered, with persistent indifference; simulated indifference, no doubt, but not the less provoking to her sister. "George will be very rich by-and-by, and he is well enough off now. We shall be able to afford a house in one of the streets out of Park Lane—I have a rooted detestation for both Belgravia and Tyburnia—and a carriage, and so on; and I shall not be worried as I have been about my milliner's bills."

"And then you are very fond of him, Geraldine," Lady Laura said, softly.

There were still little romantic impulses in the matron's heart, and this studied coldness of her sister's tone wounded her sometimes.

"Yes, of course that is the beginning of the business. We like each other very well," Lady Geraldine replied, still with the same unenthusiastic air. "I think there has always been some kind of liking between us. We suit each other very well, you see; have the same way of thinking about most things, take the same view of life, and so on."

Lady Laura gave a faint sigh of assent. She was disappointed by her sister's tone; for in the time past she had more than once suspected that Geraldine Challoner loved George Fairfax with a passionate, half-despairing love, which, if unrequited, might make the bane of her life. And lo! here was the same Geraldine discussing her engagement as coolly as if the match had been the veriest marriage of convenience ever planned by a designing dowager. She did not understand how much pride had to do with this reticence, or what volcanic depths may sometimes lie beneath the Alpine snows of such a nature as Geraldine Challoner's.

In the evening Lady Geraldine was the centre of a circle of old friends and admirers; and Clarissa could only observe her from a distance, and wonder at her brilliancy, her power to talk of any thing and every thing with an air of unlimited wisdom and experience, and the perfect ease with which she received the homage offered to her beauty and wit. The cold, proud face lighted up wonderfully at night, and under the softening influence of so much adulation; and Lady Geraldine's smiles, though wanting in warmth at the best, were very fascinating. Clarissa wondered that so radiant a creature could have been so long unmarried, that it could be matter for rejoicing that she was at last engaged. It must have been her own fault, of course; such a woman as this could have been a duchess if she pleased, Clarissa thought.

Lizzie Fermor came up to her while she was admiring the high-bred beauty.

"Well, Miss Lovel, what do you think of her?"

"Lady Geraldine? I think she is wonderfully handsome—and fascinating."

"Do you? Then I don't think you can know the meaning of the word 'fascination.' If I were a man, that woman would be precisely the last in the world to touch my heart. Oh yes, I admit that she is very handsome—classic profile, bright blue eyes, complexion of lilies and roses, real golden hair—not dyed, you know—and so on; but I should as soon think of falling in love with a statue of snow as with Lady Geraldine Challoner. I think she has just about as much heart as the statue would have."

"Those people with cold manners have sometimes very warm hearts," Clarissa remonstrated, feeling that gratitude to Lady Laura made it incumbent on her to defend Lady Laura's sister.

"Perhaps; but that is not the case with her. She would trample upon a hecatomb of hearts to arrive at the object of her ambition. I think she might have made more than one brilliant marriage since she has been out—something like ten years, you know—only she was too cold, too obviously mercenary. I'm very sorry for George Fairfax."

"Do you know him?"

"Yes, and he is a very noble fellow. He has been rather wild, I believe; but, of course, we are not supposed to know any thing about that; and I have heard that he is the most generous-hearted of men. I know Lady Geraldine has contrived to keep him dangling about her whenever he was in England for the last six or eight years; but I thought it was one of those old-established flirtations that would never come to any thing—a kind of institution. I was quite surprised to hear of their engagement—and very sorry."

"But Lady Geraldine is very much attached to him, is she not?"

"Oh yes, I dare say she likes him; it would be almost difficult for any one to avoid liking him. She used to do her utmost to keep him about her always, I know; and I believe the flirtation has cost her more than one chance of a good marriage. But I doubt if we should have ever heard of this engagement if Reginald Fairfax had not died, and left his brother the heir of Lyvedon."

"Is Lyvedon a very grand place?"

"It is a superb estate, I believe; a noble old house in Kent, with an immense extent of land attached to it. The place belongs now to Sir Spencer Lyvedon, an old bachelor, whose only sister is George Fairfax's mother. The property is sure to come to Mr. Fairfax in a few years. He is to be here to-morrow, they say; and you will see him, and be able to judge for yourself whether Lady Geraldine is worthy of him."

There was a little excursion proposed and planned that evening for the next day—a drive to Marley Wood, a delicious bit of forest about seven miles from the Castle, and a luncheon in the open air. The party was made up on the spot. There were ladies enough to fill two carriages; a couple of servants were to go first with the luncheon in a wagonette, and the gentlemen were to ride. Every body was delighted with the idea. It was one of those unpremeditated affairs which are sure to be a success.

"I am glad to have something to do with myself," said Lady Geraldine. "It is better than dawdling away one's existence at croquet."

"I hope you are not going to be dull here, Geraldine," replied Lady Laura. "There are the Helston races next week, and a flower-show at Holborough."

"I hate small country race-meetings and country flower-shows; but, of course, I am not going to be dull, Laura. The Castle is very nice; and I shall hear all about your last new protégées, and your Dorcas societies, and your model cottages, and your architect, and your hundred and one schemes for the benefit of your fellow-man. It is not possible to be dull in the presence of so much energy."

AN ANCIENT DAME'S COUNSEL TO HER DAUGHTER.

AMONG the medieval books lately reprinted in England is a curious old treatise entitled "How the Good Wijf tautze her Dautzir," in which we see how a young lady of that period was taught to conduct herself. Her mother tells her that if she wishes to become a wife she must go to church regularly, and must not let the rain stop her, for she is sure to look the fairest on that day in which she has seen God. In church she is to pray, and not to talk, neither laughing at nor scorning any one. She is to be liberal and give to the poor, whom it is necessary that she care for. She is not to despise any offers of marriage, but to consult her friends about them all. She is to avoid suspicious places in company with her lover. When out, she is not to walk too fast, nor to brandish about her head, or wriggle her shoulders in any way. In town she is not to gad about from one house to another, nor to swear, nor get drunk on her pin-money. To get drunk once in a way did not appear to matter so much; but she tells her that if she gets drunk often, she will be disgraced, and can not possibly be thrifty. So, if she finds herself in company where good ale is going, she is to drink moderately of it. She is not to frequent public shows, but she is to stay at home, and she will soon get rich. If any man speaks to her, she is only to greet him and then let him pass on, because he might tempt her to wrong. She is not to take presents, because they have been the ruin of many women true as steel. When she is married she is to honor her husband above all earthly things. She is always to answer him meekly, in order that she may "slake" his wrath, and be his darling. She is to be of a glad nature, fair of speech, and mild of mood; true in word and deed, and good in conscience; and she is to keep free from sin, shame, and villainy of any kind. She is to be well-mannered, and not behave like a "gigge" or romp. She is not to be too hard or too easy with her household, but she must see that they do what is necessary; and this advice is to be particularly attended to if her husband is away from home. When put to a push she is to work herself, and her example will have a good effect upon the servants. She is to look after her household personally, and if any fault arises she is to check it immediately; to see that when a thing has been done it has been done rightly; to keep the keys in her own possession, and to beware whom she trusts; the servants must be paid on their regular wage-days; and, if possible, she is to be generous to them. She is not to be jealous of her neighbors' "rich attire," but she is to thank God for what she herself possesses. On work-days she is to work hard, on holy-days to praise God.

Digitized by Google

SPRING AND SUMMER S
FROM THREE TO

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIV., Figs. 55–58.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 59 and 60.

DRESS WITH OVER-SKIRT AND JACKET FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 22–26.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 27–31.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. I., Figs. 1–4.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Figs. 67–69.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 76–80.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 12 TO 14 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 44–47.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 48–50.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 13 TO 15 YEARS
For description see Supplement.

Digitized by Google

OR BOYS AND GIRLS
N YEARS OLD.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 10 TO 12 YEARS OLD.
pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5-13.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIX., Figs. 70-75.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 5 TO 7 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 7 TO 9 YEARS OLD.
For description see Supplement.

SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IX., Figs. 39-42.

SUIT FOR BOY FROM 4 TO 6 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 81-85.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 11 TO 13 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 51-54.

DRESS FOR GIRL FROM 6 TO 8 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VIII., Figs. 35-38.

DRESS WITH JACKET FOR GIRL FROM 3 TO 5 YEARS OLD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VII., Figs. 32-34.

Digitized by Google

TROTH-PLIGHT.

At first I thought God would have let me
  Bring thee the freshness of my day;
So, haply, having earlier met me,
  I might have gladdened more thy way!
    So would our lives have grown together,
    Sharing in common every weather;
Ah! then I did not know that we must wait—
      Must wait!

And what impulsive songs I sung thee
  With morning's flush upon my brow!
What kisses from my mouth I flung thee—
  My lips are pale and pensive now!
    Till, said I, "Must I call forever?
    And will he answer never, never?"
It was so hard to learn that I must wait—
      Must wait!

In the dark night my pride was broken;
  I lay down mutely on my face,
And tears revealed what was not spoken—
  I found thee not in any place!
    My soul was full of grievous wonder,
    My heart-strings almost swelled asunder;
I thought that I could die, but could not wait—
      Not wait!

Then other hands were held out to me,
  And others whispered, "I am he!"
And other lovers came to woo me;
  And yet thy face I could not see.
    Then said I, "I shall never meet him;
    God wills that I should never greet him;"
And for a little I forgot to wait—
      To wait!

But swift and bitter came repayment—
  The fruit hung withered on the tree—
And I must come in spotted raiment,
  A traitor to my heart and thee.
    I am not worthy thy caressing,
    For I have forfeited such blessing.
Canst thou forgive me that I could not wait—
      Not wait?

Thou wilt—since I have found no flavor
  In all the gifts that others gave;
Their richness but provoked disfavor;
  And if I die upon thy grave,
    Know, that amid my faithless trifling
    I had no power my heart for stifling.
Let me yet prove to thee that I can wait—
      Can wait!

Ah! let no comelier form inthrall thee
  By reason of its rarer grace;
Canst thou not hear my spirit call thee?
  Hast thou no visions of my face?
    Doth never passionate want come o'er thee?
    Lookest never wistfully before thee,
To where I stand within the veil and wait?
      Then wait!

HOWARD GLYNDON.

MASQUERADING.

HERE they go; let me heap them away in these old trunks, and never see them again—the high-heeled slippers, the Pompadour waists, the Elizabethan ruffs, the quilted silk petticoats, the powder, the patches, the peasant's bodice and cap, the whole mass of gaudy trappings! Clare looks on with a doubtful smile; she can afford to smile; the spells have done all their work—she has nothing more to fear.

What made her provoke me to do her a mischief? I should scarcely have entered the room when Douglas came to see her; I should have smiled in the most distant way upon their love-making, and gone on with my own life apart from them all, if she had not urged me and fairly forced me into their company. She had boasted of him so much; she wanted me to see his devotion, perhaps to make me feel that, shy and quiet as we had always thought her, she could win and keep a lover, after all, better than I; for mine were like summer butterflies, and never tarried long. She piqued me—she provoked me. There she sat, in her plain lilac dress, in a poor light, knitting some abominable fancy-work in blue worsteds, while opposite her, as handsome as a prince, Douglas lounged in an easy-chair, as splendid-looking a man as I ever saw in my life, smiling, well-pleased, and curling his mustache, while she was saying little cooing words. I sat down and talked to him; I made him attend to me; for I wanted to find out what was in him, and what manner of man he was. He had traveled, and I led him through the story of his travels again; he had read, and I found out what books he liked best; he was fond of history, and I drew from him what bygone characters he most admired. Clare listened with delight; she wanted me to appreciate him.

He was of a Pre-Raphaelite disposition, and such a man makes a charming narrator. He could make you see precisely how the sun filtered through the grape leaves in the vineyards of Italy; he could reproduce exactly the look, the dress, of the picturesque beggars and peasants. His eye was quick for any thing picturesque in costume or attitude, and he carried the feeling into his love of history.

"I should have lived in the Elizabethan times," he said, "when the dress was so quaint and stately. How tame men look nowadays in common coats!"

"Oh, Juliet," cried Clare, "do be a court lady this evening!"

I knew what she meant. We had had a great Christmas party the winter before, and a houseful of friends staying with us. We had masqueraded and played in amateur theatricals, and when the excitement was over the costumes were huddled away in a closet, where they would have become moth-eaten and dingy if I had not dragged them out after a while, and amused the family by occasionally appearing at the tea-table as Rowena, or Joan of Arc, or a magnificent duchess or queen. But, dear me! if Douglas admired elegant costumes so much, how did he ever come to fall in love with Clare, who is a queer little thing about that, and never seems to care much what she has on? I thought I had found out when I presently heard her singing to him; for Clare has a pure, sweet, penetrating voice that some people rave over.

Toward evening I went up stairs, and began pulling over the dresses in my closet. Clare by-and-by looked in.

"Now, Juliet, do dress up this evening," she said, coaxingly, "and be just as handsome as you can. Dear Douglas and I are going out for a walk through the meadows. Don't let tea wait for us." And away she tripped.

What harm could there be in it? Slowly I put on the quilted blue silk petticoat that had been my great-great-grandmother's, and the satin stomacher.

They did not return until we had all left the supper-room, and I was already in the parlor when they came in from a hasty tea. The chilly air out-of-doors had reddened Clare's eyes and nose. She was tired, and sat down by the fire, with a coarse stocking she was knitting for some poor child. She threw me a smile of approval, for I was a court lady.

"What century is this?" exclaimed Douglas, stopping short as he caught sight of me.

I sat in the full blaze of the gas-light, with a tambour frame before me, while I swiftly and daintily took stitches in the lace, an accomplishment an old lady in the neighborhood had taught me. I had taken a straight-backed antique chair, and let the long train of my dress fall over its arm. The deep pointed waist I knew became me, and from under the blue petticoat I let the sharp toes and high heels of my tiny slippers be seen. My hair was dressed up high on a cushion, and powdered (my maid did that for me), and on the lower part of my left cheek was a coquettish patch. For jewelry I wore my sapphires.

"You look like a lovely Vandyck just stepped from its frame," said Douglas; and he drew his chair close by me.

I retorted gayly, and provoked him to new compliments. His eyes never left me, and I knew I had surprised and delighted him. Dress is such an illusion that I believe the man really felt as if I were what I pretended to be—a beautiful, coquettish court lady entertaining him in her boudoir. Clare laughed, and made little speeches too now and then; but by-and-by she grew perfectly quiet; she was really very tired, and not used to long walks.

I flirted with Douglas a little, as a court lady might—I caught my thread around my sapphires, and let him disentangle it for me. And then I rested from my tambour-work, and leaned back in the carved oaken chair, and toyed with my fan. It was a large white feather fan, somebody's heir-loom, and had been trifled with just so a hundred times before, I don't doubt.

Douglas grew brilliant, his dark eyes kindled, and he looked handsomer than ever. He talked well and eloquently, and I thought to myself that I almost wished I was a court lady, and he a court gentleman and my lover.

The moon rose large and full, and shone in at the window, shaming the gas-light. We rose with a common impulse.

"Come, Lady Juliet; come, Clare," said Douglas, "come and be bewitched by the moon!"

But Clare said she believed she would stay by the fire. The window reached down to the floor, and as we opened it we passed out, and walked three or four times up and down the veranda in that beautiful white moonlight. When we came in again Clare was shivering, and I closed the window instantly. Douglas bent over her caressingly.

"What has kept you so still all the evening, dear Clare?" he asked. "Won't you sing for me once before I go?"

Clare smiled, went to the piano, and tried her best; but she could not sing; her voice was husky. She said she thought she must have taken a little cold down in the meadows. Douglas did not leave her side again during the few moments longer that he staid. After he had gone Clare asked:

"Don't you like him, Juliet? Isn't he all I said?"

"A great deal more," I answered, heartily. "I think he's splendid! But are you sure you quite understand him, Clare—that you know all he wants?"

"Certainly," she replied, with a little dignity. "I don't know who should understand Douglas if I do not."

"Oh, very well," I thought to myself; "if you can't see yet that he wants something more than lilac woolens, I don't know but it's my duty to teach you."

I really felt annoyed at Clare. It seemed too bad, when Douglas had such fine taste, and admired the picturesque in dress so much, that she shouldn't try to brighten up a little for him. But no; down she went to meet him the next day in her brown merino, that she has had I can't tell how long—as plain as a wood-pigeon. He should have at least one glimpse of something artistic, I determined; and, leaving them alone during the day, I came down upon them in the evening as truly Elizabethan as little Nora could make me, with a mountain of golden puffs on my head, and a genuine ruff, six inches broad, around my neck. I wore paniers, too, and a deliciously absurd hoop-skirt, with a white silk petticoat this time, and a lovely pink train.

"Oh, the stiff, ugly collar!" cried Clare, as she looked up at me. But I had not studied my glass for nothing; and I knew I looked quaint and picturesque, and handsomer than any of the old English queens. Douglas was perfectly carried away, and insisted on taking a pencil and sketching me as I stood. I did not stay long, for that would not suit the dignity of a Queen Bess, and making them a deep, slow courtesy, I swept away, having the satisfaction of seeing that Douglas's eyes followed me as if he could not bear to have me go.

The next day I was Di Vernon, and the next I appeared in a costume similar to one that tradition tells us Marie Antoinette wore at her Little Trianon. And then I was a Puritan maiden, and then Blue-beard's wife. That was one of the nicest things. I got the idea from Gustave Doré's illustration of the old fairy story, and the costume was one of the very prettiest ones I had, with its curiously puffed sleeves and quilted waist, and the dear little black velvet head-dress with a plume perched on my curls. I got fairly into a vein of mischief over all these doings. I liked to flash in upon Douglas and Clare as they sat in their dullness, she always busy with her everlasting worsted-work. I liked to flash suddenly in upon them, and stand there in my picturesqueness in some becoming attitude that I knew would strike Douglas's eye. His face would light up, and then I would laugh and talk and move about, taking more attitudes, and maybe singing little songs. My voice is not like Clare's, but I can sing gay little love-songs and passionate serenades, which she can not do.

One evening, when I was a Spanish dancing girl, I sang a perfectly fiery little song of love, and she followed it, in her clear, solemn voice, with "Douglas, Douglas, tender and true."

Somehow it jarred on our mood, and we left her singing, and ran off down the moonlit garden path. We stopped by the mock-orange tree, and Douglas crowned me with the snow-white blossoms.

The next day we were to go out gathering ferns in the grove—Douglas, Clare, and I. We were to make a day of it, and carry a lunch-basket. I dressed as a German peasant girl—after one of Kaulbach's pictures—with a short skirt, a hanging pocket, and two long braids of hair.

"Do I look pretty in this dress?" I asked Clare when we were ready.

"I wish I looked half as pretty," she answered, softly.

Well, then, why did she wear that lilac dress again?

When Douglas came he brought a friend with him, a Dr. Philip Greaves—one of the plainest men I ever saw, but with such a good, strong face and grave, searching eyes. He had been a surgeon all through the war, and now was rising into practice in the same city where Douglas's business was. I felt a little shy in my costume before a stranger; so I left him to Clare, and ran ahead with Douglas and the baskets.

We had a lovely day. Douglas and I climbed the ledge in two or three different places, till Clare begged us to stop, we made her so dizzy; but I felt so light and agile in my costume it seemed as if I could scale precipices.

We gathered at last for lunch, and Clare showed me a whole basketful of beautiful ferns that Dr. Greaves had collected for her, while I had not one yet. He sat there talking so sensibly that I began to feel, somehow, of small account, and I pulled some daisies to pieces and pouted.

"There; now you look just like a little peasant girl I saw once in Bavaria," exclaimed Douglas. "Isn't it a bewitching style of dress, Phil?"

"I should like it if I saw it in Germany," answered his friend, coolly.

And then I felt mortified enough, and, turning my back on them all, went to gathering ferns. But I said to myself it was probable we should never see Dr. Greaves after that day, and it did not matter what he thought.

Douglas had said three or four times in our historical talks that he did not blame people at all for falling in love with Marie Stuart. He said he knew he should have fallen in love with her himself if she looked like her portrait, and he had been living then. That was when we had been looking at an exquisitely pretty picture of her which I kept in my port-folio. I had almost exhausted my resources in costume, and the idea struck me to get up a dress like Marie Stuart's and wear it.

I did it the next evening. I let my hair fall in waves and ripples without any puffs, and I twined strings of Roman pearls through it. Then I laid upon it a fold of black velvet with a few black heron's feathers, just like the picture, and I wore a black velvet jacket trimmed with soft white swan's-down, and more Roman pearls about my neck. The effect was really startling.

"I didn't know I was so like Marie Stuart!" I said to myself, with some vanity, before the mirror. Oh, the shallow, shallow heart I had! To-day I have locked the dress out of sight forever, I hate it so.

When the bell rang, and I knew Douglas had come, I presently slipped down stairs, and presented myself to them in the library. Douglas sprang up to meet me in a rapture. He said I was his very dream come to pass of the sweet queen. Clare glanced at me with an anxious smile. She had on a gray dress, and looked like a dove. Dr. Greaves was there too, and that was a surprise: I did not know he was coming that evening. He scanned me attentively with his earnest eyes, and I felt uneasy because he paid me no compliment, as would have been so natural. He was standing apart from the rest by the mantel, and I was tempted to approach him and say,

"Ah, you belong to the enemy's court, Dr. Greaves; I see you have no sympathy with the poor Stuart."

"Why do you seem what you are not, Miss Juliet?" he said. "Is such a game as this worthy of you?"

He spoke gravely, almost sternly, and my glance involuntarily followed his to Clare's pale face and Douglas's wandering eyes. I was startled by his voice, his manner, and lost my self-possession. At that moment Douglas came up and offered his arm. In a sort of embarrassment I took it, and he led me out upon the veranda. His manner was agitated, his voice eager and faltering.

"I always told you if I had seen Marie Stuart I should have fallen in love with her," he said; "and now I see her—can I help myself, Queen Mary?"

This was what I had done, then! In a flash I saw revealed the abyss of wrong to which I was hurrying. Rob Clare of her lover! But then why did she let me do it? it would have been so easy to have kept him, I thought.

"Go back to my cousin, Sir," I said, haughtily. "Do you take me for a traitor?" But my voice softened a little with the last words; for he stood before me, looking so handsome, and with such devotion in his eyes. Could I help it, could he help it, if he loved me?

"I shall not go back to her," he said, passionately—"not even if you reject me. That is all over and past like a dream. I can not go back to it any more than I can become a child again. My very life depends upon you, Juliet!"

So! The mischief was fairly done, then, it seemed. I had sent him back to Clare, but he would not be sent. That being ended, what next? Was love to cease for the whole world because it had ceased for Clare? That was a guilty thought, and made my cheeks burn. Should I, then, renounce Douglas? I had not, surely, meant to win him away from Clare; but that being over and past, was he not my lover? And as I looked at him he seemed to me handsomer and braver and better than any lover I ever had before; and should I lose him for a punctilio? Besides, if I had spoiled the love that formerly contented him, did I not owe him amends? And ah! his admiration had been a feast so sweet that now the cup of love he proffered tempted me wondrously. My heart beat faster and faster; I was frightened at my own thoughts.

"Let us go in!" I exclaimed; and starting away from him, I ran back to the library.

There sat Clare, where we had left her, in the great arm-chair, which made her look smaller by contrast. It struck me that she had grown thin in the last few weeks, or had I never realized how frail she was, looking like a gray feather blown there by the wind. But there was fire in her eye and a bit of pink flush in her cheek—about as much color as a wind-flower has. Dr. Greaves was talking to her, telling her some instances of remarkable heroism he had witnessed on the battle-field and in the hospital. As I listened I got glimpses of a tenderness and enthusiasm quite wonderful in so blunt and practical a man. I was just beginning to wish he would talk to me as well as to Clare, when Douglas sauntered in through the low window, and, staying there in the darkest corner by the piano, struck a few chords, and sang with his lovely tenor voice a fiery Spanish love-song which I had taught him myself. That took me over to the piano at once. Clare's eyes followed me, but she did not come too. Dr. Greaves went on with his brave stories of endurance and sacrifice.

"But love is better than sacrifice," I thought, gazing into Douglas's impassioned eyes.

Dr. Greaves rose to go a few moments after that, and asked Douglas if he were ready.

"No, he isn't," answered Clare for him, smiling gently. "You must leave him, Dr. Greaves, for I want to speak to him a few minutes."

"Oh, well, if I'm in the way, I'll go!" I exclaimed, marching out of the room. So Douglas was going to have a lecture from his fiancée! What would be the end of it? I went up stairs and sat in my room, waiting to hear Clare's step.

At last I heard it. She opened the door and came in.

"See!" she said; "here is my engagement-ring. Let me put it on your finger, Juliet. How well it fits! It was always loose on mine."

"What do you mean?" I exclaimed, with bravado; but I felt guilty enough.

"Oh, you can not help knowing," she said, with unvarying gentleness. "I have given Douglas up. I could not have made him happy. I see it all now. His future rests with you, Juliet. Go and speak to him; he is waiting below for you."

"And you think I will wear what you cast off?" I asked, rather piqued.

"Don't find fault with him for that," she said. "Am not I the castaway?"

"And you don't care?" I demanded, curiously.

Clare grew indignant then; she gave me one look, and walked off. After a few minutes I went down to the library, and found Douglas.

The transfer was made, and we were engaged. No one made any opposition. Why did they not? The only unpleasant thing was Clare's pale cheeks, but she kept out of my way for the most part. Douglas wished to be married at once; every body encouraged it, and I consented willingly enough. Was I afraid I might lose him as Clare had? No; but I was impatient of the present, tired of my life as it was and had been, and I had, though you may not believe it, yearnings for something better. And now love had come, in a strange way, to be sure, but I snatched at it. It was a new path to walk in.

We were married, and went abroad at once. We mingled in gay society in London, Paris, and Berlin; and every day Douglas told me over and over how proud he was of his beautiful wife, her bright wit, and her exquisite toilettes. If I had a secret remorse about Clare in my heart, this deadened it. Surely nature had meant me for Douglas from the first; and what sort of figure, may I ask you, would Clare have made in Paris?

After four months we came back, and settled down, taking a house in the city near Douglas's place of business. Now, I thought, our true life is to begin. But housekeeping is not my element. Our servants were abominable; things went wrong, and fretted me. And one can not always keep up dressing like Marie Stuart and court ladies. It would be absurd; and if it were not, who wants to be always masquerading? Besides, it is too much trouble. Domestic life in one's own house is a very different thing from fluttering from one gay hotel to another, with nothing to do but to unpack one's trunks, full of beautiful dresses. Douglas found it so as well as I. His Pre-Raphaelite minuteness developed itself anew; a speck on the table-cloth, a dead rose in a vase, a mat awry, annoyed him excessively, and I own I have not the tact that keeps such things forever arranged.

Digitized by Google

One evening, thinking to please him, I put on the Marie Stuart dress, and plumed myself like a queen. When we met at supper he looked discontented.

"Juliet, this toast is too burned to be touched," he said.

"Oh dear! I do think cook behaves dreadfully!" I exclaimed, most un-Stuart-like. Douglas glanced across the table and noticed me.

"Ah! in costume," he said. "How pretty you looked in that dress once, Juliet! But isn't the velvet rather faded? And the feathers are getting shabby, aren't they? The utmost daintiness is necessary in a thing of that kind, or it has a tawdry, theatre look. Your cheeks are thinner, too, than they used to be, dear, I think."

My cheeks were thin; I knew it; and I was falling into a habit of having a fearful headache almost every day, a thing unknown to me as a girl. I told the doctor, and he gave me tonics, and said summer would find me much better. The months have worn on, and June is here, but the haunting headache does not leave me. It makes my cheeks still thinner, and draws lines of pain in my forehead. I have a singular affection of the throat, too, a sort of contraction and dryness that comes and goes as it will. The doctor says it is purely nervous, and will go when the headaches are cured. But I begin to think with terror of a great-aunt of mine, whose story is one of the saddest in our family. She was one of the most beautiful belles of her day, but within a twelvemonth from her marriage she became an invalid, and with symptoms like mine, which increased upon her. She grew more and more helpless, and was bedridden for life. What if this is a capricious malady which passes over all the rest and reappears in me? Clare, being only a cousin, escapes.

A week ago the doctor urged Douglas to break up housekeeping, and to take me to my old home for the summer. So we arrived here yesterday —I with my shawls and pillow and salts, escorted by my strong, handsome husband, who is still, as I thought him at first, the handsomest man I ever saw. Clare was the first one to greet us, and as soon as she had me to herself she told me of her engagement to Dr. Greaves. She wanted to tell me with her own lips, she said. How perfectly radiant and happy she looked! Clare has taken a leaf from my old book, I judge: not in the way of costumes—don't think that; but certainly she is one of the most harmonious little things in her way of dressing now that I ever saw—such cool tints, such pretty contrasts!

I was tired after the journey, and lay down with one of my blinding headaches. When the tea-bell rang Douglas ran up for me. I dressed in a hurry, and went down. Dr. Greaves was there. What a thoroughly noble man he is! One reads it in every line of his face, every tone of his voice. He is like an inspiration. Douglas was very quiet; I fancied something was vexing him.

When I went up stairs again, as I glanced carelessly into the mirror, I was startled to see that in my hasty dressing, taking whatever came first to hand, I had pinned a bright blue bow on my purple dress. It looked fearfully out of taste. You don't know how curiously it affected me!

It seems strange to be here again, wandering about through the very rooms where, a year ago, I won my husband. This afternoon Clare and I have been clearing out the wardrobes, and I came across the costumes I pranked myself out in in the days of glamour. What Nemesis cried out from among them! I flung them away from me. I thrust them into old moth-eaten trunks, to be left in the garret to mould and decay. Let them go, to be hidden forever. Clare looks at me with her doubtful smile, and turns away suddenly. Can it be there are tears in her gentle eyes? I had no tears for her a year ago!

Clare goes down to her lover. I hear her sweet voice singing sweeter and clearer than ever. I feel like a shattered wreck. But they are all so kind to me, so strangely kind. Will they ever be able to make any thing of me again, or is Nemesis too strong for them?

THE LUNCH-TABLE.

CUSTARDS AND CREAMS.

MERE delicacies are not allowed their proper place of honor in estimating the physical worth of a meal. They often contain the blandest nourishment in forms of light digestion, as well as tempting flavor. We will amend that sentence by saying, if they are allowed to have any flavor at all. People seem to suppose that gelatine, sugar, and Burnett's extracts can not rush together in any order without satisfactory results. These things are meant only to taste; therefore they may be particularly good or not, as happens. The scanty variety of our desserts and luncheons is matter of grief to one who believes in the best way of doing the least thing. The pies are the same round—apple, mince, berry—from year to year; the cakes are just removed from satisfying sweetness or flavor. No wonder utilitarians propose to abolish pastry and cake, substituting for them husky bread and sour baked apples. Must every thing that is healthy be unpalatable? The appetite was undoubtedly given us for a guide and physical conscience. If not perverted, it will answer faithfully this end, and any dissatisfaction may be traced to a want of proper qualities in the food it rejects.

It is gradually becoming a conviction among educated Americans that we need to eat but twice a day with heartiness. The early cup of coffee or draught of milk on rising is needed by many persons to tone them for the slightest exertion, and this may be taken informally as well as at the table, where we usually dignify this refreshment by the name of breakfast. Healthy people can work after this till eleven o'clock, when breakfast proper may be served, with light, hot meats and piquant vegetables. At six or seven dinner should follow, the heartiest meal of the day coming when work is over, and the system is at leisure for digestion. Habit has almost every thing to do with this matter. But care must be taken not to force the appetite either way. People must be allowed to eat in their own way if food is to perform its legitimate function. This constant "nagging" others into one's own course of living is the most unendurable office good people ever feel called on mistakenly to perform. It is the beauty of life that, while governed by broad and immutable laws, these admit infinite variations in lesser points, that preserve any human individuality from becoming the exact counterpart of another, forever forbidding that vast monotony some creatures seek to impose on nature.

But while the social laws impose three meals a day upon us, the intervening one should be made really as unsubstantial as can be. It must allay hunger, not meet its full demands. This is the time for salads, Charlottes, and sweetmeats. It should, in fact, be a dessert meal, when the pastries and comfits take their full share of appreciation, not cloying the appetite after soups and roasts. Epicures fully understand the value of simplicity in eating. Two or three grands plats should compose a meal, not a variety of subordinate dishes. Not a few people of taste will sympathize with the piquant governess of our school who used heretically to declare when she was emancipated she would never have but one thing for dinner. One day it should be game, another fruit, the next mince-pie, and she would dine some day off black cake and coffee. It was vastly better for the digestion than any other plan for partaking of the same bill of fare. Luncheon is a lady's meal, and their sweet tooth may be indulged at this time. Confectionery may form a part of this repast, and be eaten without regrets. Healthier articles do not enter our houses than Charlottes and creams, isinglass jellies, and even candies, when not taken in cloying quantities. A glance at the ingredients of either will satisfy one that this is the case. And now for a few raw-flavored dainties, as innocent as delightful. The housekeeper must make her list of flavors wide as possible to secure success. Vanilla is intolerable in cake; coffee, orange peel, and almond are finer. Raspberry, banana, and pine for whipped creams, all the fruits for jellies, and flower petals in season to strew salads, after the beautiful French fashion, should give this dulcet repast its charm. Salads shall have a chapter to themselves. Let cups of lucent porcelain receive this opening delicacy of COFFEE CUSTARD.—Mix one egg with a cup of fresh-ground coffee, and pour on it a pint of boiling water; boil five minutes, pour in a cup of cold water, and let it stand ten minutes. Pour it off clear into a saucepan, add a pint of cream, and boil. Beat from five to eight eggs with one and a half cups of sugar, and pour the boiling mixture over this, stirring it well. Set the whole in boiling water, and stir till it thickens. Serve in cups to eat cold.

ALMOND CUSTARD.—Blanch and pound fine a quarter of a pound of sweet almonds, and boil them in a quart of milk, sweetening to the taste. Beat eight eggs (five will answer), and strain them; turn the milk and almonds boiling hot on the eggs, stirring them all the while, and boil in a pitcher set in hot water till thickened.

CREAM CUSTARD.—One pint of milk, the whites of four eggs, half a cup of corn starch, and one pint of cream. Boil the milk and cream together, and while boiling add the eggs and starch, beaten together with two and a half cups of sugar, flavoring with pure vanilla, almond, or raspberry. It is nice to pour it into cups having a few drops of different flavor in each.

APPLE FLOAT.—Stew six apples; drain and cool; beat up with two spoonfuls of white sugar and the whites of three eggs, flavor with lemon or rose-water. Fill a bowl with cream custard, and lay the froth on the top as high as it will stand. Finish with the stiff froth of eggs, tinted with rose-color by beet juice or cochineal.

VELVET CREAM.—One-half ounce isinglass dissolved in one and a half cups of white wine, to which is added the juice and rind of one lemon and three-quarters of a pound of white sugar. Simmer till mixed; strain and set to cool. Add a pint and a half of rich cream, and stir till quite cold; then set in moulds on the ice till stiff as blanc-mange. Orange peel and juice are finer than lemon.

FRUIT CREAMS.—Dissolve half an ounce of isinglass in warm water enough to cover it; add this to a pint of cream, sweetened with four spoonfuls of sugar, and boil it. When cool, lay some apricot, raspberry, or peach preserves in a glass dish, and pour the cream over it.

PLAIN CREAM.—One quart of sweet milk, one cup of cream, one coffee-cup of sugar, or less if you prefer, boiled with a piece of orange peel, or flavored with almond. Moisten four spoonfuls of sea-moss farina with cold milk, and stir into the boil. Two spoonfuls of rose brandy is a delicious flavor for this cream. Stew any juicy fruit nicely, sweetening right, and when boiling stir in a spoonful of corn starch wet in cold water for every pint of juice. This gives a jelly-like thickness and clearness to the fruit without impairing the taste in any way. While only a moderate quantity of sugar is used, the juice has an almost candied look. Cranberries, barberries, and such sour fruit are improved by it. If the juice is strained, the corn starch addition will make a very tolerable jelly, much pleasanter than the isinglass jellies. This must be poured in flat glass dishes to the depth of half an inch, and cooled. When firm, pour on the cream, let that set, and add another layer of fruit. This will be found a delicious substitute for pies in summer, when pastry is too rich to be eaten.

CHARLOTTE TART.—Make a very acid jelly with gelatine from the juice of lemons, plums, or barberries; spread this half an inch thick over sheets of cake baked very thin, and cover the whole with cream prepared as for Charlotte-Russe, an inch or more deep.

PINE-APPLE CREAM.—One pound of grated pine-apple, one pound of sugar, half a pound of butter. Rub the butter and sugar to a paste, and stir in the pine-apple, adding a cup of rich milk, and three eggs well beaten. Bake this with or without a paste.

RATAFIAS.—Blanch and pound in a marble mortar half a pound of sweet, and half a pound of bitter almonds. Add two pounds of sugar and the whites of eight eggs; beat together fifteen minutes in a deep bowl with a heavy spoon. Drop, in dime-size, on paper, and bake in a moderate oven a light brown.

LEMON CUSTARD.—The juice and grated rind of three large lemons, two and a half cups of sugar, three eggs, one spoonful of butter, three cups of sweet, rich milk, and three spoonfuls of corn starch. Beat the sugar, eggs, and butter together, moisten the corn starch, and add to this the lemons; boil the milk, and stir the mixture in quickly while boiling. As soon as the milk thickens take it off and set it in the vessel of hot water, in which it should be boiled away five minutes; then put the custard on the ice to cool. Beat the whites of two eggs to a froth with two spoonfuls of sugar, and lay this over the custard.

INVALID'S LUNCH.—Stew half a pound of large raisins, the dried peel of one orange and the juice of six, together in a porcelain kettle for an hour with plenty of water. Then strain, and set away in the ice-box. For use, take half a pint of this and half a pint of rich milk, with the whites of two eggs beat to a froth; beat together with three spoonfuls of native wine, and eat with this kind of cracker: One pound of Graham flour of the best quality, one cup of cold water, a tea-spoonful of salt, the boiled raisins chopped and stirred in, with a quarter of a pound of blanched sweet almonds chopped fine. Mix these to a stiff dough, roll thin, and bake on hot iron sheets before the fire, or on the floor of the oven. Nuts and raisins in this way are not only easy of digestion, but very nourishing, and the Graham cake in this way is made palatable to those who like it in no other way. The success and nutty richness of the cracker depend on its baking by an intense heat.

CURDS.—Freshly soured and thickened milk is esteemed by the doctors very wholesome and easy of digestion. Families in the country may make this serviceable by stirring several spoonfuls of orange wine or native port into a dish of sour milk before it sets, then leaving it to curdle, and eating with powdered sugar and nutmeg. The wine quite disguises the unpleasant taste of sour milk, and makes it a delicacy. When cream is churned, as it should be, every morning, the buttermilk may be treated in this way, and will be found very rich.

CARAMELS.—The proportions for making these are half as much plain chocolate as sugar, half as much milk as chocolate, and half as much butter as milk. Powder the chocolate, melt the sugar, milk, and butter together, and stir in the chocolate, boiling ten minutes slowly in a pan of hot water. Pour into buttered plates, cut into squares while soft, and set on the ice to grow crisp.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

NOT long ago some mention was made in this column of the peculiar properties of the new drug, hydrate of chloral, which promised to possess the advantages of opium in allaying pain and quieting the nerves, without its disadvantages. Medical writers are now warning the community against the free use of this narcotic or anæsthetic, on account of its fascinating and dangerous properties. It is only about eighteen months since attention was first called to hydrate of chloral by Liebreich, of Berlin, yet many people are so fond of dosing that they are willing to experiment upon themselves with a novelty whose qualities are yet scarcely known, in all its details, to the most intelligent physicians. There seems to be not a little danger that this hydrate may be regarded by the masses as a sort of panacea for all the ills that flesh is heir to; and the demand for it has already caused impure compounds to be put into the market as genuine. It should be remembered that hydrate of chloral, like all other powerful drugs, should never be tampered with by unskilled persons. It is capable of producing convulsions and death, and should never be taken or administered unless freshly prepared, and upon the prescription of a competent physician.

The Woman's Missionary Society of New York is about to send out three women to establish an orphan asylum at Yokohama, in Japan.

A heavy weight must be the German imperial crown to wear upon one's head, even though it be a royal head. It is a foot high, of twenty-one carat gold, and heavily set with pearls.

By the Directory of Brooklyn—the "City of Churches"—for the present year, it appears that there are 1635 places where rum is retailed, as an offset to 223 churches. Which attract the greatest number, the churches or the grog-shops?

One evening last week a large and fashionable audience assembled in the theatre of the Union League Club, on the occasion of the third annual commencement of the Woman's Medical College. After speeches by several prominent gentlemen, degrees were conferred on the three graduates—Miss Annie A. Angell, of New York; Miss Mary A. Wattles, of Kansas; and Miss Ellen F. Hammond, of Connecticut. The valedictory, which was given by Miss Wattles, was received with warm applause by the audience. We understand that Miss Wattles will commence practice in Newark next autumn.

The marriage-service in Illinois is now adapted to modern times. A justice recently pronounced a couple man and wife, "until separated by law."

A correspondent of an English magazine warmly advocates tight lacing from a novel point of view; namely, that by the "discipline of the corset" the "roughnesses of the uncultivated nature is subdued; a valuable lesson of self-abnegation is taught; patience and endurance of pain and inconvenience for the sake of others is inculcated; and the crude spirit tamed and civilized!" The writer goes on to say: "The corset is an ever-present monitor, indirectly bidding its wearer to exercise self-restraint. If you want a girl to grow up gentle and womanly in her ways and feelings, lace her tight. Instead of the anti-corset party looking upon tight lacers as people devoid of brains and hearts, let them see in a well-corseted waist the evidence of a well-disciplined mind and well-regulated feelings and affections." These are the enlightened views of an English writer—whether man or woman, we know not—in this nineteenth century. We would be unwilling to believe, however, that many English men or women were of similar opinions.

In the same magazine from which we have quoted in the preceding paragraph there is an account of the sudden death of a young woman twenty-one years old. A post-mortem examination was made by the coroner's order, when it was found that the whole of the organs of the body were contracted and out of their places. Her stomach was smaller than that of an ordinary infant, and her heart only weighed four ounces. Death arose from congestion of the lungs and brain, the result of tight lacing—a practice which the young woman, who was of prepossessing appearance, had long persevered in. The body was fearfully emaciated, and the attending physician stated that it was the most remarkable case of the kind that had ever come under his notice. The coroner said that he never remembered in his experience a case in which lacing had been carried to such an extent. The jury returned a verdict of death from congestion of the lungs and brain, produced by tight lacing.

Last fall the work of transplanting evergreen trees from the Central Park to the Battery was commenced. This spring it has been renewed. Already over three thousand trees have been set out, and soon the number will be increased to four thousand. These have been taken from localities in the Central Park which were overcrowded, and needed "thinning out." The soil of the Battery is peculiarly well adapted to the growth of evergreens, and they give promise of thriving. Flower gardens are also to be laid out in the Battery, fountains to be erected, and bird-houses provided for the sparrows. Thus a delightful breathing-place will be furnished to those who live in the lower part of the city, reminding the oldest inhabitants of former times when the Battery was a fashionable resort on a pleasant afternoon.

The sacrifice of fine horses for the necessities of the people during the siege of Paris was immense. In one instance a splendid pair of carriage-horses, which cost only a few months since $1000, were sent to the abattoirs, the proprietor receiving just $240 for them; and a splendid English horse, which cost more than $5000, was taken at the same rate. The animals in the Jardin des Plantes and the Jardin d'Acclimation were all sold at fancy prices.

A "Dodge Club" has been organized in Boston, the chief qualification for membership being skill in dodging creditors.

Over 2000 persons signed a ridiculous petition, which was laid before the French National Assembly at Bordeaux, requesting that a law be passed prohibiting the teaching of the German language and the circulation of German journals in France. Such a kind of revenge would not injure any but the French.

A prophetess has arisen in Louisville, Kentucky; young, only nineteen years of age, and, of course, beautiful, though upon that point we have not been specially informed. She falls into spasms and trances upon occasions, during which she makes revelations of the future, some of which are appalling. According to this sibyl we are to have a dry, hot summer, a new and terribly fatal epidemic, and another more frightful European war in 1872. In about a dozen years after this a great religious war will extend over the whole world, lasting nine years; and after that other dreadful things will happen, so that the inhabitants of the world will "stand in fear." This prophetess, however, will escape all these troubles, as she predicts for herself that in seven years from now she will fall into a trance, which will end in her death.

A beautiful specimen of rose-tinted honey was lately contributed by a London firm to the South Kensington Museum. On inquiry, it proved to be the result of an experiment instituted by a lady. Having a swarm of bees in a hive with a glass cover, she noticed that after making two small pieces of comb they ceased work. She then began to feed them with honey mixed with water highly colored with cochineal, and scented with rose-water. The result was thirty-three pounds of rose-tinted honey.

Not less than six thousand policemen are necessary to keep in something like obedience to the law the vast number of disorderly persons who throng the streets of London. With 140,000 habitual gin-drinkers, 10,000 professional gamblers, 50,000 professional thieves, and 500,000 habitual frequenters of public-houses, the six thousand police must be kept busy.

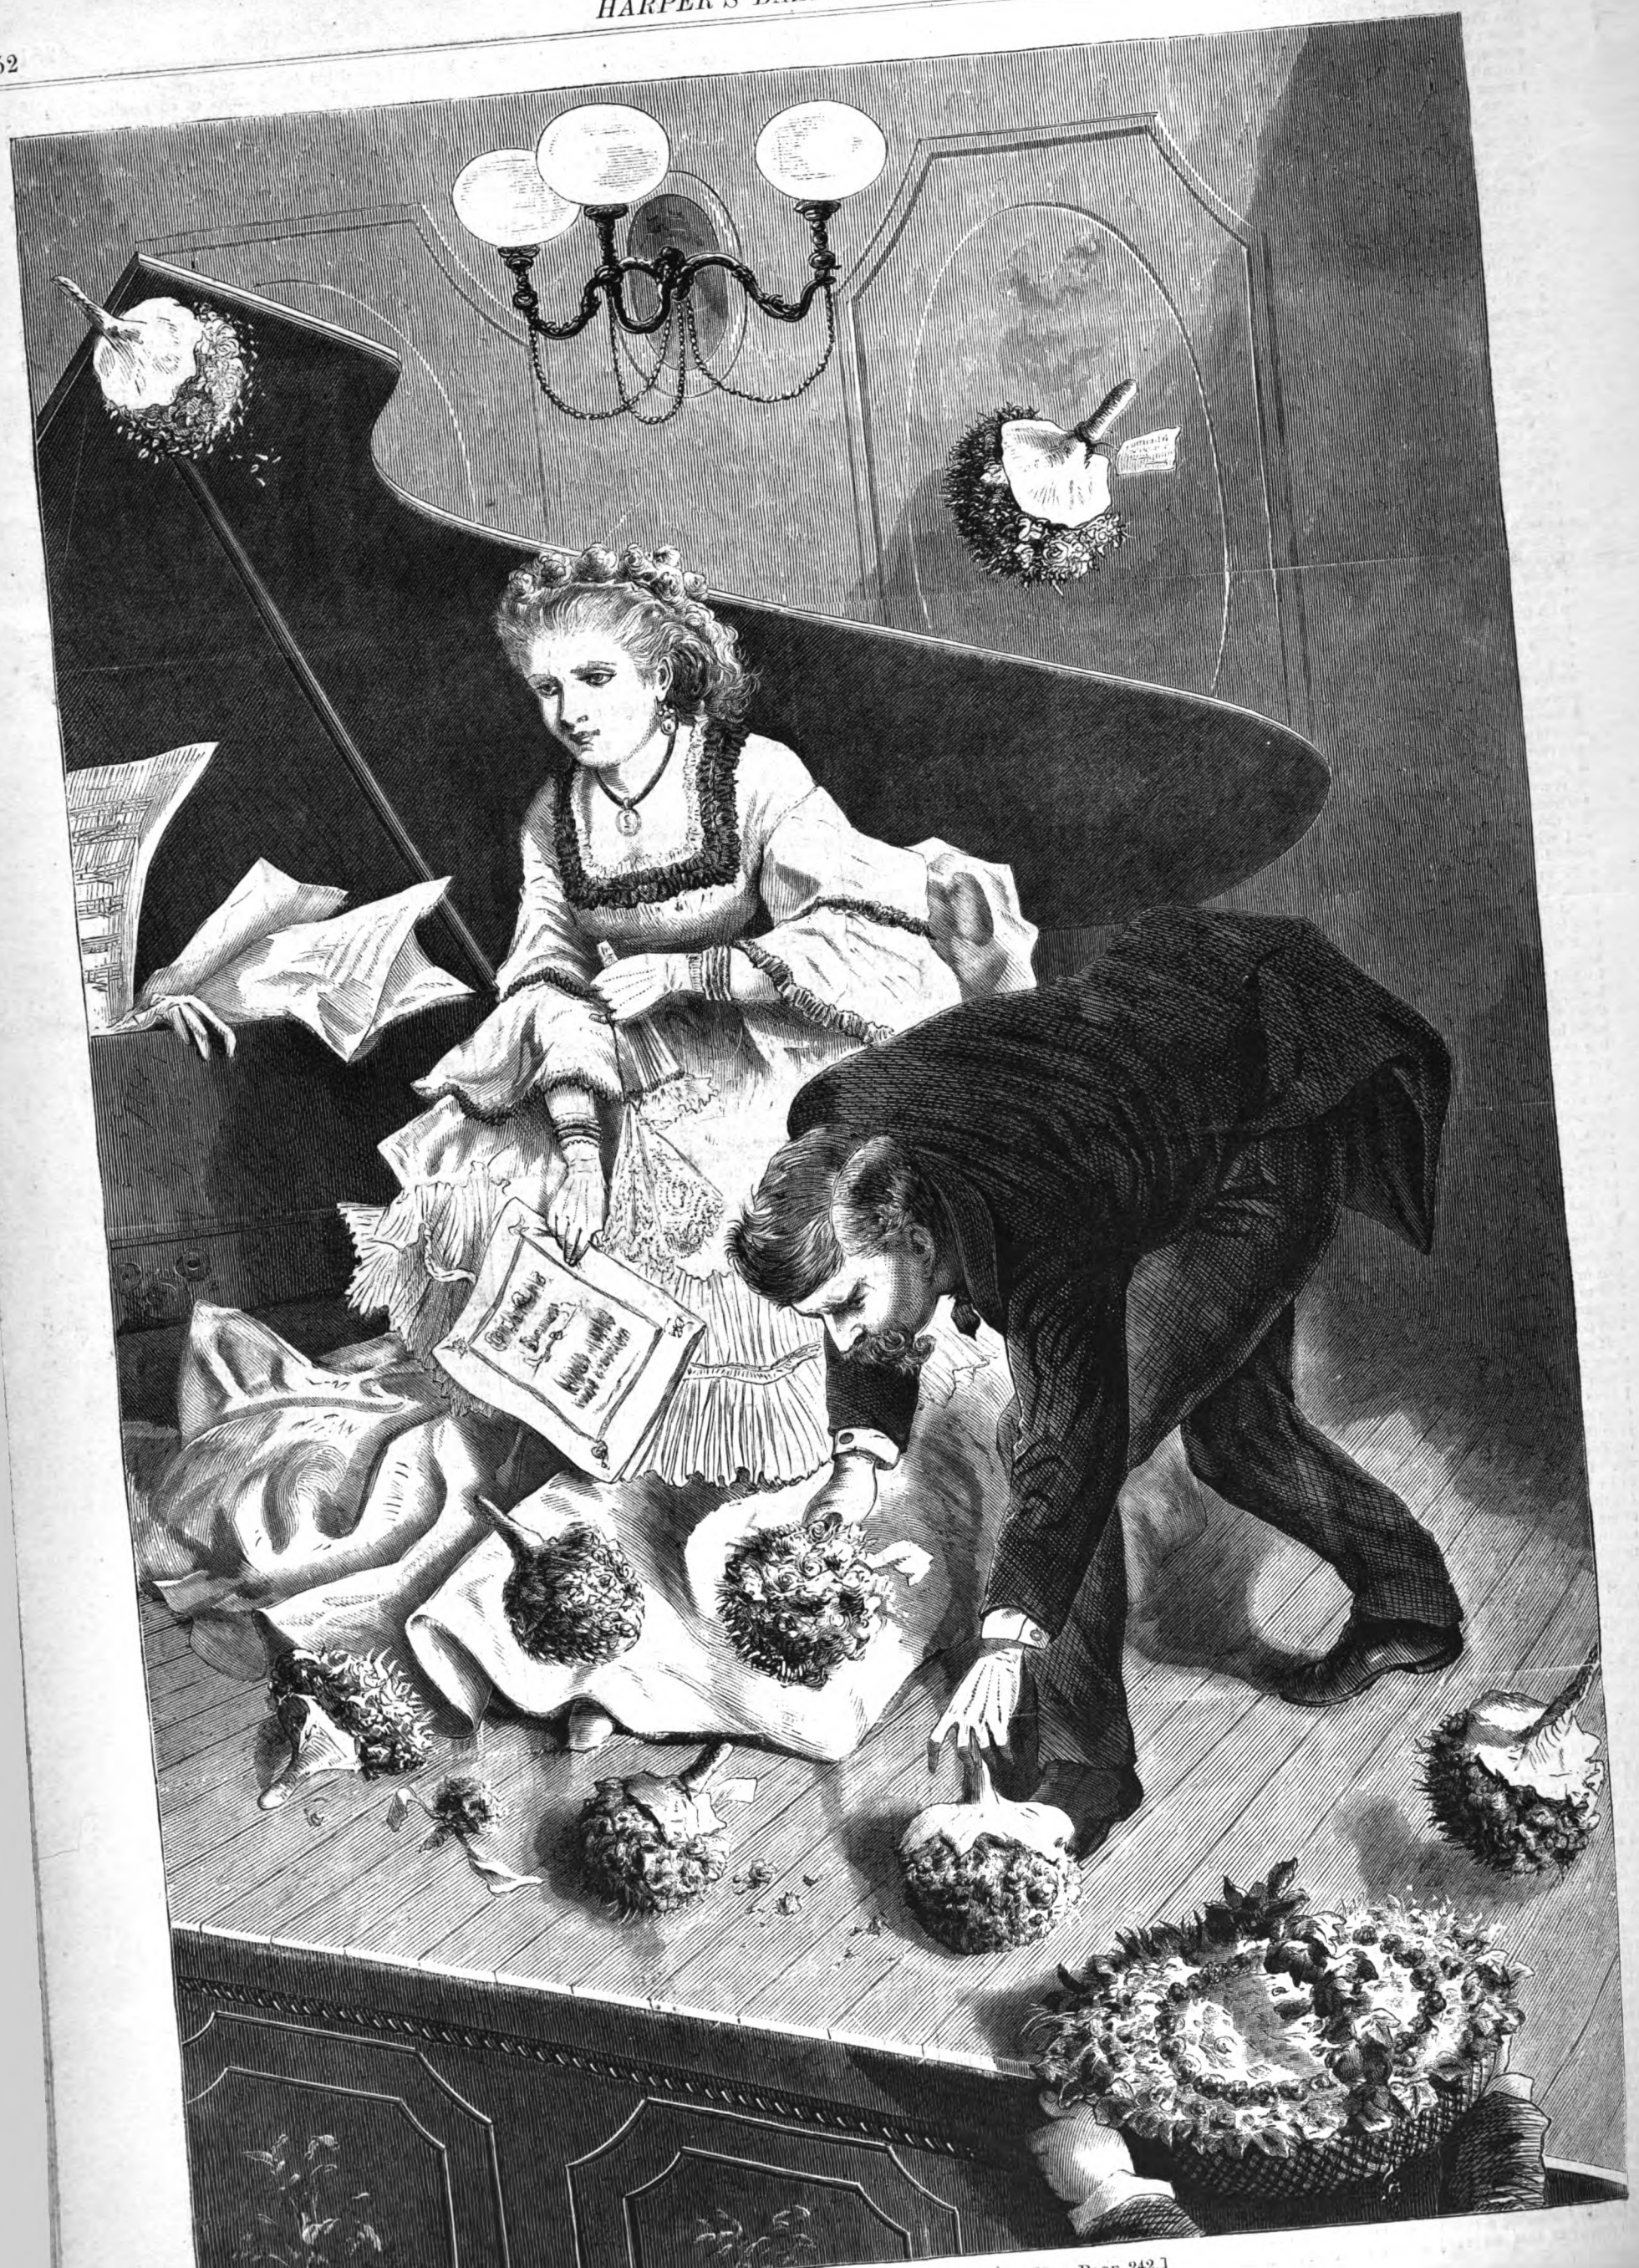
The Chicago Tribune thinks it would be a curious problem for a woman to find out from mankind what is really expected of her. Man adores helplessness, and says it ruins him. He talks about economy, and raves over spendthrifts. He decries frivolity, and runs away from brains. He pines after his grandmother, who could make pies, and falls in love with white hands that can't. He moans over weakness, and ridicules strength. He condemns fashion theoretically, and the lack of it practically. He longs for sensible women, and passes them by on the other side. He worships saints, and sends them to convents. He despises pink and white women, and marries them if he can. He abuses silks and laces, and takes them into his heart. He glorifies spirit and independence, and gives a cruel thrust at the little vines that want to be oaks. What would the critical lords desire?

If you don't know large words use little ones, and do not make yourself ridiculous by attempting what you can not accomplish. Otherwise you may find yourself in the position of the rich but ignorant Boston lady, who, being ambitious that her style of conversation should be up to the mark, said, in speaking of a friend, "He is a paragram of politeness!"

"Excuse me," said a wag sitting next to her; "but do you not mean parallelogram?"

"Of course I meant parallelogram," replied the ambitious lady. "How could I have made such a mistake?"

Digitized by Google



"HONORS."—DRAWN BY C. G. BUSH.—[SEE PAGE 242.]

Digitized by Google

LIFE IN DRESDEN.

[FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.]

THE festivities with which Dresden has just celebrated the return of peace may be said to have begun with the ringing of bells, and firing of cannon, and general display of banners that followed the publication of the telegram announcing the ratification of the treaty in France, though Sunday, March 5, was the day set apart for a grand demonstration of the public joy. On the Thursday evening previous the theatre was opened for a special recognition of the happy fact, on which occasion the "Jubel Overture" of Weber and the overture to "Iphigenia" were played, and an original prologue, illustrated by scenery and characters, recited, followed by the performance of "Wallenstein's Lager."

The King was present, and his appearance was the signal for a burst of uproarious cheers, the duration and force of which embarrassed somewhat the action of the orchestra, and might, perhaps, justly be regarded (in consideration of time and place) as more creditable to the loyalty than to the good taste of the audience. Also the less pretentious places of amusement assumed a festal appearance, and arranged their entertainments to suit the prevailing sentiments of gratitude and joy; and from every concert-hall resounded the famous "Jubel Overture" of Weber, which includes the universal national hymn, "God save the King"—a native of Germany, though claimed and appropriated especially by England.

On Saturday evening the members of the School of Art and of the Polytechnic School united in a torch-light procession, representing the return of Frederick Barbarossa to his former dominions. An old legend says that this hero is not dead, but is sleeping in the heart of the Kyffhäuser Mountain, in Thuringia, and that he will awake and come forth when Germany shall have recovered its ancient greatness and renown. Occasionally he rouses himself sufficiently to send out one of his attendant spirits to see whether the ravens are still hovering over the mountain-top; for, until they depart, he knows that Germany has not achieved freedom and independence.

The recent magnificent victories in war, and, still more, their result in the unification of the long dismembered provinces of the Fatherland, are, to the minds of the enthusiastic citizens, cause sufficient to break the slumber that has lasted nearly seven hundred years, and to bring back in triumph the patient awaiter of his country's happy destiny. Accordingly, escorted by his faithful companions, among whom were two knights bearing two ravens, and followed by the gorgeous train of champions in love and war that constituted a medieval court, the Emperor, clad in royal costume, his red beard turned to mossy gray in his long tarrying, made his joyful entry into Dresden on the eve of the anniversary of his first coronation.

The procession, escorted by bands of music, marched through the principal streets, halting before the palace to receive the greeting of the King, and then returned to the open square in front of the Polytechnic School, where they gave up their torches to a common bonfire, and united in singing the favorite student song, "Gaudeamus igitur;" after which the two schools separated to spend the rest of the evening at two noted restaurants, and the vast crowd of spectators dispersed quietly to their homes.

During the progress of the procession one of those strange contrasts of incident occurred which occasionally present the sum of human existence with the force of an epigram. As the gay throng, lit up by the blazing torches, and still further illuminated by the Bengal lights burned in their honor by the citizens whose houses they passed, reached the open square in front of the post-office, they were met by a hearse and a train of mourners on the way to one of the cemeteries. But the dead must give way to the living on this joyful occasion, and so the mournful carriage, with its sweeping black pall covering the inanimate occupant, remained stationary, while the patriotic youths made the air resound with Körner's song, "Du Schwert an meiner Linken;" after which the resuscitated Emperor and his companions went one way, and the sleeper, whom was carried another.

"No sound shall awaken to glory again,"

Even the sky of Dresden had not the face to rain or cloud upon the great day of the Friedens-Fest; the sun shone warm and soft out of a heaven as blue as that of summer, and the streets and squares were as clean and dry as only a European pavement is ever known to be. Before noon the people began to assemble in the great square of the Alt-Markt (old market), and every window of the lofty buildings surrounding its four sides was filled with eager faces. In the centre of the square, upon a high pedestal, stood a colossal statue of Germania, the work of a Dresden sculptor; and surrounding this figure, upon a raised platform, were seated the members of various musical societies of the city, the whole group being separated from the surrounding crowd by a barrier of standards, including not only the various colors of Germany, but those of many friendly nations, among which the Stars and Stripes were conspicuous.

At noon the bells of the churches began to ring, and continued till one o'clock; and close upon their melodious jangle followed the grand old choral, "Nun danket Alle Gott," led by a band of stringed instruments and the corps of professional singers, and increased to a magnificent volume of sound by the thousands of voices of men, women, and children in the dense mass of humanity that completely filled the market-place. When the hymn was ended the Mayor of Dresden appeared in the balcony of the Rathhaus (City Hall), and delivered a brief, enthusiastic apostrophe to the statue which rose before him as the embodiment of the idea that had taken possession of every patriotic soul.

His speech was followed by three prolonged cheers, after which the whole multitude joined in the triumphant song of "Die Wacht am Rhein," followed by Arndt's popular "Vaterland's Lied."

But, interesting as the ceremonies were, and delightful as it was for grateful souls to expand in the warm sunshine, every one remembered that the principal entertainment was reserved for the universal illumination in the evening. Accordingly, with the shades of night the massive stone city became a fairy capital. The common mode of illuminating was by rows of small lamps, placed so as to outline the building in beaded flames. The plain angles of the Polytechnic School and the graceful Greek façade of the Guard House were especially suited to this severe test of proportion. But many conspicuous edifices were distinguished by elaborate designs in gas-light, and there was scarcely a shop in the market-places and on the principal business streets but had in its windows or over its doors some illuminated figure suggestive of the recent struggle and its triumphant end. The City Hall was resplendent in the double eagle and crown of the empire, and the ciphers of King William and King John, and of the Saxon princes, Albert and George, each surrounded by an olive wreath. These devices were so finely perforated that the gas streamed from them in extremely slender jets, producing a very delicate and beautiful effect. Several houses bore upon their fronts illuminated portraits of the kings of Prussia, Saxony, and Bavaria, and others displayed allusions to Frederick Barbarossa and the first German empire. The favorite allegorical figure of "Die Wacht am Rhein" was portrayed in gas flames and upon painted glass; and the busts of mighty men whom the war has developed looked out from various windows and niches, wearing olive wreaths of peace in place of laurel crowns of victory. The principal entrances to the royal palace were brilliantly lighted with appropriate designs in gas, the long bridge was gorgeous with obelisks and garlands and Chinese lanterns, and many buildings on the opposite side of the river were illuminated with splendor and good taste.

It is needless to say that an immense and constantly changing crowd filled the open squares, and passed slowly through the narrow streets, observing as they went, and commenting on what they saw, till the sound of their united voices was like the roar of many waters.

In such a confusion of tongues it was difficult to distinguish a connected sentence; but one criticism has, fortunately, been handed down as too good to be lost. It was that of two countrymen, who, after gaping in astonishment at the Germania, began to speculate as to the design of the figure. "Who can that be?" said one. "It must be the new Emperor!" replied the other, stoutly. "Nay, nay," cried the first; "he does not look like that: it must be Bismarck!" After a while they ventured to ask a well-dressed citizen who stood near; but when he good-naturedly tried to give them the idea of Germany represented as a female figure, surrounded by the insignia of power, victory, and peace, they utterly failed to comprehend, and replied, in amazement, "Nay, nay; we have never in all our lives heard of this woman!" This incident is in keeping with the story told of certain soldiers in Berlin, who, wandering one day about the museum, came to a marble group of the Three Graces, and, after gazing for a long time upon the beautiful figures, asked a bystander "Which of these three is 'Old Fritz?'"

It reminds one, too, of Randolph Rogers's anecdote of three Englishwomen who once visited his studio in Rome, and, after surveying his various creations, paused before the Nydia and asked what it was intended to represent. He replied, "Nydia, the blind girl of Pompeii."

"What did he say?" asked one of the party, who was very deaf. Whereupon her friend turned to her and bawled in her ear, "He says it is Nubia, the blind girl of Bombay!"

Not less funny was the remark of the little boy in Ann Arbor, soon after the arrival of the Nydia at the University, who urged his playfellow to go with him to the museum and see the new "image of a blind idiot!" What's in a name?

At half past seven, as duly advertised, the procession of carriages, headed by those of the royal family and the court, commenced their progress through the principal streets; but many others, which were not at the appointed rendezvous in season, were excluded by the police, and their occupants were obliged to wait patiently, or impatiently, in the comparatively gloomy region of the Palace Place until nearly eleven o'clock, when the foot passengers had retired in sufficient numbers to allow carriages to traverse the city without danger to the people. The King was loudly cheered along the entire course, and his appearance was the signal for the burning of Bengal-lights and other sudden and intense flames, which served to mark his progress, and bring out the gay scene into stronger relief. Notwithstanding the enormous crowds and the narrowness of many of the thoroughfares, the festivities passed off without any severe accident. Only one death is reported as resulting from the occasion, and that was a case of fatal apoplexy, induced by the excitement of the scene rather than by the pressure of the crowd. An aged couple from the country were thrown down and somewhat bruised in a struggle at the entrance of a narrow street, and on being rescued by the police, were carried off in different directions for surgical help. In their pain and confusion the greatest suffering of both was in having lost each other, and after they were safely stowed away in a hospital they ceased not through the weary watches of the night to lament this their first separation for many years. What was the surprise and joy of both on discovering, by the next morning's light, that they had been placed by accident in adjoining beds, and were all the while no further apart than they would have been in their quiet cottage! And in a few hours their son came to carry them home, where, no doubt, they will often recall the wondrous scenes in the great city, and the alarm which found so comical and agreeable a termination.

Amidst the general rejoicings on the great feast-day the poor and the suffering were not forgotten. A dinner was furnished to all who needed it, and delicacies were provided for the sick and wounded in all the hospitals, without distinction between friend and foe. Each man also, whether German, French, or Turco, received a present of a thaler in money.

The French prisoners were conspicuous by their absence from the public festivities. A few individuals in the showy but shabby French uniform were to be seen in the crowd, but one missed the squads and companies which have been a common sight for the last few months. The truth is that some among them have lately taken advantage of the lenity with which they are treated, and have abused their liberty in many acts of lawlessness and insolence, which finally led to their being restricted to the boundaries of their barracks, after a posse of them had ventured so far as to jostle the military governor of Dresden off the sidewalk, instead of giving the customary salute on meeting him. These were exceptional cases, however, and the majority seem to have appreciated a hospitality not usually bestowed upon prisoners of war; and now that they are about to return home, a vote of thanks has been presented to the officials and citizens of Dresden for their friendly attention to the wants of their temporary captives.

THE LAST GERMAN IN PARIS.

Digitized by Google

No doubt many a wanderer, besides the writer, turned at last from the brilliant streets on that festal night to spend a few moments in the quiet court of the Zwinger, illuminated only by the pure light of the full moon, where the statue of Frederick the Just now presides over long rows of cannon and mitrailleuses, recently acquired trophies from the seat of war. It was difficult to connect those now silent and harmless weapons with the tumultuous rejoicings going on outside the walls that inclosed them, just as it is difficult to realize that this splendid edifice of the Zwinger, now devoted to the guardianship of the choicest treasures of art and science, was originally a fortress, built under the dictation of that reliance upon brute force which is gradually disappearing under the influence of increasing knowledge, and a consequent recognition of the claims of a common humanity. E.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

OHIO.—Use bias bands of silk the color of your poplin on the polonaise, and put alternate ruffles of silk and poplin on the skirt. A suit of two shades of brown pongee would be pretty for your daughter. A little paletot of cloth will answer for an outside wrap.

ANITA.—Get the pattern of the Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., for your poplin. Trim by directions above to "Ohio." A pale blue bow will answer. Round hat or gipsy of brown straw.

IGNORAMUS.—Silk of the quality like your sample is sold here for about $1 50 a yard. Garnet silk the same price. Gros grain is pronounced as if spelled gro-gran, and trousseau as if written troo-so. Mauve is a pink-tinged lilac.

DERDU.—You did perfectly right to request your friend to invite your guests to her party.

AUSTIN.—Your sample is all silk, worth $2 75 or $3 a yard. Make by the Postilion-Basque Suit pattern, and trim with lace and passementerie. We can not reply by mail.

E. F. B.—We furnish no cut paper patterns other than those advertised in the present Number. By sending ten cents and your address you can order the Bazar you want, and get with it the lost Supplement.

S. P. L.—You are mistaken in saying that we ever announced that we would make purchases for readers at a distance. We have repeatedly declined to do so, and have no time to answer by mail.

ANITA G. T.—For making a calico suit read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. Make your alpaca by pattern of Postilion-Basque Suit in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and trim with bias gros grain bands and pleatings of the same. We do not like velvet on alpaca. Take the satin binding off your ruffles and hem them. Then make a false postilion of your short over-skirt.

M. L. H.—Figure 2 in Bazar No. 12, Vol. IV., will be a good model for your green empress cloth dress. Striped shawls worn scarf fashion are used this spring. Get a pale buff linen suit for your girl of ten.

C. L.—Get black beaver mohair for your one best dress, or, if you can afford a greater outlay, black silk. Make by the Postilion-Basque Suit in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

COUNTRY GREENHORN.—It is proper for a young girl to wear mourning for her intended husband. Milliner's folds are narrow bias folds of silk lapped on the outside, but the seam concealed.

FOURTEENTH STREET.—It was very inconsiderate, to say the least, to "drag the poor bride around the room, introducing her to strangers." It would have been better manners to have brought the strangers to her, and presented them in the way you mention.

CORIANDER.—A linen dress and one of grenadine would look well trimmed the way you propose.—There is no charge for these answers.

STUARTIA.—The German verse will do very well for an infant's tombstone, if you insist on this kind of monumental inscription. But to our mind the simple record of name and age is in far better taste than any hackneyed lines could be. Elaine is pronounced El-ane, and Guinevere Gwe-ne-vēre. The character of host enforces on you even greater restraint than that of guest in speaking your mind freely; in this respect neither your own house nor your neighbor's is strictly neutral ground.—We can give you no information about the advertised article other than is contained in the advertisement.

MARY.—We see no more impropriety in your going to the theatre with a gentleman than to any other place of amusement; still it is not in accordance with the usages of society for a young lady, whether engaged or not, to go to any place of the kind without a chaperon.

ETIQUETTE.—It is incumbent on you to trace the origin of your costly anonymous presents—which is not usually a very difficult matter—when your own judgment will tell you whether you are warranted or not in accepting them.

MISS L. S.—We have repeatedly declined to answer questions concerning MSS. in this column. All inquiries of this kind should be addressed to Harper & Brothers.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—You had better consult a pronouncing dictionary for the long list of words you send us.—Adelina Patti is a sister of Carlotta.—We have nothing to add to the article you quote, which is the result of a traveler's observations.

BESSIE AND LUCY.—We are tired of saying that we know of no cosmetic that will certainly remove tan and freckles. When we discover one we intend to make a fortune by it.—It is proper and courteous to invite a gentleman to enter the house on returning from a concert or lecture, unless the lateness of the hour forbids.—When a verbal invitation is given you, what other course, pray, is open to you than to accept or refuse in like manner? And if you need a formula in which to do this, your conversational powers must be limited indeed.

FIVE CENTS.—Your sister's plan of transferring our tapestry patterns to profile paper, first marking them by pencil dots, and then coloring the squares, seems to us admirable, and we commend it to all our readers who are interested in the art of worsted-work made easy.

POCAHONTAS.—There is nothing better than glycerine for the hair. Rub it on the scalp, and brush your hair thoroughly. A mixture of lime-water and glycerine makes a good hair wash. We advise you to stop the use of camphor.

OLD LADY.—The clergyman you mention is a Methodist.—We can not think of establishing a definition so delicate as the age at which a lady may be called elderly; moreover, this age is as shifting as the quicksands, and depends on so many other circumstances than mere years that we must leave each individual to settle it for herself.

M. E. M.—Pack your flowers in a box and surround them with a thin layer of wet cotton. The stems should be thrust in wet moss or earth. In this way they may be sent for a considerable distance without material injury.

N. D.—We can not give you the addresses you ask in this column. You can obtain good manuals of phonography from almost any book-store. The length of time required to learn the art depends on your aptitude, and varies usually from three months to a year.

EYELASHES.—See answer to "An Admirer."

SAMUEL.—It certainly ought not to be a breach of etiquette to accept a wedding invitation without making a bridal present, nor would it be thus considered by persons of delicate susceptibilities.

M. H. G.—You had better write directly to the principal of Vassar College for the information you need. A young lady of twenty-one could attend school there with perfect propriety.

A. G. S.—We pay for contributions just what we consider they are worth to us; and this is affected by so many considerations that we can not undertake to estimate it here.

AN ADMIRER.—We can give you no further information on the subject. But we beg to remind you that the eye is a delicate and useful organ, which should not be tampered with with impunity; and however much you may dislike light eyelashes, it is much better to wear them thus than to injure your sight by dyeing them with an unskillful hand.

BROOKLYN.—If you desire a gentleman's acquaintance, you will certainly invite him to repeat his first call.

F. & Co.—You can order the novel through any publisher.

VIOLET.—That a lady dislikes flowers certainly is not proof positive that she lacks refinement; though a love for them may be regarded as presumptive evidence that she possesses it.

A. M. W.—We do not know of any treatise on wax-flower making published in this country. The Bazar has given several useful papers on this pretty art.

THE Inebriate's Hope! C. C. BEERS, M.D., 12 E. Twelfth St., New York, permanently cures the worst cases of Intemperance. Call or send stamp for Evidence. Is harmless.—[Com.]

IF your hair is coming out or turning gray, do not murmur over a misfortune you can so easily avert. AYER'S HAIR VIGOR will remove the cause of your grief by restoring your hair to its natural color, and therewith your good looks and good nature.—[Com.]

PREMATURE grayness of the hair should be prevented, and the best and surest preventive is Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,
And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

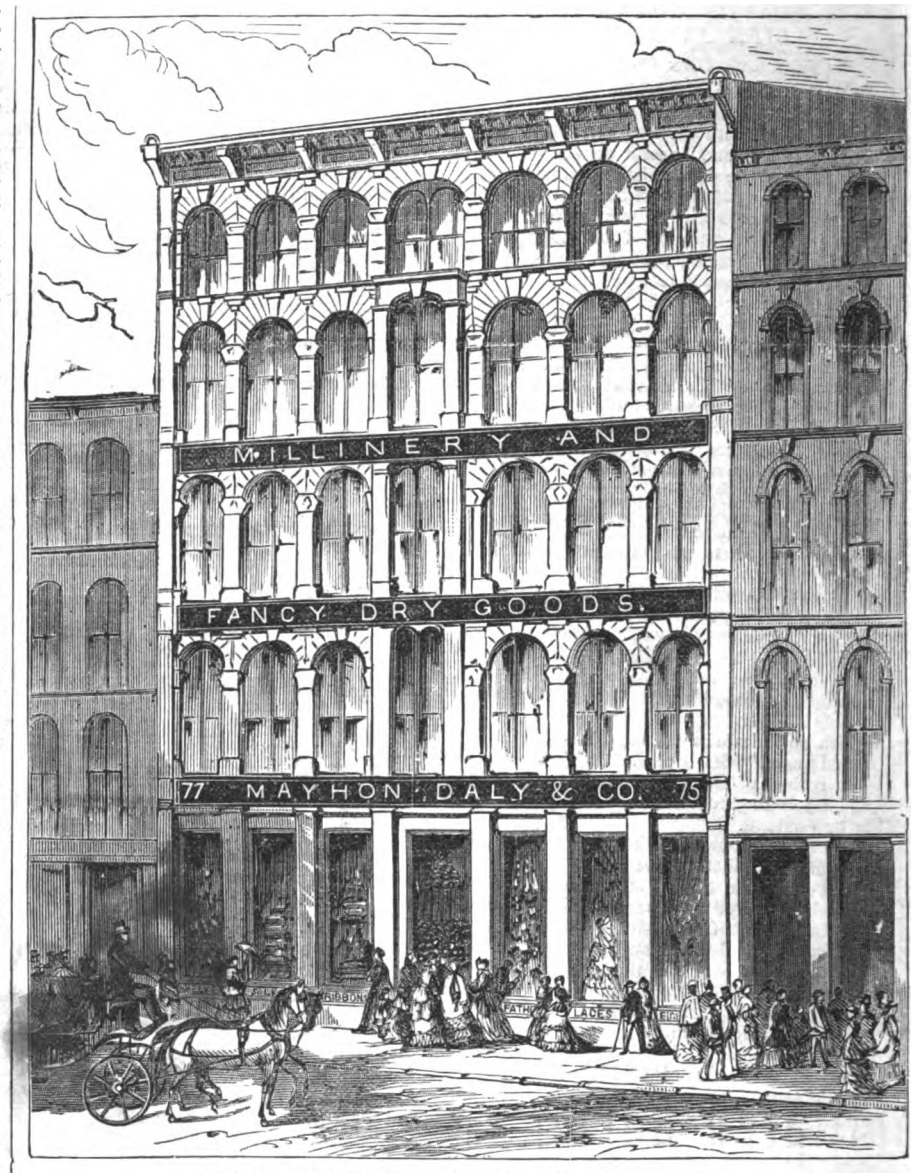
SWISS CARVED GOODS.
The Swiss Manufacturing Co., 36 East 14th St., Corner University Place, up stairs.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.
Organs & Melodeons.
The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.
46,000
Now in Use.
No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.
☞ Send for Price-Lists.
Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

No more suffering from corns, bunions, grown-in toe nails, sore heels, or pinched feet. Let the motto be "Sound feet on sound bodies." Read
THE HUMAN FEET, THEIR DRESS AND CARE: showing their natural shape, their present deformed condition, and how distorted toes and other defects are to be prevented or corrected; with directions for dressing them elegantly and comfortably. Illustrated. Price, prepaid first post, $1 25. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

KID GLOVES CLEANED, and returned in a few minutes, at the KID GLOVE DYE WORKS, 392 Bowery, N. Y. Country orders solicited.



MAYHON, DALY, & CO.,
IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN
SILKS, RIBBONS, LACES, STRAW GOODS,
MILLINERY ARTICLES, WHITE GOODS, EMBROIDERIES, GLOVES,
AND
FANCY GOODS,
75 & 77 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO.
☞ ALL ORDERS entrusted to our care will be promptly filled and shipped the day they are received.

SPRING STYLES
OF
RICHMOND PRINTS.
LADIES about buying their Spring
CALICOES
will find the latest and most tasteful designs in these standard goods.
ASK FOR THE
RICHMOND PRINTS.

EYRE AND LANDELL,
ARCH & FOURTH,
PHILADELPHIA,
DEALERS IN FINE DRY GOODS.

FOR
Hand and Machine Sewing.
J. & P. COATS'
BEST
SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,
From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.
FOR SALE BY
All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

THE NEW EMPIRE SEWING MACHINES
Prove a perfect success! The Company stands prepared to meet all demands on most desirable terms. Apply for Circulars, Samples, &c., to EMPIRE S. M. CO., 294 Bowery, N. Y.

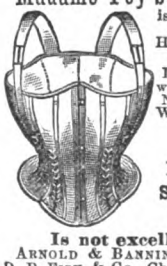
HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.
THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!
Agents wanted in every Town.
Send for Circular and sample Stocking to HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

RICH RARE, & RACY READING. Wit, humor, fun. Sent free. Address BANNER, Hinsdale, N. H.

Waltham Watches.
We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO.,
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
No. 865 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Madame Foy's Corset Skirt Supporter



is superior to all Corsets for Health, Comfort and Style.
Lady Agents wanted in all Northern and Western States.

THE PANAMA SKELETON CORSET
Is not excelled for Summer wear.
ARNOLD & BANNING, 56 Lispenard St., New York; D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago; Agents for the Supporters.
HARMON, BALDWIN & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers, New Haven, Conn.

FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE
Cleans Kid Gloves and all kinds of Cloths and Clothing; removes Paint, Grease, Tar, &c., instantly, without the least injury to the finest fabric. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE CO., 33 Barclay St., New York; 46 La Salle St., Chicago.

THE UNIVERSAL Thread and Twine Cutter saves time, twine, thread, fingers, and teeth. It is a neat little device, which may be attached to the coat, vest, lady's dress or work-basket. Samples mailed on receipt of price: Silver plated, 25c.; Gold plated, 50c. Address
GEO. BETTS, 581 Broadway, N. Y.,
Sole Proprietor for the U. S.
First Premium by the American Institute, 1870.

READ "Convent Life Unveiled." by Edith O'Gorman. Price $1 50. CT. PUB. CO., Hartford, Ct.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND

SILK-FINISHED
BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

PATENT DUPLEX
Ventilated Garter.

This elegant Garter surpasses in beauty and comfort any thing of the kind ever worn. It is made of a double row of spiral spring wire, heavily plated with silver and gold, and so arranged as not to impede the free circulation of the blood, thus insuring warm feet, while it leaves the limbs quite unmarked. The invaluable qualities which are attributed to the Ventilated Spring Garter have gained for it the entire confidence of the most eminent members of the medical profession; and it is emphatically pronounced the only Garter fit to be worn by invalids. The Patent Duplex Ventilated Garter is sold wholesale by every respectable Jobbing House in the City of New York. Also sold by

J. & R. S. Tucker, Raleigh, N. C.
David Young & Co., Philadelphia, Pa.
D. R. Young & Co., Louisville, Ky.
McAlpine, Polk, & Hilben, Cincinnati, Ohio.
Root & Barber, Detroit, Mich.
H. M. Sweetser, Evansville, Ind.
Field, Leiter, & Co., Chicago., Ill.
John V. Farwell, & Co., Chicago, Ill.
E. I. Baldwin & Co., Cleveland, Ohio.
H. D. Kendall & Co., Cleveland, Ohio.
Millers, Green, & Joyce, Columbus, Ohio.
Pollock, Thompson, & Co., St. Louis, Mo.
William Barr & Co., St. Louis, Mo.
D. C. Griswold & Co., Boston, Mass.
Claflin, Larrabee, & Co., Boston, Mass.
Hilben, Tarkington, & Co., Lafayette, Ind.
H. T. Simon & Gregory, St. Louis, Mo.
William Semple, Alleghany City, Pa.
Joseph Horne & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.
F. H. Eaton & Co., Pittsburgh, Pa.
Ferdinand Myers & Co., Baltimore, Md.
Isaac Greenbaum & Co., Baltimore, Md.
John Shilletto & Co., Cincinnati, Ohio.
Henry Plumb, New Haven, Conn.
Root & Co., Fort Wayne, Ind.
Tuell, Ripley, & Co., Terre Haute, Ind.
Einstein & Eckman, Savannah, Ga.
Gray & Co., Savannah, Ga.
John Bell & Co., Dubuque, Iowa.
H. S. Manville, Milwaukee, Wis.
C. E. Spencer & Co., New Orleans, La.
P. H. Pepper, Mobile, Ala.
Forbes, Richardson, & Co., Boston, Mass.
Mackey, Nisbet, & Co., Evansville, Ind.
F. Hopkins & Co., Evansville, Ind.
L. D. Anthony & Co., Providence, R. I.
S. O. Barnum & Co., Buffalo, N. Y.
J. R. Franklin & Co., St. Louis, Mo.
P. C. Woodruff & Co., Auburn, N. Y.
George Cox & Sons, Maysville, Ky.
Carson Pirie & Co., Chicago, Ill.
Menken Brothers, Memphis, Tenn.
Day Brothers & Co., Peoria, Ill.
J. T. & R. P. Herpin, Mobile, Ala.
D. B. Fisk & Co., Chicago, Ill.
D. M. & E. G. Halbert, Binghampton, N. Y.

GEORGE BETTS, Sole Agent,
543 Broadway, New York.

"There's nothing like it."

"Don't wish for better." "Better than any other we have used." "Like it much." "Can't speak too highly of it." "There can be no fault found with it." "Can testify to its superiority." "Don't use any other." These are a few quotations from the hundreds of testimonials in favor of DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER, which is the only chemically pure, harmless, healthy, and nutritious article of the kind in market. Perfectly reliable, easy to use, convenient, and recommended by all. For sale by grocers. DOOLEY & BROTHER, Proprietors, 69 New Street, New York.

$10 MEDALLION SEWING MACHINE. Price reduced. Monthly payments, 30 days on trial. Sews everything a needle will go through. Samples of sewing free. Agents wanted. Address MEDALLION MACHINE CO., 71 Nassau St., N. Y.

HOMAI'S PERSIAN WASH

REMOVES MOTH PATCH, TAN, & FRECKLES. Never fails. For sale by all Druggists.
B. F. RACKLEY, Proprietor, Dover, N. H.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

in

BROCATELS, SILK REPS, POMPADOUR SATINS, PARIS QUALITY TAPESTRY AND STRIPED TERRYS, &c.,

for Curtains and Furniture Coverings.

And they will also offer a lot of

ELEGANT BROCHE BROCATELS,

64 inches wide, $9 per yard; former price, $15.

FIGURED COTELINES REDUCED FROM $8 TO $6 PER YARD.

FRENCH STRIPED TERRYS REDUCED FROM $5 TO $3 75.

AN IMMENSE STOCK

of

LACE AND NOTTINGHAM CURTAINS,

at

EXTREMELY LOW PRICES.

Forming the largest and most attractive assortment in the city.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

LINEN DEPARTMENT.

Extraordinary Bargains in Damask Napkins, Table-Cloths, Doylies, Pillow-Case Linens, and Sheetings.
500 dozen Full Size Heavy Huck Towels, at $2 50 per dozen; Extra Size Fine Goods, $3 and upward.
Richardson's celebrated Linens, in all qualities.
On Monday next, and following days, in addition to our usual well-selected stock, we shall offer some very cheap lots.
Buyers of Sheetings, Quilts, and Housekeeping Goods will find this an excellent opportunity of securing Extraordinary Value in their Purchases.

HOSIERY.

Spring and Summer supply now open of
Ladies' Real Balbriggan Hose, in Sandal Lace and Embroidered.
Ladies' and Children's Imitation Balbriggan Hose.
Ladies' and Children's Silk and Spun Hose, in Tartans and Fancy Stripes.
English and German Lisle-Thread Hose, plain and open work.
Ladies' and Children's Fancy Lisle-Thread and Cotton Hose.
Ladies' Silk and Lisle-Thread Opera Hose.
Men's Cotton, Lisle Thread.
Real and Imitation Balbrigg.n.
Plain and Fancy Silk Half Hose, of every description.

UNDERWEAR.

Ladies', Gentlemen's, and Children's Silk Gauze and Gossamer Merino Vests and Drawers,
Medicated Scarlet Ditto, &c., &c.,
AT EXCEEDINGLY LOW PRICES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth St.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13
POSTILLION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 15

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

50 CENTS—THE WEEKLY WISCONSIN, the Great Story Paper, containing all of the thrilling story entitled BLACK SHEEP, by Edmund Yates, continuing four months, commencing April 12. The best and cheapest weekly paper printed. Terms, $1 50 per year; 50 cents four months. Address CRAMER, AIKENS, & CRAMER, Milwaukee, Wis.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

Be Merciful to Yourself. Do not aggravate dyspepsia with medicines that rack and weaken the body, nor render constipation chronic with rasping purgatives that leave the bowels paralyzed. Gently and without pain, TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT carries off the accretions in the alimentary canal, at the same time toning the stomach, improving the appetite, promoting healthy perspiration, and refreshing the whole system. It is a luxurious draught, in which a hundred healthful elements are blended.

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

LADY'S TROUSSEAU "A"

FOR $150.

3 Muslin Chemises	@	$2 00..	$6 00
3 Linen "	@	5 00..	15 00
3 Pairs of Muslin Drawers	@	2 00..	6 00
3 " Linen "	@	3 00..	9 00
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@	2 50..	7 50
3 Tucked " "	@	3 50..	10 50
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@	4 00..	12 00
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@	6 00..	18 00
3 Embr'd " " Tucked Yokes	@	8 00..	24 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	6 00..	12 00
2 Corset Covers	@	3 50..	7 00
2 Dressing Sacques	@	4 00..	8 00
1 Delaine Robe de Chambre			15 00
			$150 00

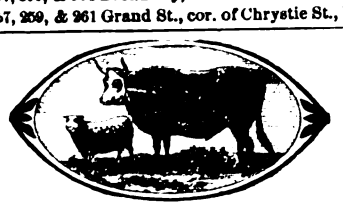
The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Complete directions for Self-Measurement sent by mail, if desired.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT,

LORD & TAYLOR,

895, 897, 899, & 901 Broadway, cor. of Twentieth Street,
255, 257, 259, & 261 Grand St., cor. of Chrystie St., N. Y.

Use none but



THE BEST!!!

TRADE MARK.

SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION.

Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in housekeeping!! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the same that received the highest prizes at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and that is supplied to the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signature of BARON LIEBIG, the inventor, on every jar.

J. MILHAU'S SONS, Company's Agents, 183 Broadway, New York. For sale every where.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!
For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address
Wilson Sewing Machine Co.,
CLEVELAND, O. or ST. LOUIS, MO.

AGENTS WANTED.

ILLUSTRATIONS

Of Target Practice, Description, Price-List, &c., of the celebrated

MAYNARD RIFLES AND SHOT-GUNS

sent on request by letter addressed to
MASS. ARMS CO., Chicopee Falls, Mass.

TO THE WORKING CLASS.—We are now prepared to furnish all classes with constant employment at home, the whole of the time or for the spare moments. Business new, light and profitable. Persons of either sex easily earn from 50c. to $5 per evening, and a proportional sum by devoting their whole time to the business. Boys and girls earn nearly as much as men. That all who see this notice may send their address, and test the business, we make this unparalleled offer: To such as are not well satisfied, we will send $1 to pay for the trouble of writing. Full particulars, a valuable sample, which will do to commence work on, and a copy of The People's Literary Companion—one of the largest and best family newspapers published—all sent free by mail. Reader, if you want permanent, profitable work, address E. C. ALLEN & CO., Augusta, Maine.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

CURL YOUR HAIR!

A BOTTLE of MAGNETIC CURLIQUE sent Free for 25 cts. It curls straight hair in beautiful curls on the first application, and will remain in curl 10 days.
Address R. BYRON & CO., Garrettsville, Ohio.

AGENTS WANTED.

The Great Work of the Age,

HENRY WARD BEECHER'S

"LIFE OF

Jesus, The Christ,"

Upon which the author has been actively engaged for some years past, will be ready in about three months. Meantime the publishers offer another good book, authenticated by another great name—a book which has been and is now selling with great rapidity wherever it is offered. All successful Canvassers for this book will have preference of territory for the "Beecher Book." The book combines

"500 Volumes in One,"
with a brilliant Introduction,
By WILLIAM CULLEN BRYANT,
under whose critical supervision it was compiled.

Over 800 pages, beautifully printed, choicely illustrated, handsomely bound. A library of 500 volumes in one book, whose contents will never grow old or stale. It will be read and re-read with pleasure by young and old as long as its leaves hold together.

"A perfect surprise. Scarcely any thing at all a favorite, or at all worthy of a place here, is neglected. It is a book for every household."—N. Y. Mail.

"A singularly handsome volume."—Phila. Inquirer.

"No similar collection in the English language, in copiousness and felicity of selection and arrangement, can compare with it."—N. Y. Times.

Terms liberal. Selling very rapidly: the trouble has been to get this book made fast enough. Teachers, Clergymen, active Men, intelligent Women can have good pay with light work by taking an agency Exclusive territory given. Send for circular, terms, &c., to
J. B. FORD & CO., 27 Park Place, N. Y.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabs.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

$5 TO $10 PER DAY. MEN, WOMEN, BOYS and GIRLS who engage in our new business make from $5 to $10 per day in their own localities. Full particulars and instructions sent free by mail. Those in need of permanent, profitable work, should address at once. GEORGE STINSON & Co., Portland, Maine.

HUNTING, Trapping, and Fishing. All about it. SENT FREE. Address "HUNTER," Hinsdale, N. H.

$300 A MONTH and expenses to good canvassers. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price

DE WITT'S MOTHERLESS. Motherless; or, A Parisian Family. For Girls in their Teens. Translated from the French of Madame Guizot De Witt by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

HEAT: being Part I. of Science for the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. Copiously Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. (Nearly Ready.)

DIARY of the BESIEGED RESIDENT IN PARIS. Reprinted from the London "Daily News," with Several New Letters and Preface. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents. (Just Ready.)

SMITH'S ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. A Copious and Critical English-Latin Dictionary. Compiled from Original Sources. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D., Editor of the Classical Dictionaries, Curtius's Greek Grammar, the Student's Hume, the Student's Greece, Old and New Testament Histories, &c.; and THEOPHILUS D. HALL, M.A., Fellow of University College, London. To which is added a Dictionary of Proper Names. 8vo, Sheep, $6 00.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. New Edition.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

FACETIÆ.

WHEN a Dutch maid-servant wishes to go to a dance, and has no swain of her own, she hires a cavalier for the occasion. A beau with an umbrella receives double pay.

THE CLOSEST STUDY—Any study where the windows haven't been opened for the last six months.

Is a jolly-boat ever helped along by four roars of laughter?

Persons who carry coal to Newcastle are sometimes hauled over them.

Two "heads" are better than one, if the letter is over weight.

The sharpest blade is run to earth when he is ground.

Why is a man never knocked down against his will?—Because it is impossible to fall unless inclined.

The idea that struck a man the other day has been fined ten dollars for a common assault.

"Two marriages in high life" are reported "as probably on the cards." We sincerely hope they're not diamonds against hearts.

Did the old sea-dogs we read about set up barks of their own, or sail in other people's ships?

AN ANIMAL OF QUESTIONABLE SHAPE—The conundrum.

A SPASMODIC CASE.—An attempt was recently made to stop the carriage of the "Minister of the Interior" in Madrid. Fortunately that important functionary was not in the interior of the carriage, but was safely ensconced in the proper place—the "Home Department."

The man who liked to get the whip-hand of his friends met with more than his match when he found one with a club-foot.

When the beer runs out, does it hop?

They say "cleanliness is next to godliness;" how is it, then, that soap and water are always found in the neighborhood of base sins (basins)?

"To arms! to arms!" the doctors cry,
"Patients of every station;
Undo your sleeve, and give us leave
To practice vaccination."

THE PRE-HYSTERIC PERIOD—Before tight lacing was invented.

RETRIBUTION.

"What's the Matter, Mamma?" "Toothache, Dearest." "Oh dear! What Tooth is it?" "Wisdom Tooth."
"Wisdom Tooth! Ah! I suppose that's the dreadful Tooth that Knows all about the French Irregular Verbs!"

THE MAN OF "SHREDS AND PATCHES."—Mr. D'Eyncourt sagely observes that tailors when out behave much worse than other men. The fact is, they can never leave the shop behind, and are not content to confine themselves to dress, their legitimate calling, but must, forsooth, ad-dress their observations to others, with a view of re-dress-ing imaginary wrongs. Hence the tailor becomes an iron-ical dog, and the thread of his discourse usually abounds in cutting remarks. Yet you have only to twit him with being the ninth part of a man to give him the needle, and cause him to make a desperate attempt to take your measure and sew you up, or give you your "quietus even with a bare bodkin."

Is there any difference between animals eating grass and grass-eating animals?

Is it correct to drive the captain's gig ashore: if so, on which side?

GUEST. "How comes this dead fly in my soup?"
WAITER. "In fact, Sir, I have no positive idea how the poor thing came to his death. Perhaps it had not taken any food for a long time, dashed upon the soup, ate too much for it, contracted an inflammation of the stomach, which brought on death. The fly must have a very weak constitution, for when I served the soup it was dancing merrily upon the surface. Perhaps, and the idea presents itself only at this moment, it endeavored to swallow too large a piece of vegetable; this remaining fast in the throat, caused a choking in the windpipe. This is the only reason I could give of the death of that insect."

A Boston lady's pins, when she is fully dressed, are said to number 300!

A young lady of Terre Haute is writing a book on "What I know about Courting."

"A CRYING SHAME."—After the disastrous calamities which France has so lately suffered, it is not to be wondered at that her government has been brought to "tears" (Thiers).

A VERY CLEVER TRICK—Changing one's mind.

One of the most obedient men in the world is an auctioneer we know, who attends to every body's bidding but his wife's.

Some ladies recently dressed for a party, and having on low-necked dresses, they painted blue veins on the exposed skin, thinking it would add to their attractiveness. A physician, who was present at the party, looked on, and finally told them they hadn't got those veins painted within four inches of where they should be naturally. They didn't know any thing about anatomy, so they had put the veins on just where it happened.

Never put off till to-morrow what you did the week before last.

During the siege of Paris, persons eating horse-flesh generally dined in the salle à manger.

THE "MILK OF HUMAN KINDNESS"—The condensed milk sent by the benevolent to Paris for the children.

A ROARING TRADE—A wild-beast show.

A NOTICE OF A PEAL—Lightning.

A GREAT TRAVELER.

Dr. Watts was evidently in the habit of making pedestrian excursions on the Continent, for in one of his noblest lines he expressly says:

"Whene'er I take my walks abroad."

The last reading of this celebrated stanza, by-the-way, is this:

"Whene'er I take my walks abroad,
How many poor I see;
And as I never speaks to them,
They never speaks to me."

"What is a smile?" asked a man of a little girl. "The whisper of a laugh," said she.

AUTOGRAPHICAL.—It is considered cool to take a man's hat with his name written in it, simply because you want to get his autograph.

What should a man carry with him when calling upon his affianced?—Affection in his heart, perfection in his manners, and confection in his pockets.

The following is almost good enough for a burlesque: When will Bismarck become a great landscape painter?—When he's Claude Lorraine.

Our Sage says there are three companions with whom you should always keep on good terms: First, your wife; second, your stomach; third, your conscience.

Devotion to public opinion was evinced by a lady aged eighty, who recently married a man of a correspondingly appropriate age, because, she said, "he comes about my house so much that if I don't marry him people will talk."

THAT'S FLAT!—A gentleman who wished to describe the excessive mendacity of a servant of his, said, "Lie! Why the fellow will lie even when he's asleep." We have met with persons, otherwise veracious, who could not sleep without lying. In fact, a man must be more than ordinarily upright who can resist the inclination.

Little fish have a proper idea of business. Not being able to do better, they start on a small scale.

A PITCHED BATTLE—A fight between two tars.

A doctor's motto is supposed to be "patients and long-suffering."

THE BEST CURTAIN SERVICE—Matrimony.

A MERE MATTER OF FORM—Cutting a dress.

The man who "couldn't find his match" went to bed in the dark.

"All bitters have a healing tendency or effect," said a doctor to a young lady. "You will except a bitter cold morning, won't you?" inquired the lady.

SLIP-KNOTS—Divorces.

TO KEEP DEY—Live on codfish.

When flatterers meet, Satan goes to dinner.

Swinging is said by the doctors to be very good exercise for a person's health; but many a poor wretch has come to his death by it.

BONDS IRREDEEMABLE—Vaga-bonds.

A DOMESTIC TALE OF HORROR.

TABLEAU I.

TIMID WIFE. "Henry dear, Henry! There are Thieves in the House!"

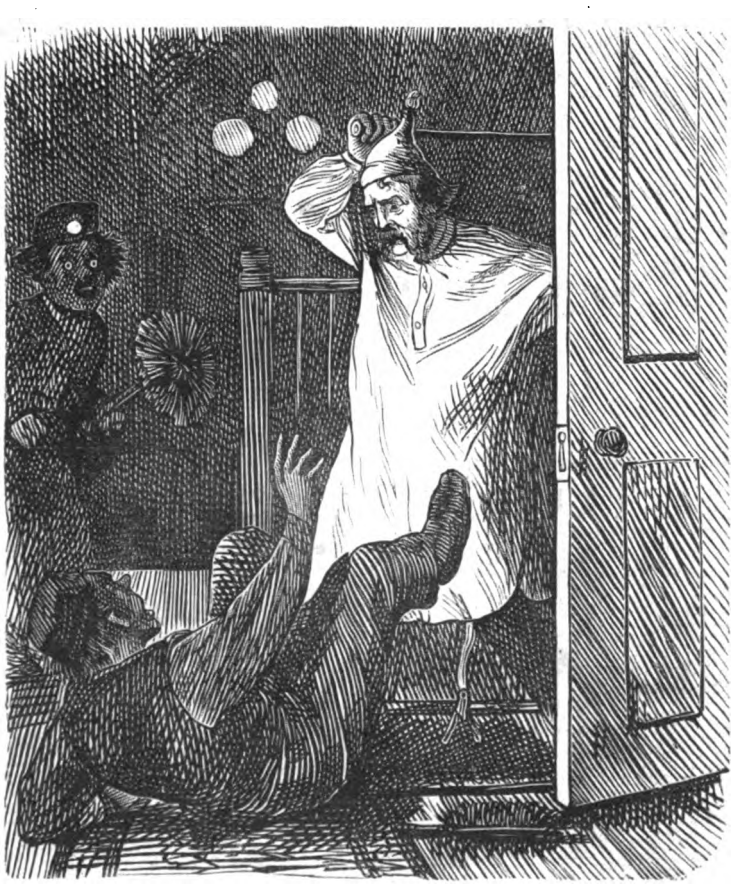

TABLEAU II.

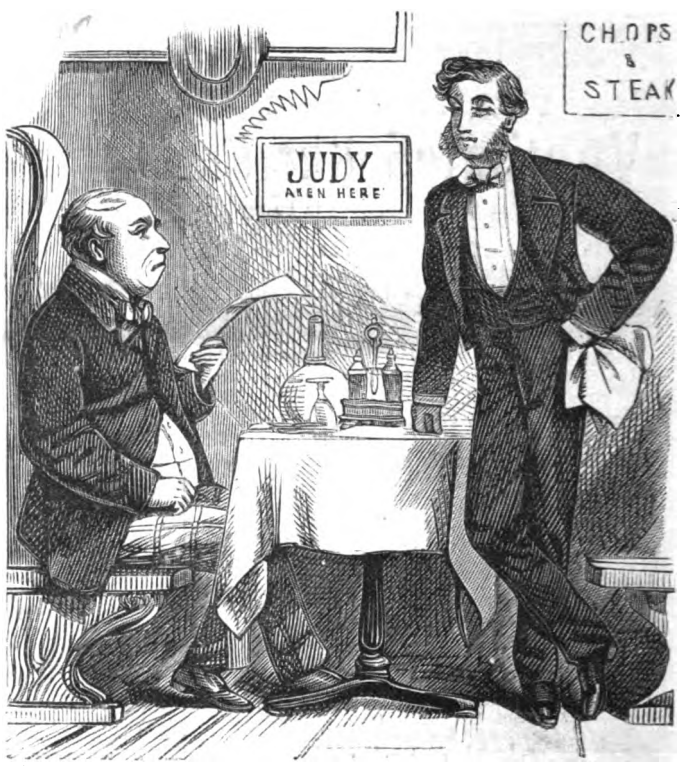
VOICE FROM THE BEDROOM. "Henry dear, Henry! I Forgot to Say the Sweeps were Coming this Morning."



VERY PROPER, TOO.

VULGAR-OLD PARTY. "I say, Waiter, Plate of Roast Veal, will you, and 'Am—"
WELL-BROUGHT-UP WAITER. "We've Veal, Sir, if you like; but, excuse me, we don't like Swearing in our Establishment."

KNOWLEDGE IS STRENGTH.

"I say, Jack! What's Post-Meridian?"
"Why, the First Post in the Morning, of course."

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 17.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT.—[SEE PAGE 258.]

[Cut Paper Pattern of this entire Suit, to fit any Figure, sent, Prepaid, by Mail, on Receipt of Twenty-five Cents and Bust Measure.]

Digitized by Google

SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT.

See illustration on first page.

THIS pretty suit comprises the short sacque of the style most in vogue this season, with an adjusted back and loose sacque fronts, and which will be found very useful to wear over linen blouse-waists in the heats of summer. The under-skirt is made of black silk, and the over-skirt and sacque of black cashmere, trimmed with folds of the material and lace.

DESCRIPTION OF CUT PAPER PATTERN.

THIS pattern comprises three articles, viz.: half-fitting sacque, Watteau over-skirt, and six-gored walking skirt.

HALF-FITTING SACQUE.—This pattern consists of five pieces—front, side piece, back, collar, and flowing sleeve. The garment is cut with loose sacque fronts; the back is fitted by a seam in the middle and side forms, and is cut with extra fullness at the side back seam below the waist line, where it is laid in a box-pleat an inch wide, turned on the outer side, and finished with an ornament. The fronts are cut pointed in the neck, and finished with a Marie Antoinette collar. The garment is made to fit tight in the back by a belt, which is sewed on the under side to the seams in the back, the sides, and under the arms, and fastened in front with hooks and eyes. The sacque is trimmed round the edge with lace two inches wide, headed by a bias fold an inch and a quarter wide with a narrow fold on both edges.

Quantity of material, a yard and a quarter wide, 2½ yards.

Extra for trimming, 1 yard.

Lace, 5 yards.

Baste up, and try on wrong side out before sewing the seams. All the seams are allowed—an outlet of an inch being given for the seams under the arms and on the shoulders, and a quarter of an inch for all the other seams. Only half the pattern is given.

WATTEAU OVER-SKIRT.—This pattern is in three pieces, and has an apron front, two side gores, and full back breadth. The sides of the apron front are cut with an extra length, which is laid in six two-inch pleats, turning upward. The notches at the sides of the apron front show where to lay the pleats. The fronts are sewed plain on the belt. One deep box-pleat, five inches wide, simulating a Watteau fold, is laid in the centre of the back breadth, and the extra fullness is laid in side pleats turning toward the front. Put the pattern together by the notches. Only half the pattern is given.

Quantity of material, a yard and a quarter wide, 3 yards.

Extra for trimming, 1½ yards.

Lace, 4½ yards.

SIX-GORED WALKING SKIRT.—This pattern is in four pieces—front, two side gores, and breadth for the back. The back breadth is laid in a double box-pleat in the middle, and the extra fullness of the gores is laid in side pleats, turning toward the front.

Quantity of material, a yard and a quarter wide, 7 yards.

Extra for trimming, 8½ yards.

To take the bust measure, pass a tape measure entirely around the body, under the arms, over the largest part of the shoulders, and two inches above the fullest part of the chest. Nine sizes are furnished, ranging, in even numbers, from 30 to 46 inches.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, APRIL 29, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with numerous full-sized patterns and illustrations of Ladies' and Children's Spring and Summer Sacques, Talmas, Jackets, Basquines, Mantelets, Water-proof Cloaks, etc., Ladies' and Misses' Spring and Summer Suits; Infants' Robes, Fancy Articles, etc., etc.

☞ Cut Paper Patterns of the Short-Sacque Walking Suit, on our first page, are now ready, and will be sent, prepaid by the Publishers, on receipt of Twenty-five Cents each. For the complete list of Cut Paper Patterns published, see Advertisement on page 271 of this Number.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of a Ramble.

MY DEAR CYRUS,—Walking the other morning in the Central Park, I met Retrorsus, and joined him in his stroll through the Ramble. He was pensive, yet talkative, and seemed to be very glad to find a companion before whom he could think aloud; for his conversation seemed to be chiefly loud thinking, to which, indeed, a companion was only necessary as a sounding-board or a mountain-side, to send back an echo. And if you will allow me at this point to make the first excursion, or discursion: do you not often remark among our fellow-travelers that this is often the chief service which they require of each other in conversation? A man turns to his neighbor and, under the forms of colloquial intercourse, begins at once to soliloquize, evidently regarding an independent response as impertinent. Indeed, at a great dinner I have sometimes seen the philosopher Historicus, who had been passing all the morning studying a new book, perhaps of science or of moral speculation, turn upon the innocent Miss Bleat at his side and proceed, in the guise of conversation with her, to say to himself all that he thought of the book. "You remember, Miss Bleat," he says to her, "that Descartes says, cogito, ergo sum; but I am persuaded that we should rather say, sum, ergo cogito. And Leibnitz distinctly affirms—" and so on until poor little Miss Bleat loses her appetite, and feels prickly with heat and vexatious consciousness of her ridiculous situation.

It is because so much apparent conversation is merely soliloquy that good listening is always so agreeable to us. Indeed, if you will show me a good listener, I will show you one who is usually considered very fascinating. By good listening, of course, I do not mean mere silence, but intelligent and appreciative attention. In my younger days there was no one more familiarly known and generally liked than James Early, of whom you may have heard. He was handsome, well dressed, and quiet; but he was not clever, nor cultivated, nor of superior character. Born into the habit of what is called good society, he improved all the advantages it offered to secure all its characteristic prizes. If he went to a dinner where the wise men were present, he listened in deferential silence to all their dreary and conceited platitudes, as if they had been profound inspirations. And I have heard the Honorable Jabesh Windbag himself, when that gentleman was the most illustrious statesman in the country, after a dinner at which James Early had respectfully listened to him with evident admiration for more than three hours, declare that that young gentleman was one of the most promising young men in America.

Even the most intelligent women were charmed with him, and Minerva herself owned that he was certainly very attractive. Yet I had often watched him when he was with her, and I saw that he did nothing but listen eloquently. Often, after a prolonged soliloquy of her own, at which Early had been present, she has remarked to me that he was one of the most agreeable men she had ever known. I saw him in a famous drawing-room in another city, and he sat the whole evening with one of the loveliest belles. She was neither intelligent nor talkative, but she was conscious of beauty and of a superb toilette, and he seemed to be conscious of nobody in the world but her. He did not speak, but his deferential silence appeared to be confident expectation of something worth hearing from her lips; or it was the most subtly flattering suggestion that the spoken wisdom of others was less than the sweet chance of her speaking. She told me afterward that Mr. Early was the most fascinating person in conversation that she had ever met. And so said all the young women with whom he danced, and all the old ladies against the wall, to whom he brought terrapin and Champagne. His conversation, they said, was truly delightful. They meant that he did not interrupt their soliloquies.

This is a long excursion, but it illustrates the reason that Retrorsus always praises my conversational powers. When he has been sitting with me all the evening, pouring out his profuse speculations upon public affairs, showing to me how hopelessly we are ruined, and demonstrating in the most learned and elaborate manner that civilization is an illusion, and that barbarism is surely overwhelming us, as the sand of the desert fatally encroaches upon the ancient Egyptian temples and buries them out of sight—while I have sat ruminating and dreamily listening, he jumps up suddenly at midnight, and says, pleasantly, "My dear Mr. Bachelor, I beg your pardon, but you have been so agreeable and instructive that I quite forgot the time," and so bows himself out. In the Ramble at the Park it was the same. We loitered in the warm spring sunshine, and I listened to the singing of the birds and the hum of the city, and watched the glittering green of the willows, and all the swelling, budding richness of the trees, while he talked on, and thought me the most eloquent of companions.

Indeed, I heard enough of what he said to perceive that he was lamenting, as so many of us secretly do, the departure of youth, and I smiled to think how the old song is forever renewed. For I remember long ago in the Tyrol, one of those glorious mornings which stand in memory, as on some divine day Mont Blanc stands supreme and glorified among the Alps, when I was swinging along the mountain-road with Hilary, who was twenty years older than I. I shouted and sang until the air rang with jocund echoes. It seems to me that the remembrance of that morning will keep me always young. But, in the midst of my triumph of life and youth, Hilary suddenly said, with a half-vexed air, "Bachelor, I hope that you don't think you enjoy this more than I, merely because you are a little younger!" Aha! old mole! He had worked so far, then. Hilary felt as if he had been driven out of Paradise because he had ceased to be young, and he looked at me over the wall, and vowed that it was not much of a shower, after all! At that time Retrorsus was as much younger than I as Hilary was older; and now, after this long lapse of time, I heard Retrorsus lamenting, in the same strain, that the dark days were come because he had ceased to be young.

But, my dear Cyrus, when does a man cease to be young? I know the most venerable fellows of thirty and thirty-five, and I know young statesmen of seventy; and if I were to give a party of young men, my first summons should be to a certain poet of seventy-five. My schoolmate Gnurly would never be older than he was at fifteen if he should live to a hundred years. Do you think that Colonel Newcome was old when he was a white-headed man, or that Barnes was ever young? "The dark days have come," I heard Retrorsus say in the Ramble, with the glorious sky full of sunshine over him and all about him, and the air musical with birds. "The dark fiddle-sticks," ejaculated I, and my companion turned to me in amazement; while I felt that, by breaking silence, I had risked the reputation of my conversational powers. "The Golden Age lies far behind us," continued Retrorsus, eying me severely. But I smiled blandly, and I suppose my face was suffused with skepticism; for he said, as if I had vehemently contradicted him, "Do you mean to say that the Golden Age doesn't lie far behind us?"

"Since you ask me," said I, "I answer that I think there is no such intolerable folly as to suppose it." And I beamed at him so that he looked at me with astonishment. I suppose that he did not wish to be interrupted, for he made no reply, but went on with his lamentations, ending with, "The days that are no more."

But, my dear Cyrus, this disposition, which it is so easy to cultivate, what is it but the forgetfulness that we all see our own door-yards, but not our neighbor's? You may read the oldest expressions of human thought, and the newest book, and you will find that in each to-day is the dark day. Other times were noble and pure; other men were lofty and disinterested. Our parents lived in Paradise; and when they came out, ah! even then there were giants in those days. But we have fallen upon evil times and upon dwarfs. Principle, patriotism, a fine and sensitive morality—these we have left far behind us; they were stations that were long passed when we took the train. I was reading only yesterday in the newspaper a chapter of reminiscences which went back only thirty years, and which lamented that statesmanship and eloquence had perished in the land. The author was kind enough to mention names, and to quote specimens of the lost art of eloquence. But the name was a nobody, and the eloquence was stuff. Your son would not declaim it at school to-day. And the worthy writer thought and said that he was treating of the better times, of the palmy days, of the Golden Age. And then I opened the "Life of John Adams," and there I found him, living in what we believe was the very purest period of our history, lamenting the ignorance, the passion, the sordid meanness of the age, and appealing to the other and distant and better day. To John Adams his own day was as dark as ours ever was or ever can be to us.

And what makes it poetic and fair to us? Because John Adams and his friends did not put their regrets into rhyme, but their convictions and courage into deeds. And just as the Golden Age is here, and now, if we will only make it golden, so is it with youth. I asked you when a man ceases to be young; and now I think, my dear Cyrus, we can answer that it is not when his hair grows gray, but when his heart becomes dry and cold. If that is at twenty, he is old. If it is not at eighty, he is still young. And so also the man who is born old never sees the Golden Age, because he never believes in generous motives and unselfish action. I have seen a boy of twelve put his fingers to his nose at the tale of a beggar at the corner, and a man of sixty, with moist eyes, emptying his purse into the beggar's hand. That boy, I fear, was born into the Brazen Age. That man will die, as he has lived, in the Golden. Out of the heart, my boy, are the issues of life. That is one of the great and glorious texts, upon which the lives of all about us are the sermons. Retrorsus, in the Ramble, thinks that youth is going, not because he was forty upon his last birthday, but because he is conscious that his faith is becoming chilled, his enjoyment of nature less keen and exquisite, his delight and confidence in simple integrity less profound. That alone, my dear Cyrus, is to grow old; that alone is the ending of the Golden Age, and the return of Astræa to heaven. I hope, my dear boy, that this spring, which completes your half-century, finds you as truly young as ever.

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

SEPARATION.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

ONE is often tempted to echo that modest remark of a certain wise man—it would have a far more learned look if I could give the name of the wise man, but I can not at this instant recall it—that, "if he had been present at the creation of the world, he should have been able to give its Maker a few suggestions." There are a few things, in fact a good many things, which one would like to have altered, and which might apparently just as well have been made different in the beginning. And yet, on the whole, there is a wonderful adaptation in things as they are. To make much improvement, you must change so many cases that, before you know it, you will find you have projected a new world.

Sometimes one is tempted to think that, if the family could not be somehow constituted to hold together, we might as well not have had mankind set in families. The father and mother make their little home. The children laugh and cry, and work and play; they have mumps and measles, and "teething" and scarlatina; they have little tiffs with each other; they are bumped and bruised; they knock out their teeth, and set their clothes on fire, and come home at irregular intervals, with a black eye or a broken arm. So, under constant watching, with many retrogressions and a thousand hair-breadth escapes, they wind along the tortuous path of right living, and presently the oldest child has arrived at the comparative maturity of—let us say thirteen years. He takes an interest in raw but real science—if it is very raw—in mechanics, in politics. The amount of information he has acquired on all subjects is astonishing. He has penetrated machine-shops, mounted locomotives, trotted after soldiers, made love to sailors, and few things in the heavens above, or the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth, have escaped his observation. Now, at thirteen, he begins to consolidate; and you would say his father and mother might have some good of him. Not that they have not had good of him before, prattling, bumping, and bruising through his infancy and early boyhood; but it was a comfort largely compounded with care. It was a delight in bounding health and beauty, and grace and promise, always underlaid with a fearful consciousness that, when the beauty and grace was not snugly tucked up in bed, it might be sliding down the third-story baluster, or bestriding the ridge-pole of the barn, at the imminent risk of its beautiful and graceful neck. Only now, when baluster and ridge-pole have lost their irresistible first charm, and top and kite and ball are not paramount objects of interest—now, when the caucus and concert and play begin to loom up, and the far-off sun of manhood reddens the eastern sky—now they can really enjoy him without misgiving. Do they? Not in the least. As soon as he ceases to be an hourly care he must go off to school! When he was of no use to any body his parents took him wholly upon themselves; but as soon as he begins to be of the smallest account they have to give him up to the public. No organized tyranny demands him, but just as surely and authoritatively society stretches out its hand and clutches him. His new shirts, his fresh jackets, and spotless handkerchiefs are put into his box, and out he goes into the great world for ever and ever. True, he will come back for the vacation, with half his handkerchiefs lost, his jackets out at elbows, and his every-day boots serenely packed a-top his pile of shirts; and for several years he will oscillate between home and school; but home for life he will never come again. Home, the eternal resting-place—home, his absorbing and exclusive world, has ceased to be. His childish, instinctive, savage love his parents had; but as soon as he is capable of an intelligent, manly affection, he goes straightway and falls in love with a stranger! It is a consolation to reflect that he is then at the same point whence his father and mother started, and will travel the same round, and see precisely how good it is.

The wonder is that it is pretty good, after all. Dreadful as it may be for parents to give up their child, it would be still more dreadful not to give him up. It is next to impossible for the grown children of a family to stay at home honorably. Life may so adjust itself that this is the best possible arrangement; but usually the sons who have energy, enterprise, character, push out into the world. What good has the mother in her empty house, with one son in China, and one in California, and one in Chicago, and one on the high seas? The foolish mother thinks she has vast treasure still, and conceives immediately a deep and abiding interest in all those places. Instead of dismissing her son from her thought, she takes into her heart at once all the ends of the earth and all the paths of the sea. Not a newspaper scrap from China or California escapes her eye. The scope of her mind has become enlarged through the scope of her affection, and her son's good name in Cathay makes her as proud and happy as if she heard his praise resounding under her own roof-tree.

It is frequent parting that softens the asperity and sweetens the bitterness and mitigates the fierceness of association. Human nature is so sharp and strong and self-willed, that it is a great trial for human beings to live together. The substantial traits of character may be harmonious; but little tastes, slight individualities, opposing tempers, will clash; and even Christian forbearance, generous yielding, kindly courtesy, need the occasional help of absence to keep life permanently sweet. Absence is the great idealizer, and withal, perhaps, the most truthful painter. Your stout, healthy, noisy boy, who teased his sisters, and tossed his pillows, and broke furniture, and tried even his mother's patience, has gone away; and in his silent room you only think how bright and frank and fearless he is—how generous, alert, and eager. The friend and companion whose impatience irritated you, whose indecision annoyed you, whose impromptitude exasperated you, has crossed the seas, and you remember only how truthful he was, how loyal, how devoted, how unselfish.

Digitized by Google

It is parting, indeed, that plows great furrows in the heart, but it keeps the soil mellow and open, receptive and fertile. Made as we are, we should grow, without it, too hard, exacting, unresponsive, unforgiving. With the pain of partings always near, with the shadow of one parting never far, it is easy to repress the hasty word, to discern the sunny side, to veil the weakness with charity, and nourish the strength with love. The heart grows soft and tender and considerate, self fades and selfishness dies, and the whole being goes out in eager desire to succor and bless its beloved.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

THE SHORT-SACQUE SUIT.

THE short-sacque suit illustrated on our first page presents the new idea for making paletots. The loose slashed sacque or paletot of last season is still worn, but its popularity is waning before a preference for garments with basque backs. The new design has a loose front and an easy yet close-fitting back, slashed to the belt in the centre to allow room for the tournure. A belt under the basque fastens beneath the front, and holds the back in place. The Marie Antoinette collar and flowing sleeves of this jacket are exceedingly pretty for summer wear. The suit, copied from a model at Lord & Taylor's, has the sacque and over-skirt of cashmere, trimmed with folds and guipure lace, and a silk under-skirt ornamented by three folds and a broad kilt pleating. This suit may be made of summer poplin, goat's-hair, or any soft woolen stuff, over a silk skirt of the same color, or the entire garment may be of the same material. The simple style of this costume renders it also appropriate for mourning, and for the same reason it is adopted for piqué, linens, satin jean, and other wash goods, as it may be easily done up.

The over-skirt of this suit, called the Watteau skirt, has a short, graceful apron, with the wrinkled front now considered stylish. To keep this apron in place a tape is fastened to the second side seams, and tied behind under the skirt. The widths back of the apron are not draped, but hang straight, with a broad Watteau fold, or pleat, in the centre, and many smaller ones on each side. A seam down the centre of the broad fold would not look well; therefore a full width must be placed in the centre, with narrower gored widths on the side.

EASTER SUITS.

A late opening at a large and tasteful furnishing house displayed many beautiful costumes, prepared for Easter-Sunday and the gay days that follow the penitential season of Lent. Rich silks of pale, delicate tints, light summer silks, goat's-hair poplins, wool serges, pongees, piqués, colored linen, and batiste costumes, were the stylish fabrics made up in the most graceful manner. Tight-fitting garments, such as postilion-basques and polonaises—minus a loose wrap—prevailed. The present fashion displays fine figures most advantageously. Waists are made slightly longer, and always show the natural curve of the figure above the hips. Shoulder seams are short and high, falling in with the line of the shoulders. All sleeves, whether coat or flowing, are shaped at the top like a man's coat-sleeve, and set smoothly in the ample armhole, without any fullness but that which comes of holding the sleeve next the sewer. Three or four bows up the front of the basque are used quite as much as buttons.

Handsomest among the Easter costumes is a gros grain of bluish-green, made elaborate with black lace. The garniture on the lower skirt is broad box-pleats at wide intervals, with a bow and shell-like curves of lace between. The apron-front bouffant over-skirt has crescent-shaped pieces and lace for trimming. The basque—a novelty—has no pleats behind, but a folded point, like a hood, is continued from the back, to fall over broad smooth pieces formed by elongating the side bodies. The suit is marked $285. Another, of turtle-dove gray, is similarly made, and trimmed with black lace. A third, gros grain, fit array for a bride, is a soft French gray, trimmed with ruffles of the same, and fringe to match, making a tasteful monotone costume: price $200.

DINNER DRESSES.

A dinner or reception dress, worthy of description, is of turquoise blue gros grain, with demi-train. Two bias ruffles six inches deep, the lower one in box-pleats, the upper gathered and lapping over the lower, headed by a bias band and three narrow, standing ruffles, trim the lower skirt. The upper skirt, like that shown in the Worth Basque Suit (illustrated in Bazar No. 1, Vol. IV.), has a single ruffle, headed by two erect frills on the back of the skirt, while a netted fringe takes the place of the lower ruffle on the apron. The basque, without pleats behind, has a ruffle and fringe around the edge. The neck is square, and the front represents a vest almost covered by a jabot of Valenciennes lace. Flowing sleeves, with a ruffle and lace. Price $275. A dress made in the same way is of pale écru silk, trimmed with broad black velvet ribbon and point duchesse lace. The first dress described, or a similar one, of fisherman's green, or of light plum-color, is the fashionable reception dress for blondes. Écru buff silks, or the faint China pink, or else the pinkish-salmon apricot-color, are the choice of brunettes.

SUMMER SILKS, GOAT'S-HAIR, AND ALPACAS.

The summer silks most popular are narrow stripes of black on white, trimmed with many gathered ruffles of the same, edged with black lace, or else a tiny fold of solid-colored silk, either black, brown, or violet, placed above the hem of the ruffle, this hem being turned up on the right side. Solid-colored vests are also seen on these, and embroidery is used as a trimming. One of the most stylish silk suits yet seen is black stripes on white, with the polonaise bordered by black and white fringe, headed by a band of black silk "tamboured" with white. The skirt has five narrow lapping ruffles piped with black. The gypsy bonnet is fine Belgian straw, trimmed with black Frou Frou gauze, a black ostrich tip, and tea-roses. Large oval ear-rings of Etruscan gold, in Moorish designs. Linen and Valenciennes collar, with India silk neck-tie of tea-rose color. White silk parasol, with black lace cover and ivory handle. Écru kid gloves with three buttons.

The goat's-hair fabrics are light yet strong, do not fray as they formerly did, are soft enough to fall into graceful drapery, have a beautiful lustre, and cost but sixty or seventy-five cents a yard. They are made usually in polonaise suits, or in the postilion-basque costume, with burnous drapery, illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and trimmed with folds of the same, piped with silk of a darker shade. Gray goat's-hair, silvery and fresh-looking, and the fashionable Frou Frou or cameo colors of two shades of buff and brown, make pretty and inexpensive suits, to be donned when warmer days arrive. Soft wool serges, as fine almost as foulards, but in the broad twill, which is now preferred to fine diagonal lines, is used for traveling dresses. An effort is being made to introduce round talmas, or elbow capes with Watteau folds behind, to wear over the polonaises of shopping and traveling suits. A few have already appeared, but these capes require to be perfectly fitted on the shoulders, and gracefully rounded below, or they will have a prim, Quakerish air, or else, on the contrary, will look very dowdy. The prettiest talma yet seen is placed over a polonaise as part of a traveling suit for a bride. It is of pin-head checked silk, black and gray, trimmed with fringe and a ruche. A broad box-pleat or Watteau fold is in the back.

Black alpacas, like black silks, are always in fashion, and the best of these are the improved buffalo alpaca, now made of the purest jet black, and the kindred fabrics introduced since this alpaca became favorably known. There are the beaver mohair, as lustrous as silk; the lustrous sable Turkish brilliantine; and lastly, the new otter alpaca, which is admirably adapted for the costumes of the present season, and of which lower priced qualities are sold than of the other brands.

PIQUÉ SUITS.

Corded or repped piqué, like gros grain, is still in favor for suits. The short-sacque suit represented on our first page is the most stylish model for these. Loose slashed sacques are still worn in linen and piqué, but the sacque with postilion back is preferred by ladies ordering new suits. Linen laces of Irish manufacture, in the familiar Cluny patterns, and kilt pleatings of lawn, edged with patent Valenciennes, are popular trimmings for piqué. Neither the lace nor the "kilting" is new, but they were abundantly used on the Princess Louise's trousseau, and thus are revived. The lace is associated with black or even maroon velvet; the pleating is ironed flatly, and headed by an inch-wide bias band of piqué. Slightly gathered frills of Hamburg or needle-worked edgings are, however, the handsomest trimmings for these white suits. Three rows of kilting, or three embroidered frills, are at intervals around the lower skirt, and one row on the jacket and upper skirt of suits. $35 to $45 is the price.

LINEN SUITS.

Suits of thick undressed linen without gloss, and looking when bought as they will look after being washed at home, are shown for serviceable summer wear. They are made precisely in the way described for piqué, and are trimmed with kilt pleating, the pleats scant and separate—not lapping as they formerly did—and headed by bias bands (not folds) stitched at intervals on the skirt. A tiny line of scarlet or brown worsted braid, or the merest fold of colored cambric, stitched in on each side of these bands, gives them a less sombre appearance. Unbleached Cluny laces and insertions, and flax linen fringes, are also used on linen suits. If the lace and fringe are merely colored to match the linen, they are almost sure to fade, but the unbleached linen trimmings do not become paler.

Readers at a distance, who can not examine the ready-made suits at our furnishing houses, declare trimming with bias bands of linen, piqué, or other wash goods, impracticable. Now a fashion-writer is nothing if not practical in the styles she quotes, and we assure our correspondents that there is no difficulty in making or in ironing these bands, provided they are cut perfectly bias, laid absolutely smooth on the goods to which they are sewed, and stitched carefully near each edge by machine with well adjusted tension—neither too tight nor too loose.

The fancy for close-fitting garments has introduced linen and white Victoria lawn suits, made with postilion-basques, like our illustration in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. It remains to be seen whether these will be as popular as the cooler and more negligee garments with loose sacque fronts. Such suits are worn in the house as well as street.

BATISTE SUITS.

A few imported suits of batiste are shown, and a small quantity of the material is found. This is the real batiste, genuine flax in its original state, forming unbleached brown linen lawn, and not the spurious fabric mixed with silk, and hitherto called batiste. It is 85 cents a yard; and suits of the darkest brown shade, trimmed with ruffles, edged with Cluny, cost $60.

GRENADINE COSTUMES.

There is nothing new exhibited in grenadine suits. They should be made over silk skirts, but those who can not afford silk use alpaca, or farmer's satin, and sometimes soft, thick cambric that has not gloss enough to betray it. The thick silk over which the basque is made is the proper lining. But few persons now use drilling lining with thin silk covering next the grenadine. Indeed, silk linings for corsages are gaining favor, and are not considered extravagant, as they wear well, set smoothly to the figure, and are far pleasanter to wear than linen or twilled cotton. Many ruffles merely hemmed, with a fold of gros grain laid in the hem, or else edged with lace, are the fashionable trimmings. The designs are all comprised in the walking suits illustrated in the present volume of the Bazar.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; LORD & TAYLOR; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE & Co.; and PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & Co.

PERSONAL.

THAT favorite contributor to the HARPER publications, Colonel THORPE, speaks of General BELKNAP as one of the representative young men who have assumed such prominent places under the administration of General GRANT. He was one of SHERMAN'S working generals, and, with great ability to conceive, he was a very whirlwind in execution. His face is very fine, and bears with singular force his well-known character of firmness, always modified with judgment.

—The president of the first agricultural society ever formed was a Mr. HOPE. This society was called The Improvers of Agriculture, and was organized at Edinburgh on the 8th of June, 1723. Many of the nobility and gentry were among its members, and it was a success from the start.

—Mr. GREELEY, referring to the small sums paid to writers twenty years ago, says, "I remember seeing LONGFELLOW'S grand 'Endymion' received in manuscript at the office of a popular and successful weekly, which paid fifteen dollars for it; a hundred such would now be taken quickly at one hundred and fifty dollars each, and the purchasers would look anxiously about them for more."

—In the estimation of the Westminster Review, no American woman has evinced in prose or poetry any thing like the genius of ALICE CARY.

—CHARLES JAMES FOX was probably the youngest man ever elected to the British Parliament, having been chosen for Midhurst when only nineteen years and four months old. At seventeen he was on intimate terms with EDMUND BURKE, who was nineteen years his senior. By the time he was twenty-four he had lost $700,000 by gambling. Yet GIBBON says of him, "Perhaps no human being was ever more perfectly exempt from the taint of malevolence, vanity, or falsehood."

—Among the boys who have passed the first examination of Cambridge University, England, is W. J. CRAFT. He is the son of WILLIAM and ELLEN CRAFT, now in Georgia—a State from which they escaped as fugitive slaves years ago. They ran to Boston, were married by THEODORE PARKER, who kept them some days in his study, he writing his sermon outside the door, with the musket his great-grandfather had used at Lexington by his side, ready to be used (probably with butt end) on the slave hunters prowling around his house.

—One of the notabilities of New Orleans is the Rev. ALEXANDER FAIR, of Christ Church, who is totally deaf, yet preaches constantly and converses fluently, understanding all that is said by the motion of the lips. He returns prompt and pertinent answers to every question, and it is said that unless the fact of his deafness were mentioned, it would never be known.

—Mrs. ANNIE BREED, late of Norwich, Connecticut, after making many private bequests, set apart $20,000 as a fund for the support of deserving and impecunious widows.

—The members of the English High Commission are all educated men and bred to public life, with one exception—Sir JOHN MACDONALD, who, not a university man, is probably the best linguist of the lot, and a man of remarkable attainments. Recently, in a closing night of the Canadian Parliament, a number of members tried their skill in a tournament of abuse in different languages. English, French, German, Italian, Latin, and Greek were flung at one another with a facility that seemed to astonish the American who relates the incident. Sir JOHN is said to have borne more than an equal share in the contest, and carried off the honors by swearing a little in Sanscrit, apostrophizing his antagonist in Russian, and winding up by anathemas in the choicest Hebrew.

—Last summer we announced in the Bazar that Mr. THEODORIC B. PRYOR, a son of General ROGER A. PRYOR, now of this city, had taken the first honors of his class at Princeton College, and had taken also, at the same time, the Mathematical Fellowship, the income of which is a support for a young man of economical habits. The Evening Post tells us that Mr. PRYOR determined, after graduating, that he would pursue his studies at the University of Cambridge, England. He entered that university during the last year, and has just been awarded a scholarship, the highest honor open to him after so short a connection with the university. This fact proves two things: first, the wisdom of Dr. M'COSH'S plan of endowing fellowships in our American colleges, enabling young men to continue their studies; and secondly, that our colleges have reached a position which enables their students to compete successfully with the best students of foreign universities.

—The recent boat-race between Oxford and Cambridge calls to mind that Bishop SELWYN, of Lichfield, was one of the three bishops who rowed in the first Oxford and Cambridge race, the other two being Dr. TYRRELL, Bishop of Newcastle (Australia), and Dr. WORDSWORTH, Bishop of St. Andrews. The Cambridge boat, in which Bishops SELWYN and TYRRELL formed part of the crew, was beaten by the Oxford, in which Bishop WORDSWORTH rowed.

—Mr. WILLIAM H. HURLBUT, of the World, who did San Domingo for that journal with characteristic pluck and fairness, says of FREDERICK DOUGLASS: "Widely as I differ from Mr. DOUGLASS on almost all public questions, and decided as is my preference for the Caucasian over the African race, in most of my personal relations, it is impossible to see so much as I have seen of him without cordially recognizing not his abilities only, but the estimable, amiable, and manly strain of his whole nature."

—WALT WHITMAN, in the estimation of the eminent British bard, SWINBURNE, is the second poet at present enjoying existence, VICTOR HUGO being the first.

—As soon as General SHERIDAN lands upon his native heath, he will probably take General SHERMAN'S place during the absence of the latter on a tour of inspection. Afterward he will most likely assume command of the Military Division of the East, with head-quarters in this city. It is no more than fair that, after having had seven or eight months of goodest time with the potentates of the effete monarchies of Europe, he should be compelled to rough it on such victual and other entertainment as may be obtainable in this propinquity.

—Scarcely a Number of the Bazar is published, among the "Personals" of which mention is not made of notable instances of benevolence. For this week we have to announce that Mr. HUDSON E. BRIDGE, of St. Louis, has given $15,000 to Washington University in that city, for the polytechnic building, $15,000 for furniture and apparatus, $100,000 for the endowment of the chancellorship and for a scientific library. Within six weeks the endowments and gifts to the university have amounted to $210,000.

—Another liberal benefaction has been made by EDWIN F. BATCHELDER, of Mansfield, Massachusetts, who has willed all his property—$60,000—to the American Bible Society.

—Two years ago Congress appropriated $30,000 for an equestrian statue of General WINFIELD SCOTT, the model of which has just been completed by HENRY K. BROWNE, at his works in Newburgh. A committee of Congress has been up to take a peep at it, and have come away satisfied.

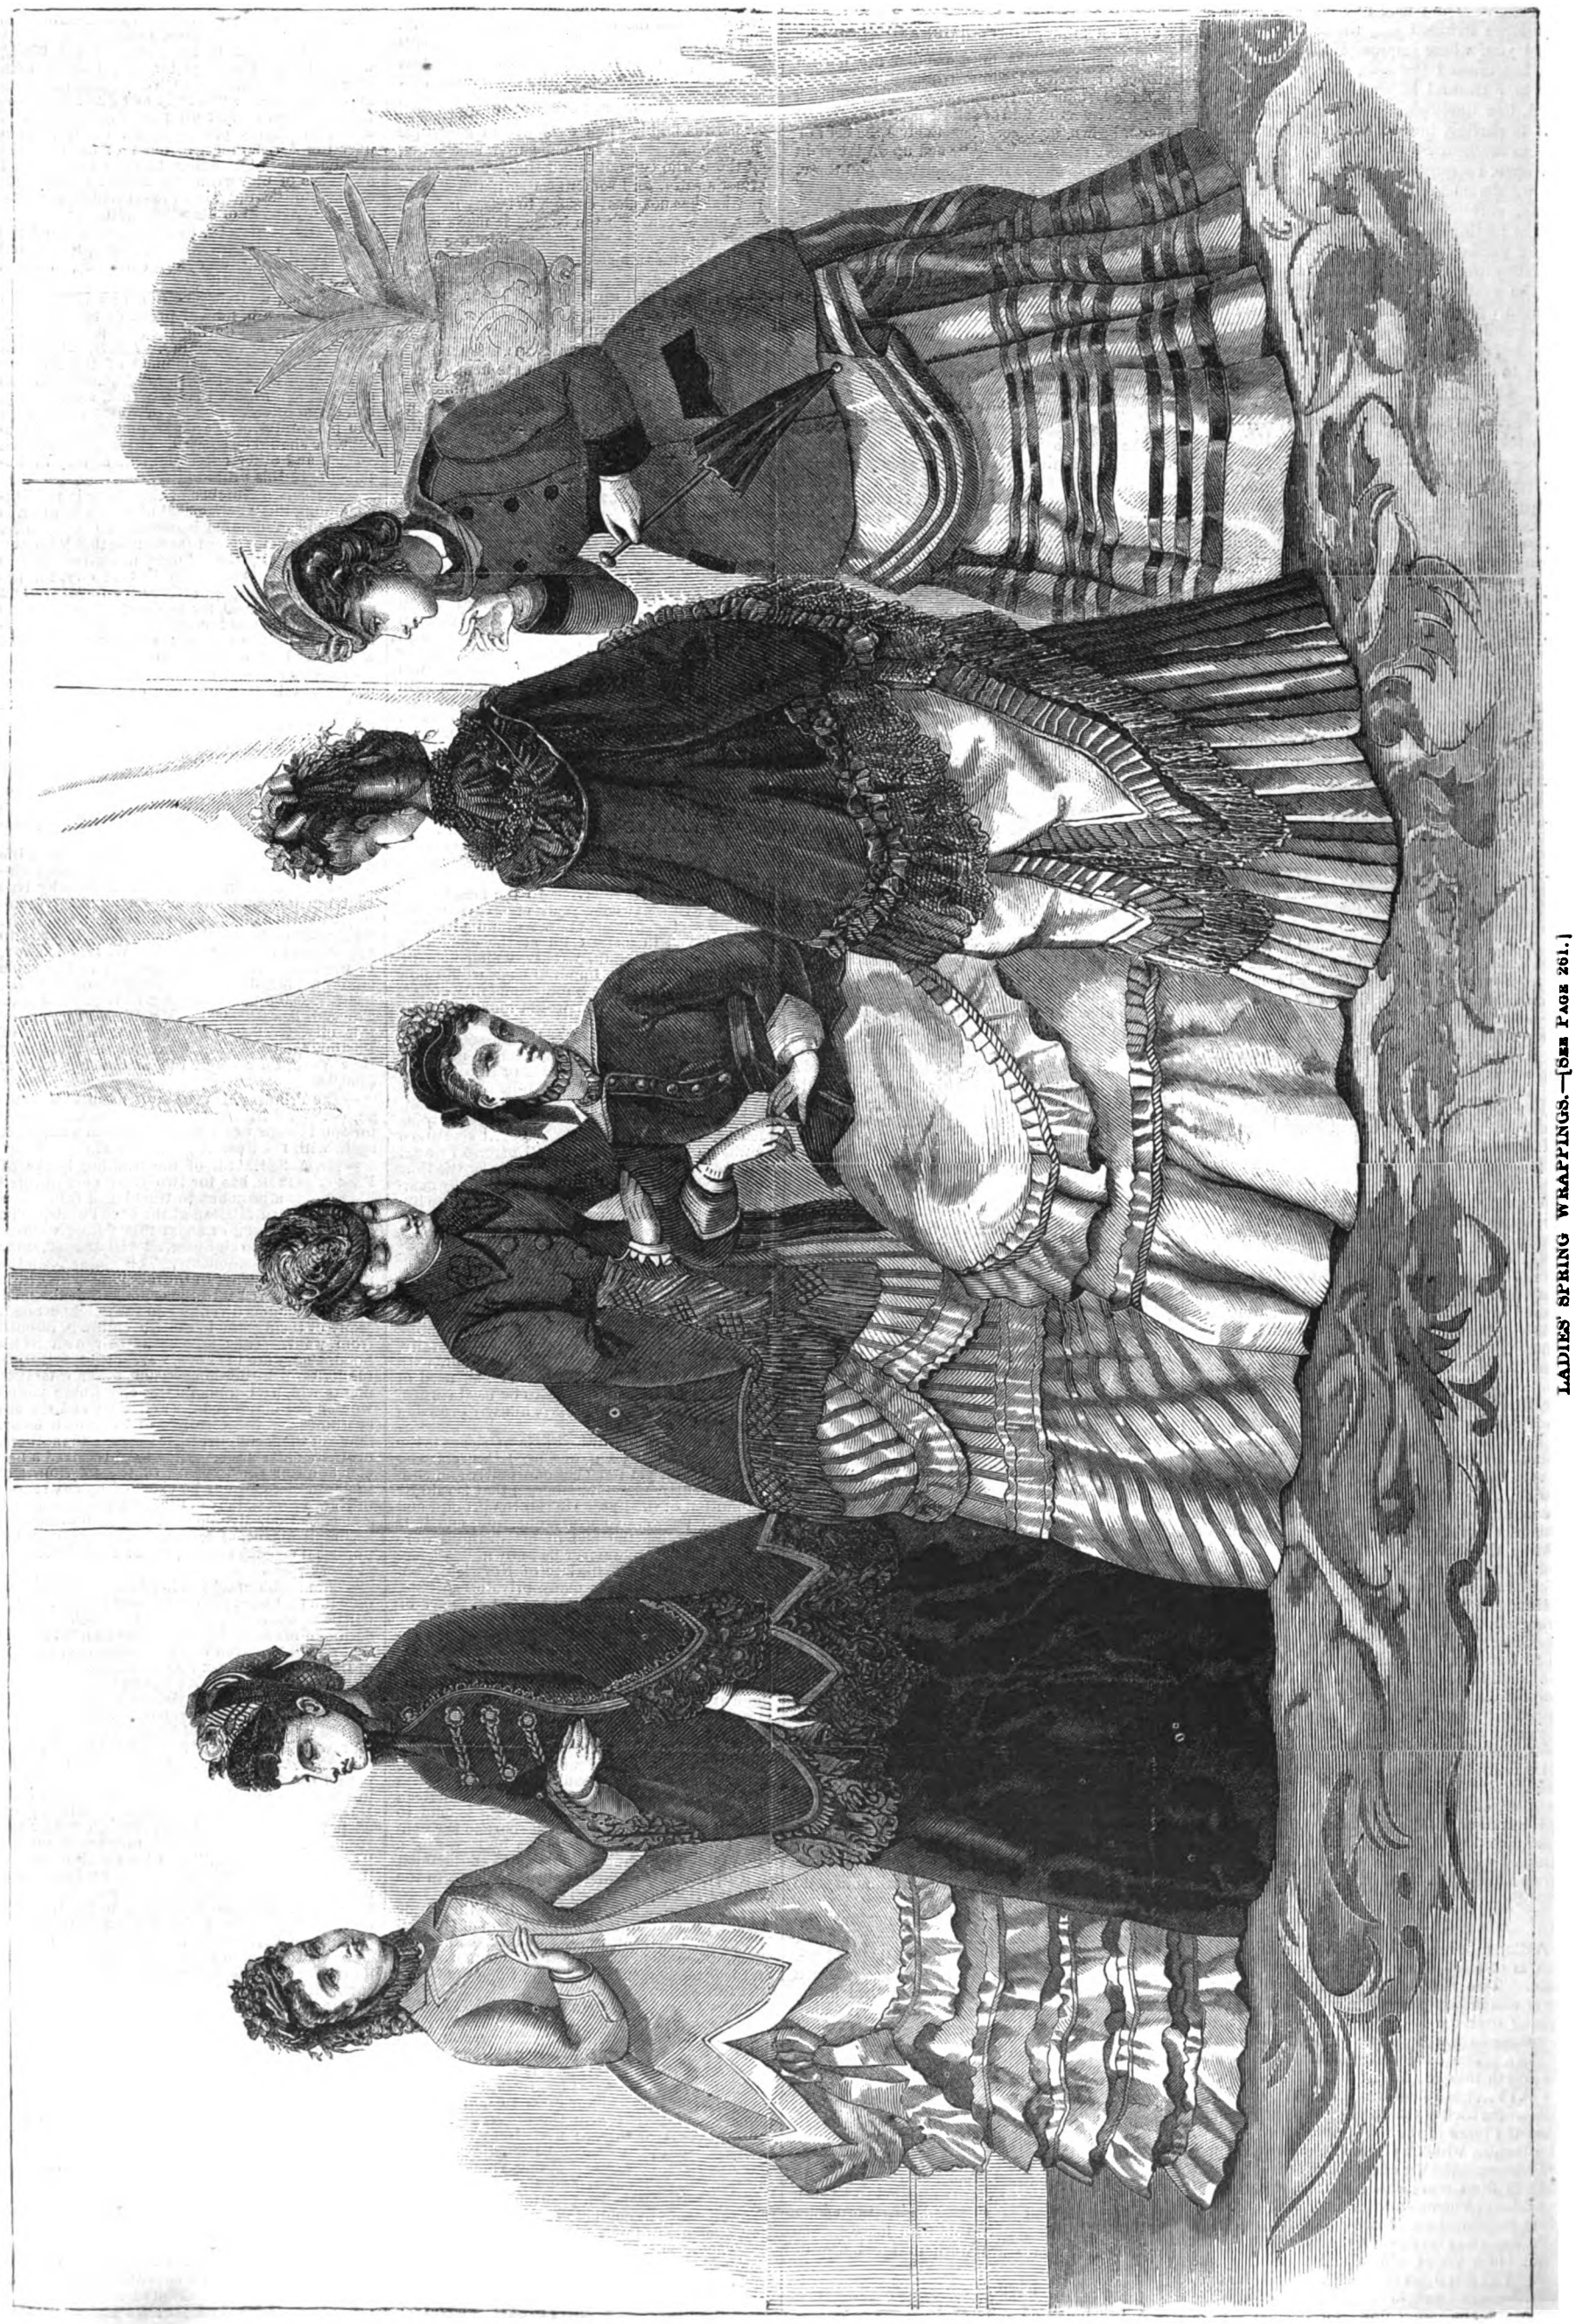
—Notwithstanding the fact that the great life insurance interests of the United States are mainly concentrated in this city, it is equally true that the largest insurances on single lives are made in other places, as for instance: Mr. W. N. SWITZER, of St. Louis, has his life insured to the amount of $300,000. Mr. W. H. LANGLEY, of the same city, has life policies to the same amount. Mr. J. YOUNG SCAMMON, of Chicago, has $270,000 on his life. Mr. L. WHITTAKER, of Chicago, has $200,000. Mr. W. M. TWEED, of this city, $85,000. Mr. JOSEPH BURNETT, of Boston, $75,000. There are few insurances in New York, on a single life, amounting to over $100,000.

—The Princess METTERNICH, admirable woman, collected in Vienna, in two weeks, $50,000 for the French relief fund, and then went at it again with the highest possible zest.

—Mr. A. S. HATCH, of the banking house of FISK & HATCH, has for two years past devoted his Sunday afternoons to teaching a Bible class in the Howard Mission at the Five Points. The class is composed of about fifty young women, of from fifteen to eighteen, all well dressed, some elegantly and fashionably. This class shows the permanent influence of the mission. These girls were all gathered into the school from the poor and even vicious dwellings in the neighborhood. Many of them came in as little children, rescued from want. They now earn their own livelihood. They are in shops, warehouses, factories, binderies, printing-houses, and other establishments which abound in the city where young women are employed. Their tasty and elegant costumes are the earnings of their own labor. Some of them support their fathers and mothers, brothers and sisters. They have received a fine education at the expense of the mission, and their singing can not be excelled by any school in New York. Many of them are fine musicians, and earn their livelihood through that genteel accomplishment. Recently Mr. HATCH gave his pupils an elegant supper, with a choice bouquet at every plate.

—The autobiography of Lord BROUGHAM covers only the first thirty-three years of his life. This will be a public disappointment, though the foundation of his fame was laid before he had reached that age. At eleven he had battled over a point of Latinity with LUKE FRASER, his master at the Edinburgh High School; before thirteen, finished his school course; at sixteen, gained the prize offered by a German university for the best essay on the "Refraction of Light;" and at twenty-four, with JEFFREY and SYDNEY SMITH, founded the Edinburgh Review. It includes, also, the period when he first went to London as counsel in the matter of the disputed succession of the Dukedom of Roxburgh; and when he first gained political standing by his speech before the House of Lords, for certain merchants, on the "Orders in Council;" also his election to Parliament, and his famous speeches on Indian Reform, Catholic Emancipation, against flogging in the army, and to abolish slavery in the West Indies. His lordship is kind enough to admit, that when at college, and even after he had attained the age of twenty-five, he was fond of indulging in adventures of the most rollicking sort. His efforts, while in college, ran mainly in the direction of bell-handles, which he delighted to wring off, and of which he had a large and varied collection in one of his closets. On the occasion of a farewell banquet to HORNER, a young "Reviewer," on his leaving Edinburgh to settle in London, "we" (i. e., BROUGHAM and other literary lambs) "accompanied by the grave and most sedate HORNER (ætat. twenty-five, or, to speak quite correctly, twenty-four years and seven months), sallied forth to the North Bridge, and then halted in front of Mr. MANDERSON the druggist's shop, where I, hoisted on the shoulders of the tallest of the company, placed myself on the top of the door-way, held on by the sign, and twisted off the enormous brazen serpent which formed the explanatory announcement of the business that was carried on within. I forget the end of the adventure, but I rather think the city guard exhibited unusual activity on that occasion, and that we had a hard run for it."

Digitized by Google



LADIES' SPRING WRAPPINGS.—[SEE PAGE 261.]

Digitized by Google

CLAREMONT, SURREY.

THE park and mansion of Claremont, the property of the Crown, situated close to the village of Esher, sixteen miles from London, will for the present be occupied by the Marquis of Lorne and his bride, Princess Louise. The park is three miles and a half in circuit, adjoining an open heathy common traversed by the Portsmouth road. The grounds are very agreeably laid out; they contain some fine trees, a lake five acres in extent, and a small Gothic building, originally intended for a summer-house, but now called the Mausoleum of Princess Charlotte. The house, designed by Brown, was built for Lord Clive, the famous conqueror of Bengal, just a hundred years since, at a cost of £100,000. It is of brick, with stone dressings, and the arms of Clive are inscribed above the portico. The first mansion on this ground was one built by Sir John Vanbrugh, the dramatist and architect, for himself, in the reign of Queen Anne. It was not like the cumbrous edifices he reared for others, which caused some wit to propose for his epitaph:

"Lie heavy on him, earth! for he Laid many a heavy load on thee."

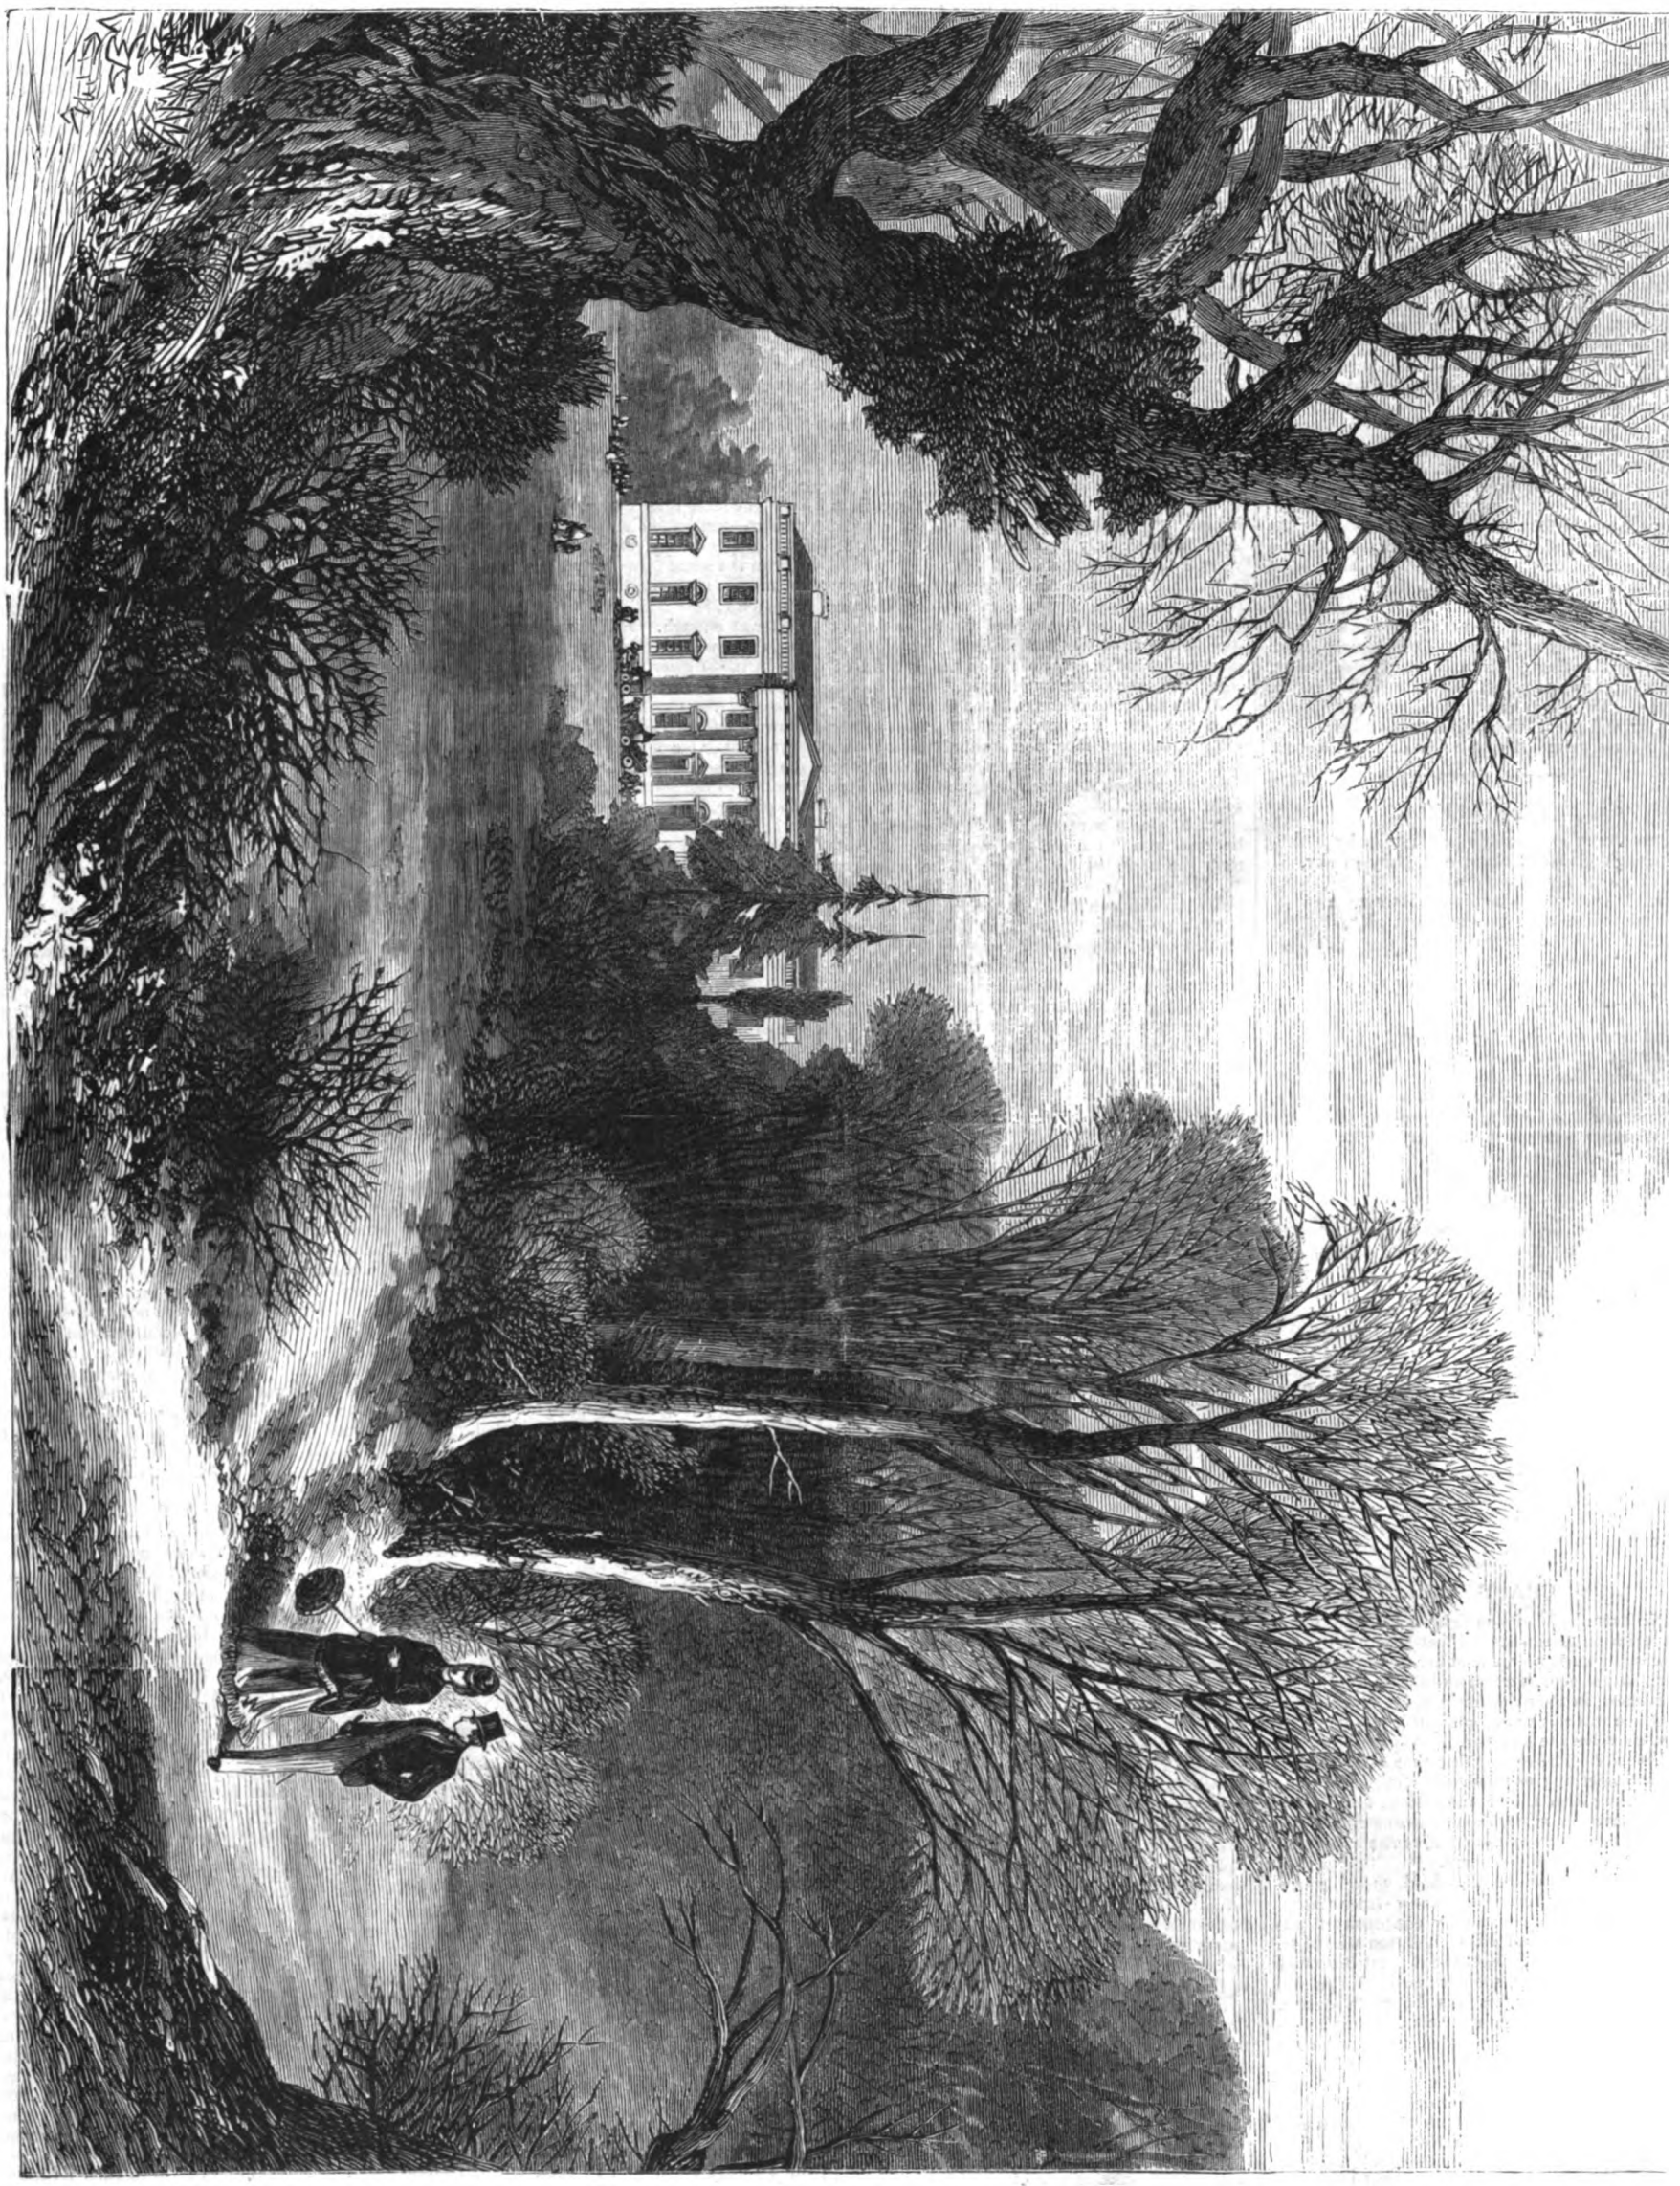
Vanbrugh, who had purchased this site, was content with a small brick house for his own residence. This was afterward sold to Holles, Earl of Clare, and more latterly Duke of Newcastle, from whose title it was named Clare-Mont. He added to Vanbrugh's building, and erected, to the westward, a castellated prospect-tower upon a mount. The grounds were laid out by Kent, a fashionable landscape gardener; Horace Walpole admired them vastly, and the pine-apples from the Claremont conservatories were sent to King George, in Hanover, by special couriers. The Duke of Newcastle, whose dwelling here was near his brother and ministerial colleague, Henry Pelham, of Esher Place, having departed from the world, Claremont was bought by Clive. After Clive's death, in 1774, his newly built mansion passed through the hands of Lord Galway and Lord Tyrconnel to those of Mr. Charles Rose Ellis, the friend and literary correspondent of Sir Walter Scott. Mr. Ellis was visited here by Sir Walter, who here wrote some of his poems. The place was afterward sold to the Crown, which settled it on Princess Charlotte, daughter of George IV., and her husband, Prince Leopold of Saxe-Coburg, subsequently made King of the Belgians. It was here that the Princess died, in November, 1817; and the house contains several memorials of her, portraits of h self and her husband, of her tutors and frien and even pictures of her favorite horses and do The place belonging to the late King Leop for his life, it was put at the disposal, in 18 of the exiled royal family of France. K Louis Philippe and his consort, the late Qu Marie Amélie, here ended their days. It since returned into the possession of the Cro



CLAREMONT, SURREY, THE RESIDENCE OF PRINCESS LOUISE AND THE MARQUIS OF LORNE.

SPRING WRAPPINGS.

See Illustration on page 260.

Fig. 1.—GOLDEN BROWN LADIES'-CLOTH C SAQUE, trimmed with silk of the same shade. T garment is half-fitting, with two hollow pla behind. The bottom is cut in four deep poin two on each side. Half-fitting sleeve, with Gre cuffs. Two yards and a quarter of the mater are required for the garment, with a yard and a quarter of silk for trimming. Golden brown silk dress, trimmed with four flounces, set on with a heading. Over-skirt, forming a pouf behind and looped at the sides, trimmed to match the skirt.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 2.—BLACK SATIN OR VELVET CASAQUE, crossed in front in the Russian style. The bottom is cut in points at the sides, the front forming a rounded tablier. Half-pagoda sleeves, pointed at the bottom. Trimming of passementerie and guipure lace. Five yards and a half of satin or velvet and eight yards and three-quarters of guipure lace are required. Plain black satin or velvet dress.

Fig. 3.—HALF-FITTING PALETOT OF BLACK BARATHEA, with the bottom slightly curving inward at the sides. Pagoda sleeves, and collar with long points in front. The collar is trimmed with braid, and the sleeves and bottom with netted fringe. Two yards and a quarter of cloth and six and a half of fringe are required. Striped silk skirt, trimmed with a deep flounce and puffed heading. Over-skirt, trimmed with puffing.

Fig. 4.—SHORT VELVET JACKET, belted at the waist. Sailor collar, and chevron cuffs of faille. Fancy buttons up the front, reaching only to the belt. Three yards and a quarter of velvet and seven-eighths of a yard of faille are required. Lilac silk dress, trimmed with a deep flounce with pleated heading. Over-skirt trimmed to correspond.

Fig. 5.—HALF-FITTING SATIN OR VELVET MANTLE, with simulated sleeves and hood, trimmed with a satin ruche, which serves as a heading to guipure lace. Five yards and a half of satin or velvet, six yards and a half of guipure, and thirteen yards of satin ribbon for the ruche, are required. Silk dress, trimmed with a deep side-pleated flounce, with over-skirt slashed in the back, and trimmed with side pleating and fringe.

Fig. 6.—DRAB LADIES'-CLOTH DOUBLE-BREASTED JACKET. Half-fitting waist, with narrow standing collar, and epaulets of velvet, and two rows of velvet buttons. Velvet pocket welts. Two yards and three-eighths of cloth and a yard and an eighth of velvet are required. Mohair dress, trimmed with bands of velvet ribbon.

ENDEAVOR.

A MOANING cry, as the world rolls by
Through gloom of cloud and glory of sky,
  Rings in my ears forever;
And I know not what it profits a man
To plow and sow, to study and plan,
  And reap the harvest never.
    "Abide, in truth abide,"
    Spake a low voice at my side,
  "Abide thou, and endeavor."

And even though, after care and toil,
I should see my hopes from a kindly soil,
  Though late, yet blossoming ever,
Perchance the prize were not worth the pain,
Perchance this fretting and wasting of brain
  Wins its true guerdon never.
    "Abide, in love abide,"
    The tender voice replied,
  "Abide thou, and endeavor.

"Strive, endeavor—it profits more
To fight and fail, than on Time's dull shore
  To sit an idler ever;
For to him who bares his arm to the strife,
Firm at his post in the battle of life,
  The victory faileth never.
    Therefore in faith abide,"
    The earnest voice still cried,
  "Abide thou, and endeavor."

(Continued from No. 13, page 199.)

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER VII.

No harm had befallen baby. Hannah, flying up stairs on terror-winged feet that carried her she hardly knew how, found her treasure all safe, lying fast asleep, as warm and soft as a little bird in its nest, in the quiet nursery.

Grace was not there, and yet it was certainly Grace's voice she had heard. What could have happened? The uneasy fear that some time or other something uncomfortable might turn up concerning Jem Dixon was seldom long absent from Hannah's mind, though it was not strong enough to take away the comfort she had in her intelligent and faithful nurse.

Of course the whole household, as well as every household at Easterham, knew Grace's story. In such a small community concealment was impossible, even had Miss Thelluson wished it, which she did not. She had a great horror of secrets, and, besides, she felt that in this painful matter perfect openness was the safest course. Therefore, both to her servants and her neighbors, she had never hesitated to mention the thing, telling the plain story, accepting it as an inevitable misfortune, and then protecting Grace to the utmost by her influence—the influence which any lady can use, both with equals and inferiors, when she is, like Hannah, quite firm in her own mind, and equally fearless in expressing it. Whatever people said behind her back, before Hannah's face nobody breathed a word against the poor nurse, who cowered gratefully under the shelter of her mistress's kindness, and kept out of other people's way as much as possible.

In her class broken hearts are rare; working-women have not time to die of grief. But though Grace said little or nothing, often when she sat sewing, with Rosie playing at her feet, Hannah watched with pity the poor sad face, and thought of the blighted life which nothing could ever restore. For, as has been said, Grace, brought up as little maid to the Misses Melville, had caught from them a higher tone of feeling and a purer morality, in great things and small, than, alas! is usually found among servants; and she suffered accordingly. Her shame, if shame it could be called, seemed to gnaw into her very heart. So did her separation from the children. How far she grieved for their father could not be guessed; she never named him, and, Hannah was certain, saw and heard nothing of him. But that scream, and a slight confusion which was audible down stairs, convinced her that something—probably the vague something she always feared—had happened: James Dixon had reappeared.

She went down stairs and found it so. In the servants' hall, the centre of an excited group—some frightened at him, some making game of him—stood a little, ugly-looking man, half drunk, but not too drunk to be incapable of taking care of himself, or knowing quite well what he was about. He held Grace tight round the waist with one hand, and brandished a kitchen carving-knife with the other, daring every body to come near him, which nobody did, until Mr. Rivers walked quietly up and took the knife out of his hand.

"James Dixon, what business have you in my house at this time of night?"

"I want my missis. I'm come to fetch my missis," stammered the man, drunkenly, still keeping hold of Grace, in spite of her violent struggles to get free.

"She isn't his missis," cried some one from behind. "Please, Sir, he married my cousin, Ann Bridges, only two months ago. He's always a-marrying somebody."

"But I don't like Ann Bridges, now I've got her. She's forever rating at me and beating the children; and I'm a fond father, as doesn't like to see his little 'uns ill used," added Jem, growing maudlin. "So I'd rather get rid of Ann, and take Grace back again."

When he spoke of the children Grace had given a great sob; but now, when he turned to her his red, drunken face, and wanted to kiss her, she shrank from him in disgust, and, making one struggle, wrenched herself free, and darted over to Mr. Rivers.

"Oh, please save me! I don't want to go back to him. I can't, Sir, you know." And then she appealed despairingly to her mistress. "Did you hear what he said? That woman beats the children; I knew she would; and yet I can't go back. Miss Thelluson, you don't think I ought to go back?"

"Certainly not," said Hannah; and then her brother-in-law first noticed her presence.

"Pray go away," he whispered; "this is not a place for you. See, the man is drunk."

"I do not mind," she answered. "Just look at poor Grace. We must save her from him."

For Jem had again caught the young woman in his arms, where she lay, half fainting, not resisting at all, evidently frightened to death.

"This can not be endured," said Mr. Rivers, angrily. "Dixon, be off with you! Webb, Jacob, take him between you and see him clear out of the gate."

Butler and footman advanced, but their task was not easy. Dixon was a wiry little fellow, sharp as a ferret, even in his cups. He wriggled out of the men's grasp immediately, and tried again to snatch at the kitchen-knife.

"Hands off, mates; I'll go fast enough. It isn't much a fellow gets in this house. Grace wouldn't even give me a drop o' beer. I'll be off, Mr. Rivers; but I ll not stir a step without my wife—that's the young woman there. I married her in church, same as I did t'other woman, and I like her the best o' the two; so do the little ones. I promised them I'd fetch her back. You'll come, Grace, won't you? and I'll be so kind to you."

"Oh, Jem, Jem!" sobbed poor Grace, melted by the coaxing tone; but still she tried to get away, and cried imploringly to her master to release her from Dixon's hold. Mr. Rivers grew angry.

"Let the woman go, I say. You have not the smallest claim upon her, no more than she upon you. If she chooses to stay here she shall. Begone, before I set the police on you!"

"Do it if you dare, Sir," said Dixon, setting his back against the door. "I'll not stir a step without Grace; she's a pretty girl, and a nice girl, and I married her in church, too. I found a parson to do it, though you wouldn't."

"Your marriage is worth nothing; I told you so at the time. It was against the law, and the law does not recognize it. She is not your wife, and so, very rightly, she refuses to go back to you; and I, as magistrate, will protect her in this refusal. Let her go." And Mr. Rivers, following words by action, again shook off the fellow's grasp, and let the young woman free. "Now, Grace, get away up stairs, and let us put an end to this nonsense."

For, in spite of their respect for their master, the other servants seemed rather amused than not at this spectacle of a gentleman arguing with a drunken man for the possession of his wife; or, perhaps, some of them having as confused notions of the marriage laws as James Dixon, had thought Jem was rather hardly used, and ought to get Grace if he wanted. John, the butler, an old servant, even ventured to hint this, and that it was a pity to meddle between man and wife.

"Did I not say plainly that she is not his wife?" cried Mr. Rivers, in much displeasure. "A man can not marry his wife's sister. I am master here, and out of my house she shall not stir against her will. Grace, go up stairs immediately with Miss Thelluson."

Then Dixon's lingering civility and respect for the clergy quite left him. He squared up at Mr. Rivers in drunken rage.

"You're a nice parson, you are. Mind your own business, and I'll mind mine. Your own hands bean't so very clean, I reckon. Some folk 'ud say mine were the cleanest o' the two."

"What do you mean, you scoundrel? Speak out, or I'll take you by the neck and shake you like a rat."

For Mr. Rivers was a young man, and his passions were up; and Dixon looked so very like a rat, with his glittering, hungry eyes, and a creeping way he had till he showed his teeth and sprung upon you. Hannah wondered how on earth poor, pretty Grace could ever have been persuaded to marry him. But no doubt it was like so many marriages, the mere result of circumstance, and for the sake of the children. "If ever I could marry that man, it would be for the sake of his children," said once a very good woman; and though men are probably too vain to believe it, many another good woman may have felt the same.

"What do I mean, Sir?" said Dixon, with a laugh; "oh, you knows well enough what I mean, and so do your servants there, and so does all Easterham. There bean't much to choose betwixt you and me, Mr. Rivers, if all tales be true."

"What tales?" said Bernard, slowly, turning white, though he still held his ground, and deliberately faced the man. For all his servants were facing him, and on more than one countenance was a horrid kind of smile, the smile with which, in these modern days, when the old feudal reverence seems so mournfully wearing off, the kitchen often views the iniquities of the parlor. "What tales?"

"Of course it isn't true, Sir—or else it doesn't matter—gentlefolks may do any thing they likes. But people do say, Mr. Rivers, that you and I row in the same boat; only I was honest enough to marry my wife's sister, and you—wasn't. That's all!"

It was enough. Brief as the accusation was put, there was no mistaking it, or Dixon's meaning in it. Either Mr. Rivers had not believed the man's insolence would go so far, or was unaware of the extent to which the scandal had grown; but he stood, for the moment, perfectly paralyzed. He neither looked to one side nor the other—to Hannah, who had scarcely taken it in, or to the servants, who had taken it in only too plainly. Twice he opened his lips to speak, and twice his voice failed. At last he said, in a voice so hollow and so unlike his own that every body started:

"It is a lie! I declare, before God and all now present, that what this man says against me is a foul, damnable lie!"

He uttered the ugly words as strongly and solemnly as he was accustomed to read such out of the Bible in his pulpit at church. They sent a thrill through every listener, and sobered even the drunken man. But Jem soon saw his advantage, and took it.

"Lie or not, Sir, it looks just the same, and folks believe it all the same. When a poor man takes a young woman into his house, and either marries her or wants to, what an awful row you kick up about it! But when a gentleman does it—oh dear! it's quite another thing!"

Mr. Rivers almost ground his teeth together; but still no words came except the repetition of those four, "It is a lie!"

"Well, if it is, Sir, it looks uncommon queer, any how. For a young lady and a young gentleman to live together, and be a-going out and a-coming home together; and when we meets 'em, as I did a bit ago, not exactly a-going straight home, but a-walking and a-whispering together in the dark—'twas them, sure, for the lady had got a red hood on, and she's got it on still."

Hannah put up her hand to her head. Until this moment, confused and bewildered, and full of pity for unfortunate Grace, she had scarcely understood the scandal with regard to herself. Now she did. Plain as light—or, rather, black as darkness—she saw all that she was accused of, all that she had innocently laid herself open to, and from which she must at once defend herself. How?

It was horrible! To stand there and hear her good name taken away before her own servants, and with her brother-in-law close by! She cast a wild appealing look to him, as if he could protect her; but he took no notice—scarcely seemed to see her. Grace only—poor, miserable Grace—stole up to her and caught her hand.

"It is a lie, miss—and Jem knows it is! You mustn't mind what he says."

And then another of the women-servants—an under house-maid to whom she had been specially kind—ran across to her, beginning to cry. Oh, the humiliation of those tears!

Somebody must speak. This dreadful scene must be ended.

"Sister Hannah," said Mr. Rivers, at length recovering himself, and speaking in his natural manner, but with grave and pointed respect, "will you oblige me by taking Grace up stairs? Webb and Jacob, remove this fellow from my house immediately; or else, as I said, we must fetch the police."

Mr. Rivers had great influence when he chose to exercise it, especially with his inferiors. His extraordinarily sweet temper, his tender consideration for other people's feelings, his habit of putting himself in their place—the lowest and most degraded of them, and judging them mercifully, as the purest-hearted always do judge—these things stood him in good stead, both in his household and his parish. Besides, when a mild man once gets thoroughly angry, people know he means it, and are frightened accordingly.

Either Dixon felt some slight remorse, or dreaded the police, for he suffered himself to be conveyed quietly outside, and the gate locked upon him, without making more ado than a few harmless pullings of the garden bell. These at last subsided, and the household became quiet.

Quiet, after such a scene! As if it were possible! Retiring was a mere form. The servants sat up till midnight, gossiping gloriously over the kitchen fire. Hannah heard them where she, too, sat, wide awake, in the dreadful silence and solitude of her own room.

She had gone up stairs with Grace, as bidden; and they had separated, without exchanging a word, at the nursery door. For the first time in her life Hannah went to bed without taking one watchful, comforting look, one kiss of her sleeping darling. She went to bed in a mechanical, stunned way; for though it was still quite early, she never thought of rejoining her brother-in-law. She heard him moving up and down the house for an hour or more, even after that cruel clamor of tongues in the kitchen was silent; but to meet him again that night never struck her as a possibility. What help, what comfort, could he be to her?—he who was joined with her in this infamous slander? Henceforth, instead of coming to him for protection, she must avoid him as she would the plague.

"Oh, what have I done, and how have I erred, that all this misery should fall upon me?" moaned poor Hannah, as bit by bit she realized her position—the misinterpretations that might be put upon her daily conduct, even as upon to-night's walk across the hill. Perhaps what Dixon said was true—that all Easterham was watching her and speaking evil of her? Was this the meaning of Lady Rivers's dark hints—of the eager desire to get her married to Mr. Morecamb—of the falling off of late in social civilities—a certain polite coldness in houses where her visits used to be welcomed—a gradual cessation of lady visitors at the House on the Hill? As all these facts came back upon her mind, fitting into one another, as unpleasant facts do, when one once fancies one has got the key to them, Hannah groaned aloud, feeling as if she could lay her down and die. It had all come so suddenly. She had gone on her way in such happy unsuspiciousness. Yes! now she recognized, with mingled wonder and—was it terror also?—how very happy she had been. There seemed nothing left for her but to lay her down and die.

Every body knows the story of the servant lamenting his master's dying innocent, to whom the master said, "Would you have me die guilty?" Nevertheless, it is hard to die, even when innocent. No bitterer hour ever came to Hannah, or was likely to come, than that first hour after a bad man's wicked words had forced from Mr. Rivers the declaration—which in itself, and in his ever feeling it incumbent upon himself to make it, was disgrace enough—"It is a lie!"

Of course it was; and any friend who really knew them both would be sure of that. But what of the world at large—the careless world, that judges from hearsay—the evil world, which is always so quick to discover, so ready to gloat over, any thing wrong? And there must be something wrong, some false position, some oversight in conduct, some unfortunate concatenation of circumstances, to make such a lie possible.

"Be thou chaste as ice, pure as snow, thou shalt not escape calumny." Most true; but the calumny is rarely altogether baseless—some careless, passing hand may have smutched the snow, or the ice have let itself be carried too near the fire. Hannah remembered now, wondering she could have forgotten it so long, Lady Dunsmore's warning: "He is not your brother; it is only a social fiction that makes him so." And if Bernard Rivers and she were not brother and sister, if there was no tie of blood between them, nothing that, if he had not been Rosa's husband first, would have prevented their marrying—why, then, she ought not to have gone and lived with him. The chain of argument seemed so plain, that in thinking it out Hannah suddenly begun to tremble—nay, she actually shuddered; but, strange contradiction! it was not altogether a shudder of pain.

Fictions, social and otherwise, may have their day, when both the simple and the cunning accept them. But it is not a day which lasts forever. By-and-by they tumble down, like all other shams; and the poor heart who had dwelt in them is cast out, bare and shelterless, to face the bitter truth as best it may.

Hannah's was the most innocent heart possible—strangely so for a woman who had lived, not ignorantly, in the world for thirty years. Whatever mistake she had fallen into—under whatever delusion she had wrapped herself—it was all done as unknowingly, as foolishly, as if she had been a seven-years-old child. But that did not hinder her from suffering like a woman—a woman who, after a long dream of peace, wakes up to find she has been sleeping on the edge of a precipice.

That pleasant fiction which had been torn down by the rough hands of James Dixon, opened her eyes to its corresponding truth, that Nature herself sets bounds to the association of men and women—certainly of young men and young women—and that, save under very exceptional circumstances, all pseudo-relationships are a mistake. Two people, who are neither akin by blood nor bound in wedlock, can seldom, almost never, live together in close and affectionate friendship without this friendship growing to be something less or something more. The thing is abnormal, and against nature; and Nature avenges herself by asserting her rights and exacting her punishments.

The law says to people in such positions—to brothers and sisters in law especially—"You shall not marry." But it can not say, "You shall not love." It can not prevent the gradual growth of that fond, intimate affection which is the surest basis of married happiness. Suppose—Hannah put the question to herself with frightened conscience—suppose, instead of that tender friendship which undoubtedly existed between them, she and Bernard had really fallen in love with one another?

Digitized by Google

That he was very fond of her, in a sort of way, she never doubted. That she was fond of him—yes, that also was true. She could not help it. He was so good; he made her so happy. Many a man is deeply attached to a woman—wife or sister—whom he yet entirely fails in making happy. He thinks too much of himself, too little of her. But Bernard was a different kind of man. That sweet sunshininess of nature, that generous self-forgetfulness, that constant protecting tenderness—more demonstrative in deeds than words—qualities so rare in men, and so precious when found, were his to perfection. He was not brilliantly clever; and he had many little faults; rashnesses, bursts of wrath, sudden, childish, fantastic humors, followed by pathetic contrition; but he was intensely lovable. Hannah had told him truly when she said—oh, how hot she grew when she recalled it!—"that it was a blessing to live with him," for every body whom he lived with he contrived to make happy.

"Oh, we have been so happy together," Rosa had sighed, almost with her last breath. And Rosa's sister, in the bitter pang which seemed like death—for it must surely result in a parting as complete—could have said the same.

Yes, of course she must go away. There seemed to her at first no other alternative. She must quit the House on the Hill the very next day. This not alone for her own sake. It was, as Bernard had once said, truly a house on a hill, exposed to every comment, a beacon and example to every eye. No cloud of suspicion must be suffered to rest upon it—not for a day, an hour. She would run away at once.

And yet, was that the act of innocence—did it look like innocence? Was it not much more like the impulse of cowardly guilt? And if she did run, could she take Rosie with her?

Then poor Hannah at once fell prone, crushed by a weight of misery greater than she could bear. To go away and leave her child behind! All Easterham might be howling at her, but she could never do that. Life without Rosie—the old, blank, sunless, childless life—she could not endure it. It would kill her at once. Better a thousand times stay on here, strong in her innocence, and let Easterham do and say its worst. For she had done no wrong, and, come what would, she had been happy. This sense of happiness, never stronger than a few hours ago, when she and Bernard were taking together that innocent-guilty walk, and finding out more than ever the deep, true harmony of soul, which, in spite of their great differences of character, existed between them, seemed to wrap her up, close and warm, her only shelter against the bitter outside blast.

What would her brother-in-law say? She could not act for herself alone; the position was as cruel for him as for her. She must think of him too, and wait for his opinion, whatever it might be. And then she became conscious how completely she had learned to look to Bernard's opinion, to lean upon his judgment, to consult his tastes, to make him, in short, for these many months, what no man who is neither her relative nor her lover ought to be to any woman—the one primary object of her life.

Utterly bewildered, half frightened, and unable to come to the slightest conclusion, Hannah, after lying awake half the night, fell heavily asleep, nor wakened till the sound of little feet in her room, and the shrill, joyous cry—as sweet as the song of a lark springing up into the morning air over a clover-field—"Tannie, Tannie! Wake up, Tannie!" dispersed in a moment all the cloudy despairs of the night.

Tennyson knew human nature well when he made the rejected lover say,

"My latest rival brings thee rest:
Baby fingers, waxen touches, press me from the mother's breast."

That is, they press out every image unholy, or painful, or despairing. Such can not long exist in any heart that is filled with a child. Hannah had sometimes read in novels of women who were mothers falling in love, and with other men than their own husbands; kissing their babies in their innocent cradles, and then flying from lawful homes to homes unlawful. All these stories seemed to her then very dreadful, very tragical, but not quite impossible. Now, since she had had Rosie, they almost did seem impossible. How a woman once blessed with a child could ever think of any man alive she could not comprehend.

Hannah had not held her little niece beside her for five minutes—feasting her eyes on the loving, merry face, and playing all the funny little games which Rosie and Tannie were so grand at when together—before all the agony of last night became as unreal as last night's dreams. This was the real thing—the young life intrusted to her care—the young soul growing up under the shelter of her love. She rose and dressed for breakfast, feeling that with the child in her arms she could face the whole world.

Ay, her brother-in-law included; though this was a hard thing. She would not have been a woman not to have found it hard. And if he decided that she must stay—that, strong in their innocence, they must treat Dixon's malicious insolence as mere insolence, no more, and make no change whatever in their way of life—still, how doubly difficult that life would be! To meet day after day at table and fireside; to endure, not in cheerful ignorance, but painful consciousness, the stare of all suspicious eyes, especially of their own household, who had heard them so wickedly accused, and seen—they must have seen!—how deep the wound had gone. It would be dreadful—almost unbearable.

And then—with regard to their two selves!

Bernard was—Hannah knew it, felt it—one of the purest-hearted of men. Living in the house with him was like living with a woman; nay, not all women had his delicacy of feeling. Frank and familiar as his manner was—or had been till lately—he never was free with her—never caressed her; nothing but the ordinary shake of the hand had ever passed between them, even though he was her brother-in-law. Hannah liked this reserve; she was not used to kissing; as people in large families are, as the Moat House girls were; it had rather surprised her to see the way they all hung about young Mr. Melville. But, even though in their daily conduct to one another, private and public, she and Bernard could never be impeached, still the horrible possibility of being watched—watched and suspected—and that both knew it was so, was enough to make the relations between them so painful, that she hardly knew how she should bear it.

Even this morning her foot lingered on the stair, and that bright breakfast-room, with its pleasant morning greeting, seemed a sort of purgatory that she would have escaped if she could.

She did escape it, for it was empty of every body but Webb, the butler, whom she saw hovering about, near, suspiciously near, to an open note, or rather a scrap of paper, left on the table, open—was it intentionally open?—for any body's perusal.

"Master has just gone off to the railway in the dog-cart, Miss Thelluson. He left me this bit of paper, with an apology to you, saying he was in a great hurry, and hadn't time to write more, or he would miss the London train."

"He has gone to London?" said Hannah, with a great sense of relief, and yet of pain.

"Yes, miss, I think so; but the note says—"

Then Webb had gratified his curiosity by reading the paper.

Any body might have read it, certainly. It might have been printed in the Times newspaper, or declaimed by the Easterham town-crier for the benefit of the small public at the market-place. And yet Hannah's eyes read it eagerly, and her heart beat as she did so in a way that no sight of Bernard's familiar handwriting had ever made it beat before.

"DEAR SISTER HANNAH,—I am away to town to visit a sick friend, and am obliged to start very early. I hope to be back by Sunday, but do not expect me till you see me. Give papa's love to his little Rosie, and believe me,

"Your affectionate brother,

"BERNARD RIVERS.

"Perhaps you will kindly call at the Moat House to-day, and tell them I am gone?"

WRITING.

UNFORTUNATELY, a very large proportion of "educated women" fall far short of Tim Linkinwater's estimate of good writing. We continually see advertisements of ladies who can write a good hand, and wish for work in copying manuscripts. But the ideas of the employer and the copyist often differ widely about what is a good hand. One lady's "good hand" is all peaks and angles, another's all scrawling dashes, while the sins of undotted i's and uncrossed t's are legion, not to speak of errors in spelling, by no means infrequent. The luckless employer is driven to distraction by the labor of deciphering, to which is sometimes added the labor of correction; and he finally throws down the ill-done work, with a pardonable sneer at the incapacity of women for any thing but dress. Of course she gets no further work from him. Disappointment all to both employer and copyist.

Now to write an ugly hand may be called a misfortune, if you will; but to write an illegible hand is a crime against society; and the angular hand and the scrawly hand are almost always irritatingly illegible.

Every one who chooses may write legibly. Every one who chooses can form each letter distinctly, can make a difference between n and u, between e and c—can dot i's and cross t's; therefore no educated woman who wishes for employment as an amanuensis or copyist can be excused for writing badly. She ought to be able to write letters and copy manuscripts clearly and legibly; if she can not, she has only herself to blame.

To those who feel their deficiency, and wish to improve, here are a few hints.

Write two or three copies every day in a very large hand.

Look at your copy upside down, when the turns of the letters should appear as well shaped as they did when you looked at them the right way. Thus, let the letters nu, when turned upside down, make a good clear mi, only wanting the addition of the dot to the i.

Never leave an i to be dotted or a t to be crossed till you have finished the line or sentence. Dot your i's and cross your t's when you finish the word, at latest.

Remember that the lines of legibility in writing, as of beauty in nature, are all curved. Angular writing is never pretty, seldom legible.

Never indulge in making overlong tails to g's, q's, y's, or overlong heads to l's, t's, and similar letters, running them into the upper or under line. Indulge not in turns, curls, or flourishes of any kind.

Study to make your writing compact without being cramped; free without straggling. To write rather upright than otherwise contributes to the union of compactness and freedom.

Never imitate another person's writing under the idea that it is prettier than your own. Many a girl has spoiled a good handwriting in this way. Let your handwriting form itself from free, bold copy-writing; and let it be thoroughly your own.

Cultivate the power of writing quickly, because it will probably be a necessity to you, certainly an advantage. But eschew hurry. Legibility must never be sacrificed to speed. And hurry is sure sooner or later to push legibility on one side. You must be content to make legibility your first object, and to leave the speed of illegibility to wealthier travelers on life's road. You will, of course, be obliged sometimes to hurry. But beware of getting a habit of writing hurriedly. It may answer in the beginning, but take care lest some day you find the habit of hurry left, the work gone.

Dirty, blotted paper mars good writing. Therefore be neat and clean in your writing. If you have much writing to do quickly, you will find sand answer better for drying it than blotting-paper; less liable to leave blots. Neatness and cleanliness in her writing is absolutely necessary to the woman who wishes to be an amanuensis.

Copy carefully a page or two of some book every day, paying strict attention to the above hints, and you will be surprised to find how much you will have improved your writing even at the end of one month.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

OCCASIONALLY there are those who recognize in the sick poor a want beyond food and clothing and medical attendance—a want even outside of religious comfort and counsel. What it must be to lie day after day in a hospital ward—with all absolute bodily wants supplied, no doubt, but without the loving words of family friends, without any thing to draw the mind from pain and suffering—none can know but those who have experienced it. A very pleasant surprise was recently given to the inmates of Bellevue by the reception of a collection of lithographs and chromos, donated by a lady of this city, to be placed upon the walls of the wards. The wish was that "the sight of these pictures might make the sick for a moment forget their sufferings." The pictures were tasteful and attractive, and, when placed upon the walls, the delight of the poor inmates would have been an ample reward to the donor could she have witnessed it.

During the week ending September 24, 1870, the number of deaths in Paris were 1272; during the week ending February 24, 1871, the number was 3941. The mortality was the greatest the week ending February 3, being 4671. The total number of deaths in Paris from September 18 to February 24 was 64,154.

It gives a little idea of the scarcity of necessaries of life during the siege of Paris to know that late in February there were in pawn at the Mont de Piété no less than 1,100,000 articles. Among these were 2000 glove-maker's scissors, 400 sewing-machines, tools of various descriptions, a large number of mattresses, and musical instruments belonging to those who composed the orchestra of small theatres.

There is no better way to preserve health in the spring than to eat fresh green vegetables moderately every day. These have a tendency to purify the blood. The quantity of meat eaten may safely be diminished toward the approach of warm weather. Many cases of sickness are caused by eating too heartily at a season when the diet should be lightened.

The census of Great Britain and Ireland is taken in a very different way from the census of the United States. The whole matter comes to a crisis on one day. April 2 was the appointed day this year. During the previous week a printed form was ordered to be left with the occupier of every house or separate lodging, who, under a penalty, was bound to fill it up correctly with the name, age, and certain other particulars concerning every person abiding with him at the close of that day. These forms were to be collected on the following day, and corrected by the enumerators if found erroneous. The published census will be issued about the beginning of June. The cost of making it is paid out of the royal Exchequer.

Plans for the new Lenox Library have been approved and decided upon, and work will be commenced at once under the auspices of the Lenox Library Association. The site of the building is on Fifth Avenue, between Seventy-first and Seventy-second streets. It is to be three stories high, built of Lockport limestone, and provided with every modern convenience.

A new bear story comes from Maine, which, if true, is strange. In the town of Burnham a little girl of nine had been to visit a neighbor about half a mile distant, and was returning home, when she was startled by seeing a huge bear about six rods distant. She, being very much frightened, started to run, but on discovering that the bear gave chase, she stopped, and, seizing a club, confronted the bear, which also stopped, sitting back upon his haunches, and displayed his paws in a very playful manner. The little girl ran toward him, club in hand, shouting at him at the same time, when old Bruin took to his heels for the woods, leaving her master of the field. A rare instance of heroism and presence of mind in a child.

The following recipe for salad-dressing has been sent to us by a lady, with the assurance that it has been exceedingly popular in her own family. As we know of its having been approved by others also, we can recommend our readers to try it:

Mix a table-spoonful of dry mustard and a heaping tea-spoonful of salt to a stiff paste, with a little vinegar. Into this beat thoroughly one raw egg. Then pour in best olive-oil, about a wine-glassful at a time, stirring it in each time till quite smooth, before adding more. Continue this till half a large bottle (or a generous half-pint) of oil has been used, when the mixture ought to be thick, like cake batter. Add Cayenne pepper to suit the taste, and a wine-glassful of vinegar, stirring the whole till perfectly homogeneous. Keep in a cool place, in a closely covered jar.

This dressing is more convenient than the ordinary kinds, as it can be prepared beforehand, used as required, and what remains will keep until again needed. Moreover, the physician of the lady who sent it pronounces it an excellent substitute for cod-liver oil!

The ice-making machines will stand idle during the coming summer, if the general report is correct that the supply now stored up will far exceed the demand for ice. However, it is never amiss to use careful economy. Customers should ascertain, by weighing, as soon as delivered, that the fair amount of ice is given them. If in one piece, it will last longer than if in two. A woolen cloth wrapped around it before it is placed in the refrigerator will greatly retard the melting. Refrigerators should be perfectly tight, and the water allowed to run off freely.

About twelve hundred species of birds from North and South America are included in the valuable collections of the museum of Vassar College.

Fossil ivory, in immense quantities, is said to exist in Alaska. It is excellent in quality, and worth about one dollar a pound in San Francisco. This is well, since, according to statistics, the cost to the United States government of the occupation of Alaska is over nine thousand dollars a month, besides supplies.

The salmon fisheries of Alaska are believed to be inexhaustible. Last year 1100 barrels were taken with nets around Sitka Bay, and 700 barrels around Prince of Wales Island. Arrangements have been made to take 2000 barrels in the latter vicinity this year.

A lady of Cumminsville, Ohio, has recently become violently insane, and her friends have been forced to send her to an asylum. Her misfortune is attributed to the use of nitrous oxide, or laughing-gas, administered to her a few weeks ago by an inexperienced dentist. The lady is of a very nervous temperament.

A very Western story comes from Quincy, Illinois, to the effect that two mothers were traveling in the cars, each with an infant about four months old; that each mother, having occasion to leave her seat, deposited her baby carefully on the seat; that each returning, mistook her seat and her baby, and traveled twenty-two miles, each unconsciously nursing the wrong child; and that the mistake was only rectified when one of the ladies was leaving the car, and the conductor, who had noticed the exchange, called her attention to the fact. This makes a very good story to tell—its only fault being that it is highly improbable, as every mother in the world would testify.

Paper is used for car-wheels now. On the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad the Pullman Car Company have wheels with steel tires and cast-iron hubs, into which paper is introduced in the way of filling under the tires for the purpose of deadening the sound and diminishing the force of concussion. These paper wheels, as they are called, have been running regularly since July last, and are still in good order.

On the supposition that France may, at the first opportunity, assail Italy, it is proposed that Rome and Civita Vecchia be protected as soon as possible, that the mountain passes toward France be fortified, and that the fortifications of Alessandria and Spezzia be increased. The immediate outlay for these works is estimated at 151,000,000 francs, and twice that amount will be needed for the completion of the work. The Nazione of Florence queries whether it is worth while to spend so much in fortifications, when it is evident that the fortifications of Paris have contributed very little to the safety of France.

The Church of the Messiah, recently destroyed in Brooklyn by fire, was a new edifice, and considered one of the finest in the city. The loss is estimated at $100,000.

Boston has freely distributed 19,988 gallons of soup during the past season. The soup has been of most excellent quality, and 96,723 persons had a share of it.

One day the Crown Prince of Prussia invited Mr. Odo Russell to breakfast at Les Ombrages, and afterward drove him out to Valérien and St. Cloud. An enthusiastic officer gave Mr. Russell a lecture on shells, and was good enough to proceed to screw out the fuse of the largest French shell in the magazine to show how it worked. "Of course the shell is empty?" said Mr. Russell. "Oh dear, no, quite charged and ready," replied the officer, screwing vigorously, a proceeding which must have greatly contributed to the comfort of the visitors. General Von Blumenthal has ordered that the unexploded shells, of which there are many, should be buried in holes three feet deep.

Between three and four thousand children attending the public schools in this city have already been vaccinated. A large proportion of these were secondary vaccinations, as the law forbids any teacher or pupil to be in the public schools who has not been vaccinated. It is stated that out of 685 children who were vaccinated in one school, in all but 84 cases the vaccination was successful.

We knew there were several methods of pronouncing the name of that populous Western city—Chicago; but were not aware, until lately, of the various orthographies which had come into use. The last, and certainly the most stylish, is taken from a letter which recently passed through the post-office, directed to "Schichagough, Illinoyes." It was promptly forwarded to Schicago.

The Kelly Library owes its existence to a generous gift of money made to the Cornell University by the Hon. William Kelly, of Rhinebeck. The sum thus given has now been, in great part, expended, and the result is a collection of mathematical works surpassed, in this country, by only two or three similar libraries. The library occupies, temporarily, a room of the South University. Its catalogue, which will probably be published during the present year, already embraces upward of one thousand titles. The volumes are well bound, and in each one a book-mark records the name of the generous donor and the date of his gift. They have been purchased principally through the agents of the university at London, Berlin, and Paris, and, in many instances, at extraordinarily low prices. Two or three cases are still expected from Germany, and one from England, the arrival of which will materially add to the treasures of the collection.

Digitized by Google

THE PRINCESS LOUISE.

THE MARQUIS OF LORNE.

THE ROYAL MARRIAGE.—[See Page 265.]

Digitized by Google

PRINCESS LOUISE AND THE MARQUIS OF LORNE.

See illustration on page 264.

IN view of the general interest felt in the marriage of the Princess Louise and the Marquis of Lorne, we devote a considerable part of our paper this week to illustrations of this important historical event. As it is the first instance for some five centuries—since the reign of Edward III.—of the daughter of a living crowned head of the sovereign has been held necessary to the legality of a marriage between a member of the royal family and a subject. In the present instance this consent has been cordially given—as, indeed, why should it not have been? The Marquis of Lorne, the son of the Duke of Argyll, is the representative of one of the oldest and proudest families of Scotland, which has intermarried again and again with the royalty of Scotland, and shone pre-eminent in historic ages when the name of Guelph was scarce heard; marrying a subject, it is worthy, indeed, of all the attention it excites. Since the sister of Henry VIII., the Princess Mary, married Charles Brandon, after the death of her husband, the French king, Louis XII., much to her royal brother's indignation, no English princess, under any circumstances, has ventured thus to cross the pale which separates the royalty from the nobility. So strict are the rules, indeed, that hedge in the divinity of royalty in England, that for the last century the consent and it is difficult to see why the alliance should not have been deemed as honorable on one side as the other. The Princess Louise is reputed to be a young lady of literary and artistic tastes, and very lovable in character. We hope that she will ennoble her new position, and that the future Duchess of Argyll will distinguish herself as much by her good works as the Princess Louise has done in setting at naught the prejudices of a senseless conventionality by marrying the man of her choice.

WAITING FOR THE BRIDE.

IN this pretty picture we see the eight bride-maids of the Princess Louise assembled at Windsor waiting for the arrival of the bride. This bevy of beauties all bear historic names. They are: Lady Constance Seymour, daughter of the Marquis of Hertford; Lady Elizabeth Campbell, daughter of the Duke of Argyll, and sister of the bridegroom; Lady Florence Lenox, daughter of the Duke of Richmond; Lady Mary Butler, daughter of the Marquis of Ormond; Lady Alice Fitzgerald, daughter of the Marquis of Kildare; Lady Grace Gordon, daughter of the Marquis of Huntley; Lady Florence Montagu, daughter of the Earl of Sandwich; and Lady Agatha Russell, daughter of Earl Russell.

The bride-maids' dresses were of white glacé silk, trimmed with satin and a tunic of gossamer and fringe; cerise roses, white heather, and ivy, with wreath to correspond. Each wore the pretty crystal locket, decorated with blue and white enamel, presented to them by the Princess Louise, and illustrated on page 269 of the present Number.

THE WEDDING OF PRINCESS LOUISE AT WINDSOR—WAITING FOR THE BRIDE.

ROMANCING.

THERE is in many a converser a looseness of statement that throws all he says into a sort of debatable land. He has been telling us things as facts which are not facts, but whether he lies or not depends on the state of his own mind, whether it is capable of lying, which, to deserve the term, is always a deliberate act. This is called romancing, in which the speaker may be more mystified than his audience. He allows himself, undoubtedly, a sort of liberty which can hardly have been first contracted without design, but which, once fixing into a habit, renders severe truth impossible. Some minds are conscious of a keen delight in emancipation from hampering truth, when once satisfied of the expediency or necessity of departing from it. The romancing faculty generally, to which we owe so much, needs looking after, or it is apt to accompany a man into the common road of life. A plain man can hardly get over the figments which authors permit themselves in the matter of their works. Some observers have even noticed that inherited imagination is prone to indulge itself in the field of real life, that the children of novel-writers are under a special temptation to subtleties which mislead more matter-of-fact intelligences.

Digitized by Google

HER HAND.

NEXT to her spirit-like face—
Or I almost would rank it before—
Is my beautiful lady's glorious hand,
Beckoning on, like a magic wand,
To Love's own exquisite fairy-land
Upon Phantasy's golden shore.

Veil it, oh, never veil
Even with the delicate glove!
Its beauties unadorned must be,
That I may study my palmistry,
And in its whiteness an emblem see
Of my lady's heart of love.

Garnish with never a ring
Even of gems most rare;
'Twere to gild the gold from Nature's mint,
Man's image in place of God's to print,
The painted lily's hues to tint,
To bedeck those fingers fair.

SISTER ANNIE.

BY JUSTIN M'CARTHY.

"ANNIE dear, we are going to have a visitor to-day, and I think you will be glad to see him. It's my old school-fellow and chum at Oxford, Syl Parnell."

"I'm very glad, George. I remember his name, I think. Is he nice?"

"Oh yes, a charming fellow. At least, he used to be. He pulled stroke in our boat; a regular stunning fellow he was. A clever fellow too; and so quick! He used to coach me up in my Greek, I remember, in a wonderful sort of way. I haven't seen him for a long time; I did not quite know what had become of him."

"Didn't you ever write to each other?"

"Yes; he wrote to me once from China, and I think I answered his letter—in fact, I know I must have answered it."

"And this is the friendship of man!" exclaimed Annie, affecting to look tragic and appalled.

"Well, you know, Annie, men don't write to each other as girls do. I couldn't sit down and write pages of paper to Sylvester Parnell as you do to Julia Carbery. But we are just as warm in our friendship, and I dare say a good deal more steady. I shall be as glad to see Syl Parnell to-day as if we had never been separated."

"How did you hear from him, George? When did he—"

"Turn up, you were going to say."

"Well, yes, turn up, if you like. When did he turn up?"

"He wrote to me the other day from Southampton to say that he had come back to England and meant to settle in Europe. I wrote off at once, asking him to come here instantly and see us, and he is coming to-day; and, my dear Annie, I want you to do every thing in the world to make him happy."

"Dear George, do you think I could fail—to try my best, at least?"

"I wonder if he is married?" George suddenly said. "His letter told me nothing about that. Do you know, Annie, Syl and I were the most romantic pair of fellows in the world, and we used to confide to each other our heart-secrets and distresses in quite a Byronic sort of way; and it so happened that the same grand misery afflicted both of us alike."

"Both crossed in love, George, or both in love with the same girl, who would not have either of you?"

"No, dear, nothing of the kind—quite the reverse, in fact. The misfortune was that neither of us could find any one to fall in love with, and we used to groan over our blighted and barren existence by the hour together. I have sat up with Syl Parnell until daybreak, exchanging revelations of our dreams and hopes and longings, and what not, and wondering who was to be 'the fair, the not impossible she,' destined to make each of us happy, and realize our fond aspirations."

"Poor fellows!"

"Yes, you may well pity us—or me, at least. Look at me, Annie; look at this grizzled, grim old fogy! This was once a bright, romantic youth, sweet sister—when you were in your nurse's arms, child—and he had poetry in him, and love, and all that kind of splendid nonsense. And no woman would fall in love with me, and so I am an old bachelor. Look on the ruin your sex has made in me, dear, and do penance for your sisterhood!"

George Denton assumed an attitude of melodramatic appeal. He was a handsome, tall, fair-bearded man. Middle-aged persons would have called him a young man; he was, in fact, just at the time of life when unmarried men begin to talk vauntingly of getting old, having as yet no fear of being really set down as old bachelors. He was about thirty-five. His sister was at least a dozen years younger. She was not, however, very young-looking. She, too, was fair: she was pale, with clear, delicate outlines of face, and large, deep gray eyes, and a certain thoughtfulness of expression, brightened occasionally by sudden and exquisite flashes of light sent from her genial soul. This brother and sister had lost both parents some years before, and lived together now, Annie keeping house for her brother. They had congenial tastes, and loved each other tenderly, and, indeed, thus far were all in all to each other.

"I wonder is he married?" Annie said, meditatively.

"Oh yes, I should think so; he is sure to have married long ago. He has a warm, loving heart, and I should think he couldn't help himself. Besides, Annie, much reason as I have to complain of your sex, I really don't think so badly of women as to believe there could not be found one at least ready to fall in love with Syl Parnell, and capable of appreciating him."

"Thank you, dear, you are so very kind to us women."

"Yes, he's married; I have no doubt of that. He has left me behind there. I tell you what, though, Annie, he sha'n't have the laugh over me for this evening, at all events; I'll introduce you as my wife! Yes, indeed I will. You shall be Mrs. George Denton! Let me see if he can show half so pretty a wife. Who shall be fairest?"

"Nonsense, George, you won't do any thing of the sort."

"Won't I? See if I don't. And I say, Annie, you must really keep up the joke, just for this evening. I can't stand being rebuked and scorned as an old bachelor all at once; the thing must break itself gently."

The brother and sister lived in a pretty cottage at Twickenham, on the Thames—Pope's Twickenham. "Thou who shalt pass where Thames' translucent wave shines a broad mirror," and so forth, cast a glance along the Twickenham bank, and you will probably see the cottage of the Dentons, for its little lawn runs sheer down to the river, amidst roses and green leaves. And there is a boat moored there, in which George and Annie row of evenings, and sing songs, and are very happy. George Denton was a stock-broker by profession, and a lover of music and of books by nature. He certainly had a dash of the old bachelor about him already; and he loved quiet evenings, and cared little for general society. When business hours were over, his sister and the Thames contented him in the summer evenings; his sister and the bright fire when winter came. He is not the man to make a great fortune, George Denton, but neither is he the man to long for it or to miss it. Meanwhile he is doing moderately well, and his home lacks nothing which refinement needs.

"And now, Syl, old fellow, let me present my wife. Annie, my love, this is my old friend Sylvester Parnell."

Annie blushed a little because of the ridiculous bit of fraud in which George would have her to play a part. This was in the evening when Mr. Parnell had arrived, and she entered the drawing-room and saw him for the first time. For a moment or two she was somewhat confused. Then she recovered herself, and after a few words of welcome she quietly studied her brother's friend.

At first she was disappointed. Mr. Parnell was very distant, and even cold, she thought. His face was dark and, at least in its outlines, somewhat harsh. He was not very young. He made her a profound bow, far too profound for her taste; it was like something on the stage. Then a whimsical idea came into her head that he was like Don Quixote. He certainly was quite unlike the brilliant, romantic, vivid youth George Denton had described to her, and she could not help thinking that Mrs. Parnell—she assumed that there was such a person—must have rather a dull life of it.

During the short delay before the serving of dinner Parnell hardly spoke to Annie Denton; but once or twice, when she looked up suddenly, she found his dark eyes resting on her, and he withdrew his gaze quickly, although without apparent embarrassment. He, then, was evidently studying her.

Only the three were at dinner. None of them wanted the presence of any stranger. Parnell talked freely now of his life, his projects, and prospects, speaking, however, for the most part to George, and not to Annie. He had, it seems, taken orders, but found himself wholly unsuited for the life of a clergyman, and so had engaged in the business of a house in Hong-Kong, and subsequently obtained a consulship there, and lived some years of the dullest, most monotonous and depressing life, until he could endure it no longer; and having some money put together, he came back to Europe and determined to enjoy at least a year of travel before he made up his mind what next to turn himself to.

"My life has been a singularly worthless and wasted one so far, George," he said, in winding up his story. "I don't very well know what my object is in living at all. I often think of our long midnight talks, and our romantic dreams of the great things we were to do, and the happiness we were to find, and—"

"And the women who were to fall in love with us," George broke in with a smile, which had a dash of melancholy in it.

"And the women who were to fall in love with us, George! Well, old fellow, you, at least, have realized your brightest dream in that way. I congratulate you! I rejoice for you! I envy you!"

He spoke with a depth of earnestness which had truth and force in it, and which touched Annie profoundly. "George is right," she thought; "this man has a great heart."

"And you, Mr. Parnell," she said, gently, "you have not married?" For she now began to see that George was evidently mistaken on that point, at least.

"No, Mrs. Denton, I have not married. Nobody ever cared for me; and, indeed, I never cared for any body in that way. I wish I had."

During the evening there was a good deal of general conversation, and Parnell did really display, in his quiet, reluctant sort of way, a surprising amount of the most varied knowledge, and a remarkably refined intellect. There was a dash of quaint and melancholy humor about him, which lent a peculiar savor to his conversation. In the East he had lived such a lonely life that he was now positively surprised to find himself so sociable and so full of conversation. The three went into the boat at sunset, and rowed up and down the river until the moon rose, and the foliage along the banks looked dark; and Annie sang, and George sang, and then, at last, Parnell sang too. And they all became quite confidential and happy.

Parnell had the oars at one time, and Annie and George were singing a duet. The rower only gave a light stroke every now and then, just to keep the boat in motion, and for the most part rested on his oars and listened to the music. Annie had drawn closely up to George's side, and George's arm was round her, and her head lay back on his shoulder as she sang. The two faces, the two forms, the strong man with the beautiful, tender girl lying folded in his arms, while their voices blended in music, and the dreamy, silvery softness of a summer moon lighted them—all this presented a picture of love made perfect in happiness, which might have charmed the dullest eye and touched the coldest heart. How was it with the lonely man who had never been loved, who had never loved, whose heart was full of unquenchable yearning and exhaustless capacity for love, and who looked on this picture and believed it to be one of married happiness? It filled him with a blended gladness and pain almost too exquisite to bear—gladness in the love and happiness of his friend—and pain at the bitter contrast to his own bleak and loveless solitude. There came into his mind the words of the saint who mourned over the misery of the lost souls below because they could never love—"And is mine too, then, a lost soul?" thought Sylvester Parnell, and I don't know that there were not tears in his eyes; and he gave quite a fierce stroke of the oars, and sent the little boat skimming along, to the surprise and disturbance of the singers.

The evening passed away in happiness and pain to one, at least, of the group; and before they separated for the night Parnell announced, to the astonishment of his friends, that he must positively leave them the next morning.

"Leave us—after all those many years that you and I have not met!" exclaimed George.

"After all those many years—yes, it is hard, indeed," Parnell replied. "But it has to be done, my dear friend—my dear friends! Be sure we shall meet again and often; but now we must separate. The sight of you, of you both, has done me good; has made me happy—and melancholy. I see now, George, where happiness is to be had; and where only. If any woman would but love me as you are loved—if there were any other woman in the world like her" (and he pointed to Annie)—"one might think life had a prize worth striving for and holding."

Annie blushed deeply. George, on whose arm she leaned, was on the very point of exclaiming, "My dear Syl, this is not my wife; this is only my sister." But she who saw the coming revelation in his look checked him with an admonitory and very earnest pressure. Much as she now regretted that she had ever been a party to the innocent plot, she shrank from the idea of following up Parnell's latest words by a disclosure of the truth. It would have been like an invitation to him to become a suitor for her. Her cheeks were flushed and her eyes fell. "I believe," she said in her heart, "there is no such thing as harmless deceit—no such thing as deceit that goes unpunished."

"By Jove! Annie," said her brother to her when they were alone that night, "I wish I had never started that nonsense about calling you my wife. Poor Syl seems terribly cut up by the sight of what he considers my conjugal happiness, and the contrast to his own solitary condition. I don't very well know how to get gracefully out of the affair. He won't like the levity of it, I am afraid. I think I'll let him go to-morrow without saying any thing, and then write to him. Poor fellow! Of course he's very unhappy. I don't want a wife, Annie—I have you; but he has no one."

"I must go," Sylvester Parnell said to himself, in his room alone that night. "I could not stay any longer, and look on such happiness and not go mad; and I could not see that pure and charming woman without agony to myself. Good God! how happy he is; and how well he deserves it, dear old George! How she loves him! If ever I meet a girl like her, I will ask her to love me—even though I am sure to be refused. Such a married life as theirs is simply heaven on earth. How strangely I feel toward that woman; and how strange the misfortune that I should never have felt so to any woman but this one, of whom I must not even dare to think too much, and whom, if I were wise, I ought, for my own sake, never to see again."

With a heart that swelled and sank painfully, Sylvester Parnell left the house of his old friend early the following morning. He staid but a day in London, and then went into Scotland and wandered about there; returned to London again, giving the Dentons no hint of his presence; left London, and went to Paris. Traveling about the Continent, he met with an English family at Dresden, and was attracted toward the only daughter by a strange resemblance which she bore, or which he fancied she bore, to Annie Denton. They were ambitious people of the middle class; and Parnell, having some money, and having been in the world of officialism somehow and somewhere, seemed to them a person whose attentions were to be encouraged—at least, until a more desirable chance should offer itself. Parnell seemed drawn to the girl irresistibly by the magnetic attraction of this fancied resemblance. He would sit by her side, and fancy that he sat by Annie Denton; he would picture himself as he had seen George in the boat, with a fair head resting on his shoulder; he would try to think of this girl now near him lying thus in his arms, and he would start and flush on finding that all the time he was thinking not of her, but of Annie Denton. At last, partly because he felt himself compromised in honor by the attention he had paid to the girl, partly in a faint, vain hope of finding with her the happiness he yearned for, partly in despair, and on the wild principle of throwing the helve after the hatchet, he suddenly proposed, one evening, for Caroline Edgar, and he was accepted.

Then came a bitter time. Too soon he found that he was engaged to a vapid, soulless, brainless, selfish creature. With parents who might truly be called vulgar in the world's worst sense, for theirs was not the mere vulgarity of manner which springs from lack of social culture, but the vulgarity of nature which no gilding can refine. Day after day, as gradual intimacy more and more disclosed the true mental character and the heart, or absence of heart, which belonged to Caroline Edgar, our wretched Parnell saw more and more clearly that he had bound himself to one who never could appreciate intellect or high purpose, one in whom the narrowest ambition worked in the meanest ways, an epitome of all the weaknesses and small vices into which fashion can pervert womanhood. For this he had gone through life thus far without love! So loving, so yearning for love was his nature, that up to this time it had found nothing to satisfy it; and now behold the prize it had won, the seamark of its utmost sail!

Of course he had no thought of receding from his engagement. That would have been contrary to his sense of honor. Although it may well be doubted whether a man or woman who has made such a mistake as he had made can do any thing more truly honorable, just, and wise toward both parties to the blunder than frankly to confess the error and draw back before the mistaken engagement is changed into a life-long bondage. But Sylvester Parnell looked upon himself as irrevocably bound to Miss Edgar, and he tried with all his might and main to love her. Now I take it that resolutely striving to love any body is like resolutely striving to go to sleep; the very effort defeats itself. The more Parnell tried the less he succeeded; but he still set his teeth and kept trying. The other party to the engagement never heeded. It never entered into the breast of that ingenuous girl to think whether Parnell loved her or not, or to care. He was engaged to her, and he seemed a good match; what else did she want? Certainly she did sometimes begin to have her little heart-pangs too, but they were not like those of her fiancé. She was a very handsome girl, and of late she had begun to find out that among the many men in Dresden whose eyes acknowledge the fact young Ruddling, of London, was one of the most conspicuous. Ruddling had just come in for an immense fortune on the death of his father. The elder Ruddling began life in the south part of London as the keeper of what is called a "marine store"—that is, a shop where all sorts of old odds and ends, and among them no small proportion of stolen goods, are bought and sold; he then became a dust contractor, like Mr. Boffin's employer in "Our Mutual Friend;" he made a great fortune; and then he died. Young Ruddling was his only son and heir. He was as miserable a little cad, to use a London word, as you could see in a day's walk; but he had an immense fortune. He was evidently smitten by Caroline Edgar's eyes and tresses and dresses; and Caroline began to say to her soul in secret, "I was too rash—I ought never to have engaged myself—I might have married this millionaire!"

Ruddling became more and more attentive, more and more devoted; perhaps he did not know of Caroline's engagement. Certainly Miss Edgar never told him of it. Toward Parnell she became so cold, capricious, and strange in manner that her unfortunate fiancé, little skilled in the ways of fashionable womanhood, and not knowing how else to account for her altered demeanor, fancied, in his simplicity, that she had discovered some coldness in his bearing toward her, and was offended by it; and he became twice as attentive and twice as miserable. At last the fair Caroline could stand it no longer; and one day the little English colony in Dresden enjoyed a little excitement in the news that Miss Caroline Edgar had been privately married to Frederick Ruddling, Esq., at one of the English churches, without the knowledge of her parents, and, of course, without the knowledge of her affianced suitor, the jilted and blighted Sylvester Parnell. Every body was amused; some persons pitied Parnell; not a few bestowed their commiseration on Ruddling. The bride's parents declared themselves very angry; but they were persons of forgiving disposition, and they at once took their daughter and their son-in-law into full favor; and, indeed, they have never since quitted the shelter of some one or other of the roofs owned by the opulent Ruddling.

And Sylvester Parnell felt like one who has suddenly thrown off some oppressive load of pain. He had suffered so much in his short bondage that the mere sense of freedom was in itself a happiness. He left Dresden for Paris, and Paris for London. "Come," he said to himself, as the Rouen and Dieppe train whirled him away to the French shore, "there finishes my love-chase! Love is not made for me; I will try no more for it; I will endeavor to think no more about it. Some men are cut out for solitude and old-bachelorhood; let them accept their destiny, being assured they can not mend it. I am free; let that be enough. A desolate freedom, to be sure, but still freedom. Love is for men like my dear old friend, George Denton.

Digitized by Google

God bless him! I'll go to see him now; I know I may do that without any new pain to myself. Just one refreshing glimpse of his delicious happiness; just one kind pressure of his friendly hand, one genial smile from his incomparable wife, and 'I will bury myself in my books, and the devil may pipe to his own.'" After which quotation from "Maud," he lighted a cigar, and tried to smoke away thought.

He reached London, and plunged upon George Denton, who was delighted to see him.

"Then you are not married, Syl?" asked George.

"No, nor likely to be, old fellow—thank Heaven!"

"Why, we heard you were about to be married."

"I am not about to be married, George," said Parnell, gravely. "Pass by all that. How is your wife?"

"Well, I say, Syl, you know; I wish I hadn't been so ridiculous; I wish I had not played so absurd a prank."

"What prank?"

"Why, you know—confound it all! It was a stupid joke of mine. You don't really think Annie is my wife?"

"What else? What on earth do you mean?"

"My dear fellow, I am a confirmed old bachelor, and shall never be any thing else. Annie Denton is my sister."

Then George explained the whole thing; and I hardly think I need explain any more. Enough to say that Sylvester Parnell made a long visit to Twickenham, and has found his ideal out at last. A time will soon come when these three will float along the Thames in the moonlight once again, and George will have the oars, and Annie will lie with her head supported by Syl Parnell's shoulder, and his loving arm around her.

PLAIN SPEAKING.

"GIVE my best love to Mrs. Humphrey," said Melicent.

"My dear," objected the mother, "you have nothing left for the rest of us. You have sent your best to Mrs. Humphrey; do you love her equally with your father and mother?"

"Oh no, certainly not; that is understood."

"Then why say more than you mean? Why not merely send your regards?"

"Because regards are so cold and calculating, and Mrs. Humphrey has been so kind and cordial."

"And so you reward her with empty words, with insincerity! Oh, if there were a little more of the heroism of plain speaking in the world! If every one would say just what he thinks and feels, no more, no less!"

"Mamma, we should offend every body."

"And is not that better than to offend the truth? It requires more courage, to be sure."

"Well, I will try it some day; just now I must write to Mr. Trustee, who has offered me the place of music-teacher in the school at Blank. I don't know how to say what I want to. I've only got as far as 'Dear Mr. Trustee.'"

"Indeed! have you met him often?"

"You know I have not, mamma."

"Then why do you call him 'dear?' You may find him any thing but agreeable."

"But I feel grateful for his offer; and in that aspect he is dear to me."

"Sophism and folderol! And it wouldn't cause you to shed a tear if he were to vanish into nothingness to-morrow."

"Perhaps not."

"Then he is not dear to you; and why should you prejudice truth for the sake of custom?"

"Then I had better speak plainly to him in every particular?"

"I should try the experiment." And so Melicent wrote:

"MR. TRUSTEE: SIR,—I am very grateful for the offer of the situation of music-teacher, but as I am entirely self-taught, you may not find me able to undertake the musical education of the advanced classes, and therefore not worth the salary you propose. In the mean time, I never have taught, and I am confident I shall not like to teach; but as my daily bread is a matter of importance to me, I shall do my best in whatever situation I may be so fortunate as to secure.

"Very truly yours,

"MELICENT JACKSON."

"That is a good beginning," said Mrs. Jackson, "only you are not 'very truly his.'"

"If he takes me—which I am sure he will not do after this—I shall be truly his!"

"It does simplify matters to speak plainly," thought Melicent; and she went to her pillow that night, decided to turn over a new leaf, and henceforth to be a plain speaker; and this is her own account of the attempt:—

In the first place I went out to walk, and I met young Mr. Bragg.

"How did you like the singing last Sunday?" he asked; and I answered, "I thought you sang the selections from 'Elijah' very badly; you lost the pitch twice—begging your pardon—and flatted like all possessed." At that he looked as if he wished I were a selection from "Elijah," that he might murder me; so I beat a retreat, and went into Cousin Dole's, just as she was sitting down to dinner. "How do you like my new dinner set?" said she, having prevailed upon me to stay; "it was just imported by Briggs. It cost three hundred dollars."

"A fool and his money," I replied: "it looks like a hotel service; it's frightfully gaudy."

Cousin Dole bit her lip, and I noticed that she helped me to a much smaller piece of transparent pudding than usual, and forgot the sauce; perhaps she thought I had plenty of my own.

"Don't you think that Betty makes delicious bread?" she asked, when the other affair had blown over somewhat.

"I don't know."

"Hannah, pass the bread to Miss Jackson."

"No, thank you; I have some."

"Well, isn't it nice?"

"It's a trifle sour. Very likely it's no criterion of Betty's ability. I hope she can do better." Cousin Dole didn't urge me to remain to tea, and as I passed under the window I distinctly heard her say, "There! I'm glad she's gone. She's growing into the crabbedest old maid alive. I do hate these people who always say what they think."

"Unless it's something complimentary," put in her husband.

Well, after that, I thought I'd walk down to the causeway and watch the ships out at sea, and the women digging clams close by; and who should I meet there but Mr. Heavyhead? Now if there is one mortal I dislike it is Mr. Heavyhead; but then it was no part of plain speaking to favor him with my views concerning one with whom he is so deeply enamored, unless he should request them.

"Well met," said he.

"You are mistaken," said I.

"Ah!—excuse me. It's a great happiness to meet a friend, and you are my friend, are you not?"

"Ahem!—I would not do you an injury." (Query: Is evasion plain speaking?) "I would do you a service rather."

"Thank you," returned this prince of coxcombs. "You have the elements of friendship. May I ask what you thought of my last poem in the Monthly Cipher?"

"Excuse me, but I thought the measure very bad, and the ideas meagre."

"Indeed! You are very frank. It is a virtue, no doubt," as if he were swallowing a dose of rhubarb by prescription. "You remind me of the character of Lucy Ellen, in my novel of 'Not Well, but too Wisely.' Do you remember it?"

"I never heard of it."

"I am very sorry. Perhaps you will allow me to present you with a copy?"

"Thank you, but I would rather not."

"You have no curiosity, then, to read it?"

"Not the slightest."

He left me shortly after this, with a graceful but frigid touch of his hat; and when I reached home I found Mrs. Housekeeper and her baby waiting to be admired. Now I hate to disappoint people.

"What colored hair do you think she'll have?" she asked, with maternal anxiety.

"I see nothing to judge from at present," I returned.

"And ain't her eyes real beauties, now?" she persisted.

"No, my friend," I said. "I never could see any thing beautiful in crossed eyes, though familiarity may render them endurable."

Mrs. Housekeeper was no disciple of plain speaking, for she took her leave in a dudgeon; and in came old Mrs. Proser to tea. Now Mrs. Proser is a trifle hard of hearing, more or less, according to circumstances—for you know there's a saying that there are none so deaf as those who won't hear.

"I've got a monstrous poor appetite," she averred, having done respectable justice to every thing on the tea-table. "Now did ye ever see the beat of it?"

"Never."

"I think I need a tonic. It's a long time since I took tea with your folks afore, Miss Jackson. Hain't you missed me a sight?"

"No, I haven't missed you at all."

"Thank you; I know'd you did. If there's any consolation fur not being able ter be inter two places ter onst, it's in being missed in one of 'em. There, I've jest dropped a leetle stitch in my knitting; I know'd you'd be pleased ter pick it up fur me now?"

"It's very disagreeable to me to pick up stitches in knitting, but, of course, I shall have to do it."

"Yes, you're real obleeging; young eyes don't mind. Now, if it ain't bad manners, may I ask how much you give fur your new bonnet as you had on a-Sunday?"

"It is very bad manners," I replied, "and I never encourage such curiosity."

"Du tell! 'twas mighty reasonable, wa'n't it? Six dollars! How'd you like Hitty's? Wa'n't it real becoming?"

"I thought it the ugliest thing I ever laid eyes on, and she looked like a fright in it."

"Yes, I told Hitty I thought you'd taken a fancy ter it; I see you a-feasting of yer eyes onto it all church-time. Eight o'clock. Wa'al, I must be jogging, unless you'd like ter hev me stay longer fur company?"

"Thank you; it will give me no kind of pleasure."

"Then I'll jest stay by till yer ma comes in, ter obleege ye."

At this moment the servant brought in an invitation to Mrs. Shoddy's soirée. Now Mrs. Shoddy, you know, is not exactly in our set; but she is ambitious, and a neighbor; but from want of education in early life she is somewhat uncultivated, and not a little vulgar. Therefore I sat down and answered her thus:

"Miss Jackson declines the invitation of Mrs. Shoddy, not wishing to associate with people of her stamp, and persuaded that she should not enjoy herself in the company of Mrs. Shoddy or her guests."

I had hardly finished when Miss Furbelow sent in to borrow the pattern of my new over-skirt. Now the pattern in question was a pet pattern, which had cost me no end of pains to procure, and some money, and though Miss Furbelow and I are quite intimate and friendly, I bravely returned word by her messenger that "Miss Jackson had counted upon a first and isolated appearance in the new style, and was therefore obliged, in self-defense, to refuse it to Miss Furbelow, knowing that her machine would turn it out ready-made long before Miss Jackson's fingers had basted it together."

Scarcely had the messenger departed when Nell Fling came dancing in to show off her new scarlet jacket, trimmed with swan's-down, like freshly fallen snow.

"Isn't it a beauty, and doesn't it set like a pin?" she cried, looking at herself over her shoulder.

"Not at all," I replied, rather quenchingly; "I think I never saw a worse fit. The stuff is pretty enough, but it's just spoiled, and that's the whole of it!"

"And I never saw a worse fit of jealousy," she returned, flinging out of the house; and just then, hearing a loud noise outside, and looking out by chance, I saw Nell Fling and Miss Furbelow and Mrs. Shoddy, with old Mrs. Proser, Mrs. Housekeeper and her baby, Mr. Heavyhead, with Cousin Dole, and young Mr. Bragg, with the whole choir at his heels, bombarding the windows with brickbats, and shouting, "Down with the Plain Speaker! Down with the Plain Speaker!" And then the breakfast-bell rang, and I was glad to wake up and find I wasn't a plain speaker after all.

"One couldn't expect any thing better of a dream," said her mother; "that is no argument against plain speaking, for there you speak without judgment or tact. In the mean time, here is a better argument in its favor;" and Melicent opened Mr. Trustee's answer, and read:

"MISS JACKSON,—You are accepted as music-teacher in the Mount Varnish Seminary, the Board feeling assured that a young lady who speaks so honestly will not be less honest in the discharge of her duties.

"Respectfully, MR. TRUSTEE."

FAMILY BREAKFASTS AND DINNERS.

BREAKFAST.

Cocoa Shells, Fried Smelts, Fried Potatoes, Buttered Toast, Rice Griddle Cakes.

COCOA SHELLS.—To a large handful of shells allow one pint of cold water. Let them soak overnight in a warm place. In the morning boil steadily for one hour. Serve, with boiled milk, hot.

FRIED SMELTS.—Put half a pound of salt pork, fat, cut in thin slices, into a deep frying-pan, and fry till crisp. Wash and clean the smelts, but do not cut them; dry them on a clean towel, and dip them in fine bread crumbs or Indian meal. Put them in the fat from the slices of pork when it is boiling hot, and fry till brown, turning when half done. It is a great improvement to wash these fish in water with some coarse salt dissolved in it, instead of fresh water. Five minutes should fry a smelt thoroughly.

FRIED POTATOES.—Peel and cut the potatoes into thin slices as nearly the same size as possible. Melt some butter or dripping in a frying-pan till it boils. Put in the potatoes, and fry them, on both sides, of a nice brown. When they are crisp take them up, place them on a cloth before the fire to drain the grease from them, sprinkle with salt, and serve very hot. The remains of cold boiled potatoes may also be sliced and fried by the above recipe, but the slices must be cut thicker than the raw potato.

BUTTERED TOAST.—Cut a loaf of bread into as many even slices as may be required, about quarter of an inch thick, and toast them before a clear fire till well browned, but not scorched. Put the slices on a hot plate, and cut each one in half or quarter, according to size. Pile up in slices, with a large piece of butter on each piece; set before the fire, having another hot empty plate ready. As the butter melts spread each piece rapidly, piling again on the empty plate. Serve very hot.

RICE GRIDDLE CAKES.—To half a tea-cupful of whole rice allow three eggs, half a pint of rich sweet milk, and half a tea-spoonful of salt. Boil the rice till every grain is thoroughly dissolved; stand aside till it jellies. Beat the jelly in the milk, slightly warmed, till smoothly mixed. Beat the eggs till very smooth and light, and add to the rice and milk; add the salt. Beat to a smooth batter. Bake on a hot, well-greased griddle till brown and light. If the batter does not adhere well together, add the yolk of another egg. Flour spoils them.

DINNER.

Beef Soup, Broiled Fresh Mackerel, Ribs of Beef (roasted), Curried Rabbit, Stewed Spinach, Horse-radish Sauce, French Beans, Pickled Nasturtiums, Cheese Cakes.

BEEF SOUP.—Saw a shin of beef in four pieces. Wash clean and put in a pot, covering entirely with clear, cold water. Simmer and skim carefully till it is clear, and the meat leaves the bone. Strain, and to the liquor add turnips, potatoes, carrots, onions, and potherbs, cut in pieces. Boil till the vegetables are nearly done, add two table-spoonfuls of rice or barley, boil fifteen minutes longer, season with pepper and salt, and serve—serving the meat hot in a separate dish. A few tomatoes are an excellent addition.

BROILED FRESH MACKEREL.—Mackerel should never be washed before broiling, but merely wiped very clean and dry, after taking out the gills and insides. Open the back, put in a little pepper and salt, and spread with a thin coating of butter. Broil over a clear fire, turning it when half done. When sufficiently cooked, the bone will come out easily. Remove the bone; chop a little parsley, work it up with butter, pepper, and salt, and a little lemon juice, and place this on each side of the open fish, in the place of the bone. Stand before the fire till the butter is all melted in, and serve hot.

RIBS OF BEEF (ROASTED).—The fore rib is the best roasting piece. Put the meat down before a nice clear fire, put some dripping into the pan, dredge the joint with a little flour, and keep continually basting. When thoroughly done, put upon a hot dish, and sprinkle a little salt over the joint. Pour a little boiling water into the dripping, season with pepper and salt, and strain it over the meat.

CURRIED RABBIT.—To one large rabbit allow three large onions, two ounces of butter, one pint of soup stock, one table-spoonful of curry-powder, one table-spoonful of flour, one table-spoonful of mushroom powder, a tea-cupful of rice, and the juice of one lemon. Skin, clean, and wash the rabbit, and divide it at the joints. Put the pieces into the stew-pan with the butter and sliced onions, and let them brown nicely. Let the stock boil, and pour it boiling into the stew-pan. Mix the curry-powder and flour smoothly with a little water, add it to the stock with the mushroom powder. Simmer gently for fifteen minutes. Boil the rice in a separate vessel till tender. When the rabbit is done, put the rice in a dish, pour the rabbit and stock into the middle of the rice, squeeze the lemon juice over all, and serve hot.

STEWED SPINACH.—Pick and wash the spinach thoroughly. Boil it till perfectly tender, and drain it. Put in a stew-pan one ounce of butter, and melt it. Chop the spinach very fine, and toss it in the butter over the fire, till all the butter is absorbed. Add a tea-cupful of rich cream, a tea-spoonful of powdered sugar, one of salt, and a little black pepper. Stew gently for ten minutes. Serve hot, covered, with slices of hard-boiled egg.

FRENCH BEANS.—Boil the beans until tender, and drain them. Shake them in a stew-pan over the fire until dry. When quite dry and hot, add three ounces of butter, pepper, salt, and the juice of one lemon. Keep shaking the stew-pan till the butter is all thoroughly melted, and serve very hot.

HORSE-RADISH SAUCE.—To four table-spoonfuls of grated horse-radish allow one tea-spoonful of powdered sugar, one tea-spoonful of salt, half a tea-spoonful of black pepper, two tea-spoonfuls of mixed mustard, and one gill of vinegar. Grate the horse-radish, and mix it well with the salt, pepper, sugar, and mustard. Beat it up well, adding the vinegar gradually.

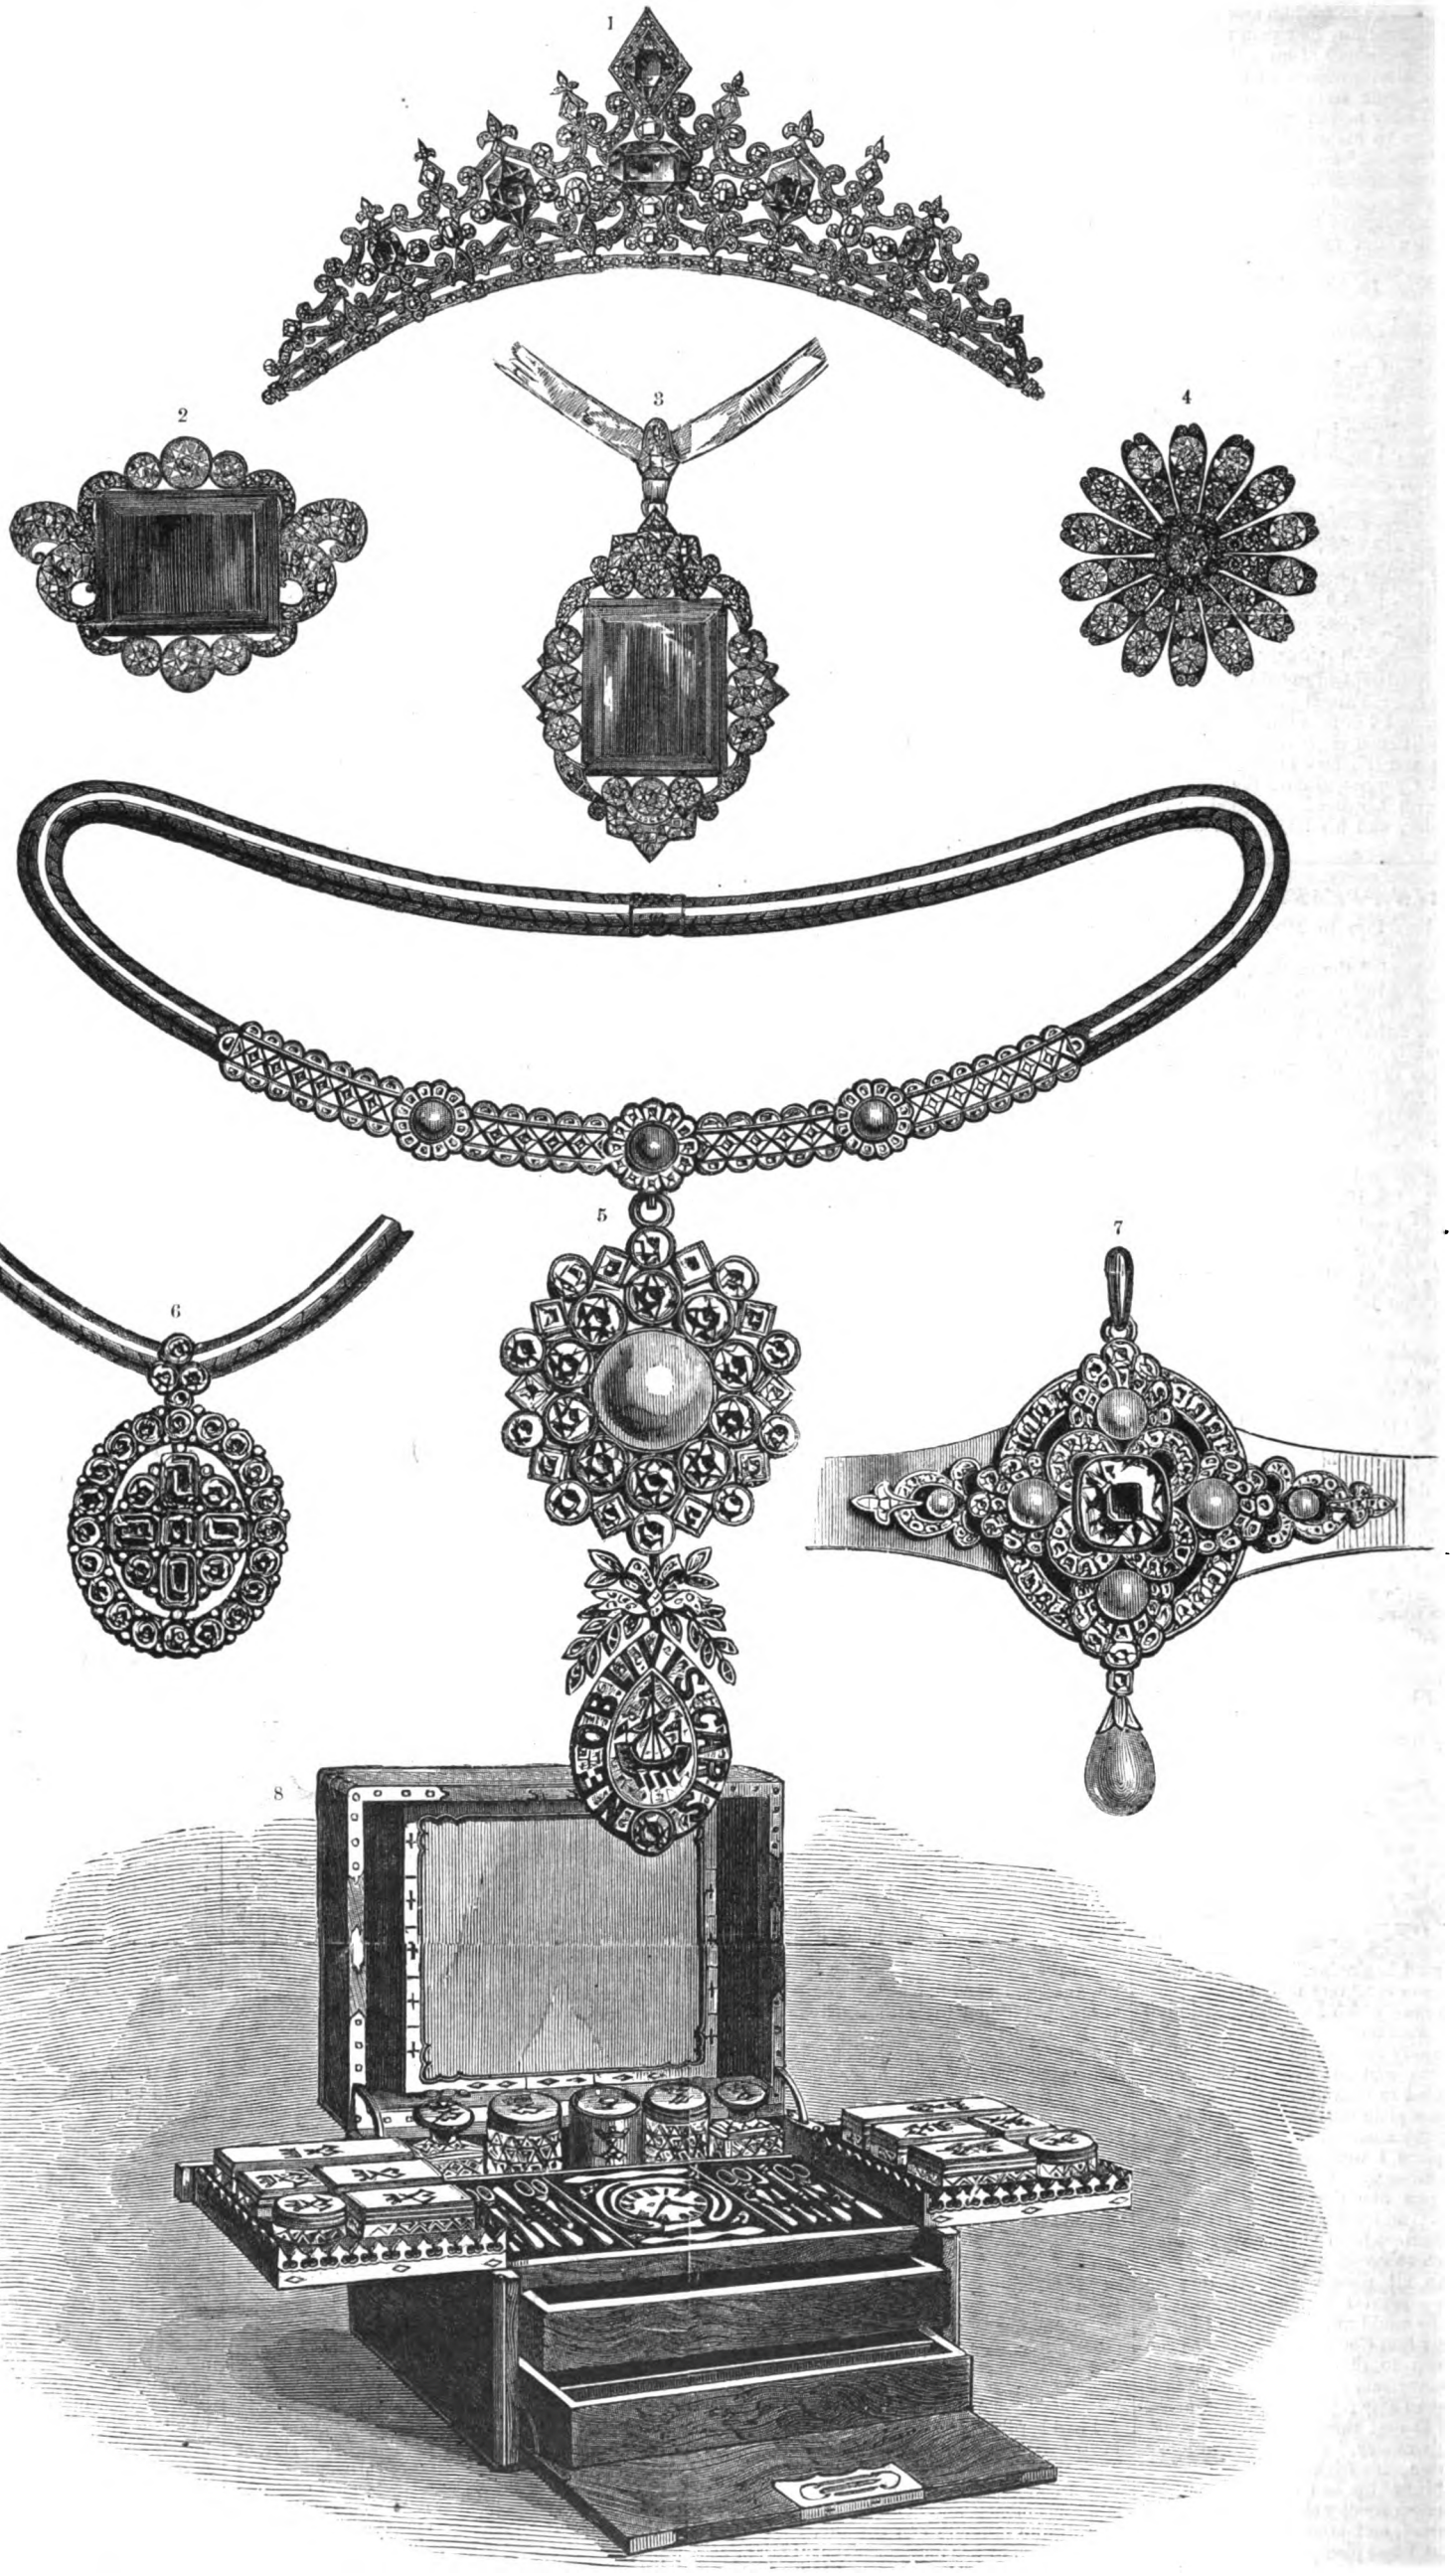
PICKLED NASTURTIUMS.—As soon as nasturtiums are gathered throw them into strong brine, and let them remain for two days. Boil together vinegar, whole pepper, whole cloves, salt, and a small piece of ginger root. When boiling, pour this over the nasturtiums, previously draining them well. Cover closely for one week, when they will be fit for use.

CHEESE CAKES.—To one pound of cottage cheese, allow a quarter of a pound of butter, one pound of loaf-sugar, six eggs, the grated peel and juice of three lemons. Beat the cottage cheese to a cream with the other ingredients, having previously beaten the eggs very smooth and light. When well mixed and very smooth, line pie-dishes with puff paste, fill with the mixture, and bake, uncovered, in a quick oven. Serve cold, sprinkled with finely powdered loaf-sugar.

PUTTING CHILDREN FORWARD.

THERE is a tendency, we think, at the present day, to put children too forward, not so much for the sake of showing off their extraordinary merits to an admiring world as from the better motive of early accustoming them to the conversation of grown people and the usages of society, and of inspiring them with confidence, ease, and self-possession. No doubt these results are very valuable; but the mistake which many people make is in forgetting that children are something like dogs, which require to be very well trained before they can safely be recommended to the familiarity of strangers. And it is to be remembered that the moment children cease to respect any of the grown-up people with whom they associate, not only is the whole benefit of the intercourse lost at once, but real injury is inflicted on the moral tone of the child. For this reason children should be brought as little as possible into the society of men and women who can not command their respect; while of those who can, the influence should be hedged round by all the numerous impalpable barriers which judicious parents know perfectly well how to interpose between children and the most popular and careless of their adult playfellows. The confidence which well-bred children at once repose in an eligible stranger, without being either rude or troublesome, is charming to every body who has any natural taste for their society. I remember once going for the first time to the house of a gentleman, wherein no sooner had I been shown to my dressing-room than a number of small feet pattered along the passage, and a whole troop of children, boys and girls, all under twelve years of age, trotted in without the slightest ceremony, and requested to be allowed to unpack my things, adding that their mamma always liked them to do this on the arrival of a stranger. I was flattered, though for the moment embarrassed, by this delicate attention. But all apprehensions were speedily dispelled by the behavior of my small visitors, who, I saw at once, knew exactly how far to go, and obeyed every injunction I laid on them with the most cheerful docility. The only sign of dissatisfaction evinced throughout was by one little fellow who was ignorant of the nature of shaving-paste, and, on being forbidden to eat it, desired leave to show it to his lady mother. He went away sorrowful, but was satisfied in the morning, when they all came back to see me dress, by watching its application to my chin. Now any one would think this was going as far as children well could go toward making themselves a nuisance. But they were no nuisance at all. On the contrary, I was amused and delighted with them. No doubt this was an exceptional case: very few children are trained to such a pitch of perfection as that. And the liberties they are allowed should be in proportion to the polish they can take. When they can indulge in such proceedings with grown-up people without being rude or disrespectful, it does them all the good in the world. Generally speaking, however, what is now the very common practice of allowing children to invade your bedroom in a friend's house is much to be deprecated. The inconvenience they occasion to yourself, and the injury they may do themselves by taking away your razor, is the smallest part of the evil. The speculations which they reserve for the breakfast-table, whether their early visit has been to a lady or a gentleman, are sometimes too suggestive for decorum, and the comparisons which they institute between male and female articles of attire, when they happen to be called by the same name, produce general consternation. The little scamps, nine times out of ten, are aware they are doing something wrong on such occasions. But there are parents who either can not or will not break them of such habits, and some who encourage them as the best antidote to shyness. But before children are subjected to this extreme remedy they should be taught docility and silence. The old adage, that children should be seen and not heard, is often silently invoked by guests, who are forbidden by courtesy to speak their thoughts aloud.

Digitized by Google



1. Tiara, given by the Duke and Duchess of Argyll.
2. Emerald Centre of the Bracelet given by the Queen.
3. Centre of Opal Necklace, given by the Queen.
4. One of the Diamond Daisy-flower Hair-pins given by Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, and Princess Beatrice.
5. Necklace of Pearls and Diamonds, with Pearl Locket, and Pendant bearing the Galley of Lorne, in Sapphires, given by the Clan Campbell.
6. Neck Ornament, Emeralds, given by Viscountess Beaconsfield.
7. Centre of a Bracelet, in Sapphires, with Pearl Drop, given by the Marquis of Lorne.
8. Toilette Service, given by her Majesty's Household.

PRINCESS LOUISE'S WEDDING GIFTS.

Digitized by Google

THE ROYAL WEDDING GIFTS.

SOME of the jewels and other gifts presented to her Royal Highness Princess Louise on the occasion of her marriage, with the locket given to each of the eight bride-maids, are shown by the engravings on this and another page.

Her Majesty the Queen has given to her daughter a very fine large emerald, set with brilliants, as the centre of a bracelet; another set as the centre of a necklace; a very fine opal and brilliant necklace, with five large opals set round with brilliants and connected with a diamond chain; a large drop brooch, with two very fine opals set round with brilliants; a pair of opal and diamond ear-rings to correspond; a richly-chased silver-gilt dessert service, consisting of one centre, two side, and four corner ornaments.

Their Royal Highnesses Prince Arthur, Prince Leopold, and Princess Beatrice have given their sister a pair of diamond daisy flowers, mounted as hair-pins.

The tiara, the gift of the Duke and Duchess of Argyll, is formed of emeralds and diamonds, surmounted by a graceful scroll-work of the same jewels.

The Marquis of Lorne has presented to his royal bride a beautiful ornament, forming the centre of a bracelet, in which is a fine large sapphire, mounted with brilliants and pearls, and with a large pearl drop attached to it.

The eight bride-maids gave to her Royal Highness a very handsome gold bracelet, set with rubies and diamonds.

The Clan Campbell presented to the bride of their chieftain's son a necklace composed of pearls and diamonds, from which is suspended a locket of oval form, with pendant. The centre of the locket is formed by a large and extremely beautiful Oriental pearl, surrounded by a closely set row of diamonds of large size and great brilliancy. The outer border also consists of large diamonds, but set in such a manner as to give an appearance of lightness very seldom obtained in ornaments of a similar description. The pendant, the most characteristic portion of the jewel, is suspended by an emerald sprig of bog myrtle (the Campbell badge), and bears in the centre the galley of Lorne, composed of sapphires on a pavé of diamonds. The border, also of sapphires and diamonds, bears the inscription "Ne obliviscaris."

Viscountess Beaconsfield, wife of the Right Hon. Benjamin Disraeli, gave the Princess a neck ornament, with an emerald cross centre, and border of fine brilliants.

The above-mentioned jewels and ornaments, with the Bible and its decorated casket, given to the Princess Louise by the maidens of England, are represented in our illustrations this week. Others were given to her, of which the following are the most important:

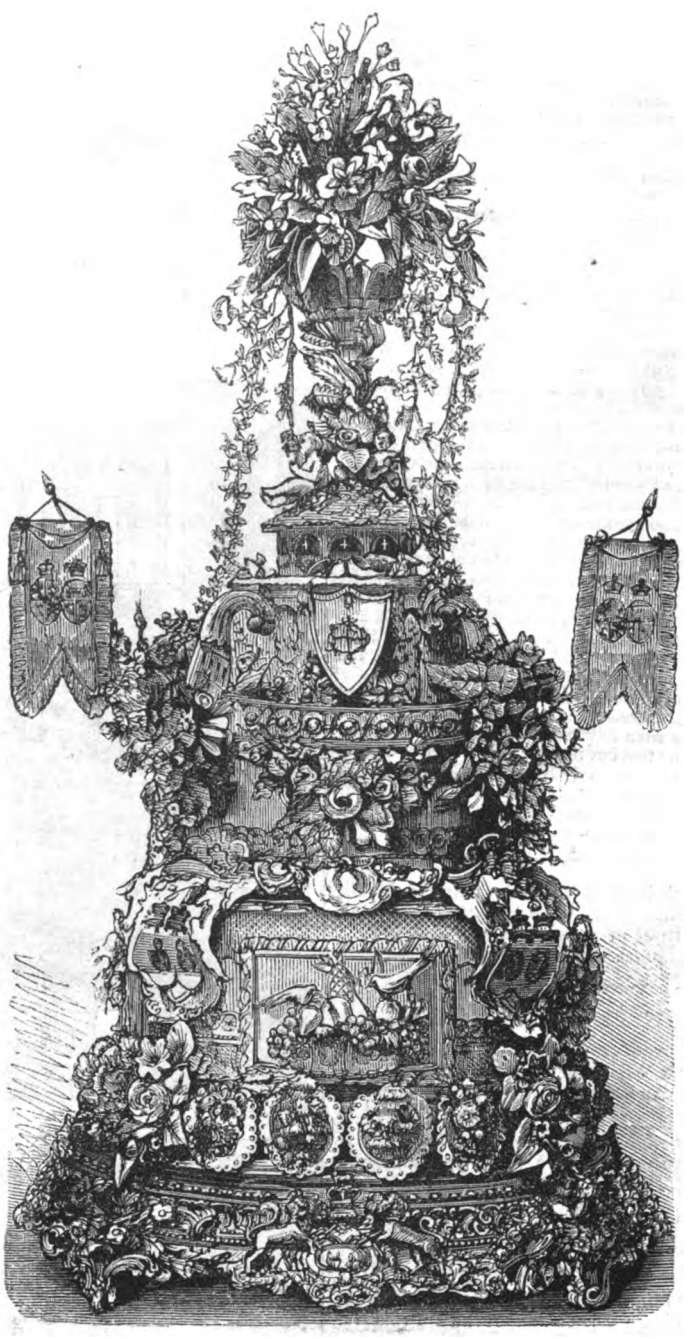
Given by Prince and Princess Christian: A beautifully chased silver-gilt tea and coffee service, containing the following pieces: Coffee-pot, two tea-pots, one sugar basin, one hot-milk jug, one cream ewer, in case.

By the Duchess of Cambridge: A silver-gilt inkstand in the shape of a shell.

By the Duke of Cambridge: A richly engraved silver salver.

By the Ladies and Gentlemen of her Majesty's Household: One large single candelabrum for five lights, four smaller candelabra for three lights each, a very complete toilette service in silver-gilt, with the cipher and coronet engraved on each article.

The locket given by her Royal Highness to the bride-maids was designed by the Princess herself. The pattern is taken from a very beautiful Holbein model · the centre being a large oval intaglio in crystal, formed with a wreath of roses and forget-me-nots, beautifully blended together, and ceiled with a purple ribbon scroll enameled with gold letters—"Louise, 1871." The border is composed of a true-lover's knot in blue enamel, united with graduated pearls, and a pendant hanging to her Royal Highness's coronet, richly chased and ornamented with emeralds and rubies. The general effect is novel in character, and in good taste. The prevailing colors of the enrichments are white and blue. These lockets were worn by the eight bride-maids during the wedding ceremony.



ROYAL WEDDING-CAKE.

THE WEDDING-CAKES.

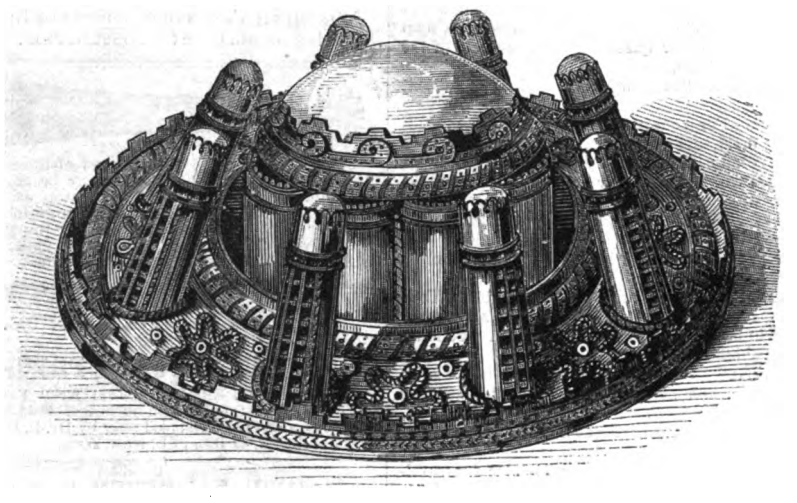
The Royal wedding-cake shown in our illustration is the one made by Messrs. Boland & Son, of Chester. The principal cake on the table, however, at the wedding breakfast was that made by her Majesty's chief confectioner at Windsor Castle. It was a perfect triumph of the confectioner's art, and was five feet four inches high, with a diameter of two feet six inches. Messrs. Boland's was made in three tiers, placed on a gold stand, weighing about two hundred-weight, and measuring at the base of the lower cake two feet in diameter, and in height nearly five feet. The gold plateau had the Royal arms at four equal distances, with Cupids and flowers. The lower tier was ornamented with blue panels, baskets of flowers, fruit, and love-birds between a scroll leaf, and medallions containing likenesses of the Marquis of Lorne and Princess Louise, with their respective coronets above. The second tier was festooned with the rose, shamrock, and thistle. The third tier was entirely of net-work, with cornucopias and shields, on which were the monograms of the bride and bridegroom. The whole was surmounted by a handsome vase of flowers, with silk banners edged with silver fringe, containing the armorial bearings of the Princess and of the Marquis. Each tier of the cake was bordered with trellis-work studded with pearls.

THE BROOCH OF LORNE.

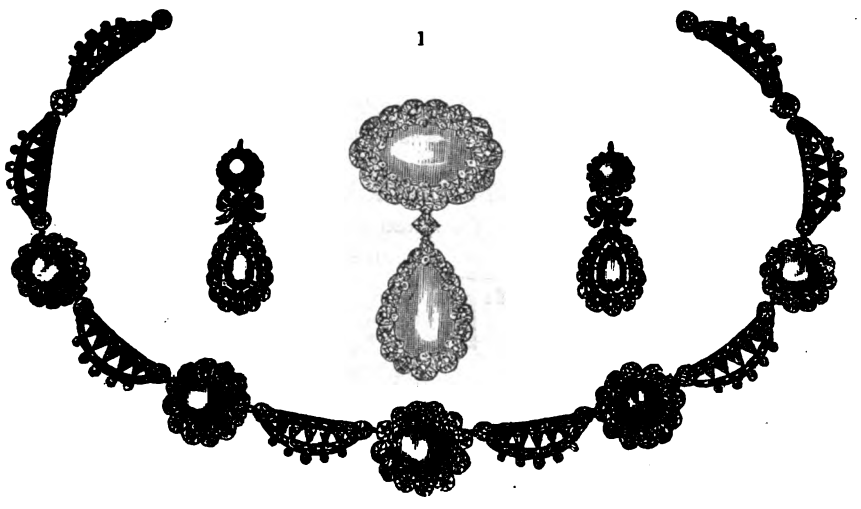
AN illustration of the famous "Brooch of Lorne," a jewel of much historic and romantic interest, is given on this page. It will be remembered how, in Scott's "Lord of the Isles," the chieftain of Lorne, to provoke his unwelcome guests, bids his minstrel Ferrand sing at the banquet in Ardtornish Castle, in presence of Robert Bruce, an insolent song of triumph concerning this trophy of the fight near Teyndrum:

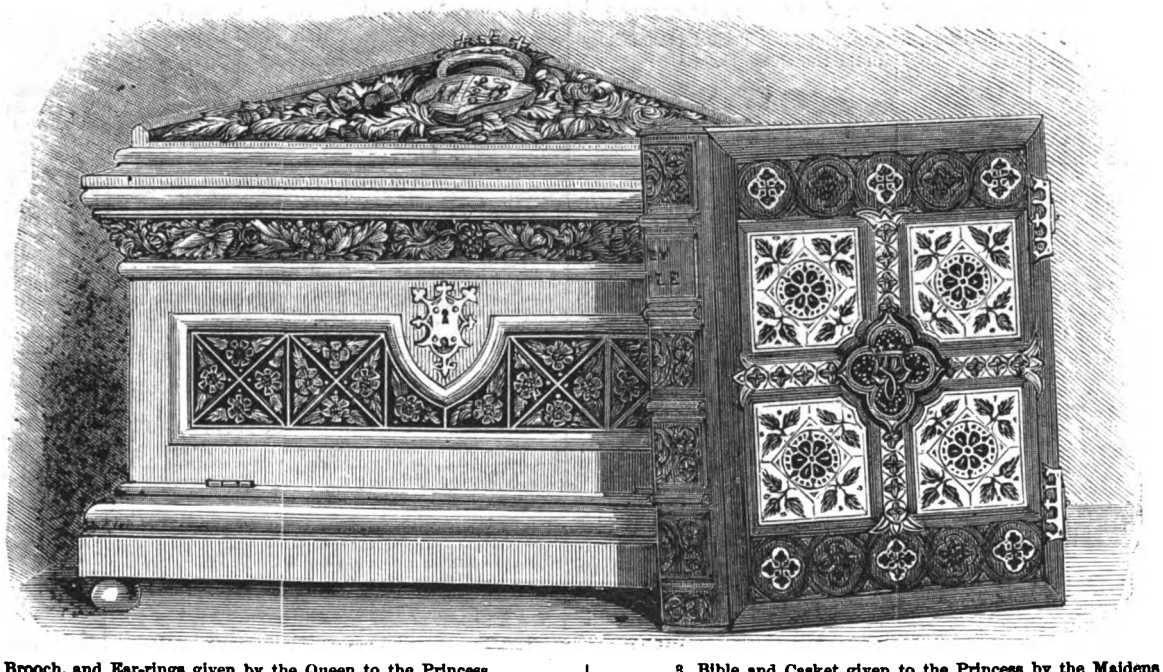
> "Moulded thou for monarch's use
> By the overweening Bruce,
> When the royal robe he tied
> O'er a heart of wrath and pride;
> Thence in triumph wert thou borne
> By the victor hand of Lorne!"

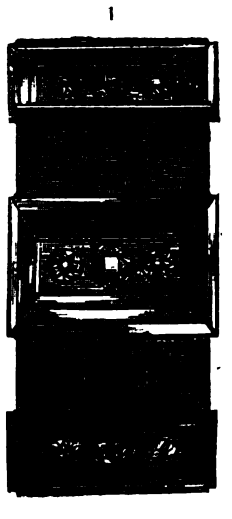
The real brooch is not "of burning gold," but of silver set with pearls. It consists of a circular plate, four inches in diameter, with a buckle on the under side. The upper side has a rim indented with battlements, like the wall around a fortress, within which rise eight round projections, an inch and a quarter high, probably intended to represent the towers inclosed by the wall. Each of these is surmounted with a Scottish river pearl. A second rim, or inner wall, ornamentally carved, surrounds an eminence of circular form, but moulded into eight semi-cylinders. It is the "keep" of the castle, which stands higher than the eight outer towers. This is hollow, forming a case or locket to hold any small article of



THE BROOCH OF LORNE.







1. Necklace, Brooch, and Ear-rings given by the Queen to the Princess.
2. Locket given by the Princess to each of her Bride-maids.
3. Bible and Casket given to the Princess by the Maidens of England.
4. Bracelet given to the Princess by the Bride-maids.

PRINCESS LOUISE'S WEDDING GIFTS.

Digitized by Google

value. Its cover is elegantly adorned with a large gem on the summit. The brooch was that which fastened the plaid of Robert Bruce, crowned King of Scotland in 1306, when he was driven by the English forces into the west country. The Lorne Macdougalls, his bitterest enemies, met and fought with him at Dalree, or Dalrigh, or "The King's Field," in Glen Dochart, on the borders of Perthshire and Argyle. The followers of King Robert got the worst of the fight, but the king himself escaped. Alexander Macdougall, the chief of Lorne, was nephew to John Comyn, whom Bruce had stabbed at the altar of the Greyfriars' Church, in Dumfries. He had sworn to kill Bruce in revenge. It is said that in this conflict he had a personal struggle with the warrior king, who struck him down with his famous battle-axe, and would have slain him but that two of Lorne's vassals, the MacKeochs, a father and son, rescued him by seizing Bruce's plaid or mantle, and so dragging the king aside. The brooch is now preserved with great care at Dunolly Castle.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

MRS. TRITE.—Stitch the blue Chambery ruffles with white. Sash of the same. Black silk over dresses are worn by little girls of eight years.

N.B.—Correspondents who have written us about suits will please search out the information they want in New York Fashions of the present paper, of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and previous Numbers. We would gladly answer each separately, but lack of space prevents.

MISS JULIA S., YONKERS.—Tennyson's beautiful stanza,

"I hold it truth, with him who sings
To one clear harp in divers tones,
That men may rise on stepping-stones
Of their dead selves to higher things," refers to St. Augustine, who first gave utterance to this golden thought.

SIDLA AND DNOMYAR.—Both the French and the Prussians were probably desirous of war. Prussia had been preparing for half a century to wipe out the humiliation of the first Napoleon's triumphal entry into Berlin; and Napoleon III. wished, by a second coup d'état which should carry France to the Rhine, to secure the continuance of his dynasty. He put himself in the wrong before the eyes of the world by first making the declaration of war, which the astute Bismarck had doubtless intrigued to provoke, and thus naturally turned public sympathy against France until his fall at Sedan. Then opinions diverged, and some thought that King William would have been both magnanimous and just had he carried out his declaration that he waged war against the Emperor, and not the French nation, and been satisfied with a pecuniary indemnity, which would not have been denied him, instead of insisting on the cession of Alsace and Lorraine, against the wishes of the inhabitants, and using his successes to establish a new empire no less despotic than that which he had overthrown. That these provinces belonged to Germany two centuries ago seems no better reason that they should be restored to her against their will, than that New York, which less than a century since was British territory, should be ceded to England at the end of a war in which we had been worsted. France would have been just as much in the wrong had she annexed the Rhenish provinces against their wish.

M. L. C.—White lawn suits are worn in the house in summer by ladies in mourning. Black also makes up prettily. Your other questions are answered in the New York Fashions.

MRS. H. A. T.—See New York Fashions of present Number.

BELINDA.—For your silk dress, summer silk suit, traveling dress, and piqué suit, consult the New York Fashion column. Black silk polonaises, lace sacques, and scarfs will be worn over colored dresses. Make morning wrappers by pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. Use white lawn, piqué, or colored cambrics, and trim with ruffles of the same in embroidery. Get a straw gypsy, and trim with ribbon of a becoming color.

AGNES.—For making your calico suit read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. Your black ostrich plume will be pretty all the spring. Read "Summer Silks" in another column.

YOUNG LADY.—Use darker brown bands of the same material for trimming your suit. Read "Goat's-hair Suits" on another page.

BEATRICE DE B.—Read "Piqué Suits" in another column.

EDNA GEORGE.—A suit of pongee is nice for traveling in July. Colored shoes are not worn. Read notice above to correspondents. Your other questions are irrelevant.

LONSLY.—Your queries about children's dresses are answered in the illustrations of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., and about suits in the New York Fashions of the present Number.

A SCHOOL-GIRL.—We have given blouse-waist patterns in our Supplements, but not in cut paper patterns. Read "N.B." above.

L. H. B.—Columbus died in the year 1506.—We know of nothing to "cure excessive blushing," and think it too pretty and too rare nowadays to need a cure.—Read notice to correspondents above.

A. E. T.—Make an over-skirt of your new material, and trim with solid-colored ruffles, putting the same on the skirt. Get a white Swiss over-skirt for your little girl, and make by designs shown in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

MRS. O. Z.—Take the velvet off your black silk skirt, and make the flounces lap. Put tapes beneath the belt of your long skirts, and other tapes half-way down the seams. Then tie these together to loop your long dress for an over-skirt. Add a false postilion—a belt with basque pleated at the back to improve the round waist. Do the same by your blue checked silk. The black and white wool dress and the buff linen will be well made by the Apron-Polonaise Suit pattern illustrated in Bazar No. 13, Vol. IV. Buff linens are serviceable, cool, and will be stylish again in the summer, but are not easily done up. Make "Little Myrtle's" check silk with flounces and over-skirt trimmed with blue; high neck and coat sleeves. Muslin ruffles would not look well on delaine.

MATTIE.—Get a tailor to sponge your cloth jacket all over.

A YOUNG MARRIED LADY.—Use pattern of the Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. Trim with narrow black lace, bias bands, and flounces of the checked silk.

G. C. S.—Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., for white dresses.

SARA.—"Present" is better than "Addressed," written after the name of a person to whom a note is sent in the same city in which it is written.

E. B. H.—Your former letter is not on record, and was probably never received.—White-edged velvet ribbon is not used now.

LOLA.—Don't make a very long train to your white muslin. Read New York Fashions of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV.

DESPAIR.—You will have to purchase chatelaine braids for the back of your head.

PLUM AND GRAY.—Gather an answer from New York Fashions of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

MISS M. L. L.—We never reply to correspondents by mail.—Use the polonaise suit pattern sent you for your grenadine. Line the waist and sleeves of polonaise with black silk, and wear over a black silk skirt. Trim with ruffles edged with narrow guipure.

"A CORRESPONDENT."—A high-throated Worth Basque and coat sleeve will be pretty for alpaca. Use simply a bias gathered puff. Black gros grain ribbon strings are on black lace bonnets.

"POOR AS POVERTY."—Use the cut paper pattern of the Postilion-Basque Suit illustrated in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., for your suit. Trim with ruches of the same.

MRS. G. B.—Hercules braid is a thick woolen heavily repped braid, from half an inch to two inches wide, used for trimming water-proof and other heavy fabrics.

JENNIE L.—Your brown dress is properly trimmed. Put bias black silk ruches on the skirt of your checked silk, and drape over black silk dresses.

F. E. V. E.—Get a black Canton crape paletot to wear with your green silk suit. Trim with lace, and line with Nile green silk. For an opera hat get Frou Frou gauze of becoming color, draped with tulle of the same shade, and ostrich tips to match.

INCOG. AND SOMEBODY.—We publish "Hannah" and "The Lovels of Arden" as fast as we receive the advance sheets from England. The stories are printed alternately, so that our readers may be sure of having one or the other in every Number. We are sorry for the unavoidable interruptions, which, however, our friends should remember are much briefer than in the monthly magazines.

THE Inebriate's Hope! C. C. BEERS, M.D., 12 E. Twelfth St., New York, permanently cures the worst cases of Intemperance. Call or send stamp for Evidence. Is harmless.—[Com.]

FACTS FOR THE LADIES.

W. KELLY, of Amsterdam, N. Y., earned with a Wheeler & Wilson, in 14 years, $14,564, making coats. An average of more than $20 a week.—[Com.]

WE have no hesitation in recommending to our readers Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer as a sure cure for dandruff, and to restore the natural color of the hair.—[Com.]

"THEY CURE!" What cures? AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL for a Cough, AYER'S PILLS for a purgative, and AYER'S SARSAPARILLA for the complaints that require an alterative medicine.—[Com.]

WINCHESTER'S HYPOPHOSPHITES OF LIME AND SODA is a certain Cure for CONSUMPTION.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

47,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

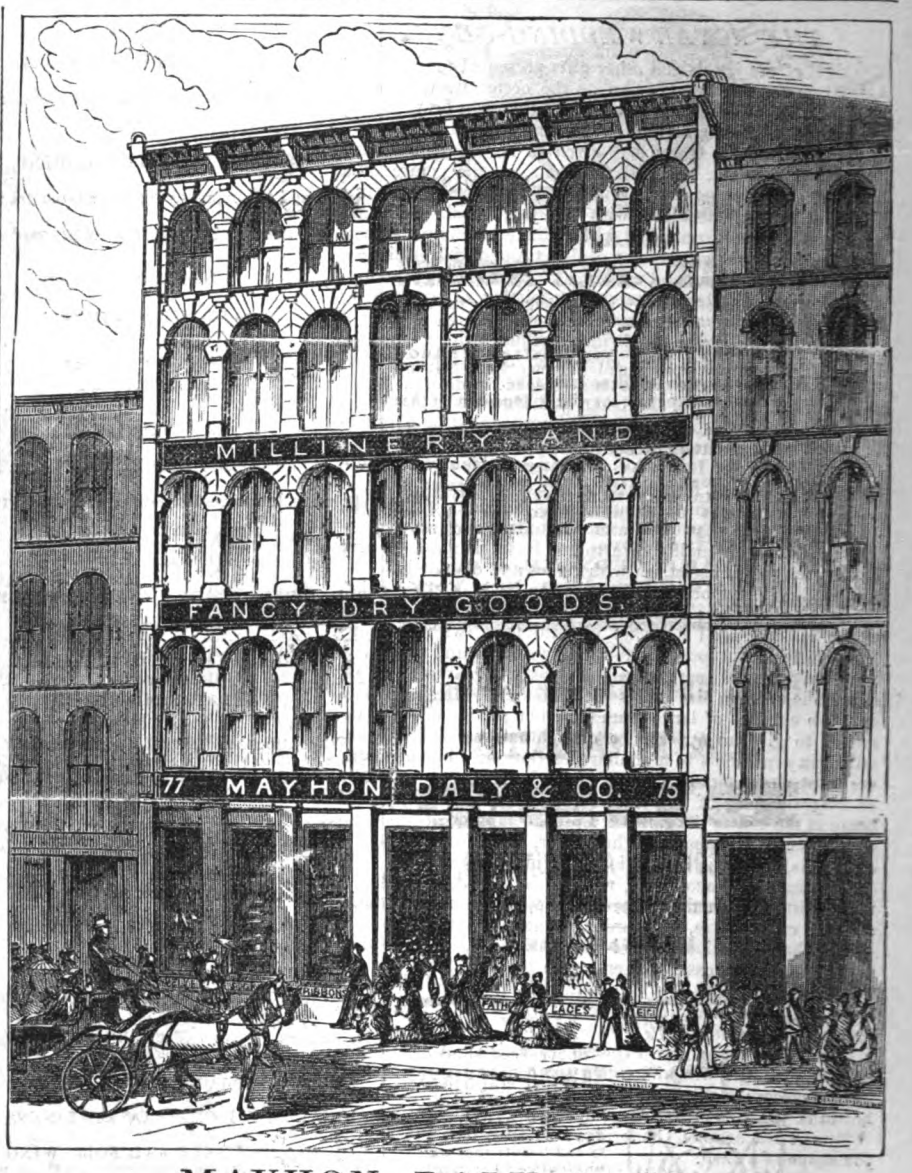
No more suffering from corns, bunions, grown-in toe nails, sore heels, or pinched feet. Let the motto be "Sound feet on sound bodies." Read

THE HUMAN FEET, THEIR DRESS AND CARE: showing their natural shape, their present deformed condition, and how distorted toes and other defects are to be prevented or corrected; with directions for dressing them elegantly and comfortably. Illustrated. Price, prepaid first post, $1.25. Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

ANGLING and FISH-CULTURE.

SCOTT'S book on "FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS," with 174 Illustrations, teaches the how and where to fish and propagate fishes. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50. Mailed, prepaid, on receipt of price, by HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.



MAYHON, DALY, & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN

SILKS, RIBBONS, LACES, STRAW GOODS,

MILLINERY ARTICLES, WHITE GOODS, EMBROIDERIES, GLOVES,

AND

FANCY GOODS,

75 & 77 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO.

☞ ALL ORDERS entrusted to our care will be promptly filled and shipped the day they are received.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

The King of the Body is the Brain; the stomach its main support; the nerves its messengers; the bowels, the kidneys, and the pores its safeguards. Indigestion creates a violent revolt among these attachés of the regal organ, and to bring them back to their duty there is nothing like the regulating, purifying, invigorating, cooling operation of

TARRANT'S EFFERVESCENT SELTZER APERIENT.

It renovates the system, and restores to health both the body and the mind. SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

INFANT'S WARDROBE "B"

FOR $100.

2 Flannel Bands	@	$0 62½	$1 25
2 Barrow Coats	@	2 00	4 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@	3 00	6 00
3 Cambric "	@	1 75	5 25
3 " " tucked	@	2 25	6 75
6 Linen Shirts	@	1 25	7 50
6 Night Dresses	@	2 50	15 00
6 Slips	@	3 00	18 00
2 Day Dresses	@	5 00	10 00
1 Robe			10 00
1 Basket, furnished			6 50
6 Pairs Knitted Socks	@	0 62½	3 75
1 Embr'd Merino Shawl			6 00
			$100 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Complete directions for Self-Measurement sent by mail, if desired.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT,

LORD & TAYLOR,

895, 897, 899, & 901 Broadway, cor. of Twentieth Street, 255, 257, 259, & 261 Grand St., cor. of Chrystie St., N. Y.

"NILSSON ELASTIC."

The most beautiful, elegant, and comfortable Garter ever worn—combining healthfulness and economy with durability and elegance of design. Patented Aug. 16, 1870. Large profits for Agents. Sample pairs (silver plated) sent, prepaid, on receipt of 30 cts. Address all orders to the HELIX WIRE CO., Bridgeport, Conn.

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS.

It has been almost impossible in this country to obtain a really good Alpaca which would retain its color and brilliancy. The enormous duties making goods cost high, the tendency has been to import Alpacas that would look cheap. Such goods, made of inferior materials, can not retain their appearance, and the result is, a lady saves seventy-five cents on a dress which costs $20 to make up, and is quite shabby in a few weeks. Satisfied the ladies would appreciate a really good Alpaca, we imported this first-class Alpaca, well known in England, France, and Germany, and the result has been (as we anticipated) a steadily increasing demand; and those who have worn them for some time say they will use no other, as they do not crease, wrinkle, or lose their color and brilliancy.

Unlike the ordinary Alpacas sold in this country, these goods have no dressing in them, and consequently are not injured by water, and may be sponged off when soiled. Their brilliancy is obtained by the wool they are made of, and not by hot pressing and high finishing, like the ordinary goods.

Do not buy an Alpaca till you look at these goods. Try them, and you will find they are all that is claimed for them.

They are now to be obtained from nearly all first-class retailers throughout the country.

Sole Importers, N. B. FALCONER & CO.

A REDUCTION IN PRICES.

G. L. KELTY & COMPANY,

722 & 724 Broadway.

New Importations of
SWISS LACE CURTAINS,
FRENCH GUIPURE CURTAINS,
NOTTINGHAM CURTAINS,
FURNITURE COVERINGS,
and CURTAIN MATERIALS.
BEST SCOTCH HOLLAND SHADES,
with Patent Self-Acting Fixtures.

$60 A WEEK paid. If you want business, send stamp to NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

Digitized by Google

THE CELEBRATED

BRAND

BLACK ALPACAS!

This brand of Alpaca is acknowledged (by the leading fashion authorities) to be the standard Alpaca now sold in the United States.

They are greatly improved in lustre and shade of black for Spring and Summer wear. Being finished alike on both sides, and made of the very finest material, they far surpass all other Black Alpacas sold in this country.

These splendid Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Buffalo precisely like the above.

PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle

SEWING MACHINES!

$25 cheaper than any other!

For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!

For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O, or ST. LOUIS, Mo

AGENTS WANTED.

TO THE

LOVERS of FLOWERS!

WE HAVE DISTRIBUTED NEARLY FIFTY THOUSAND OF OUR

Flower and Vegetable Seed Catalogue for 1871, and are receiving thousands of orders for Seeds. Accompanying letters speak of the Catalogue as the finest they have ever seen, and the prices beyond objection. It is the richest in appearance, and contains the finest illustrations of any Catalogue ever published in the world. The list is very complete, embracing Seeds of many new and rare plants, for the first time offered in this country. We mail it to any address on receipt of fifteen cents.

OUR CHROMO FOR 1871

is the best ever issued in America; size, 19 x 24 inches; representing forty-three varieties of choice flowers. Sent by mail for Seventy-five Cents. Address

BRIGGS & BRO., Rochester, N. Y.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, so as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 17

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

A. T. STEWART & CO.

are offering,

in addition to their present stock,

500 pieces choice styles and new colorings

of

SPRING AND SUMMER SILKS, imported expressly for their retail trade.

Prices, $1, $1 25, $1 50 to $2 per yard.

BLACK SILKS

at unusually low prices.

Two cases new colorings in PLAIN SILKS,

at $1 75 per yard.

A DECIDED BARGAIN.

Forming the largest, cheapest, and most attractive stock of silks yet offered.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.

GREAT BARGAINS IN

CARPETS.

Will continue to sell ENGLISH TAPESTRY BRUSSELS, $1 10 to $1 25; ENGLISH BODY BRUSSELS, $1 75 and $2—the handsomest goods in the market at those prices.

Just received:

"SMYRNA," "AUBUSSON," "AXMINSTER," AND "FRENCH TOURNAY VELVET" CARPETS, woven entire for rooms.

Also, large importations of all the various descriptions of

FOREIGN AND DOMESTIC CARPETS AND OILCLOTHS,

At Lowest Market Prices.

LINEN DEPARTMENT.

EXTRAORDINARY BARGAINS

In Damask Napkins, Table-Cloths, Doylies, Pillow-Case Linens, and Sheetings.

500 Dozen Full Size Heavy Huck Towels at $2 50 per dozen; EXTRA SIZE FINE GOODS, $3 00 and upward.

RICHARDSON'S CELEBRATED LINENS in all qualities.

ON MONDAY NEXT AND FOLLOWING DAYS, in addition to our usual well-selected stock, we shall offer some very CHEAP LOTS.

BUYERS of SHEETINGS, QUILTS, and HOUSE-KEEPING GOODS will find this an excellent opportunity of securing EXTRAORDINARY VALUE in THEIR PURCHASES.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth St.

SPRING STYLES OF RICHMOND PRINTS.

LADIES about buying their Spring

CALICOES

will find the latest and most tasteful designs in these standard goods.

ASK FOR THE

RICHMOND PRINTS.

THEA-NECTAR

IS A PURE

BLACK TEA

WITH THE

Green-Tea Flavor.

WARRANTED

TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE

Cleans Kid Gloves and all kinds of Cloths and Clothing; removes Paint, Grease, Tar, &c., instantly, without the least injury to the finest fabric. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE CO., 83 Barclay St., New York; 46 La Salle St., Chicago.

HOMAI'S PERSIAN WASH

REMOVES MOTH PATCH, TAN, & FRECKLES. Never fails. For sale by all Druggists.
B. F. RACKLEY, Proprietor, Dover, N. H.

DOOLEY'S YEAST POWDER

THE BEST

TRY IT, SOLD BY GROCERS.

THE HAPPY DREAM WALTZ, FOR GUITAR. The prettiest Guitar Piece published for years. Price, 30 cents. Sent postpaid on receipt of price. Address W. L. HAYDEN, 120 Tremont Street, Boston. N. B.—Send for catalogues of Guitar Music.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, MASS.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', at EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO.,
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
No. 865 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

A SPLENDID NEW NOVEL.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A LOST LIFE.

By EMILY H. MOORE.

A LOST LIFE is one of the best novels ever published. Orders are pouring in for it from every quarter, and thousands of readers are being charmed with it. * * * Mrs. Emily H. Moore, who has written so long over the nom de plume of "Mignonette," has made her name famous all over the country, and this, her first book, will be welcomed by every one.  The volume is beautifully printed and bound. Price $1 50.

 Sold every where, and sent by mail, free, by G. W. CARLETON & CO., Publishers, New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

HARPER & BROTHERS'

SPECIAL TRADE SALE, 1871.

FROM MARCH 16 TO APRIL 25.

FRANKLIN SQUARE,
NEW YORK, March, 1871.

We invite the attention of Booksellers to our Special List of Books, which we will sell on the following terms, for Cash, from the 16th of March to the 25th of April, after which our terms will positively be as heretofore.

On Orders of $ 100 at one time, 25 per cent. discount;
" $ 500 " 30 " "
" $1000 " 33⅓ " "
" $2000 " 35 " "

And an additional deduction of Five per cent. for Cash.

We shall not sell at any of the Trade Sales this Spring.

The Special List will be furnished to Booksellers on application to the Publishers.

HARPER & BROTHERS.

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, One Year.....$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY, One Year..... 4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR, One Year..... 4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly. Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price

HEAT: being Part I. of Science for the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. Copiously Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

DE WITT'S MOTHERLESS. Motherless; or, A Parisian Family. For Girls in their Teens. Translated from the French of Madame Guizot De Witt by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

DIARY of the BESIEGED RESIDENT IN PARIS. Reprinted from the London "Daily News," with Several New Letters and Preface. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

SMITH'S ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. A Copious and Critical English-Latin Dictionary. Compiled from Original Sources. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D., Editor of the Classical Dictionaries, Curtius's Greek Grammar, the Student's Hume, the Student's Greece, Old and New Testament Histories, &c.; and THEOPHILUS D. HALL, M.A., Fellow of University College, London. To which is added a Dictionary of Proper Names. 8vo, Sheep, $6 00.

THE MUTINEERS OF THE BOUNTY. Some Account of the Mutineers of the Bounty and their Descendants in Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. By LADY BELCHER. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. New Edition.

BARNES'S NOTES ON THE NEW TESTAMENT. New Edition. Revised, with Maps and Illustrations. Now ready: Gospels, 2 vols.; Acts, 1 vol.; Romans, 1 vol. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50 per vol.

RAWLINSON'S MANUAL of ANCIENT HISTORY. A Manual of Ancient History, from the Earliest Times to the Fall of the Western Empire. Comprising the History of Chaldæa, Assyria, Media, Babylonia, Lydia, Phœnicia, Syria, Judæa, Egypt, Carthage, Persia, Greece, Macedonia, Parthia, and Rome. By GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford. Large 12mo, Cloth, $2 50.

Fresh Novels,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

THE MONARCH OF MINCING-LANE. By WM. BLACK, Author of "In Silk Attire," "Love or Marriage?" "Kilmeny," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

FENTON'S QUEST. By Miss M. E. BRADDON, Author of "Aurora Floyd," "John Marchmont's Legacy," "Dead-Sea Fruit," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

BRED IN THE BONE; or, Like Father, Like Son. By the Author of "A Beggar on Horseback," "Gwendoline's Harvest," "Won—Not Wooed," "Carlyon's Year," &c. With Illustrations. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

DAISY NICHOL. By Lady HARDY. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

EARL'S DENE. By R. E. FRANCILLON. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

SIR HARRY HOTSPUR OF HUMBLETHWAITE. By ANTHONY TROLLOPE, Author of "The Vicar of Bullhampton," "He Knew He was Right," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, 50 cents.

THE CRYPTOGRAM. By JAMES DE MILLE, Author of "The Dodge Club," "Cord and Creese," "The American Baron," &c. Illustrated. 8vo, Paper, $1 50; Cloth, $2 00.

NEW EDITIONS

OF BOOKS

PUBLISHED BY HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

ABBOTT'S ILLUSTRATED HISTORIES: Peter the Great.—Nero.—Xerxes.—William the Conqueror.—Julius Cæsar.

RIDDLE AND ARNOLD'S ENGLISH-LATIN LEXICON. 8vo, Sheep, $5 00.

ROSS BROWNE'S APACHE COUNTRY. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

DOCHARTY'S ARITHMETIC. 12mo, Sheep, $1 50.

WINCHELL'S SKETCHES OF CREATION. Illustrations. 12mo, Cloth, $2 00.

ABBOTT'S FRANCONIA STORIES: Mary Bell.—Mary Erskine.

ABBOTT'S MARCO PAUL SERIES: In the Forests of Maine.—In Vermont.

☞ HARPER & BROTHERS will send any of the above works by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.

THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!

Agents wanted in every Town.

Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

For 50c ☞ FIFTY-TWO German Bristol Cards, with your name neatly printed and sent by mail prepaid. Address SMITH & MILLS, Argus Office, ATLANTA, Illinois.

$300 A MONTH and expenses to good canvassers. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

READ "Convent Life Unveiled," by Edith O'Gorman. Price $1 50. CT. PUB. CO., Hartford, Ct.

Digitized by Google

IRREVOCABLE.

CUSTOMER (for the Royal Wedding Photograph). "Can't I have the Lady only? I don't so much want the Gentleman!"

YOUNG PERSON (with decision). "No, Sir; we can't Part them, Sir, now!"

TOO YOUNG!

BESSIE (to pacify little sister, who keeps interrupting her perusal of that exciting "third volume"). "Yes, yes, Chatterbox, the Princess Louise is Married to-day, and if you're a good Girl you shall be Married too, when you're Old enough!"

CHATTERBOX. "Then why isn't Aunt Betsy Married? Isn't she a good Girl—or isn't she Old enough yet?"

[Suffocating rapture of Maiden Aunt.

FACETIÆ.

A CONSTANT reader wishes to know where he can purchase a pair of sheets for the bed of a river, also a set of teeth for the mouth; and would be glad to be informed what rate of interest is allowed by the Bank of the River Hudson.

If you make a very favorable impression on your first visit any where—don't call again.

MEN WELL UP IN WORD-PAINTING—Sign writers.

TOUCHING.—It is said that, to a noble-hearted woman, there is hardly any thing more touching in this life than to see a poor but virtuous young man struggling to keep a feeble mustache alive.

Surely the dead languages must be spelled with dead letters.

THE MOST LACONIC LOVE-LETTER—A note of admiration (!).

If you ever should have the misfortune to "let the cat out of the bag," never, never try and stuff her back again; it's such a mistake; you only make, inevitably make, matters forty times worse.

MODERN HEATHENISM—Worshiping idols (idles) in crinoline.

APRIL SHOWERS BEFORE UMBRELLAS WERE INVENTED.—A SWEET THING IN WATERED SILKS.

SWEET.—Speaking of vegetable wonders, we heard the other day of a young lady whose lips were so sweet that she dared not go into the garden for fear of the bees.

A SITUATION.—A youth in the country went out the other day with a shot-gun and an ignorance of fire-arms. He has vacancies now for three fingers and a portion of a thumb.

N.B. No Irish need apply.

The King of Prussia has been called the "Will of Providence!" To get rid of him the French have now to pay—the Bill of improv-idence!

When may a gardener be called proud?—When he studies haughty-culture, and considers delving infra dig.

A FACT FOR CARLYLE.—The earliest manifestation of Hero-worship of which we have notice in any record, ancient or modern, was on the part of a young Greek enthusiast of the name of Leander.

THE GENUINE COIN.

M'MILLION. "It was those golden locks that found the way to my heart."

THERESE (aside). "It was that golden key that found the way to mine!"

"TRAIN UP A CHILD," ETC.

"Mamma, don't you Think Pug ought to be Vaccinated?"

"What Nonsense, dear! They only Vaccinate Human Beings!"

"Why, Madame Fakeaway's had all her Servants Vaccinated, Mamma!"

"THE BURDENS OF FASHION."

WHAT WE MUST COME TO BEFORE LONG.

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

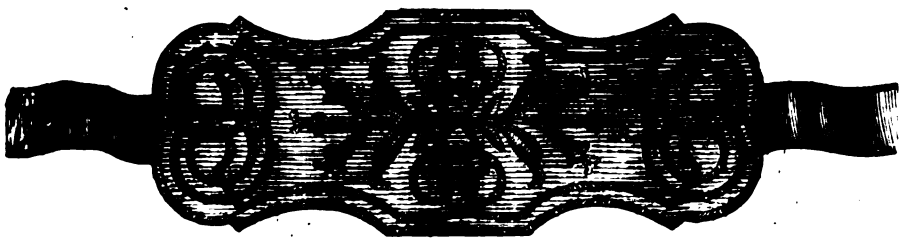
A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 18.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

Corded Piqué Napkin Ring.

THIS napkin ring has the advantage of being readily washed. It is made of corded piqué, lined with shirting, and embroidered in satin stitch with white soutache. Blue silk ribbons serve to close it. To make the napkin ring cut of piqué and shirting one part from Fig. 27, Supplement, transfer the design to the piqué, and work the embroidery as shown by the illustration. Line the part thus prepared with shirting, in doing which sew in the strings at the crosswise edges.



CORDED PIQUÉ NAPKIN RING.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. VIII., Fig. 27.

Ladies' and Misses' Mantelets, Water-proof Cloaks, and Suits, Figs. 1–5.

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR ELDERLY LADY. The dress of this suit is made of brown poult de soie, and the mantelet of light brown ladies' cloth. Brown crape bonnet, trimmed with brown feathers and strings of brown gros grain ribbon. To make the mantelet, join on the pieces turned down in the Supplement of Figs. 30ª and 30ᵇ, and also the pieces cut across according to the corresponding letters (see diagram of Figs. 30ª and 30ᵇ reduced to one-sixteenth of original size). After joining on the piece turned down of Fig. 29, cut from Figs. 29, 30ª, and 30ᵇ each two pieces, and from Fig. 31 one piece. Sew up the back from 6 to 7, and pleat the upper edge, bringing × on ●, so that all the 3's come on each other. Sew the back and fronts together on the shoulders from 3 to 4, and join the back with the fronts by sewing the latter to the under side of the back from 1 to 2 along the straight line given there, letting the stitches show as little as possible on the right side. Stitch the free edge of Figs. 30ª and 30ᵇ on the front from 4 to 5, in doing which lay the edge of the sleeve narrowly over on the under side. Bind the free edge of the front with silk ribbon from 1 to 5. Face the front edge of each front with a strip of silk three inches wide lined with muslin; set on the left front a fly five inches and three-fifths long and two inches and a half wide, and furnish the fronts with hooks and eyes. Trim the mantelet with a strip of the material four inches wide, which is side pleated; the seam made by sewing this on is covered with a fold of the material three-fifths of an inch wide, which is corded with gros grain at the upper edge. Set on black lace an inch and a quarter wide. At the back

Fig. 1.—SUIT FOR ELDERLY LADY. For pattern see Supplement, No. X., Figs. 29–31.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD.

Fig. 3.—SERGE DRESS AND SUMMER VELOURS MANTELET.

Fig. 4.—SATIN-FACED SERGE DRESS AND WATER-PROOF CLOAK. For pattern see Supplement, No. L, Figs. 1ª, 1ᵇ-4

Fig. 5.—POPLIN DRESS AND LADIES'-CLOTH MANTELET.

LADIES' AND MISSES' MANTELETS, WATER-PROOF CLOAKS, AND SUITS.

Digitized by Google

of the mantelet is a fan-shaped half rosette, formed by the side-pleated strip. Trim the neck with a standing strip of side pleating, and furnish the fronts with passementerie bands and buttons.

Fig. 2.—SUIT FOR GIRL FROM 8 TO 10 YEARS OLD. This suit consists of a dress and cloak of gray foulard. The cloak is trimmed with a fold an inch wide, and a box-pleated ruffle of the same width. Gray straw hat.

Fig. 3.—SERGE DRESS WITH SUMMER VELOURS MANTELET. This dress, with over-skirt, is made of brown serge, and trimmed with ruffles of the same. The mantelet is made of light brown summer velours trimmed with folds of brown gros grain and silk fringe. Lace hat.

Fig. 4.—DRESS OF DARK GRAY SATIN-FACED SERGE, AND GRAY WATER-PROOF CLOAK. The cloak is trimmed with folds of the material, one lengthwise edge of which is piped with gros grain. It has a simulated band of the material trimmed with pleated gros grain and gray fringe. Bonnet of black tulle and lace trimmed with feathers and ribbon. To make the cloak join on the pieces cut across of Figs. 1^a and 1^b so that A meets A and B meets B, and join on the piece turned down of Fig. 1^b. (See diagram of Figs. 1^a and 1^b reduced to one-sixteenth of original size.) In the same manner join Figs. 2^a and 2^b so that C meets C and D meets D. (See diagram of Figs. 2^a and 2^b reduced to one-sixteenth of original size.) Now cut from Figs. 1^a, 1^b, 2^a, 2^b, and 3 each two pieces, allowing an inch and three-quarters extra material on the front edge of Figs. 1^a and 1^b, and taking the material double for Fig. 3. Cut the sleeves from Fig. 4, observing the contour of the under part of the sleeve. Hem down the extra material on the front edges of the fronts, furnish the right front with button-holes, and the left front with buttons, and sew up the darts. Sew up the back from the under edge to 6, join the back and fronts according to the corresponding figures, and make a hem three-quarters of an inch wide on the under edge of the cloak. Join the trimming parts from 6 to 7, letting the edges of the seams come on the inside, and fell the double material together at the under and side edges. Sew the pleated gros grain part on the trimming part from the neck to the straight line given on Fig. 3, and cover the seam made by sewing on the hood thus simulated with a fold, and finish the bottom with a fold and fringe. Baste the hood on the neck of the cloak according to the corresponding figures, and sew both between a standing collar four-fifths of an inch wide, which is closed with a hook and eye. Sew up the sleeves from 8 to 9, trim the outer edge with a fold and fringe, and sew them into the armholes, bringing 9 on 9 of the front. In doing this form a pleat in the under part of the sleeve, bringing × on ●.

Fig. 5.—MAROON POPLIN DRESS AND GRAY LADIES'-CLOTH MANTELET. This dress is trimmed with ruffles of the material. The mantelet is trimmed with folds of dark gray velvet and side-pleated strips of the material. Gray felt hat trimmed with velvet and feathers.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 6, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will be an unusually attractive one. It will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with from forty to fifty patterns and illustrations of every variety of Spring and Summer Walking Suits, Wrappings, Blouse-Waists, etc., etc., for Ladies and Children; and numerous beautiful and ingenious Fancy Articles; together with other fine engravings, and interesting literary matter.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 287 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Iced Lemonade.

MY DEAR OSRIC,—There are many refreshments provided for us travelers of all kinds, and those of us whose journey lies in great part through busy city streets can not help observing the various temptations to recreation which are offered at every step. Very lately hot soda and hot spiced rum seemed to be the most common form of the solicitation. But with the sudden flight of Jack Frost these temptations have disappeared, and cool lager-beer and iced lemonade have taken their places. And the latter is certainly refreshing in the warm weather. In the hot and dusty cars how pleasant it is! and it is no less so in the hot and dusty streets. I stopped yesterday at a famous resort for drinking—what do they call it? a refreshment-room, a sample-room, an Athenæum, or an Academy, or Arcadia, or Paradise, or some pleasant name; but we used to call it bar-room—and when I told the bar-tender, or what I suppose I ought to call the affable and gentlemanly compounder of beverages, to mix me an iced lemonade, I saw little Shortcoat looking as if he wished he dared to order lemonade; and when he saw it in my hand—sweet, fragrant, delightful—I understood his glance as he drank his vitriolic whisky or his fiery cocktail.

Iced fire does not seem to me a very refreshing drink, nor iced delirium, disease, and death. And how many of these poor, foolish boys who think it fine to haunt bar-rooms in the morning secretly prefer the simple, harmless, refreshing draught for which they do not dare to ask! They drink the most noxious stuff—rum, gin, absinthe—because others do, and it is manly! To call for lemonade is to be a milksop. Why, my dear Osric, more than half of the ruined men that I know did not really prefer the choice they made. They preferred something else; but they could not resist the pressure of "good-fellowship," the banter and jeering of companions. They were pushed down the way that they did not wish to go. It is so in smoking. Most men acquire the taste painfully. Charles Lamb said that he toiled for it as some men do for virtue. I smoke, indeed, my dear Osric, but I had no such probation, and it is no slavery. And if you will show me a boy among his schoolmates who says that he would rather not smoke, because it makes him sick, and who declines the glass of wine or whisky, and chooses iced lemonade, and who sticks to his choice in both cases, I will show you a hero—a boy who may or may not have the high prize in Greek syntax, but who will never bring his father's hairs with sorrow to the grave.

When you travel in Europe, my dear Osric, you will be surprised and pleased to find how simple much of the popular enjoyment is. Have I forgotten, or can I ever forget, that lovely picture in the great café at Dresden, upon the Terrace? The father of the family sits, with his glass of beer, gravely reading the paper—in which was nothing worthy of such grave attention, as I well knew—and the mother sits tranquilly darning, with a cup of coffee at hand upon the little table, while a noble band plays the finest music, and the German children sit by, learning that enjoyment need not be expensive. Perhaps the boys of that very pair whom I saw so tranquilly refreshing themselves have lately bivouacked under the walls of Paris, or lain wounded in the gardens of Versailles. And in Paris, too—that most unhappy of cities, from which the cloud of the terror never wholly passes—how often, in the lovely spring evenings, have I not sat at the door of the café watching the brilliant life of the boulevards, and sipping coffee, never tired of seeing the vehement, bearded Frenchmen quaffing eau sucrée—that most innocent of drinks—over which they seemed to spit fire in the fury of conversation? And sooner shall the splendors of Titian and of Tintoretto fade into indistinguishable blackness than the vivid picture pass from my memory of those summer evenings in the Piazza, when all was leisure and murmur and music, and the gentle Venetians sipped the gentle raspberry sirup diluted with water. Or at Naples, in the May moonlights, the Southern Italians tasted harmless drinks, and hummed the latest melody of Verdi.

I know that was not all. More goes to the picture of Naples and of Venice than I could be suffered to mention even to you; but the constant and reckless drinking of fiery liquors is not yet their offense. There are the wines of the country, indeed—and, Osric, how heartily I wish we had wines so innocent!—and there is the vile absintne, for which no man in his senses has any excuse to plead. But what do you think would be said—what would you say—if you saw groups of American youth seating themselves at a little table in a public garden, or upon a public street, to drink sugar-and-water, or sarsaparilla-and-water? They would wish to excuse themselves. And this fiery taste is in the blood. It is in our traditions. The walhalla, the seat of the gods, in our old Norse ancestry—what is it but a fierce revel, a quaffing of strong drink? The brutal element in the Saxon civilization does not descend from immortal ancestors who drank iced lemonade.

Yet, my dear Osric, when you see the southern Europeans and the Frenchmen sipping their sirups and sugared water, you will probably reflect that it is those very people who are so furious and so savage when they are roused. I used to look closely at my French companions in the poor cafés in Paris, and remember that they were the descendants of the men who fed the guillotine in those very streets, and that they would be themselves purveyors for the same ravening monster should his deadly mouth once more open. Perhaps at this very time they are beginning. On the other hand, the hard-drinking nations, as we call them—the descendants of the vikings and of the walhalla gods—are tender and merciful in war, and even the horrors of their religious persecutions are borrowed from their sugar-and-water and sirup loving neighbors. A man is not a saint, clearly, because he drinks raspberry vinegar rather than whisky, nor a hero because he likes the light wines of his country. Neither am I saying that iced lemonade flows from the fountain of youth, or that it is the charmed current, so that to drink it is to become invulnerable, like Achilles dipped in that other stream.

But I am very sure that the traveler upon the great journey whose habitual refreshment is iced lemonade will be very sure to keep his brain cool and his pulse regular, and to be ready for any sudden call. I dined with Senex when he was very old. In his life he had filled many most important posts, and his name was that of sturdy, simple manhood. When I saw him he was far beyond the allotted three-score-and-ten years, but his life was not weariness to himself or to others. Indeed, the freshness of his interest, the acuteness of his wit, the scope of his sympathy, his cheerfulness and hopefulness, were those of a very young man; and it was hard to remember, in the midst of his merry and simple conversation, that he was much the oldest man among all his neighbors. But when I ventured to ask him how he had found what Ponce de Leon perished in seeking, and whether he could impart to another the spell by which he stole all but its reverence from age, he laughingly said that his only secret was a happy temper and, above all, moderation. That was the charm, dear Osric; he drank no hot spiced rum in any form whatever. His refreshment was iced lemonade, which kept him cool, with every faculty in full repair.

And I find that it is a universal secret. I have studied often and long, in other years, the Wanderjahre—long and oft the paintings of Raphael. How many of them you can recall, as I mention his name, in engravings and other copies! The copies may be as poor as possible, but they can not drop out all of the beauty; even a piece of the broken goblet carries a taste of the wine. And what is the charm of them all? It is that serene, effortless sweetness, that mild placidity of repose, that tranquil beauty. There is nothing furious in them, no tremendous straining, nothing sensational. The paramount impression is that of cheerful moderation. They are all cool and without eagerness. You do not say these are the works of a man who drank lava, and who fired his blood, his brain, his heart, continually with furious draughts. This beautiful fellow-traveler of ours did not jump out at every station, and swallow a rum cocktail in hot haste; no, his refreshment was of another kind. He had his passions and follies, with the rest of us travelers, but he put none of their fury and excess into his pictures. His hand was steady, his head was cool, his heart was true. His inspiration upon the great journey was iced lemonade.

So it seems to me the work of Shakespeare is that of a soul not fired with whisky, but calmly refreshed with the cool juices of fruits. As the man who drinks brandy continually tires in climbing a mountain, and droops and falls asleep, while he who sucks a fruit, or squeezes its juice into water, and drinks it, pushes on forever reinvigorated, until he stands triumphant upon the summit, so is it with the artist who spares excess, and finds his refreshment in that which cools, not that which consumes. When I used to hear an old friend of mine, and of many other bachelors, play the piano, which he treated as if it had been an entire orchestra, and without the least regard to its character or limitations, and beating, and banging, and swaying, and dying away, he produced only the grotesquest of effects, I wanted to say to him, "Dear boy, keep cool; keep cool. Without moderation you can have no force, no expression. Don't distress yourself, the instrument, and all the hearers. Don't play as if you had been drinking hot rum, but as if you had taken refreshment in iced lemonade."

For force lies in reserved power. He who does evidently all that he can do leaves the impression of exhaustion and thinness. The orator who, so to speak, leaves a taste of hot soda in your mouth, a sense of sweet sputter only, or a rank and angry impression as of poor whisky, is not the wise guide of men, nor the inspirer of noble action. It is the speaker who is always cool and calm, however deep and earnest his conviction may be, however inflexible his purpose, who carries the mind with the heart, and so conquers the whole man. Our journey is long, dear Osric; it leads through the torrid and the frozen zone, and we move resistlessly forward with innumerable fellow-travelers. We must have refreshment. We must recreate ourselves. Let us not do it at a terrible and wasteful expense. Let us not sacrifice the pleasure of the entire journey to-day and to-morrow for the frenzy of a moment. Keep cool, my boy; keep cool. Let your refreshment, in the hottest day, be no fierce and fiery draught, but iced lemonade.

Your friend,

AN OLD BACHELOR.

THE REWARD OF MERIT.

BY GAIL HAMILTON.

TO do good by stealth and have it found out by accident was not only CHARLES LAMB'S idea of happiness, but it seems to be nearly as high up as the unregenerate heart can climb. It would be a sad day, indeed, among the children at their story-books if Hero Harry did not come out right at the end. We can bear his suffering under the false accusation of theft, because we know that by-and-by it will be blazoned abroad that he did not steal. And when the end does come "more plentiful than hope," as holy GEORGE HERBERT says, and we find that Hero Harry not only did not steal, but knew all the time who it was that did steal, and would not tell, to spare the poor thief's feelings; and when he is set up before the whole school as a hero, and is patted on the head by the master, and is written home to be cried over by his mother—do we not feel, indeed, that virtue is its own reward? Nothing less. If there is any one thing instinctively felt by the child, and profoundly impressed upon the adult, it is that virtue is not its own reward. Let Harry never speak; let the little thief never be laid at the grave's mouth by a fall from a forbidden tree, or "damp door-step settled on his lungs," and never, therefore, be disturbed by any twinges of conscience; let honest Harry leave the school with his honor tarnished, his word suspected—and see if virtue is its own reward. Every child will cry out against the injustice, the unsatisfactory ending, though the only difference possible is that in the one case his virtue is seen, in the other it is not.

And parents are as set as children on this point. What is the use of sending gentle, lovely Lucy around to visit typhoid fever in the poor little cottages, if the Perpetual Curate is not to come in just as she is going out, and fall more deeply in love than ever? It would be nothing at all for her to have gone there, and nobody know it. It would have been stupid, indeed, for her to have written a letter after her return, saying to the Perpetual Curate that she had been saint and martyr enough to expose herself to malaria for the sake of the poor; but to do it and say nothing about it, and be found out all the same; to be called not only self-sacrificing but modest and unthinking in the self-sacrifice—that is sweet to the taste. Virtue is insufficient, but virtue recognized is virtue rewarded.

And yet we are created on such an exacting theory, we are kept up to such an unreasonably high moral standard, that I suppose we must consider virtue unrecognized better than vice. We must do the right thing because it is the right thing, if there is no better reason. Better reason? What reason can be better? None at all, to be sure; but a good many may be more agreeable, more plausible, more reasonable.

These good women in the English story-books go about among the cottagers distributing tracts and pence, and are courtesied to politely, answered reverentially, and addressed as "my lady." You go to a poor family in an American cottage. Your cottage is, in the first place, a big house—tumble-down, no doubt, but two stories high so long as it stands at all. Your poor family feel themselves as good as you, and carry themselves rather more loftily, to do away with any mistaken impression that may be made upon your mind by broken windows and torn gowns. You are as wary in your approaches as if you were besieging a city. You give ten times as much in market value as the English novel woman, and la! they say among themselves, and the report drifts round to you in twenty-four hours, you have money enough and things enough to keep or to give away. You might just as well spend the money that way as any other!

And you, knowing how many desired and desirable things you do without for want of money, feel a spasm of resentment, and have a great mind never to give them another cent. Virtue is not sufficient unto itself. It is not enough that cold feet are warmed, and hungry mouths fed. You want the cold feet and the hungry mouths to know that you did it, and to be grateful to you for it. I don't believe this is wrong, for it is the natural impulse, and it is better for the beneficiary that he feel grateful. But his gratitude is not to be the measure of your benefactions, is it? You must go on bestowing alms, ministering to necessities, denying yourself luxuries, even though you may be supposed to be doing it by way of relieving a plethora of purse and wardrobe, just as readily as if you were blessed by a grateful cottage as an angel sent from heaven.

You have a theory about servants. You believe them to be human beings, governed by the same laws as yourself, and you set out with most friendly feeling to do justly, and love mercy, and walk softly toward them. You are careful to afford them comfortable rooms pleasantly furnished, sufficient leisure, and occasional holidays. You are considerate of their circumstances, and forbearing toward their shortcomings. You help them in selecting and making their clothes, encourage them to lay up money in the savings-bank, and think you have secured a faithful servant and friend. And the faithful servant mistakes your interest for self-interest, thinks you forbear because you are afraid to speak, neglects her work, abuses her leisure, and, what is still more trying, abuses you. But you can not change, except in details. Unless she were right, and your interest was self-interest, you must still do justly and love mercy. You may be wiser in your forbearance, but you must still forbear. You must assist where assistance is wanted, comfort where comfort is needed, though seven and seventy times seven Bridgets and Ellens have gone unregarding. You feel that the case looks hopeless. Ignorance spreads such a pall over the perception. But you know in your inmost soul that nothing is left you but to be kind and patient and just and helpful to the end. Grossness and falsehood, untidiness and unthrift, do not release you from your obligations. All the more must you show your superiority to these little ones by a devout and divine patience, by caring for those who are careless of you, by benefiting those who are injuring you, confounding their turbulence with serenity, reforming their inaccuracy by exactness, forgiving when you are asked, condoning where you can, reproving where you must, and no one know any thing about it.

Digitized by Google

And when your experiment is unsuccessful, you must try it over again on each new subject with what new wisdom you have gained, but with no relaxation of resolve, and—remembering HANNAH MORE and the eight servants who betrayed her in her old age—with no certainty that your experiment, however apparently successful, may not at any time fall through and bring you to grief.

If you do not, virtue is not its own reward.

NEW YORK FASHIONS.

WRAPPINGS.

GROS grain, thickly corded ottoman silk, and faille of full deep black without a marked blue tinge, are the materials used for polonaises and the basque-back paletots now worn. China crape, fringed, richly braided, and lined throughout with soft silk of a light color, forms garments of exceptional elegance, seen only at French houses, but the fabric is too frail and too expensive to be generally worn. Fine cashmeres and barathea cloth—the same fabric as cashmere, but crinkled like crape instead of being twilled—are the materials for outside garments when more warmth is required. Repped velours cloth, and light twilled cloth in pale Frou Frou buff, brown, and gray shades, are shown in the beautiful jackets imported from Berlin to complete suits for morning or sea-side wear.

The fashionable trimmings for wraps are flat pleatings, bias bands, pipings, milliner's folds, passementerie, lace, and fringe. Ottoman corded silk, or the material, is arranged as piping; satin is not used. Guipure and thread lace from two to three inches wide is often laid on the silk instead of edging the garment, and is headed by tiny folds with passementerie. Narrow passementeries are preferred to wider ones. The trimming is massed on the back, with occasionally a fanciful vest front, or else a broad bias band of the material strapped with braid is arranged down each side of the buttons in front. Lengthwise bows with long loops and ends head slashed seams of basques or cover the drapery pleats of polonaises. Elaborate passementerie ornaments, with or without tassels, take the place of sashes. Belted garments have bows behind without ends. Coat sleeves are losing favor. Half-flowing sleeves, the duchesse, or else wide Orientals, prevail. A bow is usually placed at the throat of imported garments, but this is removed by the wearer, as it interferes with the colored neck-ties now in vogue.

Garments imported from Berlin are far more reasonable in price than those formerly brought from Paris. $40 or $50 was formerly charged for the plainest garment if it had the prestige of foreign manufacture. We have seen this season, among Berlin importations, simple but jaunty and exceedingly graceful paletots of Lyons silk—not of the thickest quality, but heavy enough for summer wear—sold for $13. They were trimmed with fringe, headed by a fold and slight passementerie, or else ottoman silk folds and rows of tiny buttons. These garments were made in the neat manner for which German needlewomen are famous. Merchants asked to duplicate them here charge $20. Handsome faille paletots, with postilion-basque backs, trimmed with guipure lace and some passementerie, are $45. Long polonaises of black gros grain, the back of the skirt reaching, when draped, almost to the end of the dress skirt, are shown in the various styles mentioned lately in our columns. There are postilion backs, belted waists, bows down the front, or else closed aprons, burnous drapery, Watteau folds, or caught up by bows in the Marguerite fashion. Richly trimmed with lace and gimp, these cost from $75 to $150. There is no necessity, however, for elaborate trimmings, as many such garments have merely a hem turned up on the right side and piped at the top, depending for their beauty on the perfection with which they are fitted and their graceful drapery.

For afternoon drives and for cool days in the country are jackets of scarlet, blue, or black cashmere, trimmed with a border of medallions of silk richly wrought in colors, and edged with fringe. A novelty this season is pale cuir-color and buff cloths, the color of écru linen, made into most graceful paletots, and braided with cord of a darker shade in simple but close patterns. These are delicate enough to be worn with the stylish buff pongee costumes prepared for the watering-places: price, $20. Pale gray, pearl, and fawn colored jackets are also shown in very light summer cloths, costing from $12 to $20 each.

CHILDREN'S FASHIONS.

The Illustration and Pattern Supplement of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., leaves little to be said about children's fashions. These pictures show also how closely girls' costumes imitate those for ladies. There are the invariable double skirts, basques, and flounces, and little girls only five years old wear collars and cuffs like their mammas.

Many mothers make an opening down the centre of basque backs, and button them behind, as they think dresses open in front too old-looking for small girls. As children do not wear much tournure, plain basques are prettier for them than those made with full postilion pleats. The proper length of dress skirts is shown in the illustrations just alluded to, viz., three or four inches above the gaiter top for girls from three to five years old, getting gradually longer until girls of ten or twelve years show but an inch of their white stockings, while misses of fifteen wear their skirts to reach the instep. The pantalets of smallest children are not visible.

Summer cashmeres in shepherd's check and in broken plaids of a color with white, soft, light, and all wool, are admirable for girls' spring suits and for the kilt skirts worn by little boys. They are a yard and a half wide, and $1 50 a yard. Glossy English mohairs, that can be perfectly cleaned by the scourer, are 65 cents a yard. These, with the summer serges of light quality, make up the woolen fabrics that girls wear in this climate during the warmest part of the year. For dressy occasions the low-priced striped silks are made with two skirts and a basque trimmed with many pinked ruffles. Among wash goods there is nothing new, and, indeed, it would scarcely be possible to rival the durable piqués in repped patterns, the thick Yokohama linens without dressing, and the serviceable Scotch ginghams, sold for 35 or 40 cents a yard.

To begin in order, high necks and long sleeves are still preferred for infants' robes. They are a yard long, and two yards wide, the skirt straight, and fulled in to a yoke of insertion and puffs. More elaborate dresses are trimmed robe fashion across the front, and require to be sloped or gored. The entire wardrobe of newly born babes is of white garments. New summer cloaks for infants are large double capes of French nansook trimmed with a fluted or pleated frill edged with narrow Valenciennes (patent lace), and headed by two rows of Valenciennes insertion separated by a row of Hamburg work: price $18. Piqué or Marseilles cloaks are embroidered or braided on the material, or else there is a mixture of these trimmings: price $20.

Most exquisite shoes for babies are knitted of scarlet, green, or white Berlin wool, and shaped over a last, with the tiny toes square, and the instep arched in the most approved fashion: price $1. Imported bibs are of soft white muslin, slightly wadded and quilted, shaped with armholes, buttoned behind, and a row of buttons before to simulate a vest front; Hamburg scallops around the edge: price 60 cents. An elegant afghan for an infant's carriage has a bouquet embroidered on a white centre, a scarlet border dotted with white daisies, and the initials of baby in the corners: $24. Lower-priced afghans are of white wool with colored ribbons run in meshes formed by loose stitches: price $9.

The first short clothes, also invariably white, have high yokes and long sleeves, with the full skirt and body in one, worn usually without a sash. Long robes are often cut down to make these dresses. The wee toddlers also wear piqué Gabrielles, low-necked, with a jacket for boys, plain high slips for girls. These are trimmed around the edge with a scant frill of needle-work or of Hamburg edging, and are made so long and large that the child can continue to wear them until it is two or three years old.

Walking coats, long-sleeved sacques, with drawing-strings about the waist, and a large cape, are made of piqué for these children to wear in the street in summer. A few very small ones, scalloped and lightly embroidered by machine, are sold for $5. Others, larger, and braided in fern leaves on the skirt, with embroidery on the cape, are $8. These are considered plain and inexpensive at the furnishing houses, as many cloaks are shown for $25 or $30 each, the single garment costing as much as many mothers spend in a season on their little ones. Cottage bonnets of Valenciennes lace and medallions of needle-work are prescribed for dressy occasions. Fine corded piqué bonnets, with soft crown and pleated coronet fronts, prettily embroidered, are useful and serviceable. For every-day wear are sunbonnets with stiffened head piece of piqué, high crown, and deep cape of muslin, and a pleated muslin ruche on the head piece.

For girls from three to six years of age elegant gypsy bonnets are shown of real Valenciennes, trimmed with white ostrich tips, forget-me-nots, and loops and strings of gros grain ribbon: from $15 to $23.

For boys of three years, and until they are old enough for trowsers, the kilt suits are made of light cloths, plaids, and of piqué. Pattern No. XX., in Supplement of Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., is the guide for such suits. They cost from $12 to $23 at the furnishing houses. Soft-crowned straw hats, with the brim turned up all around, are worn by little boys. Their piqué dresses, when not made kilt fashion, are gored skirts belted to a linen habit-shirt, and worn beneath a slashed jacket: from $13 to $22 is the price when trimmed with embroidery.

Among the choicest importations are sacques of Berlin wool overcast with silk floss—white grounds with scarlet, blue, or chinchilla stars. They are light yet warm, just suitable for spring. For children from one to three years old they are long loose sacques with a hood, and cost from $7 to $12. For larger girls they are jacket-shaped, and cost $11. Lovely jackets, sailor shape, of blue, white, or scarlet velours, are the fancy for misses of five or seven years. They are trimmed with white cord, are imported, and cost $9. Light cloth paletots, like those described for ladies, are imported in misses' sizes, costing from $7 to $13.

The sauciest hats of white straw, with rolling brim turned up broadly back and front, and slightly indented on each side, are worn by girls of ten years and older. They are trimmed with silk puffings or gauze ruches, and the fancy of the moment is to dot them with large white daisies with golden centres. Sailor hats of white straw, with wide brim, bound with blue, and a ribbon band, are for school-girls. These, with velours sailor jackets and suits of narrow striped mohair, make girlish and graceful costumes for spring. Short hair is out of fashion for children. All girls let it grow, and wear it flowing in careless waves, or else in two long braids fastened by ribbon plaited in with the lower part of the braid, and tied in a bow with ends.

Sailor suits of mazarine blue flannel are again worn by boys of five or seven years. The model illustrated in Bazar No. 16, Vol. IV., may be made up in piqué, gray linens, or flannel. White twilled flannel suits will be worn later in the season. Jackets with vests and knee pantaloons are the suits for boys too short for long pantaloons. Gathered knickerbocker trowsers are still worn, but with less fullness than formerly.

For information received thanks are due Messrs. A. T. STEWART & Co.; ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & Co.; and LORD & TAYLOR.

PERSONAL.

SOME of the incidents connected with the marriage of the Marquis of Lorne will strike Americans as having been ridiculously red-tapey. Many fine people expected to attend that wedding, but didn't. The cabinet ministers were invited, but not their wives. Mr. MORAN, the representative of the United States, couldn't go, because he is only a chargé. Several very black and a few coffee-colored embassadors, glistening with diamonds, were there, while, under the rule, some of the most peerless of the peeresses were coolly left out in the cold.

—Among the English after-dinner speakers of our time CHARLES DICKENS was undoubtedly the readiest and wittiest. CHARLES MATHEWS, Lord GRANVILLE, and Mr. LOWE are also clever in that way. Bishop WILBERFORCE, of Winchester, and Bishop JEUNE, of Peterborough, are admirable after-dinner speakers, although neither of them equals Archdeacon DENISON. Professors HUXLEY, TYNDALL, and RANKIN are also good, as is Sir FRANCIS GRANT, of the Royal Academy, whose speeches are said to be of the highest type of after-dinner eloquence. Mr. DISRAELI is perhaps best of all, sparkling as he does with keen and witty observation, graceful personal allusions, terse and picturesque phrases.

—Miss NATALIE DE LOOSEY, daughter of the late Chevalier DE LOOSEY, Austrian consul-general in this city, was recently married in Vienna to Baron KUEBEC, a gentleman of position in the best circles of Austria. The ceremony was performed at the residence of Mr. THEODORE HAVEMEYER, of New York, a brother-in-law of the bride. Count VON BEUST, Mr. BANCROFT, and many notables were present.

—JOHN H. JANNINGS has bequeathed $20,000 to the female college at Greencastle, Indiana.

—Like "the Commodore" and "Uncle Daniel," Sir ROBERT WALPOLE, who was Prime Minister of England for a longer period than any of his predecessors or successors, was a bold speculator in stocks, was largely in the South Sea bubble, and sold out at a thousand per cent. profit. GUY, the bookseller, followed his lead, and to the fortune he gained London owes the hospital that bears his name.

—A recent official report in England gives some curious facts as to the popular names of the day. It is based on the first or leading names of 100,000 children—50,000 males and 50,000 females:

Order.	Names.	Number.	Order.	Names.	Number.
1	Mary	6,819	14	Jane	1,697
2	William	6,590	15	Ellen	1,621
3	John	6,230	16	Emily	1,615
4	Elizabeth	4,617	17	Frederick	1,604
5	Thomas	3,876	18	Annie	1,580
6	George	3,620	19	Margaret	1,546
7	Sarah	3,602	20	Emma	1,540
8	James	3,060	21	Eliza	1,507
9	Charles	2,823	22	Robert	1,323
10	Henry	2,060	23	Arthur	1,237
11	Alice	1,925	24	Alfred	1,233
12	Joseph	1,780	25	Edward	1,170
13	Ann	1,718

Total number of children (out of 100,000) registered under the above 25 names 65,893

—As nearly as can be ascertained the rates paid to a few foreign and native musical artists are as follows: NILSSON, $1100; PAREPA-ROSA, $500; KELLOGG, $350; ADELAIDE PHILLIPS, $300; MARIA BRAINERD, $50; JENNY KEMPTON, $100; BRIGNOLI, $300; LE FRANC, $250; VERGER, $150; J. R. THOMAS, $50; GEORGE SIMPSON, $50 to $100; RANDOLFI, $75.

—Colonel SAM JAMES has introduced into the penitentiary over which he presides in Louisiana a new regulation. Hereafter all prisoners are to be washed before they are ironed.

—The most successful medical practitioner in Orange, New Jersey, is Miss FOWLER, M.D., a maiden of forty, whose professional income for several years past has ranged from fifteen to eighteen thousand dollars per annum. She is a sister of the phrenologist man.

—Since the foundation of the banking house of HOPE & Co., in Amsterdam, there have been nearly two hundred partners connected with the firm. Among these was the author of "Anastasius." One of the HOPES—HENRY HOPE, of Boston—who went to Europe very poor, afterward became a leading member of the firm at a time of its greatest prosperity.

—It is said that Mrs. GEORGE VANDENHOFF is soon to give her lecture on "The Rights and Wrongs of Children" in New York, under the auspices of a charity. We are assured that the little ones will have in this lady a most able and eloquent defender. Mrs. VANDENHOFF is well known as a reader, and has been for some years a most successful teacher of elocution in many of our fashionable schools.

—The Rev. BENJAMIN SAWYER may with propriety be spoken of as one of the top-sawyers of the ministry, being, in fact, one of the oldest Congregational clergymen in Massachusetts. During his pastorate he has united over fourteen hundred couples in marriage, and attended over eleven hundred funerals. He celebrated his golden wedding with his second wife nearly two years ago, never used spectacles to read with, and has hair as black as coal.

—HARRIET HOSMER'S horse "Bruno" is one of the institutions of Rome. Prince HUMBERT, heir-apparent of Italy, is a mighty Nimrod, and wanting that steed, sent an offer of four hundred guineas for him; but Miss H.'s characteristic reply was, "If the four hundred guineas were doubled, and then trebled, the Prince could not have 'Bruno.'"

—It is the pleasant duty of the Bazar to mention another of those fine impulses of benevolence which seem to be spreading among us. Mr. CONRAD POPPENHAUSEN, an opulent gentleman of Long Island, who two years ago erected a free educational institute at College Point, finding that it was running in debt, has put it in sound condition by making to the trustees a second donation of one hundred thousand dollars.

—There are four women now living in Europe who have been dethroned within the last two years: SOPHIA, Queen of Naples; CARLOTTA, Empress of Mexico; ISABELLA, Queen of Spain; and EUGÉNIE, Empress of France.

—If there is any one thing for which Boston is noteworthy, it is style. Thus, in describing recently a funeral, the able editor said, "The procession was very fine, and nearly two miles in length—as was also the prayer of Dr. PERRY, the chaplain."

—SYLVANUS COBB, Jun., is computed to have written seventy-five miles of printed matter—and yet he is not happy.

—ANNA DICKINSON, according to an exchange, says jewty for duty, eyether for either, and rectichewed for rectitude, which enwages the St. Louis Chimes of Chewsday.

—The Rev. W. O. LAMSON, director-in-chief of the American Ambulance in Paris, has been made Chevalier of the Legion of Honor by the French government.

—Boston's present especial sensation is a grandson of DANIEL O'CONNELL, who is delivering lectures before the Catholic benevolent societies of that city.

—Mr. A. T. STEWART'S store at the corner of Tenth Street and Broadway is remarkable in one particular: the basement floor is the largest floor in the world except that of St. Peter's at Rome. In flush surface (broken only by columns) it covers nearly three acres.

—WILLIAM BENTON CLULOW, an English writer, in a work little known pertinently says that "competence of fortune and a mind at ease have in thousands of instances given the death-blow to literary ambition and success." Men in the full and secured enjoyment of the elegancies of private life are rarely found purchasing happiness by hard literary labor. SWIFT'S works were the result of an ambitious desire for wealth and a title. DEFOE wrote best when he was despoiled of position and means. Lord BACON'S most important works were chiefly composed during his exclusion from public employment; and MACCHIAVELLI wrote "The Prince" and "The Discourse on Livy" under similar circumstances. Numberless other instances in the same direction crowd upon the memory as we jot down the foregoing.

—Clergymen should be good customers for life-insurance companies—such, for instance, as the Rev. Drs. SPRAGUE, of Albany, ORVILLE DEWEY, and JAMES WALKER, who are the three oldest preachers of the Election Sermons of Massachusetts now living. They officiated respectively in 1825, 1826, and 1828. Rev. Dr. WALKER preached a second time in 1863.

—Fortune seems to have not merely "smiled," but to have "snickered right out" on ex-Governor LELAND STAMFORD, of California. Twenty years ago he went thither from Albany, poor. Now he is worth $10,000,000, owns a line of Pacific steamships, three lines of stage-coaches, thirteen gold mines, nineteen factories, forty-five farms, and several first-class hotels. The way of the transgressor is hard.

—Mrs. THORNTON, wife of the British minister at Washington, is a tall, pale, rather angular woman, with light hair and eyes. In private society she is much liked. Her distinguished manners display all the fascinations of a superior culture. She speaks French and Spanish fluently, and combines with rich vocal powers that refinement of intonation so rarely possessed by American women.

—PO-TUM-PI-HO-GA, an Indian chief near Cheyenne (perhaps you know the savage?), was lately introduced to an army officer by another savage, who, by way of commending the chief, told the soldier he was only forty years old, had taken two hundred scalps, and had had the delirium tremens fifteen times. Which statement leads one to moralize on the saying of an old frontiersman: "The only good Indian is a dead Indian."

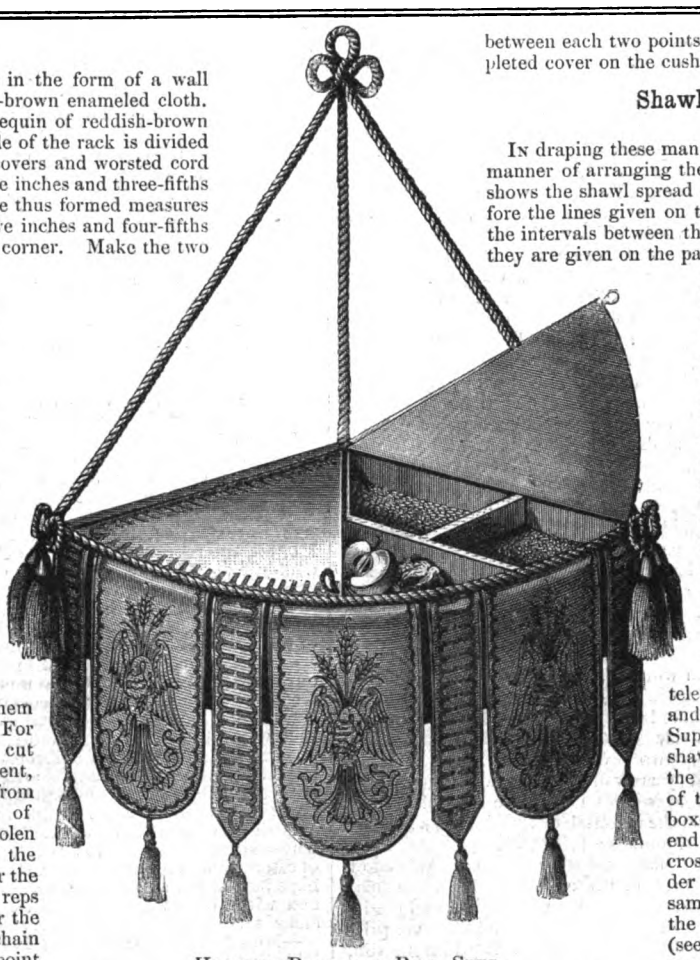
—A gentleman who writes from London to the Newark Advertiser says nice things of the lady members of the London School Board. They usually sit at the upper end of the room at the chairman's table, but when I happened to be there Miss GARRETT came in late, and took her seat at the lower end of the room. She looked as fresh and bright and cheerful as a bride ought to look (you know she was married next day), but there is a business-like air about her, and you can see at a glance that she is "all there." She did not speak, but took great interest in the discussion on compulsory education, "hear-hearing" the sentiments that she approved, in a quiet, musical voice, with the rest. When HUXLEY rose, with two or three others, to challenge the chairman's eye, and several voices called out, "HUXLEY," you could distinguish Miss GARRETT'S very distinctly; and when HUXLEY crossed the room to consult his friends about his amendment, she shook hands with him very warmly, and entered into his little scheme as heartily as any of the pantalooned ogres around her. And all this when, in the usual way, her heart ought to have been in her trousseau.

—Mr. SOL HEWES SANBORN, being yet among the quick, has made and published his will, the prominent and funny feature of which is that after he has fully "shuffled off," etc., he is to be skinned by some "scientific gent," and his hide, after proper tanning, is to be made into two drum-heads, which are to be presented to his "distinguished friend and patriotic fellow-citizen, WARREN SIMPSON, drummer, of Cohasset," on condition that he shall beat, or cause to be beaten, on the said drum-heads the national air of "Yankee Doodle," at the base of the monument on Bunker Hill, "at sunrise on the 17th of June annually." Moreover, on one of the drum-heads is to be inscribed POPE'S "Universal Prayer," and on the other "The Declaration of Independence" as it "originated in the brain of its illustrious author, THOMAS JEFFERSON." The parts of his body useless for anatomical purposes Mr. SANBORN desires, to quote his own words, to be "composted for a fertilizer for the purpose of nourishing the growth of an American elm, to be planted, or set out, in some rural public thoroughfare, that the weary wayfaring man may rest, and innocent children playfully sport beneath the shadow of its umbrageous branches, rendered luxuriant by my carcass." The trustees of the carcass are OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES and Professor AGASSIZ, who are to wire his bones together, and hang them up in the museum of anatomy.

Digitized by Google

Hanging Rack for Bird Seed.

THIS pretty rack, which is designed to hold bird seed, is in the form of a wall basket. It is made of thick pasteboard covered with reddish-brown enameled cloth. The front of the rack is trimmed with an embroidered lambrequin of reddish-brown woolen reps, and worsted tassels of the same color. The inside of the rack is divided into compartments by means of pieces of pasteboard. Two covers and worsted cord and tassels complete the rack. Cut a pasteboard bottom twelve inches and three-fifths square. One corner of this part is rounded off so that the edge thus formed measures twenty inches and two-fifths from corner to corner, and twelve inches and four-fifths from the middle of the front (rounded) edge to the opposite corner. Make the two covers of a piece of pasteboard of the same size and shape, which is cut straight across from the middle of the front (rounded) edge to the opposite corner, so as to form halves. The front and sides of the rack are made of pasteboard; they are three inches and three-fifths deep, and correspond in length to the outer edge of the bottom and cover. Cover all the parts with the enameled cloth on both sides, and overhand them together. Previous to this embroider the outside covering of the covers with reddish-brown silk braid; fasten the covers at one outer edge only (see illustration), bind the two remaining outer edges with reddish-brown silk braid, and furnish each front corner with a loop of the same. To make the compartments, prepare pieces of card-board, and cover them with enameled cloth. For the lambrequin tabs cut from Fig. 58, Supplement, three pieces, and from Fig. 59 four pieces of reddish-brown woolen reps and cambric of the same color. Transfer the design to each reps part, embroider the wider tabs in chain stitch and point Russe with reddish-brown silk, and the narrow tabs with reddish-brown silk soutache in the design given. Baste the material on the lining, bind each tab all around with braid, and fasten the upper edge to the front of the rack as shown by the illustration, in such a manner that they come a fifth of an inch apart. Cover the seam made by sewing on the tabs with coarse reddish-brown worsted cord. Finally, sew on the cords by means of which the rack is hung up, and the tassels.



HANGING RACK FOR BIRD SEED.
For pattern and design see Supplement, No. XXI., Figs. 58 and 59.

Fig. 1.—BARATHEA HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 50.

Foot-Stool with Embroidered Tabs.

THIS foot-stool is made of carved oak, and is furnished with a high round cushion, which is covered with gray cloth. The cushion is twenty-seven inches and a quarter in circumference; the under edge is finished with coarse gray worsted cord. The cushion is covered with twelve tabs. For each tab cut of gray and red cloth (the latter forms the lining) one piece from Fig. 26, Supplement. Pink the under rounded edge of the red part, and on the gray part sew red silk soutache in points, so that the lines cross each other and form diamonds. At the upper and under corner of each square form three loops with the soutache, and fasten each loop with a short stitch; at the points of intersection work a cross stitch with gray saddler's silk over the braid. Baste the outer part thus prepared on the lining, turn the bottom of the outer part over on the inside a fifth of an inch, so that it comes between the outer part and the lining, and the pinked edge of the latter projects. Button-hole stitch the edge turned down with red saddler's silk, bringing each stitch in the hollow between each two points of the pinked edge; in working the button-hole stitches, hold the tab so that the under edge is turned upward, by this means the connecting threads between the stitches come on the outer part. Twist a thread around the connecting threads. Double the tab thus prepared, letting the lining come on the inside, and join it from * to :; open the edges of the seam, and fasten them with hem stitches. Lay the tab so that the seam forms the middle of the under layer, and inside of the tab fasten three gray worsted cords, each ornamented with two gray woolen balls. Having prepared the tabs in this manner, sew the upper points on a round piece of card-board two inches and two-fifths in diameter, which is cut in twelve small points. Cover the seam made by doing this with a similar piece of card-board covered with gray cloth. Make a hole in the middle of each card-board part, and join the parts by passing a piece of red silk soutache first through the under, and then through the upper hole, and pass soutache over both card-board parts, bringing it between each two points of the card-board parts and each two tabs. Sew the completed cover on the cushion as shown by the illustration.

FOOT-STOOL WITH EMBROIDERED TABS.
For pattern see Supplement, No. VII., Fig. 26.

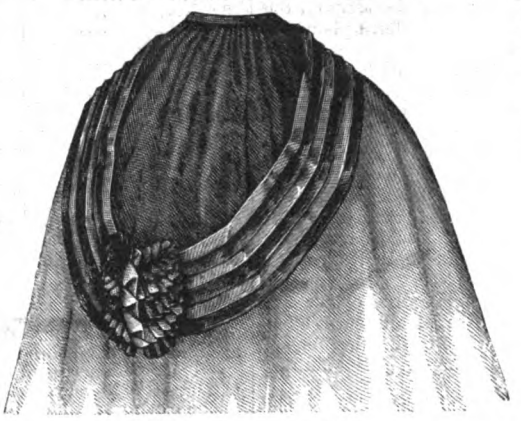


Fig. 2.—BARATHEA HOOD.
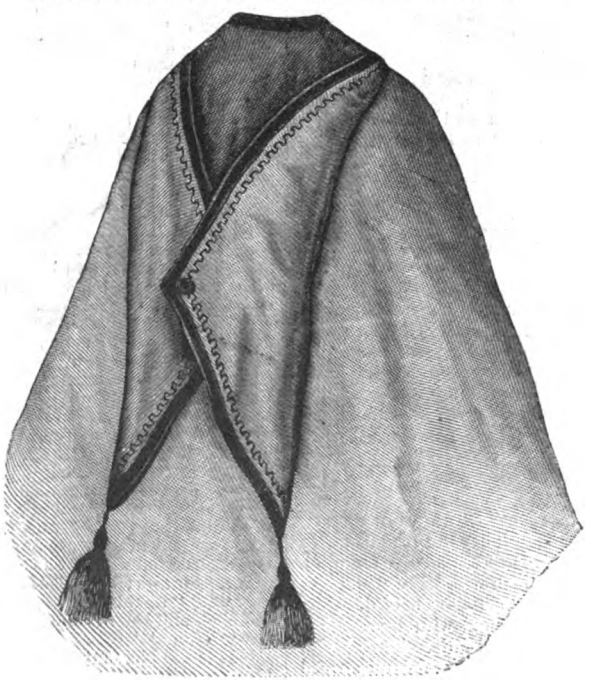
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVII., Fig. 50.

Fig. 2.—WATER-PROOF HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 49.



SERGE HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVIII., Fig. 51.

Shawls arranged as Mantelets, Figs. 1–5.

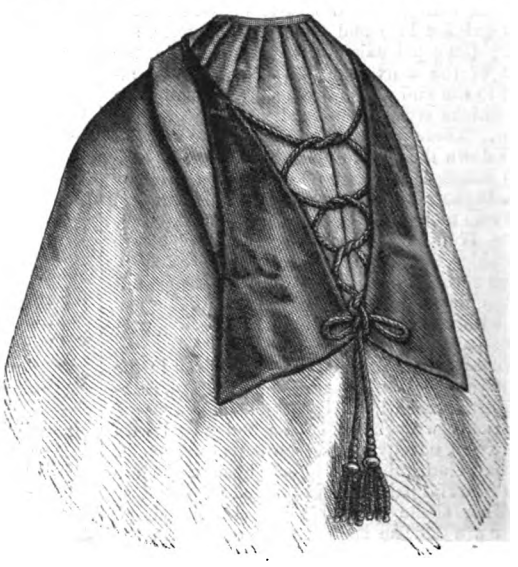
See illustrations on page 277.

IN draping these mantelets, the shawl must only be pleated, and not cut. For the manner of arranging the pleats see Figs. 28, 60, and 61, Supplement. Each pattern shows the shawl spread out and reduced to one-sixteenth of the original size; therefore the lines given on the patterns must be enlarged sixteenfold, and the spaces for the intervals between the lines and signs must be allowed sixteen times as large as they are given on the patterns. Before making each shawl, transfer the given lines and signs to the shawl. The lines are most readily marked by drawing a thread through the shawl with a needle, and designating the different signs and figures with black and white pins, etc. The figures close to the × or ● only serve to distinguish these signs. Larger or smaller shawls than those here given may also be arranged as mantelets in the same manner, but the shawl must be of the shape given on the pattern, so that the length and breadth of the shawls are in the same proportion to each other as the length and breadth of the shawls here given.

Figs. 1 and 2.—The shawl for this mantelet must be one hundred and thirty-four inches and two-fifths long and sixty-six inches and four-fifths wide. To make the mantelet, transfer the lines and signs from Fig. 28, Supplement, to the shawl. Then arrange the shawl at the middle of the back in a small box-pleat, fastening each end marked 1 of the crosswise line to the under side on ● of the same line. Along the middle line (see Fig. 28) arrange the shawl in pleats, beginning at the under side, and bringing each × on the next ●; the last × must come on ● of the crosswise line. Sew a belt of black gros grain, of the requisite width, to the under side of the pleats; this belt is closed in front under the mantelet. Arrange the shawl in pleats along the straight lines given from the under corners of Fig. 28, bringing the points designated with × on each other, and then on the ● at the end of the straight line. In doing this, begin with the × at the under corner. Cover the layers of pleats with a bow of black gros grain. Fold the shawl over on the outside along the dotted line at the upper lengthwise edge. This line has a somewhat slanting direction. The two straight lines at each end of the dotted line referred to must now come on each other. Run the double material of the shawl together along these lines; fold the three-cornered pleat thus formed over on the outside of the shawl, fasten it there, and furnish the under end of the pleat with a bow of black gros grain, as shown by Fig. 1. At the middle of the fold, which now forms the upper edge, arrange the shawl in a treble box-pleat, bringing, first, ×2 on ×3, then ×4 on ×5, then ×3 on ×6, ×5 on ×7; finally, ×6 on the next ●, and ×7 on the next ●. Along the neck sew on a ruche of black gros grain ribbon an inch and three-fifths wide, and fasten a bow of gros grain on the box-pleat at the back.

Fig. 1.—WATER-PROOF HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XVI., Fig. 49.

Figs. 3 and 4.—The shawl for this mantelet with hood must be seventy-six inches and four-fifths square. The hood may be worn over the head in the manner shown by Fig. 3. Before arranging the mantelet, transfer the lines and signs given on Fig. 60, Supplement, to the shawl, as above described; gather the shawl from 5 to 5 along the line given, so that the gathered part is eleven inches and one-fifth wide, and arrange the shawl in pleats, bringing, first, ×1 on ●1, ×2 on ●2, then ×2 on the next place marked with 5. In a similar manner fasten ×3 on ●3, then ×4 on ●4 and on the next place marked 5. Finally, baste the box-pleat thus formed on the gathered part. Sew a belt to the under side of the shawl along the gathers; the belt is closed at the front with a hook and eye. Fold the upper corner of the shawl down on the outside along the dotted line, double the shawl along the line marked "middle" on Fig. 60, so that the upper corner comes inside, and the four slanting lines marked "pleat" come on each other from : to *. Along this line sew through the fourfold material from : to *. Now spread out the shawl, which was previously doubled, and lay the outer fold of the slit left under the pleat over on the outside. Arrange the upper corner of the shawl which is now turned downward in a pleat, sewing the two lines marked with "pleat" together from b to a beside a, so that the folds thus formed meet at the outside of the hood, and at the two outer edges of the upper corner fasten



CASHMERE HOOD.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XV., Figs. 47 and 48.

Digitized by Google

×6 on ●6, ×7 on ●7, ×8 on ●8. From each ×8 to a the fold vertically indicated is formed. Finally, furnish the mantelet with buttons and loops of cord as shown by Figs. 3 and 4. When the hood is to be worn over the head, draw the buttons out of the loops at the back.

Fig. 5.—The shawl for this mantelet should be one hundred and twenty-one inches and three-fifths long and fifty-one inches and one-fifth wide. After transferring to the shawl the lines and signs given on Fig. 61, Supplement, lay the shawl over on the under side along the dotted line given at the upper lengthwise edge, and baste down the edge of the material; then lay the shawl over on the outer side along the straight line given, that is, from one end of the line marked ●4 to the other end similarly marked. Now double the shawl along the line marked "middle," so that the upper lengthwise edge, which is doubled over, comes inside, and the four slanting lines marked "pleat" given on Fig. 61 come on each other. Along these lines sew through the fourfold material from * to ●5 for the pleat referred to. After the pleat is formed, spread out the shawl, which was previously doubled; the piece turned down at the upper lengthwise edge at the middle of the back now forms a three-cornered hood-like part, which constitutes the trimming, and has a slit at the middle of the under part. Arrange this part in pleats on each side of the slit, bringing the upper ×5 of Fig. 61 on the under ×5, then both on ●5, and pass the edge of the material at the under middle of the hood-like part to the under side through the slit referred to. Then lay the shawl in an outer fold along the straight line between ●1 and ●2; along this fold arrange the double material in a box-pleat, bringing ×1 on ●1, ×2 on ●2, sew the box-pleat to the under edge of the hood-like part, and cover the seam made by doing this with a bow of black velvet. Finally, fasten each ×4 on ●4, ×3 on ●3, and fasten a ribbon forty-eight inches long on the inner side of the mantelet at the place marked ●5. This ribbon is fastened at the middle and on each side of the middle; after an interval of six inches and two-fifths it is fastened on each place marked ●3 of Fig. 61. When adjusting the mantelet the ends of the ribbon are tied at the front. At the front furnish the mantelet with hooks and eyes and a bow of velvet.

INFANT'S CASHMERE CLOAK.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 2.—LONG SHAWL ARRANGED AS A MANTELET.—BACK.
For arrangement see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 28.

Fig. 4.—SQUARE SHAWL ARRANGED AS A MANTELET.—BACK.
For arrangement see Supplement, No. XXII., Fig. 60.

Infant's Swiss Muslin and Lace Robe.

THIS robe is made of Swiss muslin, and is trimmed, as shown by the illustration, with puffs of the material, white lace an inch and three-fifths wide, pink gros grain ribbon of the same width, and a pink binding three-fifths of an inch wide. Cut the front (waist and skirt in one) from Fig. 52, Supplement, making it of the requisite length according to the direction of the arrowheads. Cut the back of the waist from Fig. 53, Supplement. The back breadths are straight, and must be cut of the requisite length. Join Figs. 52 and 53 according to the corresponding figures, face the back edge of each back of the waist with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide, and furnish them with small buttons and button-holes for closing the waist. Join the back breadths of the skirt with the front breadth, leaving a slit between the back breadths at the top of the skirt; on the edges of the slit make a narrow hem, gather the upper edge of the back breadths, and join them with the back of the waist. Cover the edges of the seam made by doing this on the inside of the waist with a strip of the material half an inch wide, and through the shirr thus formed run a narrow gros grain ribbon. Face the bottom of the skirt with a strip of the material an inch and a quarter wide. Face the neck with a strip of the material half an inch wide, and through the shirr thus formed run pink gros grain ribbon. For each sleeve cut a straight piece of the material thirteen inches and a quarter long and twelve inches and three-quarters wide. Arrange this part in puffs as shown by the illustration, join the crosswise edge, gathering it until only six inches long; hem the under edge two-fifths of an inch wide, and slightly hollow out the upper edge. Trim the sleeve and sew it into the corded arm-holes. Trim the robe as shown by the illustration, and partially indicated on Fig. 52, sewing the puffs and lace on the seams joining the front and back last of all. Make the puffs furnished with ruffles in connection with the latter, and bind the ruffles with pink gros grain. At the bottom of the waist sew gros grain ribbon two inches wide to the side seams, and, when adjusting the dress, tie them in a bow at the back.

INFANT'S POPLIN CLOAK.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XX., Figs. 54–57.

INFANT'S SWISS MUSLIN AND LACE ROBE.
For pattern see Supplement, No. XIX., Figs. 52 and 53.

Fig. 1.—LONG SHAWL ARRANGED AS A MANTELET.—FRONT.
[See Fig. 2.]
For arrangement see Supplement, No. IX., Fig. 28.

Fig. 5.—LONG SHAWL ARRANGED AS A MANTELET.
For arrangement see Supplement, No. XXIII., Fig. 61.

Fig. 3.—SQUARE SHAWL ARRANGED AS A MANTELET.—FRONT.
[See Fig. 4.]
For arrangement see Supplement, No. XXII., Fig. 60.

Digitized by Google

THE SISTERS.

THREE bonny maidens went out on a day,
While the summer sun was shining—
Janet and Annie and Margery Gray;
None were fairer, I ween, than they,
As forth that morn they took their way,
While the summer sun was shining.

Through the blooming gorse, by the dancing brook,
While the summer sun was shining,
Laughing and sporting, their way they took,
Now stooping for flowers, now loitering to look
For honey stored in the wild bees' nook,
While the summer sun was shining.

Up by the side of the hill they climb,
While the summer sun is shining,
Till they hear the bells of St. Agnes chime,
And they stop, for they know 'tis the holy time
When the nuns are singing their hymns sublime,
While the summer sun is shining.

Annie grew weary, and waited to rest,
While the summer sun was shining,
Where the church-yard graves with flowers were dressed,
And she laid her down where the shadow blessed
Of the chancel cross fell over her breast,
While the summer sun was shining.

Janet and Margery roved where they list,
While the summer sun was shining;
The day wore on, and the way they missed;
They met the young lord with his falcon on fist,
He stooped from the saddle and Janet he kissed,
While the summer sun was shining.

Janet is gone with Lord Hugh to his tower,
While the summer sun is shining;
Margery hied back again to her bower
In the peaceful vale ere the evening hour,
And there she lingered, a lonely flower,
While the summer sun was shining.

My Lady Janet rides gayly dressed,
While the summer sun is shining;
Annie sleeps sweet with the cross o'er her breast;
Margery dwells in her bower at rest—
One rich, one patient, and one with the blessed,
While the summer sun is shining.

HANNAH.

A Novel.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "JOHN HALIFAX, GENTLEMAN."

CHAPTER VIII.

HANNAH'S first feeling on discovering her brother-in-law's absence was intense relief. Then, as she sat over the solitary breakfast-table, there came unto her an uneasiness akin to fear. He had done exactly what she had not done; what, in spite of her first instinctive wish, she had decided was unwise and cowardly to do—he had run away.

From what? From the scandal? But since it was all false, and they innocent, what did it matter? Could they not live it down? Dreadful as things had appeared in the long watches of the night, in that clear light of morning, and with the touch of her darling's arms still lingering about her neck, Hannah felt that she could live it down. Perhaps he could not; perhaps he was afraid—and a cold shiver crept over her—a conviction that he was afraid.

In the sick friend she did not quite believe. She knew all Bernard's affairs—knew that though he had an old college companion ill in London, it was no friend close enough to take him suddenly and compulsorily from all his duties—he who so hated going from home. Yes, he must have gone on her account, and in consequence of what happened last night. Her first impulse of relief and gratitude sank into another sort of feeling. He had certainly run away, leaving her to fight the battle alone. That is, if he meant them to fight it out. If not, if he wished her to leave him in his absence he would perhaps take the opportunity of telling her so.

For not yet—not even yet—did that other solution of the difficulty suggest itself to Hannah's mind. Had she looked at the sweet, grave face reflected in the mirror opposite, had she heard the patient, tender voice which answered Rosie's infantile exactions—for she had gone and fetched the child, as usual, after breakfast—the truth would at once have occurred to her concerning any other woman. But it did not concerning herself; or only in that form—a rather sad but perfectly safe one—not that her brother-in-law was growing fond of her, but that she was growing fond of him; fond enough to make his marriage, or any other catastrophe which should part them, not so indifferent to her as it once had been.

But still this was only affection. Hannah had never had a brother, her nearest approach to the tie having been her cousin Arthur, who, from his extreme gentleness and delicacy of health, was less like a brother than a sister—ay, even after he changed into a lover. Now, when not one spark of passion, only sacred tenderness, was mixed up with the thought of him, his memory was less that of a man than an angel. In truth, only since she had lived with Mr. Rivers had Hannah found out what it was to associate with a real man, at once strong and tender, who put a woman in her right place by conscientiously taking his own with regard to her, and being to her at once a shelter and a shield.

Poor Hannah! she had grown so accustomed now to be taken care of, that she felt if fate thrust her out into the bitter world again she should be as helpless as one of those little fledgelings about whom, in the intervals of her meditations, she was telling Rosie a pathetic story. And when Rosie said, "Poor little dicky-birds!" and looked quite sad, then, seeing Aunt Hannah look sad too—alas! not about "dicky-birds"—burst into the sympathetic sobbing of her innocent age, Aunt Hannah's heart felt like to break.

It would have broken many a time that day but for the blessed necessity of keeping a bright face before the child—ay, even though sometimes there occurred to her, with a refined self-torture, the thought of what she should do if Mr. Rivers sent her away without Rosie. But she did not seriously fear this—he could not be capable of such cruelty. If he were, why, Aunt Hannah was quite capable of—something else which he might not exactly like, and which perhaps the unpleasant English law might call child-stealing. And she remembered a story, a true story, of an aunt who had once traveled from England to America, and there fairly kidnapped from some wicked relations her dead sister's child; pretended to take it out for a walk, and fled over snow and through forests, traveling by night and hiding by day, till she caught the New York steamer, and sailed, safe and triumphant, for English shores.

"As I would sail, for Australia or America, any day, if he drives me to it. Oh, Rosie, you little know what a desperate woman Tannie could be made!"

And Rosie laughed in her face, and stroked it, and said, "Good Tannie, pretty Tannie!" till the demon sank down, and the pure angel that always seems to look out of baby-eyes comforted Hannah in spite of herself. No one can be altogether wretched, for long together, who has the charge of a healthy, happy, loving little child.

Sunday came, but Mr. Rivers did not return, sending as substitute in his pulpit an old college chum, who reported that he had left London for Cambridge, and was staying there in his old college; at which Lady Rivers expressed herself much pleased.

"He shuts himself up far too much at home, which would be natural enough if he had a wife, but for a man in Bernard's circumstances is perfectly ridiculous. I hope he will now see his mistake and correct it."

Hannah answered nothing. She knew she was being talked at, as was the habit of the Moat House. Her only protection was not to seem to hear. She had, as he desired, taken Bernard's message to his family, even showing the letter, and another letter she got from him respecting Mr. Hewlett, the clergyman, also evidently meant to be shown. Indeed, he wrote almost daily to her about some parish business or other, for Hannah had become to him like her lost sister—his "curate in petticoats." But every letter was the briefest, most matter-of-fact possible, beginning "My dear sister," and ending "your affectionate brother." Did he do this intentionally, or make the epistles public intentionally? She rather thought so. A wise, kind precaution; and yet there is something painful and aggravating in any friendship which requires precautions.

Day after day Hannah delivered her brother-in-law's messages, and transacted his business, speaking and looking as calmly as if she were his mere locum tenens, his faithful "curate"—as if her throat were not choking and her hands trembling, with that horrible lie of Dixon's ever present to her mind. She tried to find out whether it had ever reached others' minds—whether there was any difference in the way people glanced at or addressed her; but beyond a certain carelessness with which she was usually treated at the Moat House when Mr. Rivers was not present, and a slight coldness in other houses—which might or might not have been her own morbid fancy—she discovered nothing.

The clergyman sent by Bernard, being of no imposing personality or high worldly standing, but only just a poor "coach" at Cambridge, was not invited to stay at the Moat House; so Miss Thelluson had to entertain him herself till Monday. It was an easy task enough; he was very meek, very quiet, and very full of admiration of Mr. Rivers, concerning whose college life he told Hannah stories without end. She listened with an interest strangely warm and tender; for the tales were all to his credit, and proved him to have been then, as now, a man who, even as a young man, was neither afraid of being good nor ashamed of being amiable. They made her almost forgive herself for another fact which had alarmed and startled her—that she missed him so much.

People of Hannah's character, accustomed of sad necessity to stand alone until self-dependent solitude becomes second nature, do not often "miss" other people. They like their friends well enough, are glad to meet and sorry to part; but still no ordinary parting brings with it that intense sense of loss of which Hannah was painfully conscious now her brother-in-law was away. She had thought the child was company enough; and so Rosie was in daylight hours—the little imperious darling, who ruled Aunt Hannah with a rod of iron, except when Aunt Hannah saw it was for the child's good to govern her, when she turned the tables with a firm gentleness that Rosie never disobeyed—but after Rosie had gone to bed the blank silence which seemed to fall upon the house was indescribable.

Oh, the lonely tea-table!—for she had abolished seven o'clock dinners; oh, the empty drawing-room, with its ghostly shadows and strange noises! The happy home felt as dreary as Bernard must have found it after poor Rosa died. In the long hours of evening solitude Hannah's thoughts, beaten back by the never-ceasing business of the day, returned in battalions, attacking her on every weak side, often from totally opposite sides, so that she retired, worsted, to her inner self—the little secret chambers which her soul had dwelt in ever since she was a child. Yet even there was no peace now. Bernard had let himself into her heart with that wonderful key of sympathy which he so well knew how to use, and even in her deepest and most sacred self she was entirely her own no more. Continually she wanted him—to talk to, to argue with, to laugh with, nay, even to laugh at sometimes. She missed him every where, in every thing, with the bitter want of those who, having lived together for many months, come inevitably, as was before said, either to dislike one another excessively, or—that other alternative, which is sometimes the most fatal of the two—to love one another. Such love has a depth and passion to which common feelings can no more be compared than the rolling of a noisy brook to the solemn flow of a silent river which bears life or death in its waveless but inexorable tide.

Ay, it was life or death. Call affection by what name you will, when it becomes all-absorbing it can, in the case of persons not akin by blood, lead but to one result, the love whose right end is marriage. When Hannah, as her brother-in-law's continued absence gave her more time for solitary reflection than she had had for many months, came face to face with the plain fact, how close they had grown, and how necessary they were to one another, she began, startled, to ask herself if this so-called sisterly feeling were really sisterly? What if it were not? What if she had deceived herself, and that sweet, sad, morning dream, which she had thought protected her from all other dreams of love and marriage, had been, after all, only a dream, and this the reality? Or would it have grown into such had she and Bernard met as perfect strangers, free to fall in love and marry as strangers do?

"Suppose we had—suppose such a thing had been possible?" thought she. And then came a second thought. Why was it impossible? Who made it so—God or man?

Hannah had hitherto never fairly considered the matter—not even when Grace's misery had brought it home. With her natural dislike to what she called "walking through muddy water," she had avoided it, as one does avoid any needlessly unpleasant thing. Now, when she felt herself turning hot and cold at every new idea which entered her mind, and beginning to think of her brother-in-law—not at all as she was wont to think—the question came, startlingly, was she right or wrong in so doing? For she was one of those women after the type of Jeanie in "Auld Robin Gray," to whom the mere fact,

"I daurna think of Jamie, for that wad be a sin," was the beginning and end of every thing.

But was it a sin? Could she find any thing in the Bible to prove it such? She took down a "Concordance," and searched out all the texts which bore upon the subject, but found none, except that prohibition adduced once by Mrs. Dixon—"Thou shalt not take a wife to her sister in her life-time"—of which the straightforward, natural interpretation was that, consequently, it might be done after her death.

Right or wrong. That, as Mr. Rivers had more than once half satirically told her, was, in all things, the sole question in Hannah's mind. As for the social and legal point—lawful marriage—that, she knew, was impossible; Bernard had said so himself. But was the love which desired marriage—absolute love, as distinguished from mere affection—also a sin? If it should spring up in her heart—of his she never thought—should she have to smother it down as a wicked thing?

That was her terror, and that alone. The rest, and whatever it must result in, was mere misery; and Hannah was not afraid of misery, only of sin. Yet, when day after day Bernard's absence lengthened, and except these constant business letters she had no personal tidings whatever from him, there grew in her mind a kind of fear. The house felt so empty without him that she sometimes caught herself wondering how he managed without her—who brought him his hat and gloves, and arranged his daily memoranda—for, like most other excellent men, he was a little disorderly, and very dependent upon the women about him. Who would take care of him, and see that he had the food he liked, and the warm wraps he required? All these thoughts came continually back upon Hannah, in a piteously human, tender shape, quite different from that dim dream-love, that sainted remembrance, of her lost Arthur. He was not a man like Bernard, helpless even while helpful, requiring one woman's whole thought and care—he was an angel among the angels.

That power which every good man has to turn all his female ministrants into slaves, by being himself the very opposite of a tyrant; who can win from all household hearts the most loyal devotion, because exacting none—this, the best prerogative and truest test of real manhood, was Bernard's in a very great degree. It was, as Hannah had once innocently told him, a blessing to live with him, he made other people's lives so bright. She had no idea how dark the house could feel till he was gone—till, day after day slipping by, and he not returning, it settled itself for the time into a house without a master, a solar system without a sun.

When she recognized this, the sense of her fast-coming fate darkened down upon Hannah. She was not a young girl, to go on deceiving herself to the end; nay, hers was the kind of nature that can not deceive itself if it would. During the first week of Bernard's absence she would have almost gone wild sometimes, but for the strong conviction—like poor Grace's, alas!—that she had done nothing wrong, and the feeling, still stronger, that she could always bear any thing which only harmed herself.

Then she had the child. In all that dreadful time, which afterward she looked back upon as a sort of nightmare, she kept Rosie always beside her. Looking in her darling's face—the little fragile flower which had blossomed into strength under her care, the piece of white paper upon which any careless hand might have scribbled any thing, to remain indelible through life—then Aunt Hannah took heart even in her misery. She could have done no wrong, since, whatever happened to herself, she had saved, by coming to Easterham, the child.

On the second Saturday of Mr. Rivers's absence Hannah was sitting on the floor with Rosie, in the drawing-room, between the lights. It had been a long, wet, winter day, and had begun with a perplexing visit from the church-warden, wanting to know if the vicar had come home, and, if not, what must be done for Sunday. Hannah had had no letter, and could not tell; could only suggest that a neighboring clergyman might probably have to be sent for, and arrange who it should be. And the vexed look of the old church-warden, a respectable farmer; a certain wonder he showed at his principal's long absence—"so very unlike our parson"—together with a slight incivility to herself, which Hannah, so fearfully observant now, fancied she detected in his manner, made her restless and unhappy for hours after. Not till she had Rosie beside her, and drank of the divine lethe-cup which infant hands always bring, did the painful impression subside. Now, in the peace of fire-light within, and a last amber gleam of rainy sunset without, she and Rosie had the world all to themselves; tiny fingers curled tightly round hers, with the sweet, imperative "Tannie, tum here!" and a little blue and white fairy held out its mushroom-like frock, with "Rosie dance, Tannie sing!" And Tannie did sing, with a clearness and cheerfulness long foreign to her voice; yet she had had a sweet voice when she was a girl. When this, her daily business of delight, came, the tempting spirits, half angel, half demon, which had begun to play at hide-and-seek through the empty chambers of poor Hannah's heart, fled away, exorcised by that magic spell which Heaven gives to every house that owns a child.

She was sitting there, going through "Mary, Mary, quite contrary," "Banbury Cross," the history of the young gentleman who "put in his thumbs and pulled out the plums," with other noble nursery traditions—all sung to tunes composed on the spot, in that sweet, clear soprano which always made Rosie put up her small fingers with a mysterious "Hark! Tannie's singing!" when a ring came to the door-bell.

Hannah's heart almost stopped beating. Should she fly? Then there was a familiar voice in the hall, and Rosie shrieked out in an ecstasy, "Papa come! papa come!" Should she hide? Or should she stay, with the child beside her, a barrier against evil eyes and tongues without and miserable thoughts within? Yes, that was the best thing, and Hannah did it.

Mr. Rivers came in; and, shaking hands with his sister-in-law, took his little girl in his arms. Rosie clung to him in an ecstasy of delight. She, too, had not forgotten papa.

"I thought she would forget," he said. "Baby memories are short enough."

"But Rosie is not a baby; and papa has only been away eleven days."

Eleven days!—then he would know she had counted them. As soon as the words were uttered Hannah could have bitten her tongue out with shame.

But no; he did not seem to notice them, or any thing but his little girl. He set Rosie on his lap, and began playing with her, but fitfully and absently. He looked cold, pale, ill. At last he said, in a pathetic kind of way:

"Hannah, I wish you would give me a glass of wine. I am so tired."

And the eyes which were lifted up to hers for a minute had in them a world of weariness and sadness. They drove out of Hannah's mind all thoughts of how and why she and he had parted, and what might happen now they met, and threw her back into the old domestic relationship between them. She took out her keys, got him food and drink, and watched him take both and revive after them with almost her old pleasure. Nay, she scarcely missed the old affectionate "Thank you, Hannah, you are so good," which never came.

Presently, when Rosie, growing too restless for him, was dismissed with the customary "Do take her, Aunt Hannah, nobody can manage her but you," Hannah carried the little one to bed, and so disappeared, not a word or look having been exchanged between them except about the child. Still, as she left him sitting in his arm-chair by his own fireside, which he said he found so "cozy," she, like little Rosie, was conscious of but one feeling—gladness that papa was come home.

At dinner, too, how the whole table looked bright, now that the master's place was no longer vacant! Hannah resumed hers; and, in spite of the servant's haunting eyes and greedy ears, on the watch for every look and word that passed between these two innocent sinners, there was a certain peace and content in going back to the old ways once more.

When they were left alone together, over dessert, Mr. Rivers looked round the cheerful room, saying, half to himself, "How comfortable it is to be at home!" and then smiled across the table to her, as if saying mutely what he had said in words a hundred times, that it was she who made his home so comfortable. And Hannah smiled in return, forgetting every thing except the pleasantness of having him back again—the pure delight and rest in one another's society which is at the root of all true friendship, all deep love. They did not talk much; indeed, talking seemed dangerous; but they sat a long time in their opposite seats, as they had sat day after day for so many months, trying to think, feel, and speak the same as heretofore.

But it was in vain. In this, as in all false positions, the light once admitted could never again be hidden from; the door once open could never be shut.

Mr. Rivers proposed going to the drawing-room at once. "I want to talk to you; and here the servants might be coming in."

Hannah blushed violently, and then hated herself for doing so. Why should she be afraid of the servants coming in? Why tremble because he "wanted to talk to her?" Such a common occurrence—a bit of their every-day life, which went on, and must go on, externally, just the same as before.

Digitized by Google

So she rose, and they went into the drawing-room.

It was the prettiest room in the house; full of every thing that a man of taste and refinement could desire, in order to make—and it does help to make—a happy home. Yet the master of it looked round with infinite sadness in his eyes, as if it gave him no pleasure, as if he hardly saw it.

"Hannah," he said at last, when they had gone through the form of tea, and she had taken her work—another empty form, for her hands shook so she could hardly thread her needles—"Hannah, I had better not put off my business with you—my message to you, rather. You must understand I fulfill it simply as a matter of duty. I hope you will not be offended?"

"I offended?"

"You ought not to be, I think, in any case. No lady should take offense because an honest man presumes to love her. But I may as well speak out plainly. My friend Morecamb—"

"Oh, is it that matter again? I thought I was to hear no more of it."

"You never would have done so from me, but circumstances have altered a little, and I have been overborne by the opinion of others."

"What others?"

"Lady Rivers" (Hannah started angrily). "To her, wisely or foolishly, Morecamb has appealed; and, by her advice, has again written to me. They both put it to me that it is my duty, as your brother-in-law, once more to lay the matter before you, and beg you to reconsider your decision. His letter—which I do not offer to show you, for he might not like it, and, besides, there are things said in it to myself which none but a very old friend would venture to say—his letter is thoroughly straightforward, manly, and generous. It makes me think, for the first time, that he is almost worthy of you. In it he says—may I repeat to you what he says?"

Hannah bent her head.

"That his conviction of your worth and his attachment to yourself are such, that if you will only allow him to love you he shall be satisfied, and trust to time for the rest. He entreats you to marry him at once, and let him take you from Easterham, and place you in the position which, as his wife, you would, of course, have, and which he knows—we all know—you would so worthily fill."

Bernard had said all this like a person speaking by rote, repeating carefully and literally all that he had before planned to say, and afraid of committing himself by the alteration of a word. Now he paused, and waited for an answer.

It came not.

"He desires me to tell you that, besides the Rectory, he has a good private income; that his two daughters are both married; and that, in case of his death, you will be well provided for. It is a pleasant parish and a charming house. You would have a peaceful home, away, and yet not very far away, from Easterham. You might see Rosie every week—"

Here Hannah turned slowly round, and for the first time Bernard saw her face.

"Good Heavens!" he cried. "What have I done? I meant no harm—Morecamb meant no harm."

"No," she answered, in a hard, dry tone. "He meant—I quite understand it, you see, and, since I understand it, why should I not speak of it?—he meant to stop the mouths of Easterham by marrying me, and taking me away from your house. He is exceedingly kind—and you also."

"I?—oh, Hannah!—I?"

"Why distress yourself? Do I not say you are exceedingly kind?"

But she seemed hardly to know what she was saying. Her horrible, humiliating position between her brother-in-law and her brother-in-law's friend, the one having unwillingly affixed the stain upon her name, which the other was generously trying to remove, burst upon her with an agony untold.

"Why did I ever come here? Why were you so cruel as to ask me to come here? I came in all innocence. I knew nothing. You, a man, ought to have known."

He turned deadly pale.

"You mean to say I ought to have known that, although the law considers you my sister, you are not my sister, and our living together as we do would expose us to remarks such as James Dixon made the other night. Most true; I ought to have known. Was that all? or did you mean any thing more than that?"

"Nothing more. Is not that enough? Oh, it is dreadful—dreadful for an innocent woman to have to bear!"

And her self-control quite gone, Hannah rocked herself to and fro; in such a passion of grief as she had never let any one witness in her since she was a child. For, indeed, woman as she was, she felt weak as a child.

But the man was weaker still. Once—twice he made a movement as if he would dart across the hearth to where she sat, but restrained himself, and remained motionless in his seat—attempting no consolation. What consolation could he give? It was he himself who had brought this slander upon her—how cruel and how wide-spread it was he by this time knew, even better than she.

"Hannah," he said, after a little, "we are neither of us young people, to take fright at shadows. Let us speak openly together, as if we were two strangers, viewing the case of two other strangers, placed in the same relation together as ourselves."

"Speak! How can I speak? I am utterly helpless, and you know it. Lady Rivers knows it too; and so, doubtless, does Mr. Morecamb. Perhaps, after all, I should be wisest to accept his generous offer and marry him."

Bernard started, and then composed himself into the same formal manner with which he had conducted the whole conversation.

"Yes, in a worldly point of view, it would be wise; I, speaking as your brother-in-law, am bound to tell you so. I wish to do my duty by you; I have no right to allow my own or my child's interest to stand in the way of your happiness." He paused. "I wish you to be happy—God knows I do!" He paused again. "Then—what answer am I to give to Morecamb? Am I to tell him to come here and speak for himself?"

"No!" Hannah burst out vehemently. "No—a thousand times no! My heart is my own, and he has not got it. If I were a beggar starving in the streets, or a poor wretch whom every body pointed the finger at—as perhaps they do—I would not marry Mr. Morecamb."

A strange light came into Bernard's eyes.

"That's Hannah! There speaks my good, true Hannah! I thought she had gone away, and some other woman come in her place. Forgive me! I did my duty; but oh, it was hard! I am so glad, so glad!"

He spoke with his old, affectionate, boyish impulsiveness; he was still exceedingly boyish in some things, and perhaps Hannah liked him the better for it—who knows? Even now a faint smile passed over her lips.

"You ought to have known me better. You ought to have been sure that I would not marry any man without loving him. And I told you long ago that I did not love Mr. Morecamb."

"You did; but people sometimes change their minds. And love comes, we know not how. It begins—just a little seed, as it were—and grows, and grows, till all of a sudden we find it a full-grown plant, and we can not root it up, however we try."

He spoke dreamily, and as if he had forgotten all about Mr. Morecamb, then sat down and began gazing into the fire with that dull, apathetic look so familiar to Hannah during the early time of her residence there, when she knew him little, and cared for him less; when, if any one had told her there would come to her such a day as this day, when every word of the sentence he had just uttered would fall on her heart like a drop of burning lead, she would have pronounced it impossible—ridiculously impossible. Yet she was true then—true now—to herself and to all others; perfectly candid and sincere. But would the world ever believe it? Does the world, so ready to find out double or interested motives, ever believe in conscientious turncoats, righteous renegades? Yet there are such things.

After a while Mr. Rivers suddenly aroused himself.

"I am thinking of other matters, and forgetting my friend. I had better put the good man out of his pain by telling him the truth at once, had I not, Hannah?"

"Certainly."

"Your decision is quite irrevocable?"

"Quite."

"Then we need say no more. I will write the letter at once."

But that seemed not so easily done as said. After half an hour or more he came back with it unfinished in his hand.

"I hardly know how to say what you wish me to say. A mere blank No, without any reasons given. Are there none which could make the blow fall lighter? Remember, the man loves you, Hannah, and love is a precious thing."

"I know it is, when one has love to give back; but I have none. Not an atom."

"Why not? I beg your pardon—I ought not to ask—I have not the slightest right to ask. Still, as I have sometimes thought, a woman seldom lives thirty years without—without some sort of attachment?"

Hannah became much agitated. Rosa, then, had kept sisterly faith, even toward her own husband. Mr. Rivers evidently knew nothing about Arthur; had been all along quite unaware of that sad but sacred story, which Hannah thought sheltered her just as much as widow's weeds might have done.

She hesitated, and then, in her misery, she clung to the past as a kind of refuge from the present.

"I thought you knew it," she answered, very slowly; and quickly, "I thought Rosa had told you. If it will lessen his pain, you may tell Mr. Morecamb that once I was engaged to be married to a cousin of mine. He was ill: they sent him away to Madeira, and there he died."

"He—I did not quite hear." For, indeed, Hannah's words were all but inaudible.

"He died!"

She had said it out now, and Bernard knew the whole. Those two silent ghosts, of his dead wife and her own dead lover, seemed to come and stand near them in the quiet room. Was it with looks of sorrow or anger?—if the dead can feel either. Arthur—Rosa—in their lives both so loving, unselfish, and dear. Was it of them that the living needed to be afraid?

Mr. Rivers seemed not afraid, only exceedingly and painfully surprised.

"I had no idea of such a thing, or I would never have urged Mr. Morecamb's plea. And yet, tell me, Hannah, is this lost love the only cause of your refusing him? Was this what you referred to when you once said to me, or implied, that you would never marry any body? Is all your heart, your warm, true, womanly heart, buried in your cousin's grave?"

There may be circumstances in which people are justified in telling a noble lie; but Hannah was not the woman to do it. Not though it would at once have placed her beyond the reach of misconstruction, saved her from all others, and from herself—encompassed her henceforward with a permanent shield. Though one little "Yes" would have accomplished all this, she could not say it, for she felt it would have been a lie—a lie to Heaven and to her own soul. She looked down on the floor, and answered, deliberately, "No!"

But the effort took all her strength, and when it was over she rose up totteringly, and tried to feel her way to the door. Mr. Rivers opened it, not making the least effort to detain her.

"Good-night!" she said, as she passed him. He, without even an offered hand, said "Good-night" too; and so they parted.

SAYINGS AND DOINGS.

VERY convenient is it in these scientific times to open a morning newspaper and learn from it that the "probabilities" are you may take a drive in Central Park, invite your friends to dinner, or start on a journey any time within the next twenty-four hours, without fear that a storm may overtake you or disturb your plans. But this is by no means the most important use of the American Storm Signal Service, which has now been in successful operation for several months. Its daily reports, and the "probabilities" annexed, are of great value to the commercial and agricultural interests of the country. This service is a branch of the War Department, being under the charge of General Myer, assisted by an efficient staff of officers, and a corps of about seventy-five sergeant observers, who have either been promoted from the regular army service, or specially enlisted for the purpose. They are required to pass certain examinations, and are subjected to regular army discipline. There are about forty stations of observation, located in all sections of the United States, but particularly on the seacoast and the northern lakes; and these are in direct communication with the head-quarters of the chief signal officer at Washington. Three times a day simultaneous meteorological observations are taken by well-trained observers at these stations, and telegraphed to the central office, where they are carefully examined and studied, a synopsis made out, and also the "probabilities," which are published in the principal daily newspapers, and announced by bulletin in all the Boards of Trade and Chambers of Commerce in the country. If there are indications at any station of a sudden storm, immediate warning is given by telegraph; and in general the "probabilities" of approaching weather, daily issuing from the Signal Office, have been most strikingly confirmed. The Signal Service has but just commenced its labors; but in course of time, as instruments become perfected, and experience and observation increase, it is hoped that a system of storm signals will be established along our coasts, so that violent and sudden storms or winds may be signaled to vessels by day and by night, and thus many lives and much property be saved.

Immense coal-beds have been discovered in the north of Greenland by the German arctic exploring expedition. Consequently there need be no immediate apprehension that the supply of coal in the world will be exhausted.

Butter became very scarce during the siege of Paris, and many ingenious processes were resorted to for procuring substitutes for this luxury. The article most popular was the "Mege Artificial Butter," the result of experiments made by M. Mege for utilizing the oleine and margarine obtained in the manufacture of stearine from animal fatty matter. The substance produced has the taste and consistency of butter. Until New York is besieged, however, we shall prefer butter made from genuine cream.

What a text for a sermon on simplicity is contained in the remark of a little girl of ten years: "Ma says that my sea-side trousseau will cost twelve hundred dollars!" The child who at ten is thus fitted up for fashionable life, and thinks enough about it to speak of it in such a way, will, at twenty, require ten times that sum to conceal her loss of freshness and simplicity.

"Only a penny!" How many think it not worth saving. Yet the total proceeds of a missionary society in New Hampshire, which receives individual weekly contributions of one cent from each member, has been $74,829 during the sixty years of its existence. Last year the collections came from a hundred and ten towns, and amounted to $2500. It is a woman's society; and care is taken by the officers to properly invest the money until used.

The German press has made a curious calculation in regard to the war indemnity of 5,000,000,000 of francs which the French have to pay the Prussians. According to this calculation, if a smart clerk, who could count 40,000 francs in five-franc pieces in an hour, had commenced at the age of twenty-one, and had counted eight hours a day every day, and 300 days each year, he would have reached the age of seventy-three before he had counted out this sum in silver five-franc pieces. If these 5,000,000,000 of francs were gold coin of twenty francs each, and laid flat in a line, they would extend a distance of exactly 700 German, or 2730 English miles.

A little dissolved alum is very effective in clearing muddy water. If thrown into a tub of soap-suds, the soap, curdled and accompanied by the muddy particles, sinks to the bottom, leaving the water above clear and pure. In times of scarcity of water this may be used a second time for washing clothes.

Very touching was the prayer of a tiny girl, who, being very tired and sleepy one night, was reminded by her mother to kneel down and pray before getting into bed. Folding her little hands, she said, "Please God, remember what little Polly said last night, she's so tired to-night. Amen."

An extraordinary story is told of the exploits of a young gentleman, aged eighteen months, and living at Pawtucket, Rhode Island. Being left to himself a little while one day, he was so quiet that his mother suspected some mischief. On investigation, she was horrified to behold the young man sitting by an open bureau drawer with a loaded and capped and self-cocking revolver in his hand, and he was amusing himself by ramming the muzzle of the piece down his throat, working at the trigger and hammering it upon the floor. As soon as the mother recovered from her fright she took the weapon from the child, and administered a remembrance which will doubtless deter him from a fondness for such playthings hereafter. It was almost a miracle that the child was not killed upon the spot; and we are fully of the opinion that upon the mother, or father, or some guilty adult, and not upon an innocent baby, should a severe "remembrance" be administered for the folly of leaving a loaded revolver in a bureau drawer accessible to a child.

A French statistician asserts that an average man of fifty years old has slept 6000 days, worked 6500 days, walked 800 days, amused himself 4000 days, was eating 1500 days, and was sick 500 days. He has eaten 17,000 pounds of bread, 16,000 pounds of meat, 4600 pounds of vegetables, eggs, and fish, and drank altogether 7000 gallons of liquid—namely, water, coffee, tea, beer, wine, etc. This would make a respectable lake of 300 square feet surface and three feet deep, on which a small steamboat could navigate. Very likely an average Frenchman might have spent 4000 days in amusement—before the war—but we doubt if an average American does. He does several other things, however, which are not enumerated in the above list.

A most useful branch of the Children's Aid Society is the Lord Industrial School, located at 207 Greenwich Street. The object of this institution is to clothe, feed, and train to industrious habits the destitute street children of the ward. There is a free reading-room, and a small but well-selected library. During the past year there have been 268 pupils whose proficiency has been good. At first they were very disorderly, but the patience and earnest effort of the teachers have produced gratifying results. A series of lectures on entertaining subjects was given last season, which were very successful.

It is suggested that admission fees be charged hereafter at fashionable weddings, and that they be announced after the following style: "Grandest Nuptial of the Season. The lovely —— to the manly ——. Several novelties never before presented. New music, new dresses, new properties. Tickets $1; reserved seats (middle aisle) 50 cents extra. N.B.—All persons occupying reserved seats are assured that their full names will be mentioned in the society papers."

The recent death, in Vienna, of Ludwig Lowe, a celebrated actor attached to the Austrian Court Theatre, has brought into circulation many anecdotes concerning him. On one occasion Lowe was playing Carl Moor, in Schiller's "Robbers," to a very full house in Prague. In the fourth act, where Carl arouses the robbers and cocks his pistol, by some accident the pistol was discharged, shattering the fourth and fifth fingers of the actor's hand. But he did not falter for a moment; only the convulsive quivering and contraction of his hand, from which the blood at once streamed, showed how acute was the pain. He went through the remainder of the scene with all his accustomed force and precision, and the moment that the curtain fell he fainted, overcome at last by physical pain. The surgeons who examined his hand declared that the sinews of the little finger were so badly injured that it would never again recover its natural pliancy, and put the question to him whether he would have it healed straight or crooked. "Crooked, of course," exclaimed Lowe, without a moment's hesitation. "How would I look shaking my fist at any body, in a supposed passion, and with my little finger sticking straight out in front like a unicorn's horn? It would ruin the situation entirely!" And crooked it was.

Emergencies often occur where peril is increased by panic; then the wisest course is to say and do nothing. Do not jump hastily from a carriage to which a runaway horse is attached; if a cry of "fire" is raised in a crowded theatre, keep still, and you have more chance of your life than to crowd to the doors. Waiting, in emergencies, is often the surest safety.

The agricultural prospects of France are exceedingly disheartening. A great deal of the corn sown in the north has been frozen, and a large amount has been used to supply the loss. The vines in the south have perished, or been torn up in many sections, and the oats and corn have suffered severely from the cold and high winds. The olive-trees have been so much injured in some localities that the approaching harvest is likely to prove a failure. The climax of misfortune is the outburst of the cattle plague over a considerable portion of the country.

A Hartford clairvoyant proclaims his superiority over all other soothsayers by announcing his ability to "foretell the past and present," as well as the future.

It is a startling fact that there are thousands of persons in New York who are addicted to the habitual use of opium in some form. Every druggist almost has customers whom he recognizes as opium-eaters. In many cases the habit was originally formed in consequence of taking this drug to relieve actual pain; in other cases it has been deliberately formed. When the use of opium becomes a habit, if it is not taken at frequent intervals, the most dreadful pains and spasms are experienced, the functions of nature are suspended, and the brain fearfully affected. It is a matter of extreme difficulty to break off the habit when once formed; and persisting in it causes one to lose his self-respect, his ambition, his health, his friends—every thing. All the noblest qualities are lost by a slavish use of this drug. The first step toward such a state is to be shunned.

The first Directory of New York city was issued in 1786, and contained 926 names. This Directory was quite imperfect, for at that time New York really contained 15,000 inhabitants; and the names referred to were only those of the leading families, including business men and mechanics below the City Hall Park. These names, moreover, are mostly of English and Scotch origin, instead of Dutch, as might be supposed.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 1.—Gros Grain Basque.—Back.
[See Fig. 8, Page 285.]
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 2.—Half-fitting Gros Grain Paletot.—Back.
[See Fig. 2, Page 285.]
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 3.—Ladies'-cloth Basque.
Back.—[See Fig. 12, Page 285.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. VI., Figs. 20–25.

Fig. 6.—Cashmere Basque.—Back.
[See Fig. 5, Page 285.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. IV., Figs. 10–14.

Fig. 7.—Paletot embroidered in Chain Stitch.
Back.—[See Fig. 6, Page 285.]
For pattern, design, and description see Supplement, No. III., Figs. 7–9.

Fig. 4.—Gros Grain Basque.—Front.
[See Fig. 12.]
For description see Supplement.

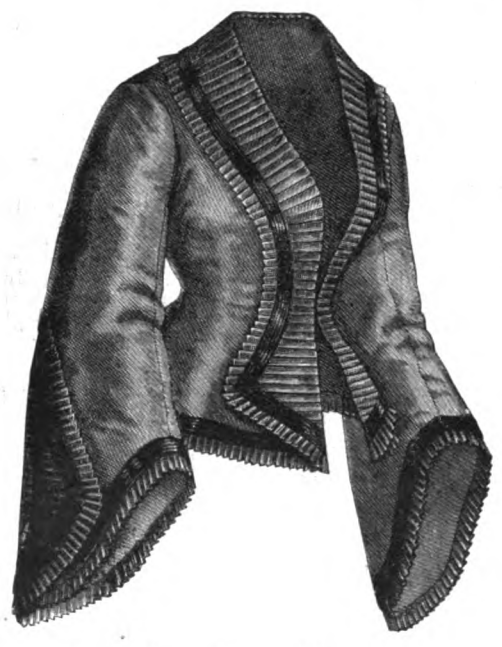

Fig. 5.—Faille Basque-Waist.—Front.
[See Fig. 14, Page 285.]
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 8.—Half-fitting Gr
Paletot.—Back.—[See
Page 285.]
For pattern and description s
No. XIV., Figs. 8-

Fig. 10.—Cashmere Paletot.—Back.—[See Fig. 11.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs. 34–39.

Fig. 9.—Silk Basque.—Back.—[See Fig. 13, Page 285.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 11.—Cashmere Paletot.—Front.—[See Fig.
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XII., Figs.

Digitized by Google

AND SUMMER
NGS.

Fig. 12.—Gros Grain Basque.—Back.—[See Fig. 4.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 13.—Summer Velours Half-fitting Paletot. Back.—[See Fig. 11, Page 285.]
For description see Supplement.

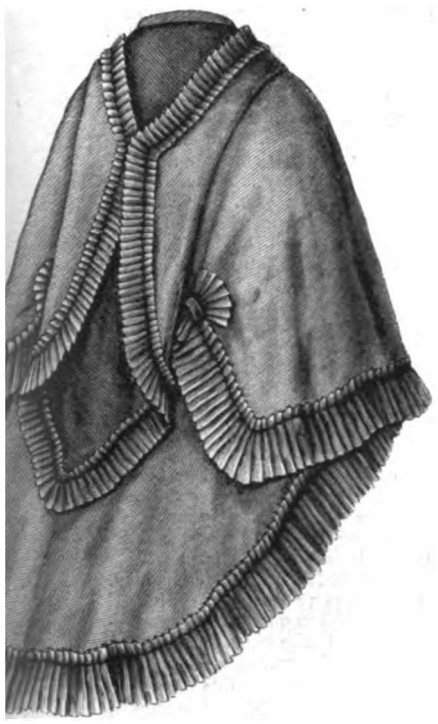

Fig. 14.—Ladies'-cloth Mantelet.
attern and description see Supplement, No. XI., Figs. 32ª, 32ᵇ, and 33.

Fig. 15.—Light Gray Cashmere Mantelet.
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 16.—Half-fitting Gros Grain Paletot. Back.—[See Fig. 9, Page 285.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. V., Figs. 15-19.

Fig. 17.—Ladies'-cloth Half-fitting Paletot. Back.—[See Fig. 4, Page 285.]
For pattern see description in Supplement.

Fig. 18.—Cashmere Sacque.—Back. [See Fig. 1, Page 285.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. XIII., Figs. 40-42.

Fig. 19.—Faille Half-fitting Paletot.—Back.—[See Fig. 10, Page 285.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 21.—Violet Barathea Mantelet.—Front.—[See Fig. 22.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5ª, 5ᵇ, and 6.

Fig. 20.—Poult de Soie Half-fitting Paletot. Back.—[See Fig. 7, Page 285.]
For description see Supplement.

Fig. 22.—Violet Barathea Mantelet. Back.—[See Fig. 21.]
For pattern and description see Supplement, No. II., Figs. 5ª, 5ᵇ, and 6.

Digitized by Google

"MY WIFE."

WHAT is my wife like? Stay and hear.
Her eyes are soft and dark and brown,
Limpid and lustrous, and as clear
As stars from heaven shining down
On this dull world. And for her size—
She's not so tall but she must raise
Her lips to mine, and I can gaze
Right downward in those loving eyes.
Her hair is like a veil of light,
All crisply golden, soft, and fair,
And falling round her shoulders white
In waving masses rich and rare.
Her hands! what artist e'er could paint?
So dainty-tipped, so small and thin;
Soft-palmed, and sweet with perfumes faint,
And white as wax the satin skin.
And then her foot is slender, small,
And arching like a serpent's crest:
The semblance likes me not at all,
So choose the simile you best
Admire. But gaze not over-bold:
My wife is but a modest girl,
As true as steel and pure as gold,
Though fair as Ocean's fairest pearl.
And can you guess her greatest charm?—
A rare one, too; but be it known,
In heart and soul and mind, my wife
Is mine—all mine, and mine alone.

A RECOMPENSE OF REWARD.

"YOU were to give yourself to me in a month," he said—"in one short month. And this parting is for so long. Agnes!"

"What, Hugh?"

"Will you give yourself to me before I go, Agnes, my beloved? It will help me in the camp and in the field to know that I have left my wife behind me, and that her prayers ascend for me to heights my own may fail to reach."

The words were spoken calmly and quietly. But underneath their stillness Agnes felt the fiery passion of the strong man's heart holding itself in leash lest it should startle or annoy her.

"It will not be the bridal of which we have dreamed, and for which we have planned," he went on, after a pause, during which she made no sign. "It will not be the bridal I should choose. But we were to have been married so soon, and life is so uncertain. I want you, Agnes. I want to feel that you are indeed mine—my very own, my wife—before I leave you. And if any thing should happen—if I should never come back—it would be a joy to me even in death to know that you bore my name. You, too, would be happier, my Agnes, and less utterly alone."

The pair of lovers who stood that evening in the bay-window of the library at Hazlehurst were not boy and girl, but man and woman; each in that early maturity of manhood and womanhood which of itself makes life seem so rich and grand and beautiful. But to them it was especially bright. Both were young; both were rich; both belonged to families who could trace back their lineage through a long line of noble ancestry. Upon both Nature had lavished her choicest gifts; and Love had anointed the eyes of both, making them to see visions and to dream dreams such as belong only to his anointed.

Her tears were dropping now like rain.

"It is all so sudden," she said.

"Every thing is sudden nowadays," he answered. "But little time is needed for this. To-morrow at ten o'clock, if you will say the word, I will be here with our good Dr. Thompson, and two or three other friends. The regiment leaves at noon. Agnes, Agnes, do not hesitate, but place your hand in mine, and tell me that you will do me this grace."

The moon came up and shone in at the bay-window, even as it shone upon Adam and Eve in Paradise. Much was said upon both sides. There were passionate words of love and entreaty; there were sighs and tears, and caresses holy as prayers. At length it was decided that at ten o'clock on the morrow Agnes Darlington should become the wife of Hugh Chester.

It was a strange, hurried bridal. Agnes gave one look at the satin robe and veil of costly lace she was to have worn a month hence. Then she smoothed down the shining folds with a tender, lingering touch, and laid them away forever. This was no time for orange blossoms; yet, with a woman's longing to make herself fair in the eyes of the man she loved, after putting on a white gown of simplest texture, she brought from the garden a handful of white rose-buds, wet with dew, and laid them where they gleamed like pearls amidst her braided locks, and rose and fell upon her breast with every beating of her heart. This done, she went down to the little library, where their vows were to be exchanged.

Her lover was already there.

"I came in advance of the others," he said. "I wanted you all to myself for a moment. Bless you for this, my Agnes, and for these," he added, laying his hand lightly upon her sleeve, and touching the roses reverently with his lips. "I hardly expected to see this fair, white vision this morning. I feared my bride would not come to me in snowy robes to-day."

"But she did, you see," she answered, the soft color coming and going. "This is our wedding-day, dear Hugh, and I could wear nothing but bridal white, even though my heart should go in mourning afterward."

He held her off at arms-length and looked at her for a full minute; then drew her to his side again.

"Pardon me," he whispered, "but I want to daguerreotype your image upon my heart and brain. I want to take it with me as it is at this moment—not a line nor a shadow altered: the soft, dark hair, the delicate oval of the face, the eyes so filled with tender light, the pure cheek's changeful glow, the mouth so firm and yet so strangely sweet. I shall carry them all with me, Agnes; and I shall see you as I see you now until God gives me back to you again. And if that day never comes," he added, solemnly, as he kissed her quivering lips, "then even thus will my memory behold you while I await your coming in the better land."

"Is beauty, then, so much to you, Hugh?"

He smiled softly. "I do not know. You are so much to me, and you and beauty are one. I can not separate or disconnect you. I can not think of you, Agnes, save as what you are. But here come the carriages!"

There was one more long, close embrace, then half a dozen friends came in, and in ten minutes the ceremony was over. At twelve o'clock Captain Chester left town with his boys in blue, and his wife turned away from half-smiling, half-tearful congratulations, to seek the quiet of her lonely room.

Days, weeks, months, a year, went by. In all this time Captain Chester's regiment had been so situated that it was impossible for him to obtain a furlough, and equally impossible for Agnes to go to him. A girl wife, a virgin bride, she had borne her husband's name a twelvemonth, yet had not looked upon his face since their bridal hour. She lived on at Hazlehurst—where she had been sole mistress ever since the death of her parents—with a widowed cousin as housekeeper and friend; lived in the memory of the past and the anticipation of the future. She worked for the soldiers; she prepared stores for the hospitals. For the rest, she reckoned time from the hour the mail came in. Her day culminated then.

One warm night in July—it was a little more than a year after her marriage—she was awakened by a slight sense of suffocation. There was a smell of smoke and burning.

She sprang from her bed and rushed to the window. All was dark, dewy, still. Not a breath stirred the maple boughs; not a ray save the faint starlight fell upon them. She listened intently. Surely she heard a slight crackling, a rustling as of invisible wings, a stealthy creeping as of fiery feet.

Just opposite the window was the door of her dressing-room. She flung it wide open. A rush of smoke blinded and stifled her, and as the current of air from without fanned the smouldering fire it leaped forth in sudden flame. There was no way of escape save through the burning room.

"Fire! fire! fire!" she shouted. Then, wrapping a woolen shawl about her head and shoulders, she darted into the dressing-room, closing the door behind her to prevent the spreading of the flames. She would have been safe in a moment, for the fire had not yet reached the hall; but above her writing-table hung a small portrait of her husband: the blue eyes turned tenderly toward her, the lips smiled in welcome. How could she leave that dear face to be the prey of the fierce, devouring flames?

She stayed her flight for just one instant; but that delay was most fateful. One long forked tongue of fire swung and wavered overhead. Then, as she reached upward, the shawl dropped from her shoulders, the loose, flowing sleeve of her night-dress fell back, and it leaped upon her like a fiery serpent.

They found her upon the hall floor wrapped in an afghan, which she had had presence of mind enough to snatch from the lounge on which it lay.

"Do not write to Captain Chester," were her first words when the burning, stinging pain restored her to consciousness; "I will write myself in a day or two."

A battle was impending. No officer nor man could leave his post without dishonor, and she would not have her hero's heart unnerved, his thoughts distracted, by anxious care for her. So, amidst all the terrible pain of the burning, when it might almost have been said of her that having eyes she saw not, and having ears she heard not, with poor scorched and blistered hands that could hardly hold the pen, day after day she wrote to him cheery little notes—bright, sparkling missives—tender, loving words that inspired and strengthened him. She told him she was not quite well, to be sure; she had burned her hand—this last as an apology for bad penmanship—but the unlucky fingers would heal in due time.

But she did not tell him—for she scarcely noticed it herself—that the doctor and her cousin, Mrs. Morgan, looked at her with strangely pitying glances. She did not tell him that the position of the mirror had been changed so that she could not see it as she lay upon her bed. She did not tell him that as her strength returned, and she began to sit up a little, it was surreptitiously removed from the chamber, and that, although she spoke of its absence time and again, no one could ever remember to bring it back.

But at length the bitter truth forced itself upon her. She was permanently disfigured—disfigured for life. When at last she exchanged entreaties for commands, and her cousin, with streaming eyes, hung the mirror in its accustomed place, Agnes Chester gazed upon the image of herself for a moment, and then sank to the floor in a dead faint. She was changed almost beyond the possibility of recognition.

"Send for Dr. Agnew; I want Dr. Agnew," she said, half an hour afterward, during which Mrs. Morgan had tried to speak a few consoling platitudes, and stopped short, struck dumb by a sudden sense of their utter feebleness.

Dr. Agnew came, with a world of trouble in his benevolent face. He saw in a moment that his patient had tasted the bitter fruit of the tree of knowledge.

"Is this the end of it?" she asked, as he approached her. "Am I to be like this all my life, doctor?" And then she covered her face with her hands, as if fain to hide it even from his kindly, sympathetic eyes.

"Why, really now, Mrs. Chester, you have taken me quite unawares! I—there, there, my poor child! do not take it so to heart. Time works wonders, you know, and perhaps—"

"Do not try to comfort me by crying peace where there is no peace, doctor," she said, quickly. "I want to know the truth—the whole truth. Is there nothing that can be done? Must I carry this dreadful face, this body of death, with me to the grave? Forget that I am a woman, and deal with me as you would deal with a man under like circumstances."

He met her now on her own ground.

"The redness, the discoloration, will disappear after a while," he said. "But the scars will remain. I have done my best, Mrs. Chester. I exhausted all my skill and all the wisdom of the schools in the endeavor to prevent the scarring. But it was all in vain. It seems like mockery to say how deeply I sorrow for this."

"Then there is no hope?" Her voice was keen and clear now—sharply strung as if by inward agony.

"Very little, I fear, my poor child. Some of the deep scars will grow less distinct after a while."

"Then may God help us both!" she cried. "But Hugh Chester shall never look upon my face again!"

She did not speak another word, but sat like a statue—cold, silent, tearless, impassive. No prayers, no entreaties moved her. She did not seem to hear them. At last Dr. Agnew and Mrs. Morgan would have carried her back to her bed. But she quietly put them away from her, walked to her couch, and laid herself down. In her inmost heart she hoped she might never rise again.

Her thoughts were not so much of herself. She felt such an unutterable pity for Hugh Chester. He had said he should take her image with him to the field; she remembered his very words, and repeated them despairingly as she lay there, with closed eyes, drawing such bitter contrasts. "Not a line nor a shadow altered." Ah! if she could only die, that he might keep her as then in his memory, while she waited beyond the stars for his coming.

But the days wore on, and she did not die. Death seldom comes to those who long for him. She still wrote daily letters to Captain Chester: that was no more than any friend might do; but she ceased to call him her husband. She dreaded the approach of the furlough for which she had prayed so long. When it came she would bid him go free. She had been his wife, in name only, for these fourteen months. Now she had changed so utterly that if he were to meet her, Agnes Darlington—she began with a strange, sad pity to think of herself by the old name again—in the streets, he would not know her; and could she hold him to the old vows? Any court would break the legal tie that bound them, and he should go out into the world unfettered.

He had said that she and beauty were one; but they were one no longer. And with solemn vows of self-renunciation the woman knelt, night after night, in the starlight, and asked God to make her firm of heart and resolute of will, that she might not bring her poor, scarred, distorted self to Hugh Chester, and claim a wife's place in his bosom.

At length there came an eager, hurried scrawl, that was hardly legible. A month's furlough at last! He must stop in New York for a day or two on business connected with the regiment. Would Agnes join him there?

The trial hour had come at last. If Hugh Chester's heart were unnerved and his arm weakened now, no great public interests were at stake; no lives hung in the balance. She must write to him at once.

And she wrote—what, no mortal save her husband ever knew. The words were sacred to himself and God; and so was the agony of those long hours during which he waited for the dawn to break. Then, contrary to Agnes's command, he started at once for Hazlehurst.

She saw him afar off, and for a moment or two her eyes dwelt lingeringly upon the form that was so inexpressibly dear. Then she called Mrs. Morgan.

"He has come," she said. "Go down to him. Bid him have mercy upon me and go away. Tell him there is nothing more to be said. My letter told him the whole story."

"But, my child," said Mrs. Morgan, hesitatingly, "he is your husband; he has a right here. I could not keep him even from this room if he chose to come."

"Do you not know Hugh Chester better than that?" she broke forth impetuously. "Do you think he would force himself into the presence of any woman? I should be secure from any approaches of his even if there were but a veil between him and me, unless I bade him come. Go down to him."

In half an hour Mrs. Morgan returned. She had been weeping vehemently. But to all her entreaties Agnes, with white, quivering lips, replied, "What is the anguish of a moment to a life-time of misery and regret? I must save him from that. Go tell him that I have said he shall never look upon my face again, and I must keep my word."

Mrs. Morgan went back to the library, where Captain Chester waited. Presently she reappeared with a little penciled note. It ran thus:

"For God's sake meet me here in this room, where we were married, this evening. Let the room be darkened if you choose, and come closely veiled if you still persist in your desperate resolve. You are my wife, Agnes, but I shall never claim you as such until you speak the word. By the very might of my love I swear to you that if you will come to me I will not touch so much as the hem of your garment. But I must speak to you."

Agnes had never left her chamber since the fire. But when Captain Chester entered the library that evening a veiled figure in black rose from a sofa in the far corner of the room and advanced a step or two. Just one word escaped the lips of each—"Agnes," "Hugh"—as their hands met for a moment.

The gas in the adjoining room was turned low, so that only the faintest glimmer of twilight pervaded the apartment where they sat. The veil was not needed as a protection even from the eager eyes of love; but I think Agnes wore it less for her own sake than for the effect it was likely to have upon Hugh.

She reasoned wisely. At first some nameless dread, some vague and undefined terror, seemed to fold Hugh Chester's senses in its stony clasp. For ten minutes he sat beside her, himself as silent, as motionless, as a statue. The very blood seemed to freeze in his veins, and the fingers that were clinched until the blood purpled beneath the nails were cold as icicles.

But at length the subtile magnetism of her presence, the old familiar spell, began to exert its wonted power in spite of the sable robes, the clinging veil, and the mystery that crouched behind it. He had said in that supreme hour of their lives, "You and beauty are one. I can not separate or disconnect you. I can not think of you, Agnes, save as what you are." But now, with that black veil isolating her and setting her apart from him in an atmosphere of her own, while it hid behind its folds he knew not what of ugliness and deformity, he felt that the charm was still there, that the sweet womanliness of the woman exalted itself in spite of all.

He kept his word. He did not touch so much as the hem of her garment. But, dropping on one knee beside her, his lips were at last unsealed. The enforced calm in which Agnes had wrapped herself was broken, and her slight form swayed to and fro like "a reed shaken by the wind."

"Stop! stop!" she cried at last; "your words torture me beyond endurance. For sweet mercy's sake leave me, Hugh, and go your way."

"But why, my beloved?" he answered, gently. "Why should I leave you? My place is here."

"You do not know—you do not understand—you do not even dream!" she cried, vehemently. "You have not the slightest idea what you are talking about. If you were to see this poor, disfigured face of mine, Hugh, your pity might draw you toward me—your manly honor might compel you to keep the vows you have taken; but your love would never survive the shock. It would be stricken dead."

"Try it, and see," he whispered, softly. "Let me look just for one instant upon the dear face you so defame. I should find love in your eyes and tenderness upon your lips, I know; and that would content me."

"No, no; I can not!" she exclaimed, piteously. "It would kill me! I should see the horror in your eyes, Hugh, however much you strove to conceal it, and I should fall dead at your feet. Not that I care to live; but, for your sake, I would not receive my death-stroke from your hands."

"Then—I will wait," he said, in his strong, manly patience. "I do not give you up, Agnes; but I bide your time. Some time you will say to me, 'I am yours, my husband, utterly, at last.' Till then I wait."

"But," she said through her tears, "I do not want you to wait. I would not bind the living to the dead. God has raised a wall between us, and sealed it with the seal of his providence. As I said in my letter, Hugh, there are divorces to be had, and—"

He interrupted her quickly, almost imperiously—

"Divorces! Do not speak that word again, Agnes. Do not pollute your lips with it. You are my wife; and, so help me God, I will be true to you so long as we both shall live!"

There was silence between the pair for many minutes. Then Captain Chester spoke again, very quietly:

"But meanwhile, Agnes, what will you do with your life? This terrible void has come into it. How will you fill it up?"

"If I were a Romanist," she said, striving to emulate his calmness, "I should seek some silent cloister, where I might hide myself for ever. But Protestantism offers no such refuge to her children. Yet there is work enough to be done. God has given me wealth, and his poor are every where."

They talked on for another hour, he bravely putting aside his own anguish for a while, and helping her to order her life, she giving him the sad joy of knowing that he was the one human being upon whom she leaned with an unfaltering trust. Then they parted—each to take up the burden of their altered lives.

Two years passed. Captain Chester had won laurels meet for the bravest; and the woman who loved him so well that she would not give herself to him read of his prowess with a beating heart, and called him by all the old heroic names that were not born to die. As for her, she had found her work. Hazlehurst rang with the voices of little children whose fathers had fallen in battle. Without the aid of convent vows Agnes had consecrated herself to the service of God and these little ones.

She had thought to wear her veil always, at home and abroad. But it repelled the children. They were awed by its seeming mystery; and at length she laid it aside. Soon she found that her wan, scarred, disfigured face was glorified in the eyes of those pure, guileless ones. They saw nothing but beauty in the tender eyes, the lips that were laden with blessing, the hands that were swift to do them good. They loved her; and in their love the hungry craving of her heart was in a measure satisfied.

The children were to have a festival. Hazle-

Digitized by Google

hurst was in a state of pleasant ferment and excitement. There was a joyous hum of preparation all over the house and through the grounds. A staging was to be erected for some tableaux, and one frolicsome urchin had perched himself upon the gate-post to watch for the coming of the carpenter who was to put it up. Presently he ran to Agnes, shouting and clapping his hands.

"Him has come! him has come!" he cried, exultingly.

"Show the man into the dining-room, Katy. The stage is to be put up at the north end."

The servant returned in a moment.

"Will you plase to go to him yourself, Mrs. Chester?" she said. "It is asking for you he is; and he's in the library, mem." Then, as her mistress left the room, she added: "Faith, and I don't belave it is the carpenter at all, at all. It's the look of a praist he has or a gintleman."

Agnes went into the library, with a long, trailing spray of clematis in her hand, and a little song fluttering from her lips. In spite of all, she was happy that day. The gladness of childhood is contagious; and none of God's creatures can be always wretched, in this world of flowers and bird-songs and starlights, unless they are willfully so.

The blinds were closed, and the room seemed dark to eyes filled with the sunshine without. A man stood in the bay-window, with his back toward her.

As she approached him, with a light, rapid step, he turned with outstretched hands.

"Agnes! Agnes!" he cried.

She gasped for breath; she turned; she would have fled from the room, but sudden faintness overcame her. She would have fallen if two strong arms had not caught her, and placed her upon the broad, cushioned seat beneath the window. When she opened her eyes Hugh Chester knelt beside her.

She covered her face with her hands, while the purple torrent surged up from her heart, flooding neck and brow; then struggled wildly to escape. But this time he held her fast.

"Wait!" he said; "wait! Oh, Agnes, my love, my wife, do not turn away from me—do not tear your dear hand from mine! You do not need to hide your face from my sight. Look at me for one instant. Do you not see that I am—blind?"

With a sharp cry she glanced upward. The blue eyes into which she gazed were as clear, as liquid, as of old; but there was no gleam of recognition in their depths, no quick answering of soul to soul.

Then, with a sob that came from the inmost recesses of her being, she flung herself upon his breast, and wound her arms about his neck.

"Blind, blind, Hugh!" she cried. "Blind! O God! is this my punishment?"

"Nay, nay, my beloved," he answered, softly; "not your punishment, but my 'recompense of reward' for all these years of waiting."

THE METHODIST BOOK CONCERN.

WE call attention to the following very important and suggestive letter of Judge REYNOLDS, which we copy from the New York Times. It sets forth very clearly the extraordinary conduct of the opponents of Dr. LANAHAN in the matter of the alleged irregularities in the Methodist Book Concern. Since the trial of Dr. LANAHAN was suddenly interrupted he has been the object of a series of most offensive articles, and the attempt to prejudice public opinion against him is manifest. Such a course is as impolitic as it is scandalous. From the first moment that Dr. LANAHAN presented his charges the conduct of the managers of the Book Concern has certainly been suspicious. His statements were simple and direct. He was right, or he was wrong. He took the full responsibility of the disclosure, and if he were shown to have been wrong, the consequences would have fallen heavily, and only upon himself.

What, then, was the obvious and honorable course? What would any honest man, conscious of unjust accusation, have done? He would have challenged the most prompt, peremptory, and thorough investigation. He would have said, "Here are my books; scrutinize them." And he would, above all things, have protested against evasion and equivocation of every kind. Dr. LANAHAN has been always ready to substantiate his charges; and if to-day nothing has been definitely ascertained—if now, toward the close of the second year since his statement was made, the inquiry has been postponed, and the whole subject confused in the public mind, it is not his fault; nor is he to blame for the general impression in the country that the subject will not bear honest investigation.

As we said when the first publication was made, the honor and interest of the denomination imperatively require the most public and conclusive action—and if the confidence of many of the most faithful Methodists has been shaken, if many of them to-day reflect sadly upon all the circumstances of this affair, it is not because Dr. LANAHAN has made charges, but because those charges have not been disproved, and because there is evidently more disposition to abuse him than to show that his charges are unfounded.

The present difficulty is the choice of accountants to examine the books, and Judge REYNOLDS truly says in his letter: "If there is nothing wrong in the Book Concern, any number of men of our selection can not find it, especially when under the control of a chief in whom the other party has such confidence. It is much easier to conceal than to create. Truly Dr. CURRY was right when he said that to outsiders 'it looks very much like a game how not to do it.'" That is, unquestionably, the general verdict. The simple way is the shortest and best; and the Book Concern has made a fatal mistake in the method it has chosen to pursue.

LETTER FROM JUDGE REYNOLDS IN DEFENSE OF DR. LANAHAN.

To the Editor of the New York Times:

On returning home, after an absence of several days, I find an editorial article in the Christian Advocate of this week, on that now hackneyed subject, "The Methodist Book Concern," which contains such an attack on Dr. LANAHAN and myself as to call for some measure of self-defense. And as it appears that the Sub-committee have adjourned sine die, this seems to be the proper time to correct some of the many misstatements which have, within a few weeks, appeared in that paper, or which bear internal evidence of having been inspired from that quarter. This is not the occasion to speak on the merits of the main question, except to remark, in passing, that when the trial of Dr. LANAHAN was so abruptly ended it was generally supposed that the Sub-committee then constituted and the accountants to be selected were to investigate complaints which had been made, and were still adhered to, as to alleged fraudulent "business arrangements and methods;" but now comes the editorial writer, with Dr. CURRY's indorsement, and says that no such thing was intended by the Book Committee. On the question of their intention I believe him, for this writer, though not one of the Committee, is in a position to know of their purposes; but it leaves the Committee in the sorry plight of having torn out the very vitals of the whole investigation, and then called one of the Bishops of the Church, and three of their own number, to convene in New York from distant points, and canvass days and nights over the selection of accountants, all for the purpose, not of satisfying the Church as to the truth of Dr. LANAHAN's charges, but simply to inspect the forms of business under an administration now so near its end. The public will not justify all this expenditure of time and money for any such puerile object as this.

But my present business is mainly with the dealings between this Sub-committee and Mr. FANCHER and myself. When they first met, they had before them the names of quite a number of accountants, highly recommended, and in every way uncommitted; and, although they proposed to have three, they reported only one for approval, naming for the position of chief accountant a gentleman whose integrity and general capacity I did not question, but who, some years since, had, in a report made by him, pronounced the books correct. He was also to select his assistants. On inquiry, I was informed by disinterested persons that his relations were such as to raise still stronger objections to his being placed in a position to control the investigation. This must not be understood as implying any imputation upon his personal character, but it compelled me to refuse concurrence in his appointment. I shortly after sent a note to the Sub-committee, suggesting that each side in the controversy should name an equal number of accountants, say three or four, leaving the Committee to select one from each list, and also to appoint some well-known gentleman of high standing as chief accountant.

The Committee adjourned, and "made no sign" in response, except to propound as a law question, to Mr. FANCHER and myself, whether, in the investigation, the Book Committee had a right to go back of 1868, the time of their appointment. This was answered in the affirmative by myself—I have never heard how by Mr. FANCHER; but the raising of the question by those representing the majority of the Book Committee was quite significant.

The editorial in the next Advocate, after the adjournment of the Sub-committee, contained a pointed attack on Dr. LANAHAN and myself, in reply to which I sent a brief note, explaining the grounds of my action, with as little particularity as possible, and giving no names; but this Dr. CURRY refused to publish, though it is due to him to say that his refusal was on the ground of his hating such personal matters. The article last alluded to throws great light upon the inability of the Committee to fix on other names. The Doctor (CURRY) says: "Respecting the other names considered by the Committee, we only know that none of them received the approval of all parties concerned." Neither Dr. LANAHAN nor his friends were consulted, so it is easy to see who were the parties concerned, who could not be suited with any body, but the only one named.

Now, to come directly to the article in the Advocate of this date. It is stated that the Sub-committee selected a Western gentleman (one formerly connected with the Western Book Concern, it should have stated) as chief accountant, "that Bishop SCOTT was ready to approve him, and so was Mr. FANCHER;" and that two of the Committee voted to nominate two others as assistant accountants. The writer must have known that the committee, as such, and as a whole (by what vote I am not informed), nominated all three, and that the same paper contained the three names, without distinction, except that one was chief and the others assistants. Bishop SCOTT was "ready to approve" all three. I did give such approval on condition that the selection should be taken as so made up; but Mr. FANCHER refused, objecting, as he says, to "approving of them by the bulk, and insisted on the propriety of judging each by his separate merits." He states no other reason in his card. Why, then, did he not pass upon the separate merits of each? What is the point of this objection, except that if I had unconditionally approved of all three "by the bulk," as I was asked to do by the Committee, Mr. FANCHER could have selected one to suit his clients, as he did? and that would have been one step gained to their side, after which the other two would be easy in the same direction. The article goes on to say that the next day the Committee again made unanimous choice of the gentleman from the West. I am told on good authority that his name was not again acted upon. How it helps the matter, if it did, it is difficult to see. I was telegraphed to know if I approved of Mr. K——, and responded again, as I had before, in writing. The writer, from these facts, says that both adjournments of the Committee were occasioned by the refusal of Dr. LANAHAN'S counsel, and that "he will not permit his proofs to see the light unless he can select two out of three of the examiners," and this, too, although he has not yet named one.

To call this pettifogging is a mere euphemism.

Learning for the first time, from the article in question, that Mr. FANCHER had proposed to members of the Committee, that either of the two gentlemen whom he had approved be appointed chief accountant, and that, joined with him, should be one accountant chosen by the Agent (Dr. CARLTON), and another by the Assistant Agent, Dr. LANAHAN immediately notified Dr. CARLTON, in writing, that he would accept Mr. FANCHER'S proposition, or that Dr. CARLTON might name both the chief and one assistant, Dr. LANAHAN to name the other. At the latest advices no answer has been made.

Why has it been impossible, after all this labor, to find only two men this side of the Rocky Mountains who could be accepted by Mr. FANCHER? Did not Bishop SCOTT urge the Committee to remain and nominate others? The cheap threat at the end of the article is certainly ill-advised. If there is nothing wrong in the Book Concern, any number of men of our selection can not find it, especially when under the control of a chief in whom the other party has such confidence. It is much easier to conceal than to create. Truly Dr. CURRY was right when he said that to outsiders "it looks very much like a game how not to do it."

It should be known that since the adjournment of the Book Committee in January Dr. CARLTON has kept an extra accountant employed upon the books, under his private instructions, which certainly seems contrary to all ideas of propriety. Dr. LANAHAN, it is true, was permitted to examine the books, and take abstracts therefrom, preparatory to his trial; but now, if the books are on trial, they are to be tested—not by the employés of the Agent. During all this controversy Dr. LANAHAN has been compelled, week after week, to read violent attacks upon his conduct and motives, in the very paper which bears his name as one of the publishers, and he can not speak in defense through its columns, though even the book-keeper under him is permitted to add his voice to the general din. His zeal, however, is according to knowledge; for, although Dr. CARLTON had repeatedly refused to raise his salary, saying they could not afford to pay more than he was receiving, the books show that on the 30th day of November, 1870—after the suspension of Dr. LANAHAN, and when his trial was approaching—this book-keeper—GRANT by name—received an addition of $2000 to his personal property by an increase of salary, $1000 of which was conveniently spread back over the year 1869. This sudden appreciation of his services is very suggestive to the reflecting mind.

G. G. REYNOLDS.

BROOKLYN, Thursday, April 6, 1871.

STARTING FOR THE FANCY BALL.

See Illustration on page 284.

THE advent of Easter is marked by the resumption of the gayeties that had been interrupted for a season by the austerities of Lent. Masquerade parties flourish again for a brief season, and ladies and gentlemen give reins to their fancy by assuming, for the moment, what character they please, and essaying the rôle of actor on the mimic stage of the ball-room. Here we have a party preparing to set out for a scene of this kind. The handsome courtier crossing the hand of the pretty gypsy girl, the doughty knight, and the fair peasant girl, are evidently the admiration of the assembled household, and are enjoying a foretaste of the sensation which they expect to make at the ball. Let us hope that their dreams may be realized, and that they may find the fiction of seeming what they are not a pleasing one for this evening at least.

AMSTERDAM HOUSES.

ALTHOUGH many houses in Amsterdam, as they at present stand, are of much older date, a very great number of them are about two hundred or two hundred and fifty years old, the time of Dutch pre-eminence, when Van Tromp, or Tromp simply, as they call him, swept the seas, and the Dutch were the carriers of the world. Guilders were plentiful, and stocks there were none. The merchant did not know what to do with the profits of his private fleet; for land was not to be bought for money. Some buried the coin under the hearth-stone; some were glad to get one per centum on loan, and all seem to have lavished countless sums in building and adorning their houses. A Hollander was asked the other day what the city palace in Amsterdam cost in the building; he laughingly answered (and it is quite true, by-the-way), "They were so ashamed of their own extravagance that they burned the accounts, and so no one knows!"

A substantial Amsterdammer's house, plain only on the outside, is resplendent with white marble and glorious with carved work within. The walls of the chief rooms have often been painted by first-rate artists, and Italian sculptors must have had a fine time of it in the wealthy city, for their hand is to be seen on cornice and balustrade in many a simple merchant's house.

The British-born bow-window is not often to be seen even in the country, and the more antique oriel seems never to have been adopted by post-Reformation architects. But Mevrouw is not without the power of seeing up and down the street at will as she sits at her work; for by the little spiegelen—spy-mirrors—suspended upon strong metal-work on either side of her sitting-room window, she can calmly survey, herself out of view, the passing crowd and scene below.

The basement-floor is always raised a few feet above the surface of the ground, to steal a little height in air for the kitchen, the floor of which is even then a foot or two below the level of the underlying ooze, but, of course, ooze-tight with cement—Bettinji, the cook, is stout and healthy notwithstanding—and ascending from the street by a flight of five or six steps, a very solid door admits you to a long and narrow passage, lofty and marbled on either side, and lighted by glass above the door. The drawing-room, or not unusually the counting-house, with this passage, takes up the entire width of the house.

The first thought any one has on entering any Dutch chamber, a drawing-room not excepted, is, "How very long!" the next, "How very bare!" Every thing is handsome, but there is so little of it. No lounging-chairs, no round table with knickknackeries; a cabinet with closed glass doors, of course, chairs placed in formal rows, a handsome chandelier, a stove-place, and that is all. You take a seat, and perhaps touch the wall with your elbow—lo! it yields to the touch. Wall-paper is a misnomer in Holland. Paper-hangings is the proper word. These sometimes are of oil-paintings on canvas, sometimes of paper stretched on canvas fastened on light wooden frames, which can be taken down bodily when their gay coverings have to be renewed. Evidently these are the next descendants from tapestry and arras. The walls may be damp, and very probably are so, but then "they assume a virtue, if they have it not;" for one's eyes are never offended in Holland by dripping, smeared, washed-out wall-paper.

The bedrooms are also but scantily furnished, and, except in guest-chambers, one does not often see a chest of drawers or a wardrobe. A foreign visitor, indeed, is apt to be at a loss what to do with his clothes until he discovers that doors, cunningly concealed, open into cupboards all about the room. By-the-way, Mevrouw always hangs her dresses in these; she seldom folds them in a drawer.

At the top of the house, both in town and country, is invariably to be found a spacious laundry, extending, in fact, over the whole area of the house. In this the linen is stored in presses, and the clothing of the past season, winter or summer, all duly turned inside out, hangs on pegs all about. Here, twice in the year, Mevrouw holds her grand saturnalia. Without doubt the most important item in a Dutch girl's dowry is linen. The quantity she thinks necessary for her own person and for household purposes is enormous. But then it should be known that she "washes" (the linen, of course) but twice in the year. Cuffs, collars, and muslins, she says, must be washed often; but all other things are flung for a time into huge buck-baskets, big enough for half a dozen Falstaffs to hide in; indeed, these are astounding baskets, and when full will weigh four or five hundred-weight. Every house has a block and pulley firmly fixed to the ornamented coping of the roof, which, indeed, is purposely constructed to carry this useful machine, and forms a noticeable feature in the architecture of all the Dutch houses; and by means of the block these huge baskets are readily lifted to and from the laundry, and furniture or heavy articles of any kind to the other stories through the windows. A visitor for the first time may see with amused bewilderment that particularly lumbering trunk of his wife's, which has been the despair of railway porters throughout his journey, whipped up by invisible hands to a height of sixty or seventy feet in no time, and disappear through a bedroom window. The clothes are simply rough-washed in the country, and when sent back all the females in the house set to work for a good fortnight to mangle and iron, starch and crimp; and you may be sure that every bit of clothing a Dutch young lady of the middle classes is wearing has thus been got up by her own fair hands. The original outlay in linen is no doubt large, but the cheap mode of washing pays good interest for the money.

One thing is very remarkable in a Dutchman's house. You never see open book-shelves, and a stray book but seldom. The fact is, in the first place, that all books and personal property are stored away in the treasury cupboard in the bedroom; and next, Paterfamilias, while exercising a rigid censorship over all light and heavy literature dispersed about the house, keeps his own most carefully under lock and key. The books he has are not many; for Holland can scarcely be said to have a literature; and, great linguist though he be, with a familiar acquaintance with at least two, sometimes three or four, modern languages besides his own, he contents himself with a few well-bound standard works in these; and for light reading, is there not the newspaper? Besides, as office hours are generally from nine to nine, the Dutchman has not much time for reading, and gets but little out of books when he has once laid them aside after leaving school, and entered upon the realities of life.

Digitized by Google

STARTING FOR THE FANCY BALL.—DRAWN BY W. L. SHEPPARD.—[SEE PAGE 288.]

Digitized by Google

DIAGRAMS OF SPRING AND SUMMER WRAPPINGS ON DOUBLE PAGE, FIGS. 1-14.

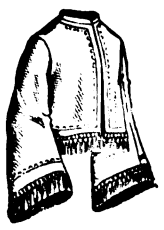

FIG. 1.—[See Fig. 18 on Double Page.]

FIG. 2.—[See Fig. 2 on Double Page.]

FIG. 3.—[See Fig. 8 on Double Page.]

FIG. 4.—[See Fig. 17 on Double Page.]

FIG. 5.—[See Fig. 6 on Double Page.]

FIG. 6.—[See Fig. 7 on Double Page.]

FIG. 7.—[See Fig. 20 on Double Page.]

Agrafes, Borders, etc., for trimming Paletots, Talmas, etc., Figs. 1-12.

THESE trimmings are made partly with silk twist, and twisted and flat black silk cord in passementerie, and partly crocheted with black saddler's silk.

Fig. 1.—PASSEMENTERIE AGRAFE. To make this agrafe, which the illustration shows reduced to two-thirds of the original size, use black silk twist of three sizes. Work, first, the two rosette-like figures on which the leaves lie. For the upper round figure sew the medium-sized cord together in coils, so that a flat round part, an inch in diameter, is formed, with a hole in the middle three-tenths of an inch in diameter. Surround this part with a piece of closely covered gimp-like cord of the same size, and with the coarsest twisted cord above referred to. Sew the ends of these cords together, and cut them off close to the joining seam. The under oval figure is made like the round figure just referred to, but is two inches long and an inch and three-fifths wide, with an oval hole three-fifths of an inch long in the middle. With one (the under) lengthwise edge of the figure join a gimp-like border of the finest twisted cord. Besides this fasten to the under side of the figure five tassels of cord and saddler's silk four inches and a half long. At the upper lengthwise edge join the oval figure with the round figure previously made. Then pass the leaves through the middle holes of the figures according to the illustration.

FIG. 10.—[See Fig. 9 on Double Page.]

FIG. 8.—[See Fig. 1 on Double Page.]

FIG. 9.—[See Fig. 16 on Double Page.]

FIG. 11.—[See Fig. 13 on Double Page.]

FIG. 13.—[See Fig. 9 on Double Page.]

FIG. 12.—[See Fig. 3 on Double Page.]

FIG. 14.—[See Fig. 5 on Double Page.]

FIG. 2.—PASSEMENTERIE AGRAFE.—TWO-THIRDS SIZE.

Each leaf is an inch long, and three-fifths of an inch wide, and is made of the finest twisted silk cord, which is sewed together in coils, as shown by the illustration. Through the small hole at the middle of the leaf pass a piece of flat plain cord two inches and two-fifths long (this flat cord forms the vein of the leaf), and fasten the end to the under side of the leaf. Join each three leaves as shown by the illustration, pass the stems through the hole at the middle of the figure (see illustration), and fasten the still free ends of the stems to the under side of the agrafe. Fasten the leaves on the outer side of the agrafe in the position shown by the illustration.

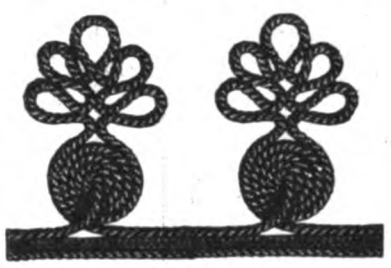

FIG. 4.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. FULL SIZE.

Fig. 2.—PASSEMENTERIE AGRAFE. For this agrafe make, first, three single leaves, pointed at the top, with black silk cord sewed together in coils. The illustration, which shows the agrafe reduced to one-half of original size, plainly shows the position of the coils. Surround each leaf with coarse twisted silk cord, sew the three leaves together according to the illustration, and cover the under ends with a rosette made of loops with fine black silk cord. This rosette at the same time covers the seam made by sewing on two black silk tassels, as shown by the illustration.

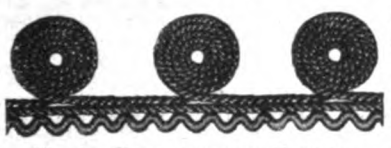

FIG. 6.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. FULL SIZE.

Fig. 3.—CROCHET AGRAFE. This agrafe consists of three leaves and a rosette crocheted with black saddler's silk. For each leaf work with black saddler's silk a foundation of 9 ch. (chain stitches), and on this crochet, not in the usual manner, going from right to left, but from left to right, 6 sl. (slip stitch) on the last 6 foundation stitches, passing over the first 3 foundation stitches. Now work 1 ch., then on the other side of the foundation 6 sl. on the first 6 foundation st. This completes the first round worked on both sides of the foundation. 2d round.—Turn the work, crochet 3 ch., 1 sl. on each st. of the preceding round, but at the end of the round leave the last st. of the preceding round unnoticed; on the 1 ch. at the middle of the preceding round (the under end of the leaf) work 1 sl., then 1 ch. Work 20 rounds more like the second round, but in the last 6 rounds do not work the 1 ch. at the under end of the leaf. When three leaves are worked in this manner sew them together as shown by the illustration, and on the under end fasten the rosette referred to. Work the latter as follows: Lay the working thread over the index finger twice as a loop, crochet on this loop 15 sc. (single crochet), after each sc. 7 ch., and draw the loop together so that a hole three-tenths of an inch in diameter is formed. Now work the second round.—1 sc. on each sc. of the preceding round, after each sc. 1 ch. The ch. scallops of the preceding round must lie on the stitches of the second round. 3d round.—1 sc. on each st. of the preceding round, after each sc. 7 ch. Work the fourth round like the second round. This completes the rosette. For each tassel make a strand of the requisite thickness six inches and four-fifths long with black saddler's silk, double the strand, and work on the upper end (fold) with 3 sc., so that the threads are closely connected. In connection with the last sc. work 12 ch., then, going back and passing over the first st., 11 sc. on the remaining 11 st., after which fasten the thread and cut it off. For the head of the tassel make a foundation of 8 ch., close it in a ring with 1 sl., and work on this, always going forward from left to right, 11 rounds without widening; the greater width at the under end is obtained by gradually working more loosely. Finally, fasten the working thread and cut it off; draw the crochet part over the tassel and sew it on. Join both tassels with the rosette, as shown by the illustration, and fasten the leaves on the rosette with a few stitches.

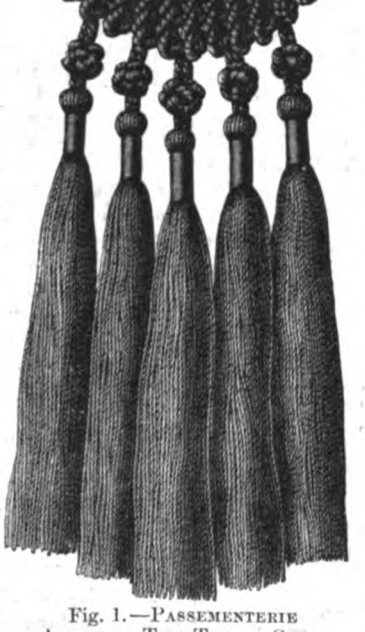

FIG. 1.—PASSEMENTERIE AGRAFE.—TWO-THIRDS SIZE.

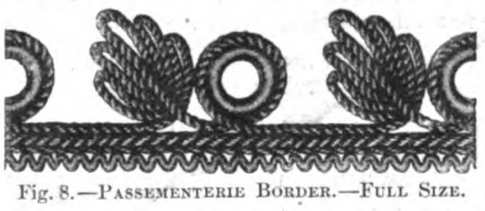

FIG. 8.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.—FULL SIZE.

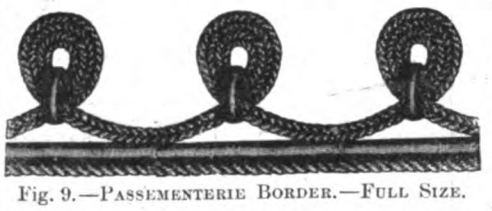

FIG. 9.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.—FULL SIZE.

FIG. 10.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. FULL SIZE.

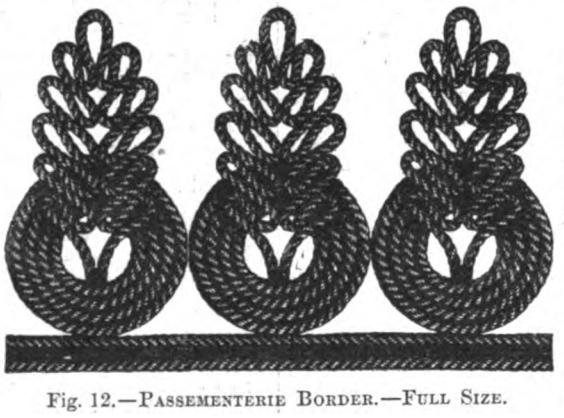

FIG. 12.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER.—FULL SIZE.

Fig. 4.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. This border is made with twisted black silk cord and black silk braid, as shown by the full-sized section of the border given on the illustration. Work the single figures in connection.

Fig. 5.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. This border is made with fine black silk cord and black silk soutache, as shown by the full-sized section of the border given in the illustration.

Fig. 5.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. FULL SIZE.

Fig. 6.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. This border is made with fine twisted silk cord and silk serpentine gimp, as shown by the full-sized section of the border given by the illustration.

Fig. 7.—CROCHET BORDER. This border is worked in single crochet with black saddler's silk over a foundation of fine black dress cord. Work, first, for one of the three-leaved figures of the border, 16 sc. over the insertion, so that the latter is covered, fasten to the first sc. with 1 sl., again work 16 sc. over the foundation, fasten with 1 sl. to the first of these 16 sc., again work 16 sc. over the foundation, and first fasten with 1 sl. to the first of the 16 st., then to the first st. of the first leaf; then, going further, work for the next scallop 24 sc. over the foundation, then again a three-leaved figure as before, and so on. In working the first leaf of each three-leaved figure, fasten the middle of the leaf to the middle of the third leaf of the preceding figure with 1 sl. The under side of the crochet work is the right side of the border.

FIG. 3.—CROCHET AGRAFE. TWO-THIRDS SIZE.

FIG. 7.—CROCHET BORDER. FULL SIZE.

Fig. 8.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. The under edge of the border is formed with serpentine silk gimp, plain gimp, and fine twisted cord. With the latter small leaves of black silk cord are joined, which are worked in connection with each other and with the rings between the leaves, as shown by the full-sized section of the border given by the illustration. For these rings take small rings of card-board, cover them closely with black silk, and, after completing each leaf, surround them with the silk cord referred to. Small brass rings may be used instead of card-board.

Fig. 9.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. The under edge of this border consists of plain flat silk cord with which coarse twisted silk cord is joined. With this under edge two pieces of fine silk cord, which are connected, are joined; these are arranged in scallops and double loops as shown by the illustration, which gives a full-sized section of the border. Each double loop is held together with a band of flat silk cord.

Fig. 10.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. This border consists of four piece of coarse twisted silk cord, two of which, in connection with black silk braid, form the under edge of the border; the two other pieces are arranged in scallops, and edged with fine twisted silk cord, which is partly sewed on plain and partly in scallops (see the full-sized section of the border given by the illustration). The braid at the under edge is laid in a small loop between every two scallops.

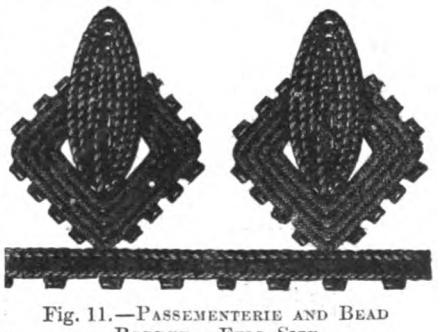

FIG. 11.—PASSEMENTERIE AND BEAD BORDER.—FULL SIZE.

Digitized by Google

Fig. 11.—PASSEMENTERIE AND BEAD BORDER. This border is made with woven and twisted black silk cord, and ornamented with bugles. The full-sized section of the border given by the illustration shows how to work the border.

Fig. 12.—PASSEMENTERIE BORDER. For this border work the rings shown by the illustration, which gives a full-sized section of the border, working each ring separately with coarse twisted silk cord. For the under edge of the border sew two pieces of fine cord, which are connected by means of soutache, to the under side of the rings, and fasten in each ring a leaf-like figure made of fine twisted cord. Where the rings meet they are sewed together.

ANSWERS TO CORRESPONDENTS.

JENNIE.—Flounce your green silk with the over-skirt, and wear a white muslin polonaise. Read in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., a description of a French gray silk in two shades. If you can not afford Valenciennes, use pleatings of white muslin under fringe for your handsome gray silk.

MRS. M. G.—New York Fashions of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., will furnish you a model for your lavender silk. The same paper shows an illustration of a suit pretty for grenadine. We do not remember the suit you refer to. You should use thick strong silk for lining your black grenadine waist, and it will not require an extra lining. Many dress-makers line all corsages with silk instead of drilling. Do not line a buff linen waist. Use the postilion or not, according to your fancy. The hair-line silks are much used for making spring suits.—The indexes are sent on receipt of stamps.

MRS. T. M.—Old ladies wear black silks, alpacas, or cashmeres made with single skirts and basques for the house, and postilion-polonaises for the street, like that illustrated in Bazar No. 44, Vol. III. Their bonnets are cottage gypsies of soft straw or of black Brussels net, with narrow gros grain ribbon trimmings, ostrich tips, and flowers.

SAVOY.—The Worth dress without over-skirt, and with a single deep flounce widely faced with dark brown, will suit your mother. Read White Dresses in New York Fashions of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV. A five-inch flounce of perpendicular tucks around the skirt, headed by a cluster of five or six half-inch horizontal tucks, trims muslin petticoats.—We know of no book on dancing that would be of real assistance to you.

PLUM AND GRAY.—The plum-colored silk for an elderly lady will look well made with the Worth basque and skirt without an over-skirt. A single deep flounce on the skirt, narrower ruffle on the basque. Get navy blue silk for an under-skirt to wear with the gray silk over dress.

No. 22, MEMPHIS.—You will find all the suggestions you want about dresses in Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV., and in No. 16. Make muslin wrappers by pattern of the illustration in Bazar No. 5, Vol. IV. The polonaise costumes described in Bazar No. 16, made with shorter skirts, are what you want for walking suits.

MILWAUKEE.—Use bands of gray silk on the basque and over-skirt of your gray dress, and alternate ruffles of silk and the fabric on the skirt.

GUITAR.—Girls of fifteen wear basques buttoned in front. Your sample is Japanese poplin, and not of much account, we fear.

CARRIE.—Checked silks now cost from $1 25 to $2 a yard. It would be safe to order it by express from any of the furnishing houses quoted in our columns.

MRS. J. B. A.—Your lace is probably llama, or one of the coarse French laces worn five or six years ago. It can not be fine, or you would have had to pay as much for a yard as you paid for your whole mantle.

MISS P.—For summer silks read New York Fashions of last Number, and of Bazar No. 15, Vol. IV.

MOTHER.—Make a loose Gabrielle, braided, for your child of one year.

J. R. B.—We have no cut paper patterns of uneven sizes. An inch difference in the bust measure is easily remedied in cutting.

E. B. B.—Your sample is the poorest Japanese poplin. Make with basque and over-skirt, and trim with silk bands.

C. A. C.—Answers to your questions are comprised in the New York Fashions of the Bazars of the last three or four weeks. We have not room here to repeat the replies.

A NEW SUBSCRIBER.—Divide your Spanish flounce in two. Trim your skirt with these ruffles, and drape over black silk.

THE Inebriate's Hope! C. C. BEERS, M.D., 12 E. Twelfth St., New York, permanently cures the worst cases of Intemperance. Call or send stamp for Evidence. Is harmless.—[Com.]

THOSE who desire a good article to restore gray hair to its youthful color, we would recommend to purchase Hall's Vegetable Sicilian Hair Renewer, a most excellent and valuable preparation. Sold by all Druggists.—[Com.]

PURGE OUT THE MORBID HUMORS OF THE BLOOD by a dose or two of AYER'S PILLS and you will have clearer heads as well as bodies.—[Com.]

COPYING WHEEL.—By the means of the newly-invented Copying Wheel patterns may be transferred from the Supplement with the greatest ease. This Wheel is equally useful for cutting patterns of all sorts, whether from other patterns or from the garments themselves. For sale by Newsdealers generally; or will be sent by mail on receipt of 25 cents.

ADVERTISEMENTS.

FOR MOTH PATCHES, FRECKLES,

And TAN, use PERRY'S MOTH AND FRECKLE LOTION. It is reliable and harmless. Sold by Druggists every where. Prepared only by Dr. B. C. PERRY, Dermatologist, 49 Bond St., New York.

MAYHON, DALY, & CO.,

IMPORTERS AND DEALERS IN

SILKS, RIBBONS, LACES, STRAW GOODS,

MILLINERY ARTICLES, WHITE GOODS, EMBROIDERIES, GLOVES,

AND

FANCY GOODS,

75 & 77 WABASH AVE., CHICAGO.

☞ ALL ORDERS entrusted to our care will be promptly filled and shipped the day they are received.

AITKEN & MILLER,
BROADWAY, COR. OF 18TH ST.,
Are now offering in their Retail Department a New Importation of French Goods, comprising
CRAPE DE CHINE SCARFS, and RICH TWILLED SILK SCARFS, Tasseled Ends, in all the New Colors;
Also, CRAPE DE CHINE by the Yard, in all Desirable Shades;
Novelties in JET GOODS,
STRAW HATS, FLOWERS,
EMBROIDERED AND LACE SETS, LACE JACKETS AND SHAWLS;
and our usual assortment of
RICH RIBBONS AND SASHES.
HANDSOME TRIMMED BONNETS AND HATS in our Retail Millinery Department.

GEO. A. PRINCE & CO.

Organs & Melodeons.

The Oldest, Largest, and Most Perfect Manufactory in the United States.

47,000

Now in Use.

No other Musical Instrument ever obtained the same popularity.

☞ Send for Price-Lists.

Address BUFFALO, N. Y., Or CHICAGO, ILL.

A REDUCTION IN PRICES.

G. L. KELTY & COMPANY
722 & 724 Broadway.
New Importations of
SWISS LACE CURTAINS,
FRENCH GUIPURE CURTAINS,
NOTTINGHAM CURTAINS,
FURNITURE COVERINGS,
and CURTAIN MATERIALS.
BEST SCOTCH HOLLAND SHADES,
with Patent Self-Acting Fixtures.

SARATOGA SPRINGS REMEDIAL INSTITUTE. New improvements in modern and elegant style. Drs. STRONG, its proprietors, are graduates of the Medical Dep't of New York University, and give special attention to LUNG, FEMALE, and CHRONIC Diseases.
Among its special appliances are the Turkish, Sulphur Air, Russian, and Electro-Thermal Baths, Equalizer or Vacuum Treatment, Swedish Movement Cure, Hydropathy, &c.
Indorsed by Bishop Simpson, Prof. Taylor Lewis, LL.D., Rev. T. L. Cuyler, D.D., Robert Carter, Esq., &c.
For description of our appliances, diseases treated, references, &c., send for Circulars to Drs. S. S. & S. E. STRONG, Saratoga Springs, New York.

LADY'S TROUSSEAU "B"

FOR $200.

6 Muslin Chemises	@ $2 50..	$15 00
6 Linen "	@ 5 00..	30 00
6 Pairs of Muslin Drawers	@ 2 00..	12 00
6 " Linen "	@ 3 00..	18 00
3 Plain Cotton Skirts	@ 2 50..	7 50
3 Tucked " "	@ 3 50..	10 50
3 Muslin Night Dresses	@ 5 00..	15 00
3 Tucked Cambric Night Dresses	@ 6 00..	18 00
3 Embr'd " " Tucked Yokes	@ 10 00..	30 00
2 Flannel Skirts	@ 6 00..	12 00
2 Corset Covers	@ 4 00..	8 00
2 Dressing Sacques	@ 4 00..	8 00
1 Delaine Robe de Chambre		16 00
		$200 00

The whole or any single article of the above Outfit may be had upon application, or will be sent, C. O. D., by Express. Every article is made in the best manner, and from the best materials. Complete directions for Self-Measurement sent by mail, if desired.

LADIES' AND CHILDREN'S OUTFITTING DEPARTMENT,

LORD & TAYLOR,

895, 897, 899, & 901 Broadway, cor. of Twentieth Street,
255, 257, 259, & 261 Grand St., cor. of Chrystie St., N. Y.

SPRING STYLES
OF
RICHMOND PRINTS.

LADIES about buying their Spring
CALICOES
will find the latest and most tasteful designs in these standard goods.
ASK FOR THE
RICHMOND PRINTS.

KID GLOVES CLEANED, and returned in a few minutes, at the KID GLOVE DYE WORKS, 892 Bowery, N. Y.
Country orders solicited.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
are offering
EXTRAORDINARY INDUCEMENTS to purchasers in
CARPETS, CURTAINS,
FURNITURE COVERINGS, and every description
of
HOUSEKEEPING GOODS.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

A. T. STEWART & CO.
are offering for sale
a stock of
REAL INDIA CAMEL'S-HAIR SHAWLS, exceeding in value $250,000, a large portion of which were purchased during the siege of Paris, and which, for style, quality, and price, can not be excelled in this city or elsewhere.

BROADWAY, FOURTH AVENUE, NINTH AND TENTH STREETS.

ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth Street.
A LARGE LOT OF FINE
FRENCH MACHINE EMBROIDERY, suitable for summer dresses, &c., &c., will be offered on Monday,
Greatly Under Regular Prices.

MAGNIFICENT ASSORTMENT OF FINE CARPETS NOW OPEN.
"SMYRNA," "AUBUSSON," "AXMINSTER," AND "TOURNAY" CARPETS,
In One Piece.
Forming together the largest and most beautiful assortment of these goods EVER EXHIBITED IN THIS COUNTRY.
Also, Fresh Arrivals: "French Moquette," "Axminster," "Royal Wilton," "English Brussels," and "Tapestry," "3-Ply," and "Ingrain" CARPETS, and ENGLISH AND AMERICAN OILCLOTHS,
At Lowest Market Prices.

UPHOLSTERY DEPARTMENT.
Now open, a splendid assortment of Satin Damasks, Brocatelles; Plain, Striped, and Figured Silk Terries; Plain and Striped Worsted Terries; Tapestry and Cloth Covers.
BILLIARD CLOTHS, all Colors.
Satteens, Cretonnes, Chintzes, Furniture Twills, Swiss and Nottingham Curtains, Bed Spreads, Window Shades, Hair and Spring Mattresses, Pillows, Bolsters, &c., &c.,
AT VERY LOW PRICES.
ARNOLD, CONSTABLE, & CO.,
Broadway and Nineteenth St.

DIAMOND D MOHAIRS.

It has been almost impossible in this country to obtain a really good Alpaca which would retain its color and brilliancy. The enormous duties making goods cost high, the tendency has been to import Alpacas that would look cheap. Such goods, made of inferior materials, can not retain their appearance, and the result is, a lady saves seventy-five cents on a dress which costs $20 to make up, and is quite shabby in a few weeks. Satisfied the ladies would appreciate a really good Alpaca, we imported this first-class Alpaca, well known in England, France, and Germany, and the result has been (as we anticipated) a steadily increasing demand; and those who have worn them for some time say they will use no other, as they do not crease, wrinkle, or lose their color and brilliancy.
Unlike the ordinary Alpacas sold in this country, these goods have no dressing in them, and consequently are not injured by water, and may be sponged off when soiled. Their brilliancy is obtained by the wool they are made of, and not by hot pressing and high finishing, like the ordinary goods.
Do not buy an Alpaca till you look at these goods. Try them, and you will find they are all that is claimed for them.
They are now to be obtained from nearly all first-class retailers throughout the country.
Sole Importers, N. B. FALCONER & CO.

No more suffering from corns, bunions, grown-in toe nails, sore heels, or pinched feet. Let the motto be "Sound feet on sound bodies." Read
THE HUMAN FEET, THEIR DRESS AND CARE: showing their natural shape, their present deformed condition, and how distorted toes and other defects are to be prevented or corrected; with directions for dressing them elegantly and comfortably. Illustrated. Price, prepaid first post, $1 25.
Address S. R. WELLS, 389 Broadway, N. Y.

ANGLING and FISH-CULTURE.
SCOTT'S book on "FISHING IN AMERICAN WATERS," with 174 Illustrations, teaches the how and where to fish and propagate fishes. Crown 8vo, Cloth, $3 50. Mailed, prepaid, on receipt of price, by HARPER & BROTHERS, Publishers, New York.

BOOSEY'S COMPLETE OPERAS for Voice and Piano-forte, words in two languages. Price $1 each. Now ready: Don Juan, Fidelio, Il Barbiere, Sonnambula, Martha, Trovatore. Issued fortnightly. BOOSEY & CO., No. 4 Bond St., and W. A. POND & CO., No. 547 Broadway.

HINKLEY KNITTING MACHINE.
THE SIMPLEST, CHEAPEST, AND BEST IN USE! HAS BUT ONE NEEDLE! A CHILD CAN RUN IT!
Agents wanted in every Town.
Send for Circular and sample Stocking to
HINKLEY KNITTING MACH. CO., Bath, Me.

$60 A WEEK paid. If you want business, send stamp to NOVELTY CO., Saco, Me.

$300 A MONTH and expenses to good canvassers. Samples free. C. M. Linington, Chicago.

Digitized by Google

THE BEAVER BRAND

SILK-FINISHED

BLACK PURE MOHAIRS.

These GOODS are finished alike on both sides, and are distinguished for their silky appearance, brilliant lustre, and pure shade of fast Black. Being made of the very finest material, they positively excel all other Mohairs ever sold in the United States.

These beautiful Goods are sold by most of the leading Retail Dry-Goods Merchants in all the leading cities and towns throughout all the States.

☞ Purchasers will know these Goods, as a ticket is attached to each piece bearing a picture of the Beaver, precisely like the above.

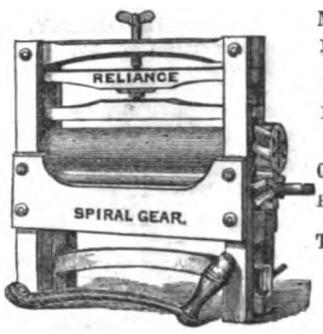
PEAKE, OPDYCKE, & CO.,
427 & 429 Broadway, New York,
Sole Importers of this Brand for the United States.

RELIANCE WRINGER,

PERFECTED 1871.



Moulton Rolls, Most Durable;
Spiral Cogs, Easiest Working;
Curved Clamp, Holds Firmest;
The Cheapest,
The Best,
TRY IT.

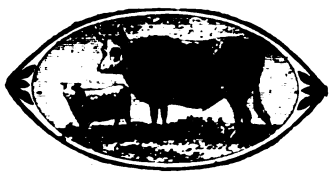
PROVIDENCE TOOL COMPANY,
11 Warren St., N. Y., and PROV., R. I.

Waltham Watches.

We claim for WALTHAM WATCHES more points of excellence than are found in those of any other manufacture. This is especially the case with those made for ladies' use. In their construction every care is taken to insure correct performance, and, although of small size, they are remarkably substantial; in this respect they essentially differ from the great majority of small foreign watches, which are so slightly made that their use, as time-keepers, must be very short and limited. The gold cases for these watches are of great variety, from the perfectly plain to the most elaborately ornamented. Every taste and purse can be suited. An examination of our assortment, which is by far the largest in the country, is respectfully solicited, and to those at a distance we will send our Illustrated Catalogue, on application by mail or otherwise. Please state that you saw this notice in Harper's Bazar.

HOWARD & CO.,
JEWELERS AND SILVERSMITHS,
No. 865 BROADWAY, NEW YORK.

Use none but



THE BEST!!!

TRADE MARK.

SOUPS AND BEEF TEA FOR THE MILLION.

Strengthening Nourishment! Economy in housekeeping!! LIEBIG'S COMPANY'S EXTRACT OF MEAT, the same that received the highest prizes at Paris, Havre, and Amsterdam, and that is supplied to the British, French, Russian, Prussian, and other Governments. None genuine without the signature of BARON LIEBIG, the inventor, on every jar.

Agents in San Francisco, CHURCH & CLARK; New Orleans, E. J. HART & CO. General Agents, J. MILHAU'S SONS, 183 Broadway, New York.

GETTING UP CLUBS.

Great Saving to Consumers.

Parties inquire how to get up clubs. Our answer is, send for Price-List, and a Club form will accompany it, with full directions, making a large saving to consumers and remunerative to Club organizers.

THE GREAT AMERICAN TEA CO.,
31 & 33 VESEY STREET,
P. O. Box 5643. NEW YORK.

THE NEW WILSON

Under-Feed Shuttle
SEWING MACHINES!
$25 cheaper than any other!
For Simplicity, Durability and Beauty they stand unrivalled! For STITCHING, HEMMING, TUCKING, FELLING, Quilting, CORDING, BINDING, BRAIDING, GATHERING, Gathering & sewing on gathers, they are unexcelled!
For particulars address Wilson Sewing Machine Co., CLEVELAND, O. or ST. LOUIS, MO.
AGENTS WANTED.

APRIL, MAY, and JUNE purify the blood and beautify the complexion by using HELMBOLD'S CATAWBA GRAPE-JUICE PILLS, and HELMBOLD'S HIGHLY CONCENTRATED FLUID EXTRACT SARSAPARILLA.

In the Spring and Summer months the system undergoes a change. This is the time to use good blood-renewing, purifying, and invigorating medicines. "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla," and "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Grape-Juice Pills," are the best and most reliable.

One bottle of "Helmbold's Fluid Extract Sarsaparilla" equals in strength one gallon of the syrup or decoction as made by druggists; and a wine-glass added to a pint of water equals the celebrated Lisbon Diet Drink—a delightful and healthful beverage.

The "Grape-Juice Pill" is composed of Fluid Extract of Catawba Grape-Juice and Fluid Extract Rhubarb. Useful in all diseases requiring a cathartic remedy, and far superior to all other purgatives, such as salts, magnesia, &c. "Helmbold's Grape-Juice Pill" is not a patented pill, put up as those ordinarily vended, but the result of ten years' experimenting and great care in preparation. Safe for and taken by children. No nausea; no griping pains; but mild, pleasant, and safe in operation. Two bottles of the "Fluid Extract of Sarsaparilla" and one bottle of the "Grape-Juice Pills" are worth their weight in gold to those suffering from bad blood, poor complexion, headache, nervousness, wakefulness at night, costiveness, and irregularities; and to those suffering from broken and delicate constitutions it will give new blood, new vigor, and new life. The "Catawba Grape Pills" are done up with great care and in handsome bottles, and will surpass all those vended in wooden boxes, and carelessly prepared by inexperienced men, comparing with the English and French style of manufacturing. All of H. T. Helmbold's preparations are Pharmaceutical, not a single one being patented, but all on their own merits. Prepared by

H. T. HELMBOLD, Practical and Analytical Chemist, Crystal Palace Pharmacy, 594 Broadway, New York.

P. S.—HELMBOLD'S EXTRACT BUCHU has gained a world-wide fame.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT.

THE RIGHTS OF THE SICK.

It is the right of every invalid to know what his medicine is, and why it is prescribed. Is any sufferer from dyspepsia, liver complaint, headache, costiveness, or heartburn desirous to know what is, and why he ought to take it? The answer is simple. It is the chemical equivalent of the Seltzer Spa Water, and the greatest physicians the world has ever seen have pronounced that water a specific for the complaints in question.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

SOLD BY ALL DRUGGISTS.

Madame Foy's Corset Skirt Supporter

Is superior to all Corsets for Health, Comfort and Style.

Lady Agents wanted in all Northern and Western States.

THE PANAMA SKELETON CORSET

Is not excelled for Summer wear.
ARNOLD & BANNING, 56 Lispenard St., New York; D. B. FISK & Co., Chicago; Agents for the Supporters.
HARMON, BALDWIN & FOY,
Sole Manufacturers, New Haven, Conn.

FOR

Hand and Machine Sewing.

J. & P. COATS'

BEST

SIX-CORD IN ALL NUMBERS,

From No. 8 to 100 inclusive.

FOR SALE BY

All Dealers in Dry Goods and Notions.

BLEES
NOISELESS,
LOCK-STITCH
SEWING MACHINE

Challenges the world in perfection of work, strength and beauty of stitch, durability of construction, and rapidity of motion. Call and examine. Send for circular. Agents wanted.

MANUFACTURED BY
BLEES
Sewing Machine Co.,
623 Broadway, N. Y.

FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE

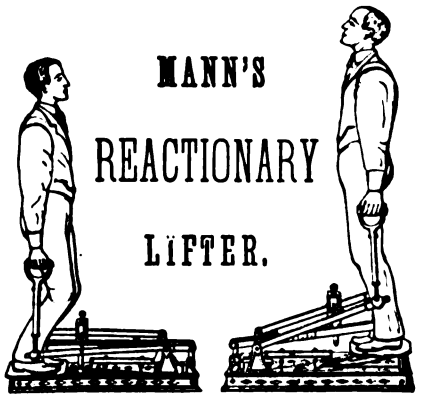
Cleans Kid Gloves and all kinds of Cloths and Clothing; removes Paint, Grease, Tar, &c., instantly, without the least injury to the finest fabric. Sold by Druggists and Fancy Goods Dealers. FRAGRANT SAPOLIENE CO., 83 Barclay St., New York; 46 La Salle St., Chicago.

CARBOLIC HEALING COMPOUND C.S. SALVE

Beautifies the complexion by removing Pimples and all other disagreeable disorders of the skin. Twenty-five cents per box.

JOHN F. HENRY, Sole Proprietor,
No. 8 College Place, New York.

MANN'S REACTIONARY LIFTER.



Is the most remarkable apparatus ever invented for health exercise. A few minutes each day is sufficient. Taken at night induces refreshing sleep. It is adapted alike to the strong or weak, and especially to ladies in a delicate state of health. One of the greatest blessings to them ever discovered. Circulars showing this peculiarity, and books, delivered or sent free on application.

Call and see it, at the office of MANN'S REACTIONARY LIFTER COMPANY, 865 Broadway, New York, or address as above by mail.

THEA-NECTAR
IS A PURE
BLACK TEA
WITH THE
Green-Tea Flavor.
WARRANTED
TO SUIT ALL TASTES.

A Great Offer.—HORACE WATERS, 481 Broadway, N. Y., will dispose of One Hundred PIANOS, MELODEONS, and ORGANS, of six first-class makers, including Waters', AT EXTREMELY LOW PRICES, FOR CASH, DURING THIS MONTH, or will take a portion cash and balance in monthly or quarterly installments.

WANTED—AGENTS ($20 per day), to sell the celebrated HOME SHUTTLE SEWING MACHINE. Has the under-feed, makes the "lock stitch" (alike on both sides), and is fully licensed. The best and cheapest family Sewing Machine in the market. Address JOHNSON, CLARK, & CO., Boston, Mass.; Pittsburgh, Pa.; Chicago, Ill.; or St. Louis, Mo.

HOMAI'S PERSIAN WASH

REMOVES MOTH PATCH, TAN, & FRECKLES. Never fails. For sale by all Druggists.
B. F. RACKLEY, Proprietor, Dover, N. H.

RUPTURE, ABDOMINAL WEAKNESS, or CORPULENCY.—Relief and Cure. Seeley's Hard-Rubber Trusses and Supporters. Late patterns, indestructible (steel coated), cleanly, light, safe, comfortable. Also, Bandages, &c. Estabts.: 1347 Chest. St., Phila., and 3 Ann St., N. Y. Send for Pamphlet.

AGENTS! READ THIS!

WE WILL PAY AGENTS A SALARY OF $30 PER WEEK and Expenses, or allow a large commission, to sell our new and wonderful inventions. Address M. WAGNER & CO., Marshall, Mich.

W. D. WILSON & CO., 327 Pearl St., N. Y., furnish Printing Ink for Harper's Weekly and Bazar.

Cut Paper Patterns

OF SUITS IN

HARPER'S BAZAR.

Arrangements have been made to furnish CUT PAPER PATTERNS of the beautiful Paris Costumes which it is intended shall appear frequently in Harper's Bazar. These Patterns are GRADED TO FIT ANY FIGURE, from 30 to 46 inches Bust Measure, and are fitted with the greatest accuracy, THE NAMES AND DIRECTIONS FOR PUTTING TOGETHER BEING PRINTED ON EACH SEPARATE PIECE OF THE PATTERN, SO as to be adjusted by the most inexperienced.

The following patterns are now ready:

Vol. III.

WATTEAU-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	No. 22
TRAINED CARRIAGE SUIT	" 24
POMPADOUR-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 26
SHORT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 28
TRAINED HOUSE DRESS	" 30
POINTED-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 32
PEASANT-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 34
TRAINED EVENING DRESS	" 38
TRAINED STREET SUIT	" 40
BLOUSE-WAIST WALKING SUIT	" 42
POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 44
HIGH-WAIST TRAINED SUIT	" 46
VEST-CASAQUE WALKING SUIT	" 48
DOUBLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 49
SINGLE-BREASTED SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 50

Vol. IV.

WORTH-BASQUE HOUSE DRESS	" 1
LADY'S GORED WRAPPER	" 5
LADY'S WATER-PROOF CLOAK	" 11
APRON-POLONAISE WALKING SUIT	" 13
POSTILION-BASQUE WALKING SUIT	" 15
SHORT-SACQUE WALKING SUIT	" 17

The Publishers will send either Pattern by mail, prepaid, on receipt of TWENTY-FIVE CENTS and BUST MEASURE. The same Patterns cost sixty cents in gold in Paris. The whole set of Nine Sizes will be sent for $2 00. No patterns separated or exchanged.

In ordering, please specify the Number of paper containing Suit and send Bust Measure. Dealers supplied at the usual discount.

HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Valuable New Books,

PUBLISHED BY

HARPER & BROTHERS, NEW YORK.

☞ Sent by mail, postage prepaid, to any part of the United States, on receipt of the price

HARPER'S MAGAZINE for MAY, 1871.

HEAT: being Part I. of Science for the Young. By JACOB ABBOTT. Copiously Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

DE WITT'S MOTHERLESS. Motherless; or, A Parisian Family. For Girls in their Teens. Translated from the French of Madame Guizot De Witt by the Author of "John Halifax, Gentleman." Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

DIARY of the BESIEGED RESIDENT IN PARIS. Reprinted from the London "Daily News," with Several New Letters and Preface. 8vo, Paper, 60 cents.

SMITH'S ENGLISH-LATIN DICTIONARY. A Copious and Critical English-Latin Dictionary. Compiled from Original Sources. By WM. SMITH, D.C.L., LL.D., Editor of the Classical Dictionaries, Curtius's Greek Grammar, the Student's Hume, the Student's Greece, Old and New Testament Histories, &c.; and THEOPHILUS D. HALL, M.A., Fellow of University College, London. To which is added a Dictionary of Proper Names. 8vo, Sheep, $6 00.

THE MUTINEERS OF THE BOUNTY. Some Account of the Mutineers of the Bounty and their Descendants in Pitcairn and Norfolk Islands. By LADY BELCHER. Illustrated. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

TODD'S APPLE CULTURIST. The Apple Culturist. A Complete Treatise for the Practical Pomologist. To Aid in Propagating the Apple, and Cultivating and Managing Orchards. Illustrated with Engravings of Fruit, Young and Old Trees, and Mechanical Devices employed in Connection with Orchards and the Management of Apples. By SERENO EDWARDS TODD, Author of "Young Farmer's Manual," &c. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50.

OUR GIRLS. By DIO LEWIS, A.M., M.D. 12mo, Cloth, $1 50. (Ninth Edition.)

HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

TERMS for HARPER'S MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, and BAZAR.

HARPER'S MAGAZINE,	One Year	$4 00
HARPER'S WEEKLY,	One Year	4 00
HARPER'S BAZAR,	One Year	4 00

HARPER'S MAGAZINE, HARPER'S WEEKLY, and HARPER'S BAZAR, to one address, for one year, $10 00; or any two for $7 00.

An Extra Copy of either the MAGAZINE, WEEKLY, or BAZAR will be supplied gratis for every Club of FIVE SUBSCRIBERS at $4 00 each, in one remittance; or, Six Copies for $20 00, without extra copy.

The Postage within the United States is for the MAGAZINE 24 cents a year, for the WEEKLY or BAZAR 20 cents a year, payable yearly, semi-yearly, or quarterly, at the office where received. Subscriptions from the Dominion of Canada must be accompanied with 24 cents additional for the MAGAZINE, or 20 cents for the WEEKLY or BAZAR, to prepay the U. S. postage.

The Volumes of the MAGAZINE commence with the Numbers for June and December of each year. Subscriptions may commence with any Number. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to begin with the first Number of the current Volume, and back Numbers will be sent accordingly.

The Volumes of the WEEKLY and BAZAR commence with the year. When no time is specified, it will be understood that the subscriber wishes to commence with the Number next after the receipt of his order.

When the subscriber's address is to be changed, both the old and new one must be given. It is not necessary to give notice of discontinuance.

In remitting by mail, a Post-Office Order or Draft payable to the order of HARPER & BROTHERS is preferable to Bank Notes, since, should the Order or Draft be lost or stolen, it can be renewed without loss to the sender.

TERMS FOR ADVERTISING IN HARPER'S PERIODICALS.

Harper's Magazine.—Whole Page, $500; Half Page, $250; Quarter Page, $150—each insertion.

Harper's Weekly.—Inside Pages, $1 50 per Line; Outside Page, $2 00 per Line—each insertion.

Harper's Bazar.—$1 00 per Line; Cuts and Display, $1 25 per Line—each insertion.

Address HARPER & BROTHERS, New York.

Digitized by Google

DESIGNS AFTER NATURE.

GRAND BACK-HAIR SENSATION FOR THE COMING SEASON.

FACETIÆ.

A YOUNG beginner writes to know whether, if a man gives him pepper, he can charge the man with a salt? (We require time to think this over.)

CRUELTY.—A well-to-do Deal fisherman, on his daughter's wedding-day, lately, gave her a smack.

Although a blacksmith is a forger, you can not fairly call him a thief because he nails shoes.

PROVERBIAL.—Where there's a wheel there's generally a way.

A poor washer-woman says that while there's life there's soap. Let's soap so, lather.

THE LATEST EDITION OF (H)OIL'S GAMES—A petroleum explosion.

THE LANGUAGE OF FLOWERS.

We often hear of the "pink of propriety." Can we not with equal propriety speak of the "lie-lack of truth?"

Is Hollyhock to be added to the list of British wines?

How is the disturbed state of the Continent likely to affect the coming up of single and double stocks? Is it likely to interfere with the dividend on ten weeks' stocks?

Is it possible to utilize the clippings of phlox for any other purpose than that of coverings for beds?

The emblem of Ireland is a shamrock. A pink would be more appropriate for a car-nation.

What tax hurts nobody?—Taxidermy.

A DRY REMARK.—"Keep your powder dry!" Yes, by all means; but if you think you can best attain that object by keeping it in the oven, don't expect us to call on you.

OVER THE RING-FENCE.

MY ANCESTOR.

My ancestor—'twas ages, please,
Ere swells of Norman blood
Could boast of genealogic trees;
They were not e'en in bud!—
My ancestor he owned a tree, broad-boughed and strong and high:
What peer can boast an ancestor more highly born than I?

He valued money not a jot,
Of rank he took no heed;
But daily food by labor got,
His family to feed.
For no one did he friendship feign; he never told a lie:
What peer can boast an ancestor more finely bred than I?

He did not care about French cooks,
But chiefly lived on fruit;
He never read improper books,
At law ne'er had a suit;
His loving spouse no chignon wore; she did not paint or dye:
What peer can boast of ancestors more virtuous than I?

'Tis true that he had pointed ears,
Was hairy, wore a tail;
He went on all fours, it appears,
And trees was wont to scale
(He sprang—so Darwin says—from an Ascidian, by-the-bye):
Well, who can boast an ancestor more wonderful than I?

CHI-GNON É VERO!

"My love," said Mrs. Maydup to her spouse on returning from her drive, "I have had a hair-breadth escape."

"Ah," said the brute, "you were well out of danger if it was the same hair that you've got on now!"

ACCOUNTED FOR AT LAST.—Is it not strange that the "best man" at a wedding is not the bridegroom? This must be the reason of so many unhappy marriages.

An enraged man tears his hair, but an enraged woman tears her husband's.

ONE TOO MANY.—The pleasures of the poor man are few, yet we would gladly see him less frequently roll in his carriage.

A correspondent writes to ask if the brow of a hill ever becomes wrinkled? The only information we can give him on the point is that we have often seen it furrowed.

HOW TO RAISE BEETS.—Take hold of the tops and pull.

A Frenchman took a room in Paris on condition that the landlady would wake him up every morning at eight o'clock, and tell him the day of the week, the state of the weather, and under what form of government he lived.

A teacher of vocal music asked an old lady if her grandson had an ear for music. "Wa'al," said the old woman, "I really don't know; won't you take the candle and see?"

A LOGICAL REFUTATION OF MR. DARWIN'S THEORY.

JACK (who has been reading passages from the "Descent of Man" to the Wife whom he adores, but loves to teaze). "So you see, Mary, Baby is descended from a Hairy Quadruped with Pointed Ears and a Tail. We all are!"

MARY. "Speak for yourself, Jack! I'm not descended from any thing of the kind, I beg to say; and Baby takes after Me. So there!"

THE SAME, WITH A DIFFERENCE.

LADY. "I think you said your name was Mary?"

NEW BROOM. "No, Mem, not exactly Mairey—it's Sairey, and you Spells it with a Hess instead of a Nem."

Digitized by Google

HARPER'S BAZAR.

A Repository of Fashion, Pleasure, and Instruction.

VOL. IV.—No. 19.] NEW YORK, SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1871. [SINGLE COPIES TEN CENTS. $4.00 PER YEAR IN ADVANCE.

Entered according to Act of Congress, in the Year 1871, by Harper & Brothers, in the Office of the Librarian of Congress, at Washington.

EVENING TOILETTE.

THIS exquisite dress is made of cerise silk, trimmed with puffings of the same, and flounces and tablier of rich point lace. The low corsage and short sleeves are trimmed to match the skirt, and worn over a lace chemise Russe. White lilies with green leaves ornament the dress and hair. Necklace, ear-rings, and bracelets of Moorish gold.

PROVERBS.

LORD CHESTERFIELD says that "no man of fashion ever uses a proverb." But in all ages of the world there has been a manifest fondness for proverbs and for proverbial phrases. And this fondness has displayed itself not only among the common people, but among men of intellectual culture as well.

Perhaps his lordship would hardly have classed King David's son among "men of fashion," but Solomon must at least be allowed to have been a very splendid fellow in mind and in tastes, whatever moderns may think of his manners. And Solomon was very much given to packing his intellectual wares in portable parcels. He is said to have uttered three thousand proverbs.

Aristotle most decidedly was not a man of fashion, but he was a man of genius and great intellectual force, a force not wholly spent on syllogysms and syllogistic reasoning, as we learn that he found time and inclination to collect a book of proverbs, which had come down to his time from those who were to him "the ancients." Indeed, the "learned Stagirite" held the theory that there had been a very ancient philosophy, from the wrecks of which proverbs had been preserved by reason of their brevity and elegance.

St. Paul was not a "man of fashion," but he was a man of great mental power and great sanctity, and he did not disdain to point a lofty moral by the quotation of a proverb from a comic poet, when he repeated Menander's adage, "Evil communications corrupt good manners."

The Spanish tongue is full of the most astute, elegant, and pungent proverbs, and much of the charm of Cervantes's immortal "Don Quixote" is in the apt use and application of the proverbs of the country, and in the formation of fresh proverbial phrases.

There are hundreds of proverbs in the writings of Shakspeare which are remembered and quoted by very many who do not know the plot of a single one of his plays. Indeed, his genius is largely exhibited by his frequent putting of so much of the common-sense and the common feeling of mankind into a few admirably plain and memorable words. A popular book of such might be collected from his plays.

Matthew Henry's "Commentary on the Bible," which is rich in excellent exposition and homily, is spangled with star sentences of the brightest wisdom. Another and an excellent book might be made by collecting these incisive sentences.

We must conclude that Lord Chesterfield was more fastidious as to his manners than as to his morals when he forbade the use of proverbs in good society. It is to be recollected that the masters in any department are those who produce what the mass of the people in several successive generations adopt and preserve. It is so in philosophy, in painting, in music, in poetry, and in eloquence. Proverbs have their existence by the popular approval.

It is difficult to define what all so well understand. Howell's "ingredients of a good proverb" are well known. It must have shortness, sense, and salt. If it becomes long it will run into parable, or fable, or allegory. It can scarcely extend beyond a single sentence. There must be very much sense in very few words, and the wit seems to lie in the comparison we make between the great sense and the little sentence which holds it. But some "sense" is almost as vapid as nonsense, and as heavy as stupidity. The proverb must have that pungency which we attempt to describe by the word "salt," a quality that is preservative as well as pungent. Perhaps we might add "sound" to Howell's catalogue of ingredients, as we discover in our attempts to translate a proverb from one language to another, in which we may have preserved shortness, sense, and salt, and yet what has survived several generations in one language can not be made to find a place in the uses of the people who speak another.

If we should be called upon to say what a proverb is, we should content ourselves by combining and modifying the definitions of Cervantes and Earl Russell, and saying that it is the wisdom and long experience of many briefly expressed by the wit of one.

The longevity of proverbs, and their naturalization in many tongues, is shown by the history of the old Hebrew "carrying oil to the city of olives," which passed through the Persian "carrying pepper to Hindostan" into the English "carrying coals to Newcastle."

An amusing story is told by a recent American traveler who visited the house of a Chinese gentleman, where he found the walls adorned with scrolls, inscribed with proverbs and pithy sayings of the Chinese classical writers. In the study was a scroll, richly covered with silk and gilt ornaments, indicating the high value set on it by the owner. The guest learned that his host was liberal enough to believe that all the wisdom of the world was not confined to the Chinese, and so had been at great pains

EVENING TOILETTE.

Digitized by Google

to obtain a popular English proverb. To that end he had dispatched his agent to the treaty ports where foreign hongs were allowed, and the agent had brought back this, which he had found hung up in all the English and American stores, which, therefore, he supposed was a cherished English proverb. It was carefully and reverently unwrapped, and the astonished American beheld a yellow card, on which was conspicuously printed, "Bent & Co.'s Water Crackers for Family Use or packed for Shipment!"

ROSES.

BY HARRIET PRESCOTT SPOFFORD.

Roses she has, to remember,
Roses of summer and south;
Roses that burned the redder
For a long and thirsty drouth.

Roses, plucked when strolling,
To wear on a trembling breast;
Roses on cheek and forehead,
Blooming with love confessed.

Roses heavy with fragrance,
Sweeter for every sigh;
Roses, passionate roses,
That never shall fade or die!

Roses she has, to remember,
Roses of summer and south;
But the reddest of all the roses
Is the rose on her baby's mouth.

HARPER'S BAZAR.

SATURDAY, MAY 13, 1871.

☞ Our next Supplement Number will be an unusually attractive one. It will contain an extra-sized Pattern Sheet, with from forty to fifty patterns and illustrations of every variety of Spring and Summer Walking Suits, Wrappings, Blouse-Waists, etc., etc., for Ladies and Children; and numerous beautiful and ingenious Fancy Articles; together with other fine engravings, and interesting literary matter.

☞ We would call the attention of our readers to the Advertisement on page 287 of this Number, containing the complete list of the Cut Paper Patterns published by us.

A GOOD WORD FOR CHILDREN.

THE Bazar does not consider itself called to any high moral mission, to push forward any special reformation, or to champion any particular rights. And yet the Bazar would not be considered heartless and dead to any of the interests of humanity. It would always be found, quite modestly but quite certainly, on the right side of every question in which society has any interest. It will, therefore, give a few lines to the cause of those who can not plead for themselves in print—namely, little children.

When good Mr. BERGH, in pushing his care for dumb animals, infringes on the interests or feelings of other animals that are not dumb—namely, drivers and conductors—they naturally cry out, "Is not a man better than many horses?" Perhaps Mr. BERGH might be induced to admit that, with certain explanatory provisions; but then he would say the man can plead for himself, the horse can not. Animated by similar generous sentiments, we desire to say a few words for children.

It is a bad sign in any community to have few children. It does not speak well for the high health of any family in which there are no children, if a family can at all be considered to exist without children. It is a very bad moral symptom where children are not desired. Children are sanitary, are a discipline, are a "means of grace," are a "hope of glory." They are the most important members of a family. The older members work for them, not they for their seniors. They live like the lilies, clothed without care. They are little kings and queens, truly and legitimately, "by the grace of God."

It is absurd and it is wicked and it is injurious to snub them. They must increase, while we must decrease. It is, therefore, as foolish for age to treat childhood lightly as it would be for the setting star to slight the rising sun. It is wicked, because older people have the power, to hurt the feelings and the character of a child while the child has no redress; and it is injurious, because it dwarfs the man who offers and the child who suffers the slight.

The proverb, "Little children should be seen, and not heard," has been the bane of many a young life, and the blight of many a domestic circle. It has been let down as an extinguisher on many a bright little head, and has effectually extinguished it. We never knew it to be used with propriety and wit except when the child that was called up to recite a lesson it had not learned put in the plea, "Little children should be seen, and not heard!"

They should be both seen and heard. If possible, they ought never to be out of sight. They should be heard, because they have so much to say and so much to learn. No one can be long acquainted with a child that has not been repressed without noticing how wonderfully fresh, generally, and how marvelously profound, very often, are the thoughts and questions of the youngsters. They are little strangers from another land, making naïve comments upon what they see in this. They are not afraid. They have no consistency to care for, no position to maintain, no policy to carry forward. They are truthful. They rebuke falsehoods and conventionalities. If their speeches are embarrassing, it is because our speeches are wrong. When little Tom Williams asked Miss Amanda, last week, where her other face was, and in reply to her exclamation of astonishment said, "because ma says you carry two faces," the mother, who had been talking so blandly to Amanda, should not have considered her son "a horrid boy;" she should not have said that Amanda carried two faces.

We put off children because we can not answer their questions, have not the frankness to say "I do not know," and the industry to go and learn, and come and instruct the child.

This snubbing of children loses to grown people all that would come to them from the questions and sayings of the young. It represses the natural curiosity of childhood, that curiosity which is the basis of all acquisition of learning and the stimulus of all intellectual culture. It also represses all originality. The child becomes a mute until he can become a mimic. He watches others older than himself, uttering speeches and performing acts suitable to their age, but not to his. He imitates them, because he has become afraid to ask questions. And so we all become painfully uniform.

Children ought to be heard; it is due them. They ought to be seen; it is due us. The banishment of children from society is a mistake and a loss. Who is so great a guest that we may allow him, whom we have invited, to exclude from our board the little guest whom God has sent? If our invited guest be worthy a place at our table, he will feel that our invitation was all the more cordial, and he was all the more welcome, because we did not allow his arrival to banish the purest, noblest, and best members of our own families.

MANNERS UPON THE ROAD.

Of Amphion and his Lyre.

MY DEAR JOEL,—The other evening I was bidden to a birthday party, and Medicus brought his magic lantern. He made it himself, and he and Junior painted the slides, some of which were so grotesquely comical that I am sorry for those who have not seen them. But there were some classic figures, as they are called, outlines of mythological persons and scenes, which gave Flaxman, from whose designs they were copied, altogether a new beauty and value. If these amateur artists could spare the time they might, with proper magnifiers, reproduce Raphael's "Hours" as large as life, if it were desirable, and with an unsurpassable effect. But there was one scene, taken, I believe, from an old alto-relievo in Rome, which was most significant of all. It was Mercury giving the lyre, or lute, to Amphion. Amphion of the heavenly blood-royal, bred among the shepherds, and forever famous, is one of the figures of the old story which is most familiar and suggestive. And as he was brought before us by the magic light, Zenobia turned her superb head to me and said,

"Mr. Bachelor, what a pity such a guest should be only a shadow!"

"But he is in the room," I answered.

"I see him," she said again, smiling, with her eyes fixed upon the picture.

"No," I whispered, "not in the picture, but in the flesh. Amphion of the old legend, Amphion of the celestial line, Amphion of the wonder-working lyre, is bodily present in this room."

Of course in the darkness I could not see her expression, but I imagined it from the tone of her voice, as she said,

"The obscurity of the room has passed into Mr. Bachelor's conversation."

"On the contrary, his meaning is as light and distinct as that outline upon the screen. For, Zenobia, what was Amphion?" I asked.

"He was the marvelous musician who played the walls of Thebes into place, whose lyre drew form from chaos."

"The same magician is in this room."

Zenobia was silent, and I knew that she was wondering who it was that I meant. But, my dear Joel, if our own life did not interpret to us the life of other times and people, it would be all a blank to us. When the philosophers say that the world is created every day, what do they mean but that all the possibilities, the powers, the passions of human nature which have made every epoch in history, which have inspired all art and poetry and song, are as fresh and abounding to-day as they ever were? In the earliest legend that remains to us we read of the siege of Troy, and when we are told that Achilles was dipped in the Styx and was invulnerable, and that now for the Greeks, now for the Trojans, the gods and goddesses contended, we know that it is a way of saying that there was the safety that always springs from heroism and genius. That is our earliest story, and the latest is told in the newspaper every morning. The father at the breakfast-table reads of the siege of Paris, with its episodes of cruelty and bravery and folly; and his son runs off with shining morning face to school to read the same story under other names and in another language. Homer is real; Homer interests us to-day because we are doing and thinking what Homer describes. I look out of my window and I see Sir Philip Sidney going down town. I go to church, and there sits William of Orange in the corner pew. I pass a glittering carriage in the Park, and lo! Judas Iscariot taking his evening drive.

